In the House, the Copper Tariff bill was passed over the President's veto, 138 to 66.—The report of the New Orleans Riots Committee was agreed to.—The report of the Special Commissioner of Revenue—Mr. Wells—was also adopted.

February 24:

In the Senate, the Copper Tariff bill was passed over the President's veto, 38 to 12.

The Senate took up the bill to strengthen public credit and legalize gold contracts was passed, 119 to 61.

February 25:

In the Senate, the bill to exempt manufacturers of Sewing Machines for domestic use from taxation was passed.

In the House, the Senate bill authorizing certain National Banks to change their names was passed.—The report of the Joint Committee on the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation bill was disagreed to.

—The Constitutional Amendment proposition relating to suffrage, reported by the Southern Committee, was passed, 150 to 45.

February 26:

In the Senate, the Constitutional Amendment proposition was passed in the same form as in the House, 39 to 12. It does not include the right to hold office.

In the House, the Deficiency Appropriation bill was passed.

February 27:

In the House, the contested election cases of Messrs. Arnell and Bowen were the subject of a long discussion, and both gentlemen were refused seats. Mr. Arnell's claim appears to be based by the majority of San Francisco. The reason given is the immorality of the Democratic party. Rather hard on John Chinaman!

A report was received at Corpus Christi, Texas, on the 9d of February, to the effect that two hundred Indians had attacked the ranches of Los Angeles and Los Amios, on the road to Brownsville, and slaughtered the two Mexican families occupying the premises, women, and children. Troops were at once sent in pursuit.

A very serious difficulty has arisen between Bishop MCGOVERN and the Catholics of Altoona. It appears that the Bishop removed Rev. Thomas O'Flaherty, Rector and Superior of the Asylum of Providence, a few years since, and appointed Rev. M. Kavanagh in his place. On Sunday, February 20, Father O'Flaherty attempted to say mass, when the congregation refused to allow a public recognition of Kavanagh, and to allow him to proceed. A number of the prominent members took Kavanagh from the altar, and he was quietly led him out of the church, and the Bishop was notified of the affair. At a subsequent meeting the congregation resolved to stand by their old pastor, recognized the action of the Bishop and his clergy, they would no longer submit to the "one-man power" which they had exercised over them, but to appeal to the Pope if necessary. They also resolved that the new pastor should not occupy the parsonage.

The locomotive tender, the express cars, baggage cars, and a Pullman sleeping car of an express train on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad, struck near Gaines Station, on the 23d of February, by a locomotive and express and baggage cars, thrown into a ditch, and the sleeping car was thrown across the track. Several persons were seriously injured.

David T. Valentine, Clerk of the Common Council for more than thirty years, and grandfather of "Valentine's Manual," died on the afternoon of February 26.

The trial of Fanning Bouton for perjury in the city sentenced ten burglars to State Prisons. The day after the sentence he was convicted on the same charge.

The Naval Monument Committee, of which Vice-Admiral Farragut is Chairman, has collected sufficient funds for the erection of a monument to the memory of the officers, sailors, and marines who fell in the different battles during our late sanguinary war.

FOREIGN NEWS.

In the British House of Parliament February 22 Mr. Fortescue stated that the Government proposed to release forthwith the Fenian prisoners, some of whom are leaders in the late insurrectionary movements. Baron Lionel de Rothschild has been elected to the British Parliament. The Fenian prisoners, Costello and Warren, who were sentenced to death, have had their sentences commuted.

Another Polar expedition has sailed from Bremen.

The Danish Minister of War urges the sale of the Danish West Indies to the United States.

The dedication of the American Methodist Theological Seminary at Frankfort-on-the-Maine took place on the 18th of January, and the clergy and presiding elders from all parts of Germany and other countries were present. Addresses were made in German by many of the clergy, and by some of the professors, and in English by G. F. Kettell, United States Consul, Frankfort; by Mr. Murphy, United States Consul, Frankfort, and by Professor M'Clintock, United States Consul, Frankfort. The seminary is a large four-story brick building in the eastern part of the city, commanding a fine view of Frankfort and vicinity. It cost will be about 400,000 francs, and the gift of T. Martin, Esq., against 65. General Prim has assured the Cortes that the late dynasty would never reascend the throne.

CUBA.

We have advices of a battle fought at the mouth of the Donuji, in which the Government troops were successful. An order has been issued to the troops in the field to take no prisoners in arms. The captured are to be executed by the stick. Accounts from Santiago de Cuba state that the cholera is still raging, and the insurgents are destroying the plantations in that vicinity.

"Liberty! Freedom! Tyranny is dead!
Run hence, proclaim, cry it about the streets."

THE POLITICAL DEATH OF THE BOGUS CÆSAR.

"Some to the common pulpits, and cry out LIBERTY, FREEDOM, AND ENFRANCHISEMENT!"

THE MYSTERY OF THE LOEW BRIDGE.

I.—FROM HIS DIARY.

I AM not a spiritualist—I dare not be. People strong of nerve may stand on the brink of the precipice, on the edge of the parapet, and, looking down, compute the dizzy depth. If I tremblingly approach a sickening horror seizes all my senses, a devil's voice hisses in my ear, Cast thyself down from hence! Men of logical mind may draw aside the curtain of the grave and throw the steady plumb-line of their philosophic gaze into the yawning abysses of eternity. But for me—too well I know that "that way madness lies." Those who will may laugh at ghosts, or seek to meet them. I dare not believe or disbelieve. The air around us may be thronged with spirits; we may live in their world, as insects live in ours, all unconscious of the higher existences about us; I shut my eyes. I never wish to see one, or for an instant to imagine that I do. I dread the possible phantasms of a fevered brain as much as the real phantoms whose apparition would craze it.

"From all crafts and assaults of the devil, Good Lord deliver us!"

I am not a timid man. No one dares call me a coward. I fought my way through the four years of the Rebellion, and won my major's straps in the charge at Gettysburg. I can lift with pride these heavy masses of hair and show the gleaming white scar that marks clear across my skull the lightning course of one of those bullets from which I never flinched. But my weapons are not spiritual, and I would rather meet my deadliest foe in open fight at noonday than encounter the "dear departed shade" of my best friend in "the dead waste and middle of the night."

Ghosts never walk in sunlight, do they?

It is inexplicable. I can not bear to think of it, and that is why I have filled this page of my diary with mornizing instead of a simple record of the day's adventures, as my habit is. I can not stop thinking of it, so perhaps I had better write it down and see if I can not get rid of the burden that oppresses me by giving up its keeping to this journal, which no eye but my own can ever see.

It is only a photograph—or rather a ferreotype—of the Fulton Street Bridge, and one of the crowds that daily assemble upon that elevated thoroughfare. Only a ferreotype, and I have another like it, though taken on a different day. Both are poorly taken, and to a casual eye the second seems a duplicate of the first, though of course the crowds are different. They are much alike; that is the trouble—too much alike.

In the first place, I am in each of them, and in nearly the same position. There, in about the middle of the bridge, near the railing, is my face—there, just under—

This is how I came to have it taken. New York is a great city. It can afford to throw twenty thousand dollars into the mud, as Sir Walter cast his velvet cloak, to save royal feet a wetting, and then stand by and laugh to see the sovereigns ignore and pass around it, and laugh at them if they don't. The papers say that only country people avail themselves of the new bridge. I am a countryman, I suppose, and I am not ashamed to own it, though I might say instead that I am in business in the city. But, in fact, my business only calls me into town two or three times a week, and I still live in my father's home on the farm in New Jersey where I was born. I had hoped by this time to be living in a home of my own, with wife and children about me; but now— Well, I have told my journal that secret too.

"IS THAT THE WAY IT LOOKS ON THE BRIDGE?"

As I was starting for the city last Friday my little sister Sue called after me,

"Do, Harry, bring me home a picture of the Fulton Street Bridge."

I remembered her as I passed it going to my lunch, and, as much to please her as to gratify my own curiosity, I mounted the long staircase, intending to surprise her with a picture of myself in that of the bridge.

With this intention I elbowed my way through the crowd, and obtained a position close to the railing on the lower side, which would be, as nearly as I could calculate, in the direct focus of the camera. The view of Broadway from this point was an interesting one, and I watched the counter currents of humanity flowing ceaselessly through it, with pleasure at first. But even such an elevation as I looked down from was enough to make my head a little dizzy, and I was glad when the eccentric photographer, who daily takes the bridge as Joshua took Jericho, with the blast of a trumpet, sounded his horn to give warning of his purpose, while the veiled eye of the camera was slowly turned upon the expectant crowd.

There was a sudden stir and rustle as each one endeavored to strike an attitude supposed to be becoming; again the horn sounded; a sudden quiet and silence fell upon us; the veil was drawn from the eye of the Cyclops, and we remained petrified for an eternity of five seconds, till one more blast broke the spell and set us free.

I took one glance up Broadway, and then hurried down on the other side of the bridge, glad enough to find my feet on a level with terra firma once more.

Then I ran up to the photographer's saloon, paid my twenty-five cents, just glanced at the picture to assure myself that it was the right one, and, recognizing my own face, put the precious article into my pocket-book and hurried away to my restaurant, where I had appointed a meeting on business with a gentleman. From that time until I had to take the boat to catch the last train which could get me home that night, I was so pressed that I could not even read the day's papers. So, when I got on the train, I borrowed a lantern of the conductor, whom I knew, and, sitting in a freight car, enjoyed them and my pipe all the way home.

As I unfolded the Herald my eye was caught by one of the "personals," because of its heading:

Fulton Street Bridge. First time. Meet again on Monday. Spirit.

Of course I forgot the foolish thing as soon as I read it, and occupied myself with the more important topics of the paper.

It was late when I reached the house, and, letting myself in with my night-key, I walked softly up the stairs to my room. But there was a light in the one next to it, which was Sue's. She is a romantic child, and I suspect her of sitting up late sometimes to read novels. She heard my step, and threw open her door to meet me, making a pretty picture as she stood on the threshold in her scarlet dressing-sack and white skirts, with her dark hair unbound and rippling over her shoulders.

FÊTES OF THE VICEROY OF EGYPT AT CAIRO—THE DROMEDARY RACE.

[SEE PAGE 167.]

"Oh, Harry! have you brought me the picture?"

"Yes, little gossip, come and get it," I said, throwing my arm around her waist, and kissing her rose lips in hearty, big-brother style as I drew her into my room.

"Why don't you wear your hair that way all the time, Sue? It's all the fashion in New York. Or, if you'd rather make some money, cut it off and send it to one of the city girls to sew on to her hat. That's the way they do. Whew—isn't it long?" and I drew it through my fingers admiringly, till she rolled me a heavy bag for tangling it, and commenced diving unceremoniously into the depths of my over-coat pockets.

"Not there, child; you are not acquainted with the topography of a gentleman's pockets. There, do you know my one in that crowd?" I threw the picture on the bureau before her.

"Oh, Harry, there you are yourself, you dear old thing! I knew you in a minute, though you have got new mustaches. What did you move your head for? Is that the way it looks on the bridge? How funny! But who is that looking over your shoulder?"

"Some rag-picker, I suppose, or maybe a pickpocket; there were plenty of them in it. But I laughed, and took up the picture to examine it for the first time.

It was crude. I saw nothing remarkable at first, but as I held the picture to the light under my student-lamp I did perceive, dimly visible in the through the mist, a face very different from all the rest, just above my left shoulder. It seemed to fill up an opening in the crowd of heads, but was only visible for the light which belonged to it. It was a woman's face, and different from the rest in that it was unadorned by any bonnet. It was going to my unclothed, but what face is not in these days?), in that the eyes were closed, or nearly so, in that the whole expression was out of death, not life.

Perhaps I am making my description more accurate than it could have been then, because a little matter had not noticed as much as this, I know, and the whole impression was so blurred that only a critical eye could have discovered the one face from another. Only, this one seemed a little more distinct than the rest. It was as if all the others moved, and this one remained a stained self-control, and remained entirely motionless.

"A Sister of Charity, I should think, Sue, practicing sanctification of the eyes in penance for having her picture taken."

"Is it such, do you think?" she innocently asked, and, giving me another kiss for good-night, ran off to her own room, carrying her treasure with her, and I went to bed.

I don't remember that I dreamed that night. Perhaps I did without knowing it, for about two o'clock I woke with a sudden start, and with what roused me was a rush of cold air on my face, and the loud spoken words: "Meet again on Monday." And, just as I opened my eyes on the white dead face of the picture floated before me, and then dissolved into the darkness.

I started up in bed and gazed around after it; then, recollecting myself, sank back again on my pillow. But I could not keep my eyes open. I was trembling all over in a nervous chill, and at last made up my mind that I should have to endure one of my wakeful nights, and might as well make the best of it. I lighted my lamp, partially dressed myself, and, raking the cinders off the top of my fire, sat down in dressing-gown and slippers, thinking that I might perhaps read myself to sleep in my arm-chair.

Perhaps I might, if it had not been for that face. It troubled me more than I liked to own, and the confused fancies of my dream still lingered, so that the phrases are apt to, until dispelled by the light of day.

I thought I would look at that picture again; and as Sue always left her door ajar at night, I was able to creep softly into her room and steal it out of her drawer without waking her. The face seemed a little more distinct to me than it had at first. So shadowy, yet so stern, and oh, so dead! I felt that Sue would surely notice it if she looked at it again, and resolved to find some excuse to her for not returning it. It took possession of me. I sat gazing, gazing at it, till I was startled to look over my shoulder lest I should meet those eyes unveiled; sat so till the day broke and the shadows fled.

Then I must confess that things wore a different aspect, and, after a bracing bath had cooled the fever of the night, I felt rather ashamed of myself. I did not give up the picture to Sue, however, but told her I did not want such a misrepresentation of myself to be circulated that I should destroy it and get her a better one.

Destroy it! Rather might it destroy me.

But I would not look at it again; and as the days went on the unpleasant impression wore off, and I had reasoned myself into the conviction that the strange effect had been produced by some peculiarity of the atmosphere or the instrument, and exaggerated by my heated and wearied brain. I had the need of keeping myself in tune quiet, so I tried to put the whole affair out of my thoughts.

I had not expected to go to the city under a week, but something turned up in business that called me there sooner. I was walking down Broadway with a friend, so busily engaged in conversation that I did not notice where we were. The people i s front of us stopped, as if to wait for some obstruction to pass, and we stopped, too, necessarily; and also naturally suspended conversation for a moment.

In the pause the words were loudly sounded in my ears—

"Meet again on Monday."

I glanced up. We were at the foot of the Fulton Street Bridge.

"Did you speak?" I asked my friend.

"No. Is any thing the matter? You look faint."

"Oh no, indeed," I said; "but excuse me. I have just remembered an appointment at the office, and must just off our talk till to-morrow. I shall be in town again, or, perhaps, not go out tonight, but eat at the Astor House at eleven. Good-by," and I turned down Fulton Street, abruptly, walked around the block, and came back to the bridge. An irresistible impulse drew me up the stairs, and to my former position by the railing. But this time I carefully searched the crowd as I entered it, passed every face over me, and, when the horn sounded the first time, looked quickly back over each shoulder. I was satisfied that all was right, and that I had only the conventional attire, all the faces were decidedly material, and unquestionably alive. I felt quite at my ease.

The horn sounded the second time. A chill seized me, and I would have given worlds to look back over my shoulder, but I seemed paralyzed, and I know I kept still that time.

Once more I paid my quarter; once more I looked at my picture—and oh! once more I saw that face, just over my shoulder as before, only the crowd was thinner, and more of it could be seen. The hands of hair combed smoothly down on over the brow of death; the downcast eyes; the nose line faintly, and only faintly, with an expression that had not discovered in the first picture. The lips full, half parted in a smile, as if in the midst the scene it had smiled over a smile of life on a dead face, a smile seductive, bewildering, half sweet, half cruel. And below, in minute outline, as if intended for a background which gave the impression of a figure floating in the air, was the cloudy suggestion of the swelling, half-veiled bosom.

More than my first terror seized me as I gazed upon it. Whose was this face, and what had she to do with me? I went back to the Tombs. Of course I could not take that picture to Sue. I must try once more. When would the horn sound again? So I asked the man at the desk. I was faint with hunger and excitement, but I took no lunch. I spent the whole hour upon the bridge, watching every face that approached, usually passing and repassing over it, but watching in vain.

The next time the trumpet gave warning I chose a position as far from my original one as was consistent with the possibility of securing a glimpse, and taking the necessary precaution of looking over each shoulder at the last moment. To my great relief my scheme was successful, and no ghastly countenance appeared over mine. The picture was a very good one, too; and I felt almost happy as, saying to myself, "There, now, that will do for Sue," I turned to leave the bridge. But my breast-pocket, and stopped the other into my note-book with the original sketch.

I am ashamed to tell, even to this journal, how the rest of that day was spent. I neglected my business, and though I walked for hours on the uptown times, and to drink several cups of café noir (I never take any thing stronger), every returning hour found me near the blast of boom, quite careless of the remarks at last made upon my frequent reappearance by a few loafing boys who seemed to be spending the day on the bridge themselves.

"I say, Bill, here come the swell 's a-gettin' up a picter-show-bill of his own, I guess."

"Oh, he's goin' to run for Congress, and is goin' to sell them to pay expenses."

"Say, mister, please to put a quarter to buy one of your pictures for 'Liza?"

Yes, I actually spent all the afternoon in these experiments, and returned to my room at last, a haunted ground of the bridge extended over about a third of its length, and that the middle third. Beyond this limit I dared not go, I determined, I could stand alone without my strange attendant. But I came to receive a solution of the mystery of my haunting face, and hours, and, when the fading light and lessening crowd forced the inquisitive photographer to close his rooms, I left the bridge in a state of nervous excitement which I was ashamed of but could not control.

I did not return home that night, but staid at the house of an intimate friend, and went to the theatre with him. I fancy I was delirious, for I did return we found two of the young ladies who had remained at home with visitors, deeply engaged in the mysteries of "table-moving." I was soon examined into the merits of the oracular toy, avoiding it with my usual dread of the supernatural; but now something impelled me to say:

"Can Planchette answer mental questions?"

"Oh yes, indeed; only try it, Mr. Neilson—tell us what you have asked the question."

"I have asked it."

Planchette started without hesitation, and we wrote in a few moments hand that I could read without stooping: "Spirit."

"Is that the right answer, Mr. Neilson?"

"I asked who is present."

"Oh, then that is a stupid answer, Planchette; can't you tell us whose spirit?" chided the fair protectress. But nothing more could be drawn from the oracle than a constant repetition of this response, and I preferred to be more than satisfied with it. So indeed I was.

Then I asked "where have I met you?" and, with some embarrassment, Planchette wrote, less legibly than before, "Low—Low—"

"What can that mean, Neilson?" said my friend, as we stopped to decipher it.

"Pshaw, girls, your Spirit don't know how to spell! It means the Lowe Bridge, I've no doubt. That's a good pun."

"So it does—that must be it!" they cried in chorus, and never noticed that their good joke had struck me to the heart.

I only asked one question more, and that also a silent one. It was,

"Have you any thing to say to me?" and the answer came promptly:

"Meet me by moonlight alone."

A trifling answer it seemed, and I joined in the laugh it caused and went off to bed, thoroughly exhausted by the excitements of the day. To bed, but I can hardly say to sleep. My weary brain had passed into that consciousness when it waked again into that condition of semi-trance which is not perhaps peculiar to my own experience, but which has a conscious sense of being asleep, then the mind gradually wakens more and more, and tries to act as usual through its bodily machine, but in vain. The body lies in heavy slumber. The soul seems partly detached from it, and the connection broken between spirit and nerves. The paralyzing fear of that complete detachment, which is death, comes over the soul, and the will makes fierce struggles to regain its mastery of the body, until, with a shriek of torture, the bondslave wakes. How great the real danger of death in this state may be I do not know, but it is my conviction that many of those who have been found dead in their beds, after having retired in apparent health, have died in one of these struggles. I am sure that I came very near dying in mine.

The state is simply a dreamless one. The mind possesses more than its usual activity; and so I know that what I saw was real, and not a dream. I saw myself as I lay under the indefinite domination of the trance; and while I lay there powerless, helpless, unable to move or cry out, I saw that face grow out of the darkness. I saw that floating form, and pleading, wreathing arms extended. A bewildering rapturous vision of beauty! I was utterly impossible to utter, I know what the lips said, what the smile meant —not even here can I write it—all, all but the power of the deed. I struggled, but was forced to sit beheld? when shall I read their mystery?"

The voice said,

"To-morrow night—at midnight—between earth and heaven."

Then another form appeared—one that I had loved, and long mourned as dead in my life. A glory round the bright brow, a shining cross upon the pure bosom, a look of ineffable love and compassion on the dear face. I struggled, but vainly, to stretch my arms toward it. The other vision faded, a hand whose gentle touch I knew on the dead upon my forehead, and I sank into a natural quiet slumber.

*

Months have passed since the last page in my journal was written. How insufficient it now seems to me as I look it over! I have not visited the Fulton Ferry bridge since then. Perhaps I do not need. I have not consulted mediums or oracles. The last one I saw told me that I am continually attended by a beautiful spirit. As if I did not know it. Am I not a spirit myself? and can not I leave this material form and hold high converse with the unseen world at will? I have traveled far since the above record was penned; and now in a distant city I hear that the Lowe Bridge is to be removed. If it prove to be the truth I must hurry home.

My journey has been one of business, and it has been attended very successful. All my plans have prospered; all my speculations have thriven beyond my wildest hopes, and without as great care of them as I have needed to give. So, to tell the truth, if the heads of the firm knew all the details of my life, they might charge me with inattention to business; but they will be satisfied when I go to them with half a million of dollars in my hand. And I know how the results were obtained, but they don't. At least my guide—my beautiful one—has not told me to fortune and glory. In visions of the night the scenes of the future are sometimes thrilling my throbbing brow, her presence is with me. In the watery wastes of the ocean a solemn eye calms the fever of my soul; as I walk these streets, a stranger among strangers, a gentle hand is laid upon my arm—sometimes from above, and from the hurrying crowd before me a face looks back.—her face. That smile beckons me on; but when I last turned to look, as I passed it, so as to gain upon it imperceptibly, it ever eludes me, and melts into air just as I think to overtake it. I am weary sometimes. Mine errand—when—but when shall I reach her? The day is coming! One thing grieves me. I never see that other face of the cross and the cross. It was once the beloved face of my good angel. Has she deserted me?

But, then, whose is this face? I can not be unhappy while that smile shines upon me. Unhappy! Every nerve throbs with ecstasy, every vein thrills with the fire of spirit and spirit and sense in which I live. Have I ever lived before?

Ah! as I write, that hand creeps over my face, and in the—

*

I have half an hour before the train leaves, and the porter has taken my trunk. I may as well spend the time of waiting in making one more entry in my journal, which goes into my valise.

Midnight is a good time to start. The night shines most, and I prefer it to the day and then—shall get there in just about twenty-four hours if all goes well—and all will. Yes, this is the very time to begin a journey. I have been thought the clerk asked me, when I paid my bill, if I would not prefer the morning train so as to have a good night's rest; and, as I left the room, I heard him say to some one, "That man looks as if he hadn't slept for a month." I suppose I do look somewhat haggard, and I have been after wakeful lately; but what does that matter? I slept last night at any rate, though not in bed. I believe I went to sleep while in the very act of writing. To sleep—but what of that? What is the sleep of the body, of mere matter which ever sleeps unless aroused by spirit forces? Was Lasleep when, at the touch of that hand, the eyes of my soul unclosed and the curtain rolled from the future?

How shall I paint that vision? Darkness all-enveloping around me, blue depths of more mysterious darkness above, and, glowing, floating on the ocean back-ground, midway between the two profounds, a swaying pathway of light, of rainbows, of celestial dyes. My winged spirit rain up with winged feet the steps that led, like Bethel's shining ladder, from earth to heaven. Above me were my hopes—the form of the face, that form, that floated above the aerial rendezvous in soft and changing auroral radiance; and glowing, as subtle, as ethereal, as the white arms lured me on, the smile grew brighter, more significant, the veiling eyelids seemed slowly rising. Then, even as the cold fires of the north stream suddenly from the horizon to the zenith, and as suddenly disappear, so the vision before me glowed and vanished. I woke to earthly life with the strange sensation, common to such startled wakings, of falling from an eminence. I woke to find it a dream, but a dream of prophecy. I know that when next I climb those shining steps to meet her the secret of those veiled eyes will be revealed.

My brain seems bursting with the awful joy. I shall fly on the wings of night to my splendid bride. Over the sea is the honor given. Those eyes with all their dread secrets in them will look straight into mine, and I shall meet their pure unbiddenness. The angle looks at the sun, as the dead look up at God!

II.—WHAT THE POLICEMAN TOLD THE REPORTER.

Yes, Sir, the bridge is nearly done, and to good riddance to it. Never should it ever did to my body, unless to the people from the country, who crossed it just to say they had, and the pickpockets who made their skiffs useful, or the picture-man who made his fortune, they say. It was all a mistake, Sir. It took too longer to climb, as the top of it than to take your chance among the carts, if you were used to it; and as for the ladies, bless their hearts, there's not one of them but would rather trust me to take her over than to drag her pretty Balmoral up those muddy stairs.

That's all the good it ever did; and as for the harm—why, not to speak of the cost to the city, which nobody seems to mind, and not to speak of the row Knox made about its darkening his windows—after all the harm it did can't be called away with the rubbish. The more's the pity!

It only happened not a fortnight ago, Sir, and though it's not much afraid of being run, you can't wonder that I don't enjoy being night-watchman on this beat yet. It was rather a cold and stormy night when I happened to be walking about pretty brisk to keep my blood moving, when about midnight I saw a cab drive up (countless cabs meet and drop passengers at the corner of Broadway, and then drive off quite rapid. Of course there was nothing particularly suspicious in such a circumstance, but the time is most forgotten when the very sight of a small black carpet-bag in a man's hand would scare every one to death with the fear of relief spies and incendiaries. Still it seemed rather strange for a traveler to stop at midnight and not at the door of any hotel or private house, and I knew it's our business to keep our eyes open, Sir. So I just kept mine on this man, and as he started up to the bridge I followed him at a little way. Sir, but at a respectful distance—not to intrude. It was a wild sort of night—cold and windy. The sky was full of driving clouds; but the moon was at the full, and I could see all he did for a long way off. He was a young-looking fellow, slight built, and I knew that if any thing else wrong, as I didn't believe there was, that I could easily overhaul him. But I noticed something a little queer about his walk. It was irregular, he would walk very slow a while as if he was going to stop, and then he would start off at a quick almost run and then stop again. But then he might have had a late supper somewhere, and that seemed like a reason. Any way I watched him till he got to this crossing, just where you're standing, Sir, this minute, and he put his hand on the rail and looked down as if he would go up. But the steps were barred. The work of tearing down the bridge had been commenced that very day, and the carpenters on the spot had not been taken away; so to prevent any chance of accident the stairs were blocked. He seemed surprised to find it so, and I was, too, eager to see him, after waiting a moment, throw his valise over and then spring over the bars like a serf and walk up the stairs. Still he was quiet enough, and seemed to know what he was about. I called out to him to tell him that the bridge was gone; but he paid no attention to my voice, though I was quite near enough for him to hear it, and just kept up the stairs. Of course I saw it was his fancy to take a last look from the bridge by midnight it was no business of mine, and I thought he'd come down again when he'd had try it myself. I had got quite up to the bridge by the time he reached the top, and, not to let him think he was watched I purposely stopped to notice me, I walked slowly on toward the Park; but turned when I got into the shade of St. Paul's, and looked back. He was leaning against the railing on the lower side—just about there he stood, Sir, in the middle of the bridge, looking up town, or rather up at the moon. It was shining full on his face, and made it look ghastly and wild even from where I stood. I looked at my watch—it was just twelve o'clock.

He raised his finger up this way as if counting the strokes, and—how would you have felt in my place, Sir?—just as the last one sounded he lifted both arms above his head, so! and rushing across the bridge before I saw what he was about, cried out, "Coming," and sprang! not as if he had any idea of falling—sprang up as if he expected to grasp something in his arms.

I tell you what, Sir, my head reeled with that scream, and that rush through the air, and that awful thud as his body struck the pavement. I've seen men killed in rows, and in the war, when every body about was screaming and yelling and fighting like devils, but that didn't sicken me like this. It didn't seem as if I could move at first, and then I rushed down the street to him like mad, striking my club on the pavement as I ran. He was dead, Sir—quite dead: he hadn't struck on his head, but his neck was broken by the concussion, and his face had the awfulest look you ever saw: the mouth and eyes wide open—ah! it makes my flesh crawl now to think of it. Just will, staring madness, Sir. Assistance came up as I was working over him, and we carried him to the station-house, and then went back for the carpet-bag which he had left at the foot of the stairs. In that we found papers enough to identify him: his name and address in full—Harry Mortimer Neilson, Clinton, N. J."—on all his papers. A lot of confused accounts and long rows of large figures, with their totals set down and "$3,000,000 to my credit" verified by the Adder. "Then a queer sort of diary that we couldn't make much head or tail of, and half a dozen tintypes of the bridge, with himself in each one.

We telegraphed to his friends, and his brother came down the next morning and identified him. So his family wanted it kept quiet, and managed to somehow, though, of course, there had to be an inquest, and the verdict was "died by visitation of God"—Suicide, while laboring under insanity. His friends had not seemed to suspect him of it, though they had noticed some queer things about him for some time; especially some letters he had written about business that hinted at some wonderful speculation he had made. But it came out in the inquest that all the poor fellow's trouble was owing to that cursed bridge. He got a notion that every time he went out he was haunted by a spirit, whose picture was taken looking over his shoulder every time that his was. He dwelt on the notion till it drove him mad, and led him to his death.

But you may believe that the hardest work ever given me was when I was detailed on citizen's dress to accompany his body home to his family. He seemed to have been the favorite son and brother, and he had one sister that was just took on so as to break one's heart to see her. She insisted that it was all her fault—that she had killed him, because she had asked him first to bring her a picture of the bridge, and he had had his own taken on it to please her. It was heart-breaking!

Oh, as to the pictures, Sir. Yes, it was curious; there was such a piece in every one, just over his right shoulder. I kept one myself, and you can look at it; but that's any enough explained. He had had a clear conception in his brain, think of looking at the other fellow's eyes, taken without him, he would have found the same in plenty of them. And nobody but that crazy man could help seeing what it is, especially in the later ones (they were all dated), where it was plainer. He was nothing more nor less than the last of one of them white statues on the new Bank building, taken through the crowd. If you like to buy it you can get one of his sisters yet without much trouble, and stand in the same position that he did that night, Sir, and see for yourself.

NEXT-DOOR NEIGHBORS.

NEXT-DOOR neighbors have ever been fast friends or bitter enemies. They have either fought and bled for each other—on battle-fields, or bus times, of course—or they have cut each other's throats; and the one thing, it is sad to say, they have done much oftener than the other. Strong hate seems, as a matter of course, to spring from close vicinity in these old times. The Capulets and the Montagues must have been next-door neighbors, though Shakspeare does not say so. Superficial people may think that Romeo and Juliet more than make up by their feud; but deep thinkers will rather consider these gentle Veronese lovers as illustrious exceptions that as precedents at all affecting the two great laws of love and hate, which rule next-door neighborships. Besides, it is of very well to talk of the Romeo who takes poison and dies to his Juliet's feet.

With the progress of time and good-breeding, next-door neighbors have grown to be civilly affectionate or politely rancorous, and now, as a rule, the latter, or the bickering, is the case may be, is carried out on the most moderate scale. When next-door neighbors meet, they bow to, or not to, or cut each other as instantly as they well can do these things, and they generally walk through life as they mostly go to heaven, by roads that, having once met at right angles, are never by any means to meet again, but go on widening and widening away till they flow into their most reconciling and last sea.

But still we meet every now and then, chiefly in small or out-of-the-way places, with instances of cruel hate or tender love, of bitter spite, cruel or kind and brotherly offices, which bring back the old relation in its vivid aspect before being modified, indeed, by change of manners, but still the same at heart. Such instances must be known to many; two will illustrate our meaning.

Two workmen were next-door neighbors in one of the London suburbs. They lived at peace for a whole year; then, the dog of one having flown at the child of the other, war was declared. Still, though embittered on both sides by wives and children, the war carried on was a fair fight. But hate was there, passive and phlegmatic in one man, keen and active in the other, and, unluckily, strong in both. These men drank freely, and used to meet and quarrel at the same public house. It was inevitable that they should come to blows, and at length they did. The phlegmatic man, being much the stronger of the two, had no trouble in defeating his enemy. The worsted one was henceforth best upon revenge, and chance, or his own ingenuity, gave him what he wanted. He came one evening to the usual haunt, his face still tearing the mark of the blow that had felled him. He kept on his line of silence; he bore with his foe's boastful looks and with the jeering of the by-standers; but when he went to pay his reckoning, and was waiting for his change, he said to the landlady:

"I owe you something, Mrs. Smith. Please to make it all square, if you please," and he pointed a scornful forefinger at his enemy, "in a thief! I come here no more: that fellow has got for the past months for robbing his master ten years back. Let him deny it—let him deny it."

Pale, ghastly, and struck as by death, the wretched man heard, saw and denied nothing. They all stared, and he denied nothing. They heard assurance in him, and denied nothing. It was true. He had been a thief once—once only—for he was one of the very few men who, having thus fallen, could rise and triumph over their sin. He was honest now, and therefore the discovery and the shame were too much for him. He slunk away with never a word in his heart, and was seen in the public house no more. Nor was this all. His story spread. His wife, on learning it, left him, declaring that she was to be ashamed of him; the whole world he felt had in some sort turned against him. He could not bear this new fact. He left his employment, went out, and never came back. And the saddest part of this sad story is, that his triumphant enemy never regarded his victory as a triumph at all.

These two men, who could have lived at peace so easily if they had but been a little farther apart, could not resist the temptation for life-like and animosity which vicinity threw in their way. And what is true of hatred is happily also true of love. Instances of this are known to all languidly wrapped up in self-indulgence forever, are roused to generous exertion and self-forgetfulness by their next-door neighbors.

A few years ago there came to a little county town of England a lady whom we shall call Mrs. Jennings. This was the name, indeed; but her story is a true one, and that is the only matter of interest in this case. She came to take possession of a little house and of a hundred a year, both of which she had inherited through the death of an aunt whom she had never seen, and who had never done her a kindness. She tried to mourn for him, and she could not. She also tried in her conscientiousness to be grateful to him; but she soon found out that her gratitude to the deceased was all for his dying just so she was seen with him, and that the only way she was too honest to make-believe that she was grieving; she was too good to rejoice; so she put on black clothes, took a little servant, and went down to her and to keep her company, and settled down in her own house for the first time in her life.

There is an age when selfishness is a delicious feeling, whatever moralists may say. Miss Jennings had been a governess, and had made a home had lost its meaning for her. And now she had her own home, and she could live and die in it. For years she had been cut and dried for some in late, and now she could sit within the whole day long if it so pleased her. Instead of the three plants in flower-pots, which were the most always killed, Miss Jennings had her own garden. And to make her happiness complete, Miss Jennings could now indulge in the love of dogs that dream of her latter years—a painted glass window. It is all very well to deride such simple longings, but you may be sure that those who deride never had them. Miss Jennings had had brighter dreams once—dreams of husband, home, and children; and when these had passed away before the chill breath of old Father Time, she took refuge in harmless fancies. And the painted glass dog was one of the last, and Miss Jennings was a proud and happy woman when it was put up in the landing, and glowed there in the sun, and its hues fell on her staircase carpet. "I shall always think of my poor uncle when I look at that window," thought Miss Jennings, with a real warmth of her gratitude to the dead. And so she did think of the old gentleman, faithfully and not tenderly, and then the painted glass window got to be a sort of memorial window, and perhaps it was as true and as religious in its way as many of its more ambitious brethren displaying their dim gorgeousness in solemn old cathedrals.

This pleasant, selfish little life had lasted through the summer and autumn, and was beginning with a new series of delights, under the shape of cozy evenings by the fireside, a bright lamp on the table, and a bright coal-fire in the fat, white hands of plump Miss Jennings, who leaned back in the most comfortable of arm-chairs in the best-door neighbors stepped in and blotted out the fair picture. On a dreary snowy evening, when the wind howled, so gustily without, it made the comfort within doubly pleasant. Miss Jennings, who was gently nodding over a love story, was roused from her delicious reverie by her little maid—that Mrs. Brown, the poor gentleman next door, whose wife was ill, asked to speak to her. Mrs. Brown's errand was a sad one; his dying wife wanted to see Miss Jennings, whom she had only spoken to, and for whom she had conceived a sick woman's fancy. Such wishes are not to be resisted; Miss Jennings at once put by her novel, rose, and followed Mr. Brown to the next house. She never forgot the scene that awaited her there; a disordered household, and a red-eyed children, a man blanchely looking husband, and a dying woman, whose eyes burned like fire in her wasted face. At once she seized Miss Jennings's hand, and held it fast.

"I knew you would come," she whispered; "I knew you would; I am going to die; you know we are strangers here; my poor husband is a clerk at the bank, you know, and my poor children are all going to ruin. I know you will take care of them when I am gone; you are good—I know you will."

"My goodness!" cried Miss Jennings, looking scared her in dismay. But the wife, who had not seen her, had kept on saying, "I know you will," as if it were the burden of a song; and still uttering the words, she died a very few hours that night. The fire was not out when Miss Jennings came home, the lamp still burned brightly, the novel still lay on the table by the chair seemed to await its mistress, but Miss Jennings sighed drearily as she sank into it. Seven children to provide for would take away from Mrs. Brown, who was out all day, and did not know a sou in the place, how would he manage? Miss Jennings, who, on the best intention of accepting the dead lady's legacy, but still how would he manage, you know? He managed admirably with a little help from Miss Jennings. She was never more in her heart than she knew of, more tenderness than the painted glass window could express. At first she only went in to direct Mr. Brown's one servant, "until his should get some one," but that soon one never coming, for with excellent reasons, Miss Jennings gave up that illusion, and said to herself that she must "give a look to poor Mr. Brown's children every now and then." This, too, was but other illusion. Miss Jennings found that children will not be looked at now and then, but require constant attention. And so she looked at them so assiduously that the circulating library indignantly sent in the second volume before she would rather decline Miss Jennings's subscription than have books kept so long, if you please. Miss Jennings, in short, managed a second governess; they were welcome to the second volume, stupid fools! she remembered quite well she was not going to read it herself. Mr. Brown came in,"and she had something else to do now—thank Heaven. So she had, good Miss Jennings; she had seven children to look after, and a house to take care of. Mr. Brown, a poor nervous man, in a state of chronic depression, thanked her much, and was apt to express overpowered by his gratitude at times, but he did nothing to relieve her burden. "Poor fellow!" thought Miss Jennings as she now and then saw him in a vestful look "he is as helpless as a baby, you know. And so he was, so much so, that spite Miss Jennings's vigilance, many children would, and did, go wrong. The evils at length became so serious, and so crying, that Miss Jennings ventured on remonstrance. Mr. Brown was much shocked his head distractedly against the parlor mantelpiece, but said it could not be helped. There was no help for it, and all the children; it was very sad, but it must be so. "My goodness!" exclaimed Miss Jennings, "we can be so!" that! But Mr. Brown would say that Miss Jennings was very kind, but, of course, she could not do for ever; she must go to her own house and in his; his dear wife had told him to marry again, by all means, but the poor dear had said Jennings, and he must take a chick of fifty-two, with a moderate salary and seven children, all under fifteen! And Mr. Brown looked up in silent desperation at his case, and said no more.

Miss Jennings looked around her, much moved. Spite of all the trouble and vexation, the place looked very comfortless, and the house, Miss Jennings knew, was like the parlor. Winter had long been over, spring and the summer which had followed it had waned, another winter was beginning. She had given up every little enjoyment of her own to this one family, she had scolded the servant—she had mended the younger children's clothes—she taught the children, and she had even cried out Mr. Brown was very grateful; and still, either because his means were insufficient, or because his spirits were too low for exertion, there was some dreary gloom in his gloomy assertion that they were all going to ruin. She gently touched the arm of the man with his hairs in her eyes, and a little blush on her faded cheek, she said:

"Mr. Brown, I have a proposal. I have a hundred a year, and the house I live in is my own. I love your children, and they love me—will you marry me?"

At first he started and could not believe his ears—then a burst of tears expressed his joy; and need it be said that he accepted Miss Jennings's proposal? Need it be said, too, what a world of good occurred to him and to his children thereby? I think Miss Jennings, like the man in our first instance, but with far better reason, never regretted. For among the results of next-door neighborships may be numbered the matrimonial every now and then.

FETES OF THE VICEROY OF EGYPT.

THE Viceroy of Egypt celebrated the anniversary of his accession on January 18 by a series of fêtes in his palace, which is said to have cost about one million sterling, has been built by the Viceroy at Gezireh, opposite the more ancient part of the city of Cairo, and on the other bank of the Nile. It is designed partly in the Saracenic style, by Mr. FRANC; and in all its architecture and decorations, external or internal, as well as in the furniture of its rooms, the most gorgeous taste is displayed. Here the Viceroy gave a grand ball to about 2500 persons, at the expense of $150,000. Their carriages were ranged in a road prepared for the purpose, and the illumination of the gardens, the palace stands in a fine park, full of large trees and exotic plants, and which abounds in shady nooks and grottoes, splendid kiosks, statues, fountains, shrubberies, parterres full of the rarest flowers, aquariums, aviaries, and deer-inclosures, scattered all over the grounds. These were brilliantly illuminated that night by thousands of gaslights. In the palace all the superbly-furnished state-rooms had been thrown open. They contained an array of female beauty of almost every nationality, bedecked in the height of the Paris fashions, while the dresses of the gentlemen presented diverse national, civil, and military garbs with the more sombre-looking evening dress.

A portion of the entertainments was during the fêtes consisted of races, in which horses and other animals contended. The horse-race for the English cup was an exciting event. The course was a very interesting one of five miles, which was won by a well-known Arab horse called "Duquesne." But the most characteristic race was one with dromedaries, of which we give an illustration on page 165. It was a very long race; and the effect of the long robes of the Arabs who rode and the trappings of the animals flowing behind gave a picturesque appearance to the scene. A regatta was also held on Lake Timsah, which borders the town of Ismailia, the central station of the Suez Canal.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THERE are a larger number of Cubans in this city than in any other place, and many chances of avoiding the horrors of war, have recently deserted their native island. An association of Cubans here, called "Junta Patriotica de Cubanse," has been formed for the purpose of forwarding hospital supplies and other comforts to the insurgents in Cuba. It is said that a large number of volunteers, from this and other cities, have landed in Cuba, or will shortly land there, and are now fighting in the revolutionary ranks. The Junta has gone in small parts of, reports are true, no less than seven hundred have sailed from this port alone.

The Junta has been a decided success this season, if the attendance is any criterion. The artists are certainly worthy of it. Mrs. Scott Siddons, Lucia Grange and Miss Kellogg are well known; and the fresh, sweet voices of Miss M'Culloch, Miss Stone, and Miss Lanier are delightful to hear. Those who have listened to Brignoli, Beath, Grisnlini, Antonucci, and others, understand their excellence—at least they do if they are good judges of the quality of tone in the human voice.

A traveler in Greece, in a letter to the Evening Post, gives an interesting account of a visit to one of the largest cemeteries in that country, which has been established by American money. The proficiency of the Greeks in the fine arts, their natural orderly demeanor, were remarkable. About three hundred Cretan children were taught in this school but there were also other institutions, the use of which about a thousand pupils are daily gathered.

The Mont Cenis tunnel is to have a felt respecting hydrophobia, New York could import from Mississippi a wonderful "mad-stone" which abides to Colonel Milam, whose family resides in that State. It is said that a certain Colonel Milam, of Waterford, Miss., owns a "mad-stone" about the size of a hen's egg. The stone was brought from China in the early days by a sea-captain, and for many years in three or four places, but was carefully fastened together with a wire, which was taken from its side. It is to this Colonel Milam states that it has been applied with success in over one thousand cases, and has only failed in less than three parts of these could not be successfully reached. He has used it himself over his children and family. When applied it adheres as if by suction, and usually remains on ten or twelve hours. When the person is all satisfied the stone falls off. The stone is then soaked in warm water from twenty-four to thirty-six hours, when it is ready for another application. Besides the above, Colonel Milam asserts that he can carry case of dog, snake, or rattlesnake bite, where medicine is obtainable, and actually set in.

Grant and Colfax appear to be setting good example in the matter of economy. A dinner given to Governor Geary, in Philadelphia, fifty gentlemen were present. But the entertainment was to be refused from the guests and those two were General Grant and a well-known Philadelphia gentleman, Mr. Colfax is said to have declined a dinner at his numerous receptions without wine being considered necessary to add to the enjoyment of the occasion, certainly remarkable at Washington receptions.

A Peruvian mummy, which was thrown up by the convulsions of the earthquake near Arica last year, is now in possession of Dr. Squier, who intends to present it to the Peruvian Government. The mummy is of a female, and upon knowledge derived from letters only. In course of time the gentleman arrived at the head of the mummy a parcel of letters, the documentary to the ceremony. He was ushered by the servant into a spacious and elegant room, and on the sofa sat the mummy of Miss L——, for whom he inquired. Shortly a very neat and intelligent colored girl entered the room.

GENTLEMAN. "It is Miss L——I want to see."

COLORED LADY. "Miss L——, Sir?"

GENTLEMAN. "Under the circumstances you will not expect me to fulfill that engagement."

COLORED LADY. "Why, you will recollect I wrote you that I had a dark complexion."

MOTHER GOOSE has been shocked by snow and ice. The fall of snow has been so heavy that on some branches of the Androscoggin Railroad the passenger trains have become temporarily impassable, and for several days no mail could be sent from Portland to Montreal.

An extraordinary story is related in the Newark Courier of a man employed by a large firm as laborer, named Seiling, seized by a severe attack of meningitis, became temporarily insane, and in his frenzy threw $40,000 into the fire. The money had been put in the bottom of a trunk for safe-keeping over night, and Seiling, not knowing it was in the bank on Monday morning, placed the result in the destruction of a fortune, occurred on Sunday evening.

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C.—SKETCHED BY TH

ETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 170.]

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE subject of a permanent seat of government was first debated in Congress after the issue offered to that body in Philadelphia, June, 1783, by a band of mutinous soldiers, who assailed the hall during session, demanding arrearages of pay; and a resolution was passed, October 7, 1783, to erect buildings for Congress on the Delaware or Potomac, provided a suitable district could be procured on either of those rivers for the Federal capital. In December, 1788, the Federal Legislature of Maryland passed an act authorizing her members of Congress "to cede any district, not exceeding ten miles square, which Congress may fix upon and accept for the seat of Government of the United States." In 1789 Virginia made a similar cession to Congress for the location of the seat of government, and promised to advance moneys, not exceeding $120,000, to be expended in the erection of public buildings, provided Maryland should advance not less than two-fifths of that sum, to which proposal Maryland assented. Other States made like offers of territory, being anxious to have the seat of government within their boundaries. The bickerings of the rival States in Congress were finally settled by an arrangement effected by JEFFERSON and HAMILTON, and, with the advice of President WASHINGTON, the present location of the District was selected, WASHINGTON himself defining the boundaries.

The selection of the precise location for a city had been noticed by WASHINGTON when a youthful surveyor of the country round. He encountered with HALLOWELL a forest in the hill now occupied by the Observatory, which was long known as Camp Hill in the Revolutionary time. The present desire that the seat of government should be located here is said also to have had great influence in the selection. President WASHINGTON directed MAJOR L'ENFANT in planning the city, and, finding him somewhat arbitrary and refractory, he appointed ANDREW ELLICOTT in his place.

In laying out the plan of the city MR. ELLICOTT drew a base line, by astronomical observation, through the area intended for the Capitol, and upon this basis laid off two sets of streets, intersecting each other at right angles, and distinguished by letters and numbers. The streets running north and south are numbered, and those running east and west are lettered, taking the Capitol as a starting-point. Avenues were then projected, cutting the streets at various angles, and forming the most prominent and favorable points of the city—the avenues interesting each other and forming open spaces at certain points previously determined upon. These avenues are named after and located to correspond with the position of the different States in the Union, and are from 130 to 160 feet wide; the streets vary from 90 to 110 feet in width.

Congress commenced its first session in Washington on the third Monday of November, 1800. The appropriations for the public use at that time are described by the HON. JOHN COTTON SMITH, of Connecticut:

Our approach to the city was accompanied with sensations not easily described. One view of the Capitol only had been erected, which, with the President's house, a wide avenue between, and a number of private southdoor, were shining objects in dismal contrast with the wood which was all around. Instead of verydoing the avenues and streets portrayed on the plan of the city, one was wholly within the woods, except a road, with two buildings on each side of it, called the New Jersey and the Pennsylvania avenues, leading to a fluid down on paper, from the Capitol to the President's mansion. In this road, at that time in a deep mire, and almost impassable, were a few small framed houses, covered with alder bushes, which were cut through the body of the intended avenue where the then existing winter. Between the President's house and the Capitol, on the left, a house had been erected, which then bore, and may still bear, the name of the Six Buildings. There were also two other blocks, consisting of two or three dwelling-houses, in either of which the whole now and then resided to abandon them, not only unfinished but in a rotten condition. They proved to be but two or three comfortable habitations in all respects within the bounds of the district which I professed to represent in Congress, and the other to Navy Yards, who were the former proprietors of the city proposition of the land proprietors of the city, but who reserved for their own emolument a certain number for private sale, and other speculative purposes. The lands in every direction were covered with the forest. A few acres had attempted in one instance by a coverlog formed of the chips of the stones which had been hewed for the Capitol. It extended but a little way, and was of little value; for the wood was but short-fingered—cut our shoes, and in wet weather covered them with wet mortar. In a word, it was a "new settlement."

Commenting upon the elevations of the location, and the frequent efforts made to effect its change, he says: "We must acknowledge that its selection by WASHINGTON as the permanent seat of the Federal Government affords a striking exhibition of the discernment, wisdom, and foresight which characterized that illustrious man. Under this impression, whenever, during the six years of my connection with Congress, the question of removing the seat of government to some other place was agitated—and the proposition was frequently made—I stood almost alone as a Northern man in giving my vote in the negative."

MR. DICKENS, in his "American Notes," thus describes the appearance of the National Capital in 1842:

Here is Washington, fresh in my mind, and under my eye.

Take the worst parts of the City Road and Pentonville, or the straggling outskirts of Paris, where the houses are stinted, poverty-stricken, and their oddities, but especially the small shops and dwellings, pitiful in Pentonville (but much the reflection) by furniture-brokers, keepers of poor eating-houses, and dispensers of little. Burn the whole down, build it up again in wood and plaster; widen it a little, throw in part of St. John's Wood; put green blinds outside all the private houses, with a red curtain and a white one in every window; plow up all the roads; plant a great deal of coarse turf in every place where it might not be to erect three handsome buildings in stone and marble any where, but the more entirely out of every body's way the better; call one the Post-Office, one the Patent-Office, and one the Treasury; make it something but in the actual, existing business of the afternoon, with an occasional tornado of wind and dust; leave a bald, unfinished space for the Capitol, and place where a street may naturally be expected; and that's Washington.

It is sometimes called the City of Magnificent Distances, but I think it will prove extremely hard to reward the City of Magnificent Intentions: for it is only on looking a little way off that it looks like a city at all, and that one can at all comprehend the vast designs of its projectors. Spacious avenues, frowning upon streets, squares, and parks, are things which, not only want houses, trees, and inhabitants; public buildings that need but a public to be completed, and unfinished, but they are monuments of taste which only lack great thoroughfares to orna-ment—are in reality nothing else. And they will, in season over, and most of the houses gone out of town forever with their occupants. The Washington of 1842 is a Barmecide Feast: a pleasant field for the imagination to run a race in; a monument to a great design, a project, with not even a legible inscription to record the departed glories.

The view of Washington, which we present in this week's issue, shows in the immediate foreground many of the most interesting edifices of the city. The modest brick building at the right of the picture has been for some time the head-quarters of General GRANT, and stands on a street, at the left, is the Winder building, occupied by the numerous offices of clerks of the different departments, which, from the limited space in the departmental buildings, could not be located in their proper edifices. The Second house to the left of the building is the habitation of Lieutenant-General SCOTT. At the extreme left of the picture is seen the building erected by the worthy Samuel W. Z. Seaton, and for years dedicated to art. This building at it present made use of for the offices of the Quarter-Master-General and his clerks. Next to this building, and in the same block, is the "Blair House." Vice-President COLFAX has his present home also in this block, fronting upon the square. Across Pennsylvania Avenue, to the right, is the War Department and Navy Department with their Secretary's Department, and above and beyond to the White House with its conservatory and still higher, the Capitol. Next to the Treasury Department, from which looking down the Avenue is seen the Capitol with its extensive grounds, and the Patent Office, next the Washington in the census of 1860 is set down as 61,122.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER IV.

"ON THE ROAD" IN CROATIA.

I PASSED half the night after I was followed in writing to my mother. It was a very long epistle, but, in my fear lest, like so many others, it should not ever reach her, it was less expansive and candid than I could have wished. Sara's name did not occur throughout, and yet it was Sara's image was before me as I wrote, and to connect my mother in interest for Sara was my upperrmost thought. Without touching on details that might awaken her fears, I tried to fetch you, for I will no longer live without you."

I pictured the place I was living in, and its climate, as attractively as I was able, and what I verily believed, that I hoped never to leave it. Of my father I did not venture to speak, but I said, that if the success of our correspondence should prove assured, to tell me frankly all about her present condition, and where and how she was.

"You will see, dear mother," said I, in conclusion, "that I am not the only unfortunate one who is not sure who may read him. Of the accident by which the address I now give this letter reached me I will tell when I write again. Meanwhile, though I shall not be here to receive it at once, write to me, to the care of Hodnig and Oppovich, Fiume, in the Austrian Croatia."

I inclosed a little photograph of the town, as seen from the bay, and though ill done and out of drawing, it was the best I could afford of the pretty little spot with its mountain frame-work.

I had it in my head to write another letter, and, indeed, made about a dozen attempts to begin it. It was to Pauline. Nothing but very boyishness could have ever conceived such a project, but I thought—it was very simple of me!—I thought I owed it to her, and to my own loyalty, to declare that my affection had wandered from its first allegiance, and fixed its devotion on another. I believed—I was young enough to believe love that I had won her affections, and I felt it would be dishonorable in me to deceive her as to my own. I suppose I was essaying a task that would have puzzled a more consummate tactician than myself, for certainly nothing could be more palpable than my failure: and though I tried, with all the ingenuity I possessed, to show that, in my altered fortunes, I could no longer presume to retain any hold on her affections, somehow it would creep out that my heart had opened to a sentiment far deeper and more enthralling than that love which began in a police and ended at the railway.

I must own I was very grateful to my stupidity and ineptness, which saved me from committing this great blunder, though, at the time, I mourned over my ignorance, and bewailed that dullness that destroyed every attempt I made to express myself gracefully. I abandoned the task, at length, in despair, and set to work to pack up for my journey. I was to start at daybreak for Agram, where some business would detain me a couple of days. Hence I was to proceed to a small frontier town in Hungary, called OSSOVIZ, on the Drave, where we owned a forest of oak-trees, and which I was empowered to sell, if an advantageous offer could be had. If such should not be forthcoming, my instructions were to see that waterways were existed in the neighborhood to work saw-mills, and to report fully on the price of labor, and the means of conveyance to the coast. As I mention these details, even passingly, it is but to show the sort of work that was entrusted to me, and fortunately my mind was touched at feeling how great and important were the interests confided to my judgment. In my seven months, I had made somebody. This sentiment, felt in the freshness of youth, is never equaled by any thing one experiences of triumph in after years. Success and later successes come upon hearts joyous in the day-spring of existence, hopeful of all things, and, above all, hearts that have not been jaded by envy, and made discordant by ungenerous rivalry.

There was an especial charm, too, in the thought that I was to be no mere everyday commonplace existence, but a strange series of ups and downs, changes and vicissitudes calling for continual watchfulness and a small amount of energy; in a word, I was a hero to myself, and it is wonderful what a degree of interest can be imparted to a character by self delusion. My business at Agram was soon dispatched. No news of the precarious condition of our "house" had reached there, and I was treated with all the consideration due to the confidential agent of a great firm. I passed an evening in the society of the Intendant, who closely questioned whether Carl Bettmeyer had got over his passion for the Fräulein Sara; or was she showing any disposition to relent. I drew favorably on his addresses. What fortune Oppovich could give his daughter, and what sort of marriage he expected to for her, were all discussed. I here was one point, however, all were agreed upon, that nothing could be done without the consent of the "parents," as they distinctively called the great financier of Paris, whose sway, it appeared, extended not only to matters of trade and money, but to every relation of domestic life.

"They say," cried one, "that the Baron likes Bettmeyer, and has thrown some good things in his way of late."

"He gave him a share in that new dock contract at Fiume."

"And he means to give him the directorship of the Viscovan line, if it ever be made."

"He'll get nothing Oppovich for a wife," said a third; "and that's a better speculation than them all. Two millions of florins at least."

"She is the handsomest girl in Croatia."

"And doesn't she know it?" exclaimed another. "The last time I was up at Fiume, old Ignaz undertook to tell her something me to her by saying, 'Yesterday was her reception-day; if you are here next Wednesday, I'll introduce you.'"

I thought it was only the nobles had the custom of reception-days.

"Wealth is everything, nowadays, and if Ignaz Oppovich was not a Jew he might have the best blood of Austria for a son-in-law."

The discussion grew more and more warm as to whether Jews did or did not aspire to marriage with Christians of rank—the majority opining to believe that they pined for and entertained their own riches, and that no people had such an intense appreciation of the value of condition as the Hebrew.

That Frenchman who was here the other day, Maurice, or Marcel, or the man who could get the Stephen Cross for old Oppovich, and the title of Chevalier, would be sure of his daughter's hand in marriage."

"And does old Ignaz really care for such a thing?"

"No, but the girl does: she's the thoughtless and the vainest damsel in the province."

It may be believed that I found it very hard to listen to every word of those in silence: but it was of the last importance that I should not make what is called an eclat, or bring the name of Oppovich needlessly forward for town talk and discussion: I therefore repressed my indignation, and appeared to take little interest in the conversation.

"You've seen the Fräulein, of course?" asked one of me.

"To be sure he has, and has been permitted to kneel and kiss her hand on her birthday," broke in another.

And while some declared that this was mere exaggeration and gossip, others averred that they had been present and witnessed this act of homage themselves.

"What has this young gentleman seen of this hand kissing?" said a lady of the party, turning to me.

"That it was always an honor conferred even more than a homage rendered, Madam," said I, stepping forward and kissing her hand; and a pleasant laughter greeted this mode of concluding the controversy.

"I have got a wager about you," said a young man to me, "and you alone can decide it. Are you or are you not from Upper Austria?"

"And are you a Jew?" cried another.

"If you'll promise to ask me no more questions, I'll answer both of these—I am neither Jew nor Austrian."

It was not, however, so easy to escape my questioners: but as their curiosity seemed content to go no nearer, I was glad to be left to myself as best I might, and that I had not totally failed, I gathered from hearing an old fellow whisper to another:

"You'll get nothing out of him: he's not a Jew by birth, he has lived long enough with them to keep his own counsel to himself."

Having finished all I had to do at Agram, I started for Ossviza. I could find no purchaser for our wood, indeed many had chosen to sell, and forests were offered me on all sides. It was just at that period in Austria when the mania was first awakened for the employment of industrial enterprise, and schemes of money-getting were rife every where; but such was the ignorance of the people, so little versed were they in affairs, that they imagined wealth was to pour down upon them for the wishing—that Fortune asked of her votaries neither industry nor thrift.

Perhaps I should not have been led into these reflections here if it were not that I had undertaken them, or something very like them, in a dispatch I sent off to SARA—a dispatch on which I had expended all my care to make it a master-piece of fine writing and acute observation. I remember how I expatiated on the disabilities of trade, and how I dwelt upon the effect of those lethargic temperaments of Eastern origin which seemed so wanting in all that energy and persistence which form the life of commerce.

This laborious essay took me an entire day to write, but when I had posted it at night I felt I had done so great a thing, that only an intellectual effort, but as a proof to the Fräulein how well I knew how to restrict myself within the limits of my duties: for not a sentence, not a syllable, had escaped me throughout to recall thoughts of any thing but business. I had asked for certain explanations about Bettmeyer, and on the third day came the following, in Sara's hand:

"HERR DIGBY.—There is no mention in your esteemed letter of the 4th November of Kraus's exceptions, nor have you explained the part of Heydiger's contract Hansser now objects. Freights are still rising here, and it would be imprudent to engage in any operations that involve exportation. Gold is also rising, and the Bank discount goes daily higher. I am obliged to you for your interesting remarks on ethnology, though I am low-minded enough to own I could have been much more pleased where the floods in the Drave have interfered with the rafts, and also whether these late rains have damaged the new quay-works.

"If you choose to see Pesth and Buda you will have time, for Count Hunyadi will not be at his château in Slavonia before Christmas: but it is not an you should see him immediately on his arrival, for his intendant writes to say that the Graf has invited a large party of friends to pass the festival with him, and will not attend to any business matters while they remain. Prompting made will be otherwise needful. Thanking you to add to your instructions already given. Although I have not been able to consult my father, whose business is daily greater, I can say that you are empowered to make a compromise, if such should seem advisable; and your drafts shall be duly honored, if, from circumstances, are not in a position to acquaint us with details.

"The weather here is fine now, I passed yesterday at Count Hunyadi's, and found it thrilling well. I believe the archduke will purchase it, and though sorry on some accounts, I shall be glad on the whole.

"For Hodnig and Oppovich,

"SARA OPPOVICH.

"Of course if Count Hunyadi will not transact business at his château, you will be at a loss to know his convenience. Perhaps the interval could be profitably passed in Transylvania, where, it is said, the oak-bark is both cheap and good. See to this if opportunity serves. Bich's book and maps are worth consulting."

If I read this epistle once, I read it fifty times, but I will not pretend to say with what strange emotions. Even in my fury reference I could bear well enough, but the little passing sneer at what she called my ethnology piqued me painfully. I set to work at once to search out pains to tell me that nothing that did not lend itself to gain could have any interest for her? or was it to say that these topics alone were what should be discussed between us? Was it to recall me to the duties, to make me remember in what relation I stood to her, she wrote this? These were not the natures I had read of in Balsac! the creatures all passion, and nothing else tinent; women whose atmosphere was positive enchantment, and whose least glance, or word, or gesture, breathed perfume hours to very madness; and yet, was it not in Sara to become all this? Were those deep lustrous eyes that looked away from space longingly, dreamfully, dazedly—were they meant to pore over wearisome columns of dry arithmetic, or not rather to give back in recognition what they had got as rapture, and to look as they were looked into?

Was it, as a Jewess, that my speculations about race had offended her? had I expressed myself carelessly or ill? I had often been struck by a smile she would give, not scornful, nor slighting, but something that seemed to say, "These thoughts are not our thoughts, nor are these ways our ways;" for in no silent fashion she would make no remark, but be satisfied to shadow forth some half dissent by a mere trembling of the lip.

She had passed a day at Abazio—of course, alone—wandering about that delicious spot, and, doubtless, recalling memories, for any one of which I had given my life's blood. And would she not bestow a word—one word—on these? Why not say, she as much as remembered me; that it was there we first met! Sure, so much might have been said, or at least hinted at, in all harmlessness? I had done nothing, written nothing, to bring rebuke upon me. I had taken no liberty: I had tried to make the dry detail of a business letter less wearisome by a little digression, not wholly out of apropos; that was all.

Was this the fickle heart beat solely on gain? And yet what grand things did the love of these women inspire in olden times, and what splendid instances there still! How true and devoted, how self-sacrificing! Sara's beautiful face, and its calm loveliness, rose before me as I thought these things, and I felt that I loved her more than ever.

CHAPTER XXVI.

IN HUNGARY.

It still wanted several weeks of Christmas, and so I hastened off to Pesth, and tried to acquire some little knowledge of Hungarian, and some acquaintance with the habits and ways of Hungarian life. I am not sure that I made much progress in any thing but the "Csardas"—the national dance—in which I soon became a proficient. Its stately solemnity suddenly changing for a lively measure, its waiting postures and attitudes; its haughty tramp and defiant tone; and, last of all, its whirlwind impetuosity and passion—all spoke of the people and their nature—possessed a strange fascination for me; and I never missed a night of those public balls where it was danced.

Toward the middle of December, however, I bethought me of my mission, and set out for Gross Wardein, which lay a long distance off near the Transylvanian frontier. I had provided myself with one of the wicker carriages of the country, and, leaving Pesth one early morning, three horses harnessed abreast, or, where there was much up-hill, a team of five.

I mention this, for I own that the exhilaration of speeding along at the stretching gallop of these splendid "Jackers," tossing their wild manes madly, and, with their nostrils quivering, inhaling an ecstasy of delight almost maddening. Over and over, as the excited driver would urge his beast to greater speed by a wild, shrill cry, and I yelled out in concert with him, carried away by an intense excitement I could not master.

On the second day of the journey I left the region of roads, and usually directed our course by some church spire or tower in the distance, or followed the bed of a river when the ice in the region of roads, and usually directed our course by some church spire or tower in the distance, or followed the bed of a river when the ice was solid. This headlong swoop across fields and prairie, dashing madly on in what seemed mad recklessness, was glorious fun; and when we came to cross the small bridges which span the streams, myself on the off parapet at one moment and where the deviation of a few inches would have sent us headlong into the torrent beneath, I felt a degree of blended terror and delight such as one experiences in the mad excitement of a fox-hunt.

On the third morning I discovered on awaking that a heavy fall of snow had occurred during the night, and we were forced to take off our wheels and place the carriage on sledges. This alone was wanting to make the enjoyment perfect, and over pace from this hour became positively sublime. Leaving behind me the ample fur mantle, and my hands inclosed in a fur muff, I accepted the salutations of the villagers as we swept along, or blandly raised my hand to my cap as some wenried guard would hurriedly turn out to present arms to a supposed "magnate:" for we were long out of the best of usual travel, and rarely any but some high official of the state was seen to come "extra post," as it is called, through these wild regions.

Up to Larous the country had been a plain, slightly, but very slightly, undulating. Here, however, we got among the mountains, and the charm of scenery was now added to the delight of the pace. On the fifth day I learned, and not without sincere regret, that we were within seven German miles—something over thirty of ours —from Gross Wardein, from which the Hunyadi Schloss only lay about fifty miles.

Up to this I had been, to myself at least, a "Grand Seigneur," traveling for his pleasure, careless of cost, and denying himself nothing; splendid generosity, transmitted from each postilion to his successor, secured me the utmost speed his beasts could master, and the impetuous dash with which we spun into the arched doorways of the inn, roused the whole household, and not unfrequently summoned the guests themselves to witness the illustrious arrival. A few hours more and the grand illusion would dissolve! No more the wild stretching gallop, cutting the snow-drift; no more the clear bells, ringing through the frosty air; no more the eager landlord bustling to the carriage-side with his flagon of heated wine; no more that burning delight imparted by speed, a sense of power that actually intoxicates. Not one of these! A few hours more and I should be Herr Owen, traveling for the house of Rudnitz and Oppovich, banished to the company of humans, and reduced to a status where whatever life has of picturesque or graceful is made matter for vulgar sarcasm and ridicule. I know well, ye gentlemen who hold a station fixed and unassailable will scarcely sympathize with me in all this; but the castle-builders of this world, and happily they are a large class, will lend me all their pity —well aware that so long as fragments of castle the drafts upon her, the poor man is never bankrupt, and that it is only as illusions dissolve he sees his insolvency.

I reached Gross Wardein to dinner, and passed the night there, essaying, but with no remarkable success, to learn something of Count Hunyadi, his habits, age, temper, and general demeanor. As my informants were his countrymen, I could only gather that his qualities were such as Hungarians held in esteem. He was a very hundred florins for what he asked eight. He did not even vouchsafe me an answer, and almost drove over me the next day as I stood at the side of the gate there."

"That was like Tassilo," said a Hungarian, with flashing eyes.

"He served you right," cried another. "None but a German would have offered him such a rudeness."

"Not but he's too ready with his heavy whip," muttered an old soldier of Radetzki. "He might chance to strike where no words would efface the welt."

Stories of Hunyadi's extravagance and eccentricity now poured in on all sides. How he had sold an estate to pay the cost of an imperial visit that lasted a week; how he had given a team of four across the Danube on the second day of the frost, when a heavy man could have smashed the ice by a step of his foot; how he had killed a boar in single combat, though it cost him three fingers of his left hand, and as awful flesh-wound on the side; and numberless other feats of daring and recklessness were recorded by admiring narrators, who finished by a loud "Eljen" to his health.

I am not sure that I went away to my bed feeling much encouraged at the success of my mission, or very hopeful of what I should do with this magnate of Hungary.

By daybreak I was again on the road. The journey led through a wild mountain pass, and was eminently interesting and picturesque; but I had no longer an eye for enjoyments as before, and serious thoughts of my mission now oppressed me, and I grew more nervous and afraid of failure. If this haughty Graf could do what they represented him, it was just as likely he would refuse to listen to me at all; nor was the fact a cheering one that my visit would be even nowwhere is the race less held in honor than in Hungary.

As day began to decline, we issued forth into a vast plain into which a mountain spur projected like a bold promontory into the sea. At the very extremity of this a large army was brought to bivouac, seemed to stand out against the sky. "There, yonder," said the postilion, pointing toward it with his whip; "that is Count Hunyadi. There's three hours good gallop yet before us."

A cold snow-drift borne on a wind that at times brought to a stand-still, and which gave us to seek shelter by the wayside, now set in, and was fain to roll myself in my furs and lie snugly down on the hay in the "wagon," where I soon fell asleep; and though we had a change of horses, and I must have managed somehow to settle with the postilion and hand him his "trinkgeld"—I was conscious of nothing till awakened by the clanking sound of a great bell, when I started up and found myself driven into a spacious court-yard, in which, at an immense fire, a number of people were seated, while others busied about harnessing or unharnessing horses. Here we are, Herr Graf!" cried my postilion, who called out from the recognition of the loudness way I had treated his predecessor. "This is Schloss Hunyadi."

HOSPITALITY.

THE man of hospitable mind is known by his eyes and tongue. It is the great trait characteristic in its way than a stranger's reception of a stranger. The hospitable man at once assumes that you are a friend, and that you come with a friendly intent. He salutes you with a kindly smile and a ready grasp. He only incidentally asks you the reason of your call, or rather waits till you yourself disclose it. He offers you every hospitality what he thinks you can require, not obtrusively, but with manifest courtesy, and the desire that you should avail yourself of every thing within reach. If your personal happiness be the unwelcome, that only redoubles the solicitous kindness of your own personal welcome, and you find that there is kindly consideration in all his thoughts respecting you.

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION.

THE announcement that DULCE is to be succeeded as Captain-General of Cuba by General DE RODA does not indicate very strong confidence on the part of the Spanish Government in the speedy suppression of the insurrection in that island. LEGENDRE and other luminaries was too intimately associated with the Bourbon régime. DULCE took his place, and began his administration by the introduction of liberal reforms, the establishment of the freedom of the press, and the offer of general amnesty. But indulgence proved no more effective against the rebels than severity had; and even DULCE began too late to see and correct his mistake. Probably it would have been wiser for Spain to have allowed him to pursue his new policy. The succession of DE RODA—the real author of the sanguinary conflicts in Cuba—will only tend to further inflame the passions of the Cuban rebels, and to widen the circle of their power.

As we intimated last week the great want of the rebels is arms. On page 172 we give an illustration of the manner in which this want is surreptitiously supplied. Apart from its fidelity as a pictorial representation of an actual fact, this engraving possesses rare artistic merits. The silence and secrecy of the night-attempt, and the grim determination with which it is carried out, give a wonderful effect to the picture.

GREENWOOD IN WINTER.

ALL dressed in snow; a giant shroud
Is folded on each grave,
And crystals bright of frozen rain
The narrow walks now pave.
The cold wind whistles from the bay
Through gate and leafless tree,
And far away from dust of rose
Flies the bright honey-bee.
And down below in the snowy shroud
The sleepers coldly lie,
And sentinels of marble forms
Stand with them silent by.
What care they for the leafless tree,
The whistling wind or snow?
The peaceful rest of roseless checks
Is not disturbed below.
And soon the giant shroud of snow
The warm young Spring will rend,
And where the dress of Winter trailed
Will spring some flowers of gold.
And down below the nursing snow
The violet hides its blooms,
And early through the springing grass
Will breathe its soft perfumes.
And down below the nursing snow
The roses hide their leaves,
As in the mantles of the frost
The wheat is keeping sheaves.
And thus beneath, in holy graves,
Where friend and lover sleep,
Are faces, snowy, cold, and pale,
Beneath the winter sheet.
Though frosty shrouds of death be there,
Yet Spring will come erewhile,
And bid from Winter's frozen lips
The warm and gladdening smile.
As roses burst in April snows,
As violets through the snow,
As silvery streams from ice-bound rills
In gushing radiance go—
So from the sleep in coldest graves
Will friend and lover come,
When in the morn of God's sweet Spring
He bids his children home.
The snow of Winter is the type
Of Death, where all is cold—
So blooming flowers and green of Spring
Are types of Life untold.
The Life that brings to chilly checks
That faded early here
The bloom and dimples they had lost
Upon the darkened bier;
And sweeps from the Winter's breath,
Or roses of the May,
Will be the kisses, long lost here
In that lost Greenwood day.
What though the snows on Greenwood fell,
Nor its red roses bloomed,
The loving heart we had kissed
At last the Spring untombed.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE CANINE FANCY—Too often the calf of one's leg.

"YOUR future husband seems very exacting," he has been signalling for all sorts of things," said a mother to a daughter who was on the point of getting married. "Never mind, mamma," said the affectionate young girl, who was already dressed for the wedding; "those are his last wishes."

HOW HE WHIPPED HIM.

A lad, narrating a stretch-tale in which he had been engaged, said:

"I'll tell you how it was. You see, Bill and me went down to the wharf to fish; and I felt in my pocket and found my knife, and it was gone; and I said, Bill, you stole my knife; and he said I was another; and I said go there yourself; and he said it was no such thing; and I said he was a liar, and could whip him if I was bigger'n him; and he said he'd come to step, mother; and I said he was a bigger one, and he said I never had the courage to; and I told him to fork over that knife, or I'd fix him for a tomdemon at Sacred Hill; and he said he guessed not as no gentleman; and I said he doesn't take it up; but he did, you bet, you never—well, you never did; then I got up again, and said he was too much afraid to do it again; and he tried, but he didn't; and I grabbed him and throwed him down on the top of me like several bricks; and I told you it beat all—and he did he; and my little dog got behind Bill and bit him; and Bill kicked at the dog, and the dog ran, and I ran after the dog to fetch him back, and I didn't catch him till I got clear home; and I'll whip him more yet. Is my eye very black?"

"To skate, or not to skate," but if you do, is it best to fall to? Then skater thinks not:

"Thy heart is like a frozen lake
On whose cold brink I stand;
Oh! buckle on my spirit's skate,
And take me to the land.
And lend, thou living saint, thy way
To where the ice is thin,
That it may break beneath my feet
And let a lover in!"

DITTIES.

What was Eve's first song?—A new-ditty. What are foolish songs?—Stupid-ditty and absurd-ditty. What should be the "lay" of the lazy?—Reund-ditty. What is a miser's love song?—Cupid-ditty. What is a sailor's song?—A guid-ditty. What is a sour song?—An acid-ditty. What is a strange song?—An oddditty.

TABLE OF CONTENTS—The dinner-table.

AN ARTLESS LOVER.

I know I'm "horrid ugly," Jane,
You scarcely need have stated.
That insensitive fact
Because it's antiquated.
And—getting flatty on the shelf—
I tell you, Jane, sincerely,
I think you're pretty plain yourself.
Although I love you dearly!

Your nose is not the kind of nose
To satisfy a painter;
Your locks are like the red, red rose,
Or just a little flutter.
Upon your cheek the glow of rouge
Shines best-root-colored nearly;
Oh, mind, you know, I tell the truth,
Although I love you dearly!

It's needless to possess two eyes
Without the least connection;
Where each inquiring optic tries
A contrary direction.
It's very much more useful, though,
Than ornamental, clearly;
I'm sorry that you squint, you know,
Although I love you dearly.

I think I've said enough to prove
You're not a perfect Venus
(And quite sufficient to worry Unpleasant thoughts between us);
So when you're idolize again,
My visage too severely,
Just call to mind, I told you, Jane,
Although I love you dearly.

"Look here, Squire, where was you born?" said a fellow-lodger to a five-monthser. "Where was I born?" "I was born," said the victim, "in Boston, Tremont Street, No. 44, left-hand side, on the 1st day of January, 1870, at 8 o'clock in the afternoon; physician, Dr. Warren; nurse, Sally Benjamin."

Yankee was answered completely. For a moment he was stuck. Soon, however, his face brightened, and he quickly said:

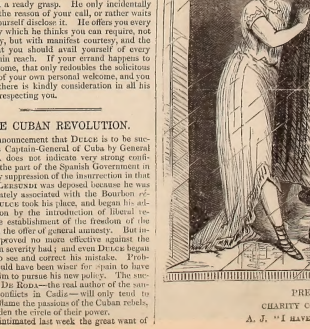
"Yees; well, I calculate you don't recollect whether it was a frame or a brick house, dew ye?"

"How much older did you make this year?" inquired one farmer of another, who had offered a specimen for trial.

"Fifteen barrels," was the answer.

Another case.

"Well, if you had another apple, you might have made another barrel."

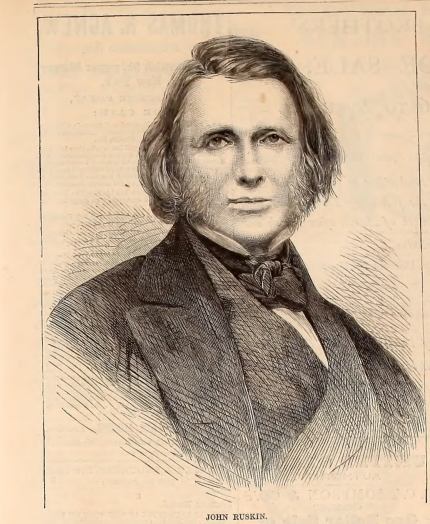


PREPARING TO GO CUT.

CHARITY COVERS A MULTITUDE OF SINS.

A. J. "I HAVE SEEN A WORSE RELIGN THAN THIS."

LANDING ARMS FOR THE PATRIOT FORCES ON THE COAST OF CUBA.—[SEE PAGE 171.]



JOHN RUSKIN.

JOHN RUSKIN, ESQ.

MR. JOHN RUSKIN, the well-known art-critic, is the son of a city merchant, and was born in London in February, 1819. Having been educated as a gentleman-commoner at Christ Church, Oxford, he gained the Newdigate prize for poetry in 1839, but subsequently devoted himself to the cultivation of the pictorial art, which he practiced with success under COPLEY FIELDING and J. D. HARDING. A pamphlet in defense of TURNER and the modern English school of landscape painting was his first effort in the cause of modern art, and this brochure eventually swelled to a standard work entitled "Modern Painters," the first volume of which appeared in 1843. The author's success as a writer on art was decided by the warm reception the public accorded to this volume, of which several editions have since been called for. MR. RUSKIN'S views, however, were combated with bitter asperity by some of the art-critics of the day, who resented with an affectation of contempt his free expression of dissent from the trammels of their school. In his second volume of "Modern Painters," written after a residence in Italy, and published in 1846, he took a much wider survey of the subject originally entered upon, including the works of the great Italian painters, and discussing at length the merits of their respective schools. This, his chief work, has been since completed by the publication of three more volumes, the last of which contains illustrations by himself. MR. RUSKIN temporarily diverted his attention from the study of painting to that of architecture, giving, in 1849, "The Seven Lamps of Architecture" as a first result—a work followed, in 1851, by the first volume of "The Stones of Venice," the second and third volumes of which appeared in 1853. The illustrations in these last-named productions, which also excited some of the same professional hostility that his first publication met with, displayed to much advantage his artistic powers. MR. RUSKIN has also expounded his views both in lectures and the pages of newspapers and reviews. In 1851 he advocated pre-Raphaelism in letters to the London Times; he lectured in Edinburgh on Gothic architecture in 1853, having previously (in 1847) contributed articles to the Quarterly on Lord Lindsay's "Christian Art." Topics of the hour likewise occupied his pen from time to time: one on the "Construction of Sheepfolds" (the Discipline of the Church) appearing in 1851; another on the "Opening of the Crystal Palace," in 1854; and in 1855 "Notes on the Academy Exhibition" of that and the following year. A notice of "Giotto and his Works" is also from MR. RUSKIN'S pen, having been written for the Arundel Society, of which he is a member. In addition to the above-mentioned works, he wrote for the Cornhill Magazine four essays on the relations of employers and employed, under the title of "Unto this Last" (reprinted in 1862). He has also published "The King of the Golden River," illustrated by DOYLE; various separate lectures on art subjects; in 1864 a selection from his own writings; and in May, 1865, "Kings' Treasuries and Queens' Gardens." MR. RUSKIN has since contributed a series of essays to the pages of the Art Journal, entitled "The Cestus of Aglaia," and has also occasionally written on questions connected with political economy. His latest public appearance was at the Royal Institution in London, to the members of which he delivered a most interesting lecture on the "Flamboyant Architecture of the Valley of the Somme." This lecture was marked by all the elegance and fine judgment which ever characterize MR. RUSKIN'S deliverances on matters of art and taste.

THE MEMORIAL METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, WASHINGTON.

THE dedication of the Metropolitan Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church in Washington took place on the 28th of February, and awakened the profoundest interest in the religious community. The services were announced to commence at the usual hour for morning worship; but as early as 9 o'clock there was assembled about the doors a crowd large enough to fill the body of the church.

General GRANT and MRS. GRANT, accompanied by their family and MRS. GRANT'S father, arrived just as Bishop SIMPSON commenced his sermon. Speaker COLFAX and MRS. COLFAX had previously arrived, as had also Chief Justice CHASE, accompanied by Senator and MRS. SPRAGUE. Among other distinguished gentlemen present were Senators CRAGIN, THUMBULL, COLE, DOOLITTLE, PATTERSON of New Hampshire, HENDRICKS, WILSON, and others; Representatives DAWES, JUDD, CHURCHILL, HUMPHREY, WASHBURN of Massachusetts, CONNELL, FIELDS, COLE, and many others. All these gentlemen were accompanied by ladies of their households.

Bishop SIMPSON opened the dedicatory services by reading an appropriate selection from the discipline. Then the choir, composed of the best amateur performers selected from the various choirs of the city, sang the hymn, "Before Jehovah's awful throne," the whole audience joining in the hymn. A prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. HAMILTON, followed by readings from the Scriptures by the Rev. Dr. KENADT and Rev. ALFRED COOKMAN. An anthem was then chanted, after which the Rev. Bishop SIMPSON delivered an eloquent and impressive discourse.

As announced by the Rev. Dr. DE HAAS at the close of the reunion, there still remained a debt of $35,000. The sum of $10,000 was raised on the spot by subscription. MR. OLIVER HOYT, of Connecticut, and Hon. THOMAS CORNELL, of New York, each gave $1000. MR. ARCHER, of New York, gave $500; and, among a number of subscribers for $100, we notice the name of Vice-President COLFAX. The exercises were then closed, in the manner appointed by the book of discipline.

The audience on this occasion numbered at least 2000 persons, and hundreds were unable to secure an entrance. In the afternoon an eloquent extempore discourse was delivered by the distinguished English divine, Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON; and another collection added $2000 to the sum contributed in the morning. Of this Senator CATTELL contributed $500, and Senator HARLAN $100.

We give an illustration of the church on this page. Its design is pure Gothic. It is built of brown stone, rough hewed. The building fronts 75 feet on C Street and 115 feet on Four-and-a-Half Street. It is about fifty feet in height. At the northeast corner of the structure is to be constructed a tower and spire, the utmost point of which will be 240 feet from the pavement. The main front of the church is from C street, there being three large entrance ways, approached by brown stone steps. The main audience-room, 85 feet deep by 75 feet wide, is by far the handsomest and most elaborate of the many fine churches in Washington. The ceiling is about 20 feet high, the Gothic style of architecture being faithfully observed. Six heavy columns rise on either side, affording a support to galleries 12 feet 3 inches in width, extending around three sides of the room. These columns are heavily capped, and over these caps are arranged gas jets sixteen to each cap, which at night brilliantly illuminate the room. At the south end of the room the pulpit has been located in an alcove. The wall in the rear of the pulpit is beautifully frescoed, and on either side is a panel, on one of which is inscribed the Ten Commandments, and upon the other the Lord's Prayer. The keystone of the arch above the pulpit is made of the stone from which Solomon's temple was erected, and bears upon its face the inscription, in Hebrew characters, "Jehovah Jireh." The front of the pulpit is of black walnut, and the design is chaste and beautiful. The panels are of olive wood from the garden of Gethsemane. On the front is a magnificently carved cross with the letters "I. H. S.," crowned with a wreath of twining ivy, all in walnut. This handsome decoration was executed in Boston, and was presented to the church by friends in that city. The caps of the posts on either side of the pulpit are of olive-wood from the Mount of Olives. The whole appearance of the pulpit and altar is grand and imposing.

The organ of the church, presented by CARLOS PIERCE, Esq., of Boston, is a magnificent instrument, twenty feet wide, twenty high, and thirteen deep.

A feature in the construction of the edifice was the idea suggested of making the windows of the church memorial tablets, commemorative METROPOLITAN MEMORIAL METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, WASHINGTON, D. C., DEDICATED FEBRUARY 28, 1869.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
SPECIAL TRADE SALE, 1869.
FROM MARCH 16 TO APRIL 24.

Franklin Square, New York, March, 1869.

We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following Terms, for Cash, from the 16th of March to the 24th of April, after which our Terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of $ 100 an one time, 25 per cent. Discount, and Five per cent. for Cash.

" $ 500 " 30 " "
" $1000 " 33⅓ " "
" $2000 " 35 " "

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Spring. The SPECIAL LIST will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers personally, or by mail enclosing five cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

LICENSED BY THE
UNITED STATES
AUTHORITY.

S. C. THOMPSON & CO.'S
GREAT
One Dollar Sale of
Dry Goods, Notions Goods, Linens, Cottons, FANCY GOODS, Albums, Bibles, Silver-Plated Ware, Cutlery, Leather and German Goods of every description, &c.

There articles to be sold at the uniform price of
ONE DOLLAR EACH,
and not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive.

The most popular and economical method of doing business in the country.

The goods we have for sale are described on printed slips, and will be sent to any address at the rate of 10 cents each, to pay for postage, printing, &c. It is then at the option of the purchaser that they will send one dollar for the article or not.

By Patronizing this Sale you have a chance to exchange your goods, should the article mentioned on the printed slip not please.

The Smallest Article sold for ONE DOLLAR can be exchanged for Silver-Plated, Five-Bottled Revolving Castor, or your choice of a large Variety of other Articles comprising over 250 useful articles, not one of which could be bought at any retail country store for nearly double the amount.
Worth Ten Times the Money.

TERMS TO AGENTS.
We send on commission to Agents:

For a Club of Thirty, and $3 00,
one of the following articles: 20 yards Cotton, Lady's Fancy Square Wool Shawl, Lancaster Quilt, Accordeon, Set of Steel-Bladed Knives and Forks, Violin and Bow, Fancy Dress Pattern, Pair Lady's extra quality Cloth Boots, one dozen large size Linen Towels, Alpaca Quilt, Honeycomb Quilt, Cotton Cassimere Wool Blanket, 18 yards best quality Print, 12 yards Delaine, one dozen Linen Damask Napkins, &c.

For a Club of Sixty, and $6 00,
one of the following articles: 40 yards Cotton, Pair Honeycomb Quilts, Cylinder Watch, 4 yards double-width Waterproof Cloaking, Lady's Double Wool Shawl, Lancaster Quilt, Alpaca Dress-Pattern, Engraved Silver-Plated Ice Pitcher, Revolving Castor, Set of Ivory-Handled Knives, with Silver-Plated Forks, Pair of All-Wool Blankets, Pair of Alhambra Quilts, 30 yards Print or a Marseilles Quilt, Double-Barrel Shot-Gun, Webster's National Pictorial Dictionary (60 engravings, 900 pages), 5½ yards Doeskin for suit, &c.

For a Club of One Hundred, and $10 00,
30 yards Sheeting, Fancy Cassimere Coat, Pants, and Vest Pattern (extra quality), Pair splendid Rose Blankets, Fancy Plaid Wool Long Shawl, 25 yards Hemp Carpet, splendid Violin and Bow, splendid Alpaca Dress-Pattern, Silver Hunting-Cased Watch, Single-Barrel Shot-Gun, Ivory-Handled Carving Set, Mahogany Table-Covers, with one dozen Dinner Napkins to match, Webster's International Dictionary (unabridged (1040 pages), &c.

☞ For additional list of commissions see circular.
COMMISSIONS FOR LARGER CLUBS OR PROPORTION.

Agents will please take notice of this. Do not send names, but money. Mailed Price List free upon request. Make your letters short and plain as possible.

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE OF THIS:
☞ Be SURE and send Money in ALL CASES by REGISTERED LETTER, which can be sent from any Post-Office.
Where a Draft on New York city money is preferred to any other method whatever.
We can only be responsible for money lost, unless some precautions are taken to insure its safety.
SEND FOR CIRCULARS.
Send your address in full, Town, County, and State.

S. C. THOMPSON & CO.,
136 FEDERAL STREET,
Boston, Mass.

LIBRARY OF LOVE. Etiquette, Courtship, and Marriage, 4 little vols. for 50 cents.—Talk, Recreation, and Wit, 4 little vols. for 50 cents.—Talk, Recreation, and Wit, 4 little vols. for 50 cents.—Talk, Recreation, and Wit

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to the favorable wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 00.

MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

IMPERIAL BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1; $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.

JAPAN, 80c., 90c., $1; $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1; $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1; $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FINGON BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 25 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

BREAKFAST (mixed), 20c., 25c.; best, 40c. per lb.

GREEN (unroasted), 20c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

FORTESCUTH, MICH., August 26, 1868.

To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York.

GENTS: The people here will not let me stop. They say I have learned the trade, and that I must go to send another order for them. So here you have it, at the same price we recently sent since that time. May be, making five hundred and forty-four dollars, exactly four cents, be sent you since the date.

Hoping this will be as good for you, I remain

Yours, &c., JOHN W. HAWKINS.

10 lbs. Uncol'd Japan, Mrs. Kemp.....at $1 00.....$10 00
" Imperial.....do.....at 1 25.....6 25
" Young Hyson.....do. L. Cunningham.....at 1 25.....7 50
" Imperial.....Elias Stephens.....at 1 25.....2 50
" Coffee.....J. L. Christian.....at 30.....3 00
" Gunpowder.....O. A. Watrous.....at 1 50.....3 00
" Imperial.....F. Taylor.....at 1 25.....2 50
" Young Hyson.....J. Hopkins.....at 1 25.....3 00
" Coffee.....do.....at 30.....3 00
" Gunpowder.....John Stephens.....at 1 50.....9 00
" Young Hyson.....Wm. H. Dorsey.....at 1 25.....5 00
" do. do. .....H. Malone.....at 1 25.....12 50
" do. do. .....N. Newcomb.....at 1 25.....6 25
" do. do. .....Noah Campbell.....at 1 25.....8 00
" Gunpowder.....Judge Miller.....at 1 50.....6 00
" do. do. .....A. Gole.....at 1 50.....6 00
" Imperial.....Mrs. Bell.....at 1 25.....3 75
$74 25

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money order with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, for "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our gifts are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory after you have turned at our expense within 30 days, and have not been used, return them.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can receive the cost of their Teas and Coffee about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending early to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, for mere gain and profit, are advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in the first advertisement. This will prevent the orders from getting into the hands of boys imitators.

POST-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

$10.000 A YEAR can be made by selling our 100 Iron-saw articles. Sample sent to any family. Can be done in doors or out. Only three hours' labor each day. Information and premium circular sent free. W. H. DAILEY & CO.,
148 Fulton Street, N. Y.

The Teeth an Advertising Medium.

Every time a lady who uses FRAGRANT SOZODONT opens her mouth, she advertises the article. The state of her teeth is a certificate of its excellence. No spot darkens their surface, no impurity clings to them, the cavities decayed, they are sure to exhale the breath that swells through them is sweet as the breeze of June.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY

Price of Presses, $8, $15, $16. Offices, $15, $20, $30. Send for a circular to LOWE PRESS CO., 99 Water Street, Boston, Mass.

DEAFNESS, CATARRH, SCROFULA Speedily cured. Cures legally guaranteed, or money refunded. By the Inventor of the Celebrated Patent Invisible Cushion Vibrator for Incurable Deafness. Send 10c. for Treatise on Deafness, Catarrh, and Scrofula. Dr. T. H. STILWELL, 195 Bowery St., N. Y.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

$15 $20 $9 SNUG SI

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE).

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been attacked, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, representing as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we in no way responsible for the bogus watches sold only those purchasing directly from us, or of some one having a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have also greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and in perfection differs from imposition Watches heretofore named in the market.

"COLLINS METAL,"

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificates. The $15 Watches are equal in neatness, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold Watch costing $100. Those for $20 are of superfine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $2 to $8.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Gold Follow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge. We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), or we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our published prices. Our regular customers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or vicinities representing themselves to be agents for the genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to send money to Boston, as we have no authority to receive it. Watches to be paid for when taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only store is

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

$25 KNITTING MACHINE.

WANTED—Brettys and Sellers for the BICKFORD FAMILY KNITTER, the most reliable invention for the household ever made. It knits 20,000 stitches a minute, runs both by hand and foot, sets up its own work, and does a wide range. Orders are making from $2 to $3 per day at their homes. Description pamphlet sent free. Circulars and terms liberal and explicit. BICKFORD KNITTING MACHINE CO., 29 Broadway, Rooms 36 and 38, New York.

WANTED BY A MANUFACTURING CO.—Salesmen and Teamsters, to sell and peddle a new line of goods. Remunerative and permanent situation. H. H. RICHARDS & CO., 1 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

$245 A MONTH. TO AGENTS. A NEW and useful articles. Address 49 JOHN B. GOUGH, Alfred, Me.

"HUNTER'S GUIDE" AND TRAPPER'S COMPANION.—New Edition, Revised, Enlarged, 20 new Recipes added, all about Hunting, Trapping, and Fishing, Tanning and Coloring Hides and Furs, 10,000 sold in 2 weeks. Beware of imitations. A neat book, 64 pp., only 25 cents; 6 for $1 00, postpaid. Address HUNTER & CO., 23 Chatham Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

Prices from $16 to $22.

From the Scientific American of April 11, 1868.

"The color of the metal closely resembles that of fine gold, and is very pleasant to the eye, and its lustre lasting."—&c., &c.

When desired, these Watches will be sent by express, C. O. D., subject to examination and payment of freight charges.

Descriptions of goods and metal sent free upon application. An inspection of my goods respectfully solicited.

JULES D. HUGUENIN WUILLEMIN,
No. 3 Maiden Lane, New York.

For sale by all respectable dealers.

"KNOW THYSELF." For "Self-Made Men." Read "Physiology, or Views Whom Great Men and Man's Power over Death; Women's Forces, and How to Control Them; Eyes, Speech, Lips, Cheeks, Complexion; Affection, Temper, Emotion, &c., in March No. of PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Only 20 cts., or $2 a year. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

TEN PER CENT. COUPON BONDS of the Republic of Honduras, the Switzerland of Mexico. For sale by A. WILKINS, Detroit, Mich.

EMPLOYMENT — "Pleasant and Profitable Business." Send for Circular. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

PROTECT YOUR LIFE AND PROPERTY WITH A

FIRE EXTINGUISHER

Send for Circular. U. S. FIRE EX. CO., 4 Dey St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED in every town to sell the celebrated Improved Universal Hanger—the handiest and most durable machines made. Send for circular. CURTIS HANGER CO., 16 Beekman St., New York.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT will effect a cure in all cases of Gout and Rheumatism after all other remedies have been tried in vain. Sold by all druggists at 80 cents per box.

GENUINE OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO.

Geneva, Switzerland.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

Manufactures, on strictly scientific principles, style, finish, durability, and cheapness, Gold Watches, called Oroide Gold Watch Co. to be perfect time-keepers, and to retain their color equal to Gold. Oroide Gold Chains, $5, $8, $7, and $10. Clubs for Six Watches will receive an extra Watch free. Express will exhibit the Watch, &c., when requested, on receipt of express charges both ways. Watches sent, when ordered, to any part of the United States, Canada, or Europe, by express, C. O. D., which must be accompanied with a Postal Money Order. Customers must remember that our Watches are not Cheap Watches. Thousands testify to their reliability. Energetic Agents wanted. Thousand dollars yearly. On receipt of $100 Postal Order, a full assortment of Watches and Chains forwarded to our address.

JOHN DUGGAN, Oroide Gold Watch Co.

Only Office in the United States, No. 73 NASSAU STREET New York.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 BROADWAY, N. Y., will dispose of

100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, AND ORGANS,

of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for cash, or will take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid; the same to let, and rent money applied if purchased.

FRESH GARDEN and FLOWER SEEDS, prepaid by mail. For 10 cts. per oz., the best sorts Asparagus, Beet, Carrot, Parsnip, Radish, Spinach, Turnip. For 10 cts. 25 cts. per oz., the following: Cabbage, Celery, Chicory, Cucumber, Lettuce, Melon, Squash, Tomato, Tomato. For 40 cts. Onion, Sweet Marjoram. The above also in 5 ct. papers. 20 sorts Garden Flowers, 25 cts. Collection of Garden Roots Potato 75 cts. per lb.; $3 for 5 lbs. Seeds on Commission. Agents wanted. R. M. WATSON, Plymouth, Mass.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material for printing it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen books of types, cuts, borders, &c., 10c. each.

DAVID WILKINSON, & Co., Adams Presses,
26 Cornhill Street, New York.

HOVEY & CO.'S ILLUSTRATED GUIDE

TO THE

FLOWER and VEGETABLE GARDEN,

FOR 1869,

IS NOW READY, containing 150 pages, with 100 BEAUTIFUL ENGRAVINGS, and a choice collection of the varieties of FLOWER and VEGETABLE SEEDS, including many NOVELTIES of great merit.

A BEAUTIFUL COLORED PLATE.

The guide is the most complete garden manual containing full and plain directions for the CULTURE OF FLOWERS and VEGETABLES. It will be mailed to all applicants upon the receipt of 25 cents. Send free to our neighbors and friends.

HOVEY & CO., 53 North Market St., Boston, Mass.

VELOCIPEDE WHEELS,

MANUFACTURED BY

S. N. BROWN & CO.,

DAYTON, OHIO.

They also make a prime article of Spokes and Hubs for light Carriage and Buggy Wheels. Send for Price-List.

100 BEAUTIFUL PHOTOGRAPHS sent on receipt of 30c. Address A. PEARSALL, 205 Fulton St., N. Y.

25 CENTS.—Now is the time to subscribe to "HALL'S LEAVES," the best, the most popular, and the cheapest monthly publication. Each number contains a matter of interest and importance to every family. Send for specimen copy. Address as above. Sample copies sent on receipt of stamp to pay postage. Address HALL'S LEAVES, Nashua, N. H.

EMPLOYMENT that pays. For particulars, address, with stamp, H. A. Smallwood, Vt.

MAGIC, MYSTERY, & HEALTH.

Sent free on receipt of a stamp. Address W. HERBERT, 102 Nassau St., New York.

$5000 A Year can be made by live agents, selling my new and wonderful invention. Address J. ASHTON, 62 Second st., Baltimore, Md.

$5 WONDER.

INDUSTRY SEWING MACHINE.

Only THREE DOLLARS. Simple, practical, and durable. Makes the Elastic chain stitch, and adapted to all kinds of plain sewing. Any child can operate it. An elegant gift. Testimonials daily. Sent to perfect satisfaction. Agents wanted. Address INDUSTRY SEWING MACHINE CO., Manchester, N. H.

COTTON-SEED OIL MEAL, best food known for Milch Cows. Address WM. WEBB, 43 Cedar Street, New York.

Patent Work-Jointer Kerosene Burners (no trotted wicks), Lamps, Chimneys, Shades, and Globes wanted. Send for circular. P. R. Dominick, 223 Hudson St., N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either of the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY, 20 cents a year; for the BAZAR 10 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscribers in the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 20 cents extra for each of the MAGAZINE or WEEKLY or the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will also find each number from the beginning of their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the time subscribed for expires. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

Back Numbers of the Periodicals are supplied. Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any number, but as a rule they commence with the number next after the receipt of the order. Subscribers who wish to begin with the number of current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the first of January. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be replaced without loss to the sender.

Subscribing the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200: Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $55 each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside, $2 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

"FAREWELL, A LONG FAREWELL, TO ALL MY GREATNESS!"

GORHAM MFG. CO.

Sterling Silver Ware,

AND

Fine Electro-Plated Ware,

of the following trade-marks:

Trade-Mark for Silver. GORHAM MFG. CO. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

GORHAM MANUFACTURING CO.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

THE GORHAM WARE may be obtained of ADAMS, CHANDLER, & CO., No. 20 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

PRINCE & COS. ORGANS AND MELODEONS. 13,000 now in use. BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

STEM-WINDING
Waltham Watches.

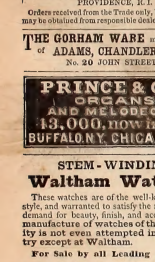
These watches are of the well-known 2-plate style, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy. The manufacture of watches of this fine quality is not even attempted in this country except at Waltham.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

THE CELEBRATED

AMERICAN IMPROVED VELOCIPEDE.

Patented January 20, 1869.



FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., and 64 Crosby.

Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

Dr. JNO. V. BUETON'S

TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED, TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO. In using, or smoking, and thereafter, it renders tobacco and cordials to the taste, invigorates the system, promotes great nourishing and strengthening powers of nutritious food, and appetizer, enables the stomach to digest the heartiest food, causes sleep refreshing, and establishes robust health. Smokers and chewers will find it a sovereign friend. Price Fifty cents per box, by mail, or at Druggists. Sold by Druggists throughout the country, with full directions, wherever needed, etc., etc., etc. Agents wanted. Address

DR. T. E. ARNOTT, Jersey City, N. J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

☞ Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations. [Trademark & Copyrighted.]

RALPHNEDER & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum Pipes and Holders, with Monograms, Portraits, &c. Wholesale and Retail. Repairing in all its branches. Send for price-list. 400 Price-List. Box 6726. Store: 13 Wall St., & 6 John St., & 11 Nassau St., Basement. Cor. Spring. Received a Prize at the Paris Exposition, 1867.

NEW MUSIC.

VELOCIPEDE GALOP, illustrated.....50c.
TELEGRAM WALTZ—Strauss.....40c.
RITTY MCGEE, 35c.; THE HATWING TROUPE..40c.
YOU'RE SOOTHING THING OF ME.....30c.
LIVE IN MY HEART AND PAY NO RENT.....30c.
Four Brilliant Arrangements, by Ascher. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1135 BROADWAY, 26 door above 25th St.

BLUNT & CO., 179 WATER ST., N. Y.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.

First Quality only. At VERY LOW PRICES.

PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

MANY EXPERT RIDERS in New York have given it a trial, and pronounce it

The Strongest, Best Constructed, and Most Perfect Velocipede yet produced.

The art of riding is very easily acquired. It has been successfully in many instances, in one day by parties who rode easy and gracefully.

ITS ADVANTAGES OVER OTHER VELOCIPEDES—

1st. The DRIVING WHEEL is from five to ten inches higher, and still the saddle is so low that the rider can touch the floor with both feet.

2d. We balance the machine on the same wheel, instead of the front. In doing this the balance is more perfectly acquired, and the rider can not be thrown from his saddle. Experts pronounce this the true principle of balance and riding a Velocipede.

3d. The saddle is placed back of the front wheel, thereby giving the rider greater power on the cranks to drive the Velocipede at great speed, or up steep grades.

4th. We apply the BRAKE and can leave to the STANDARD, over front wheel, so that they operate on the wheel in any position.

5th. By inclining the STANDARD over the front wheel, back at an angle of forty degrees, in turning we are not liable to run, and turn a perfect circle without the worst, over-reaching or upset. We also avoid the jar to the guiding arm so frequent on cobble-stone or pavement.

6th. They will notice, from cut, the easy and graceful position of the rider.

All that are ambitious to get as large a run as possible, and not run over, we give the sizes below, in proportion to a man's height:

Men from 4 ft. 10 in. to 5 ft. 2 in. high, can use a 48 in. wheel and touch the floor with both feet. Men from 5 ft. 2 in. to 5 ft. 6 in. high can use a 54 in. wheel and touch the floor with both feet. Men from 5 ft. 6 in. to 5 ft. 9 in. high can use a 60 in. wheel and touch the floor with both feet. Men from 5 ft. 9 in. to 6 ft. 2 in. high can use a 66 in. wheel and touch the floor with both feet. As all will be desirous of getting the Velocipede that will run the easiest, go the fastest, and turn the shortest, we invite all to send for Circular giving full description.

TOMLINSON, DEMAREST, & CO., FINE CARRIAGE BUILDERS, 620 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

KNOX'S SEEDS.

We offer our new crop of

GARDEN AND FLOWER SEEDS,

for the season of 1869. Our Seeds, so long and favorably known throughout the United States, are justly esteemed wherever tried.

The following catalogues will be sent free to applicants:

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HAND-BOOK OF SEEDS, SEED NOVELTIES AND SEED POTATOES.

Containing Directions for Planting, Preparation of the Soil, and after Management, particularly adopted to the use of Gardeners, Amateurs, and all others to whom a knowledge of Gardening and Treatment of Seeds is necessary.

☞ MARKET GARDENER'S LIST, for Gardeners only.

☞ WHOLESALE PRICE-LIST, positively for the Trade only.

W. W. KNOX,
Successor to J. KNOX,
No. 137 Liberty St., PITTSBURGH, Pa.

O=C

The Highest Cash Prices

PAID FOR

OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;
OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;
OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are written full;

and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Dealers, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Families, and Public Libraries,

Entire Households, Old Estates, Country Stores, and Express Companies, and

JOHN G. STOCKWELL,
23 Ann street, N. Y.

THE WILSON SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Cheaper than all others.
AGENTS WANTED. Manufactured by
THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, O.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, Plans, and Details to Working Scale of Country, Suburban, and Village Houses, with specifications and estimates of cost. Quarto. PRICE Twelve Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. 150 Designs, $1.50, postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect,
191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

ELGIN WATCHES.

CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing watches, or watches represented to be of our make, of parties who advertise to send them "C.O.D." We have no connection with such houses, and do not furnish our goods to any house for that purpose. The excellence and good repute of the real ELGIN WATCH have caused several Foreign and American WATCH COMPANIES to make IMITATIONS WITH THE SAME OR SIMILAR NAMES, marks or dials. Avoid all parties who advertise to send our goods "C.O.D.," no matter whom. To get the real ELGIN WATCHES purchase only of dealers in your vicinity or of those from whom you know to be honorable.

THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,
ELGIN, ILLINOIS.
Business-Office, Nos. 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

GENUINE WALTHAM WATCHES,

IN SOLID GOLD AND SILVER CASES ONLY,

AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Silver Hunting Watches.....$18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases....$80
Gold Hunting Watches, Ladies' Size.....$70

Every Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Company. We will send these Watches by Express to any place, with bill to collect on delivery, and give the purchaser the privilege to open the package and examine the Watch before paying, and any Watch that does not give satisfaction may be exchanged or the money will be refunded. Every one is requested to write for our Descriptive Price-List, which explains the different kinds with prices of each.

Please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.

Address in full,
HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N. Y.

THE NEW EDITION of our DESCRIPTIVE and ILLUSTRATED SMALL FRUIT CATALOGUE of 52 pages, and PRICE-LIST for SPRING of 1869, of 16 pages, will both be sent to all applicants enclosing 10 cents. They contain: A beautiful Colored Plate of the Martha (White Concord) Grape, Illustrations of the Jucunda (Our No. 700), and Fillmore Strawberries, Kittatinny and Rochelle Blackberries; Descriptions of the leading Grapes, Strawberries, Raspberries, Blackberries, Gooseberries, Currants, &c., including interesting accounts of some of the newer kinds; Considerations that should influence the purchaser in the choice of Nursery Stock; The Causes of Failure in Small Fruit Culture, and the requisites of success; Select Lists by mail and otherwise; The Value of Pot-grown Strawberry Plants; Lists of Strawberries for Amateurs and convenient Market; For Market purposes or Home use; Distant and Convenient Markets; Early, Medium, and Late varieties, in the order we esteem them; Letters and Reports of distinguished Fruit Growers, who have visited our Grounds and examined our varieties, modes of culture, system of handling, etc.

Whether growers wish to purchase our stock or not, they will find these two pamphlets of 68 pages of great value, and worth more than ten times their cost. For which send at once, 10 cents.

J. KNOX,
Box 155, Pittsburgh, Pa.

£150,000,000

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1030. Fee to search for any name, $1. GUY & CO.,6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

Dr DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD LIVER OIL

Universally recognized by the Faculty as

INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR

to every other kind,

and the unequaled remedy for

Consumption, General Debility,

and the Wasting Diseases of Children.

DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in Imperial Half-Pints only, sealed with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with his Trade-Mark.

SOLE CONSIGNEES.

ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.

SOLE ACCREDITED AGENTS IN AMERICA,

EDW'D GILPIN & Co., 34, Cliff street, New York.

Sold by all Druggists, at $1.50 per Bottle.

☞ Beware of fulsome imitations.

$20 A DAY—TO MALE AND FEMALE AGENTS.—Reader, if you will introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES, Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only Licensed Shuttle Machine in the market sold for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Full particulars free. Address

W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio.

THE DOLLAR SUN.

Chas. A. Dana's Paper.

The cheapest, neatest, and most readable of New York Journals. Every body likes it. Three editions, DAILY, SEMI-WEEKLY, and WEEKLY, at $10, $2, and $1 a year. Full reports of markets, agriculture, and Farmers' and Fruit Growers' Clubs, and a correct story in every Weekly and Semi number. A PREMIUM to every subscriber. Specimens free. Send for a copy, with premium list.

I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher, New York.

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we recommend especially for home and office use, the plain Hungarian and Egg Bowls, with Wide Mouth Stems, as they hold most tobacco, and are the most durable and practical ones, being the easiest to clean. Or for a Cigar Bowl, having the largest draft to allow cigar to smoke cool. For traveling and street smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bend.

Being represented extensively throughout the country by our goods, we are desirous to have our Pipes—and Cigars too—reach every smoker. Therefore we have reduced the prices to the following:

We will sell a No. 3 Pipe for $5, and for every additional foot number higher (meaning No. 4 costs $6; No. 5, $8; No. 11, $15, &c.). Pipes from No. 4 to No. 8 are considered fair-sized ones; from No. 9 upward, large ones. In the above is included a Case for each Pipe.

Nice Amber Mouthpieces for Weichsel Stems are from $3 to $10 per piece.

We send by Express to collect on delivery, amount and charges to be stated. The amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance. Insure your money and the express-return charges.

In conclusion, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on thirty years' experience in the trade, having received our Diploma in 1929 by the respective commissioners in Europe; and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHAUM GOODS into this country.

We use Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Work done. And, mark of all, do not charge exorbitant prices. For reference, we are in possession of commendations from thousands of our customers, representing all classes of society.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Genuine Meerschaum Goods.

Stores: 485 Broadway, near Broome, and 27 John St., 27, middle of the block.

SEND FOR CIRCULAR AND PRICE-LIST TO LETTER BOX 5846.

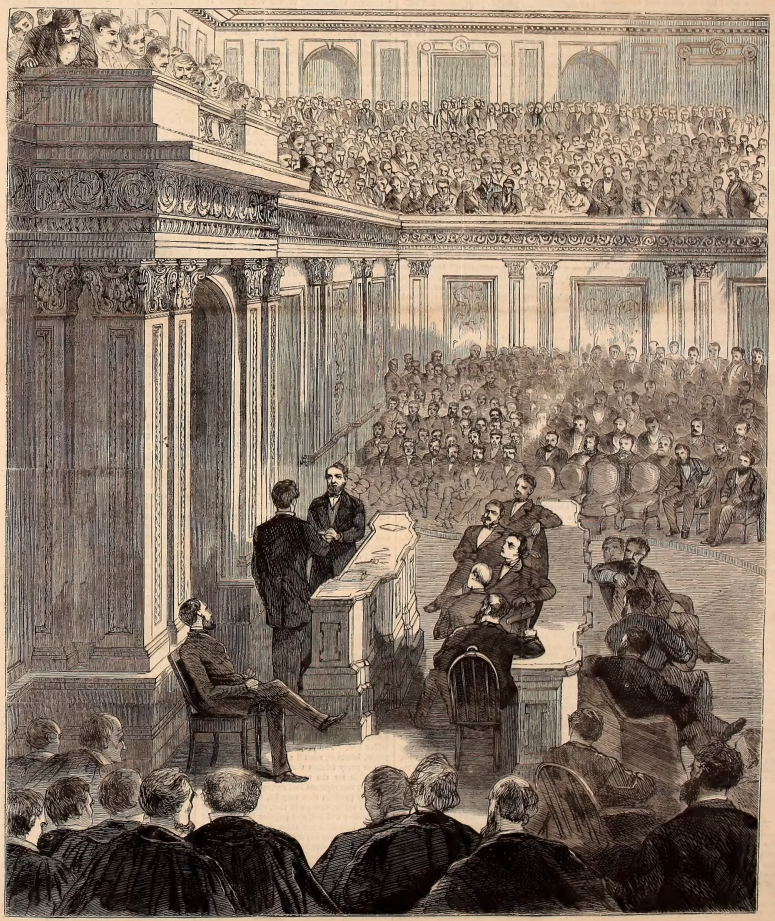
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 638.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

328 Harper 1 v 818



VICE-PRESIDENT WADE ADMINISTERING THE OATH TO SCHUYLER COLFAX.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 188.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1869.

THE FOURTH OF MARCH.

ELSEWHERE in this paper we describe and illustrate the happy event of the fourth of March—the inauguration of President GRANT. It is a day which will be, as we believe, gratefully remembered as that on which the administration began that closed the immediate questions opened by the war, and ushered the country into a career more rational than it has ever known. The wisdom of the people in electing General GRANT rather than his opponent has been already vindicated by the greater tranquillity and security in the Southern States, and by our constantly increasing financial credit abroad. It can not be doubted that if Mr. SEYMOUR and General BLAIR had been inaugurated instead of General GRANT and Mr. COLFAX, there would have been a profound distrust in the public mind both at home and elsewhere. There is now, however, a universal confidence both in the integrity, the ability, and the purpose of the new President. No one fears that the national character will suffer from him in any way, and it is felt that if palpable evils are not at once reformed, the reason must be sought elsewhere than in his perception or his will.

The President's inaugural address, with its simplicity, earnestness, and elevation of tone, was wholly worthy of the great occasion. It was not new in every where read and considered. It has been contrasted with the speeches of such feeble and base politicians as BUCHANAN and PIERCE, the last of the Democratic Presidents, and it suggests, by its infinite manliness, the golden words of WASHINGTON and LINCOLN. He says, with truth, that the office comes to him unsought, and the country gladly believes him when he adds that he shall conscientiously strive to serve it as well as he can. Such words from such a man are not phrases merely. They afford GRANT'S entire history, not obscured nor perverted his meaning. Always with a policy to recommend springing from conviction, he will have none to enforce against the constitutionally-expressed will of the people. "I know no method to secure the repeal of bad or obnoxious laws so effective as their vigorous execution." In the great questions of the time, says the President, can be wisely settled only by maintaining the utmost security of person and property, and the freedom of religious and political opinion in every part of the country. He appeals to the young men to help keep the national honor unfurnished, by insisting upon honesty in every part of the debt, and exhorts the country to repudiate repudiators. In foreign affairs the golden rule, that is, the highest law of individual intercourse, should direct our policy. The Indians must be humanely treated, with a view to ultimate citizenship. The suffrage question will agitate us until it is authoritatively settled, for which a way is now opened by the fifteenth amendment. And the President concludes by asking national patience and resolution toward a happy Union, and by invoking the favor of Almighty God to that end.

The address shows General GRANT'S admirable comprehension of the situation and its necessities, and his full sympathy with the party of wise progress. Indeed, as we see a man so true and tried, so sagacious and strong, called to the Presidency of a nation full of energy and industry and resources, and kindling with all the fire and hope of youth, it is impossible not to foresee a brilliant destiny for the country. But in this hour of just pride and exultation no one must not forget that the President is but an official of limited powers; that this country can not be governed by PUNY, but is constantly controlled by public opinion; and that the highest patriotism consists in keeping that opinion as true as the purpose of the Chief Magistrate. We consider elsewhere the duty of every citizen, and show how he can aid the President in his great task. For the power and duty of the individual citizen, despite all mere rhetoric, are not yet truly perceived nor conscientiously discharged.

General GRANT, as he enters upon his arduous administration, knows that the prayers of all good men attend him, and that the hearts of the poor and oppressed every where bless him. His character and career already instinctively rank him with our two greatest Presidents. The national confidence is unbounded, but it will not be betrayed.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

THE Vice-President, also, takes his seat amidst universal congratulation and confidence. The public career of Mr. COLFAX has been so conspicuous that he is as much known as any man in the country, and, with as few enemies as any public man, he has thousands of warm and eager friends in every part of the land. But better than the general friendship is the reason, and that is an unshaken confidence in the personal character of the Vice-President. Indeed, one of the most gratifying of all the pleasing facts of the occasion is, that both the President and Vice-President are men of the highest character. It is not a pair of politicians merely who now fill the highest offices in the Government.

It was the general feeling of the most sagacious men in the country, long before the nominations, that the candidate for Vice-President should be selected, not for local or lesser reasons of any kind, but from the profoundest conviction that his possible succession to the Presidency would not disturb the country. Three times in our history the Vice-President, by the death of the President, has been called to the chief executive position, and in each instance the change has been a national misfortune. It would have been more fatal for a party actually smarting under the worst betrayal to nominate a Vice-President who was not heartily in sympathy with it; and the selection of Mr. COLFAX was hailed with the most cordially sagacious action of the Convention in all its work.

As Speaker of the House the Vice-President has been as popular and efficient an officer as any of his predecessors. His ample knowledge of Parliamentary law, his promptness and self-possession, his facility of oratory, his urbanity and firmness, have been constantly displayed upon the most public scene. Through all he has passed with the sincere respect of his colleagues and with the unqualified love of his countrymen; and he ascends to his higher and more peaceful station with their heartiest good wishes and high anticipations.

It is delightful to see in such men as GRANT and COLFAX the representatives of a truly American principle in our politics; and in their inauguration the beginning of a better era for the country.

THE OPPOSITION.

A LEADING article in the World upon the morning of the Inauguration concludes with the statement that Democrats expect General GRANT "to be nothing but the President, present, and they will constantly confront him with the same resolute opposition which they have always offered to the Republican party."

This is a frank avowal. It shows any intelligent man can ask is, that the lines be plainly drawn and constantly remembered that divide the Republican and Democratic parties. The mischief threatened by Mr. CHASE'S nomination by the Tammany Convention was that it tended to obscure the issue. Mr. CHASE had nothing in common with the Democratic party, except, as his position at the time indicated, a restless fever for place. The Democratic party had "always offered" a "resolute opposition" to the Republican, and Mr. CHASE had always been a Republican. His nomination would have been a deception; and his election, had it taken place, could only have settled nothing.

But the difficulty was avoided. Those who had always led the Democratic party in its resolute hostility to the Republican had it still, and the country showed what it thought of those leaders and their followers by the election of General GRANT. Meanwhile the intended candidate of those who had always opposed what deserves no better name than a dodge, on the 4th of March administered the oath of office to the President in whose triumphant defiance of the Republican party is profound and inspiring. Yet among the reflections of the famous day there could have been none more instructive than that he who had been the most steadily associated with that party and those principles, and who had remained firm while so many failed, at the very instant when they were beginning to prevail over a peaceful and united land, had chosen to separate himself from association with them, and to pass into history as another victim of ruinous Presidential ambition.

And as the Democratic party proposes to offer the same resolute opposition to the Republican administration, it is useful to see what the Republican principles and policy are which the Republican party arose out of a resolute opposition to the extension of slavery, which was a Democratic policy. That opposition was based on moral basis, and when the relation between morality and interest was made plain the Republican party came into power. The revolt of the Democratic leaders was offered "a resolute opposition" at Fort Donelson, Vicksburg, Andersonville, and Richmond compelled the Republican party to suppress that opposition by war. The war ended, and the party was forced into a struggle with the President, who, supported by the Democratic party, tried to reverse as much of the result of the war as possible.

The Republican principles were that the Union should be restored on terms honorable agreeable to the loyal victors, and not inconsistent with the principle of the Government and with the Constitution; that the freedmen should not be betrayed; and that the national honor should not be tarnished by any form of repudiation. These principles, and the policy that grew out of them, received "a resolute opposition" from the Democratic party. That party declared that when the war ended every thing in the united States resumed its old position; that, under the Constitution, Congress could prescribe no conditions whatever for the restoration of States that did not succeed in permanently seceding; and that the loyal people of the United States could do nothing whatever to secure the victory they had won but try individuals for treason. Upon this ground the Democrats resisted every measure proposed which was designed to establish civil and political equality, and to prevent the unquestioned supremacy of the recent rebel element in the Southern States. But every such measure was carried by the Republican party, and was heartily approved by the country.

The Democratic party offered "resolute opposition" to the fifteenth amendment when it proposed to check the extension of slavery. All the "resolute opposition" to the war proceeded from the same party. When the Republicans sought to found peace upon justice and equality, and the acknowledged principle of a popular government, it was resolutely opposed by the Democratic party. Declaring that the policy of Congress was wise and humane, and that the faith of the nation should be kept with public creditor and freedman, and nominating General GRANT, the Republican party met the same "resolute opposition" of the old friends of slavery, and of the apologists and abettors of the war. And now that Democratic party has entered upon his Presidency the same opposition is to be offered. Naturally—for the future policy of the Republican party will spring from those principles of equal rights which the Democratic party has always resolutely opposed. The President declares for complete protection of person and property and every opinion in the country. The Democratic party has always resolutely opposed such a policy, and will continue to do so. He declares for honest payment of the debt. The Democratic party will resolutely oppose. The President declares for economy and retrenchment. The Democratic party "will constantly confront him with the same resolute opposition."

Already the "resolute opposition" has begun by the most ludicrous and captious comments upon the circumstances of the Inauguration, and upon the inaugural address. Mr. JAMES BROOKS, also, a worthy representative leader of the Democracy, attempted a small riot in the House to prevent the organization. But no patriotic man can regret that the hostility which necessarily exists in human affairs between justice and intelligence and honesty on the one hand, and ignorance, prejudice, brutality, and privilege upon the other, should be frankly declared and plainly understood. We certainly do not object to the virtues or all the talents of the Republican party. But as certainly we see that the ignorant and the disorderly, with the skeptics of all intelligent classes and the aristocracy every where, instinctively ally themselves with the Democratic party and wish its success; while the great mass of the intelligent, industrious, and thrifty American people, and the liberals of every country in the world, range themselves with the Republican party of the United States. It has been the party of humanity and intelligence in the past, and there is no reason why the same faith and sagacity that have hitherto inspired its really great measures should desert it in the smiling future that lies before it.

THE OFFICES.

THE President has very plainly stated his views upon the subject of office-holding. Only honest and capable men should be appointed, and it should not be enough to entitle a man to recommendation for any place that he had been a hard worker for the party; nor that he is poor and wishes the office; nor that his uncle is a Senator and his cousin a Representative. The civil service of the United States is not—certainly it should not be—an infirmary for the feeble and impecunious.

But the President has also said, and, if he had not said it, it is naturally his view, that the heads of the executive departments must be responsible for the offices in them. This is simply good sense. But we remind our friends that there is still another responsibility for those offices, and that is the Republican party. Although the President has very wisely and firmly refused himself of the enormous pressure of office-seeking, the fact of office-seekers is far more formidable than ever. It has become a recognized industry, but its operations will be fortunately somewhat limited by the Tenure-of-Office law. The applications for a few days campaign, however, are all made; and we suggest to our party friends that they will be held accountable for the results. If the offices are filled by incompetent and corrupt men, however strongly partisan they may be, the public service will suffer, taxes will rise, the character of the country will fall, and popular impatience of a party that does not show itself fit to govern will emphatically express itself at the next election. On the other hand, if the offices are filled by worthy and capable men who are firm and tried in the Republican faith, the relief of taxation, the increasing prosperity, domestic content, and foreign respect will give the dominant party a long and secure term of power.

Truths so evident need no urging. But what is important is to know whose judgment we have sought to stand firm; to be able to say no; and to insist upon recommending no one whom they, if holding the appointing power, would not themselves appoint from a conviction of personal character and capacity, as well as from party considerations. Such considerations, of course, are not to be omitted. Under our present system it is most desirable that those who hold prominent positions in the service should be in sympathy with the Administration. With a proper civil service bill this necessity would be very much lessened, because such a bill would change the conditions of party organization. But the interests of party themselves demand—if the case should arise, which is hardly supposable—that when the necessity of choice lies between an incompetent party friend and a competent party foe the latter should be preferred. In the vast majority of such cases, but not in all, that might be found would strengthen, not weaken the party.

Let every honest friend of the President, then, take his share of the responsibility, and lighten the load all along the line by refusing to cheapen or prostitute his name. When a secretary sees a man whom he knows that it means something. Let it assure him that if the man personally present you would urge, upon the most legitimate grounds, the appointment you recommend. This is the best we can do in the absence of a civil service bill—but it is a great deal.

MR. SEWARD.

AMONG the memorable events of this political season is the retirement of Mr. SEWARD from the public scene upon which for so long a time he has been so conspicuous an actor. On the last day of his official life the clerks in the Department of State addressed him a letter, expressing their regard and admiration, and in his reply Mr. SEWARD said:

"Gentlemen, it would be as idle as it would be presumptuous for us to undertake to fix a standard for the popular appreciation of our own services. That will be the task of history, which, in the future, estimating studiously the vicissitudes of nations; and that task can only be performed when we shall have ceased to be. Let us, therefore, be content for the present with hoping for concord and harmony to each other the humble pretension that whatever may be the errors which history may at any time detect, these errors have been all in unconscious of judgment, and not of motive or purpose."

This is what every man would fain have said in his own case. But what indeed is the case of a truly said, of the most calamitous errors that have ever been committed.

Doubtless it is impossible in the present heats of party difference properly to estimate Mr. SEWARD'S character and career. And yet it is significant and suggestive that those whose faith in him twenty years ago was profound and intelligent have long been wholly alienated, and those who, in the full flush of young enthusiasm, regarded him as men only once regard a political chief, have long since looked upon him in amazement and sorrow. The history of these times must answer the question why it was that a statesman who in 1860, was the acknowledged leader of a great and victorious party which then came into power, in 1869, when that party was more firmly fixed in popular confidence than ever, while during the intervening years its policy, founded upon its original principles, had constantly prevailed, was wholly without the sympathy or respect of that party or of any other.

It is not the case of EDMUND BURKE, for when he parted with his old associates he became at once the acknowledged chief and supreme adversary of the great revolutionary party of Europe. Besides, as COLERIDGE wisely says, and as Mr. MORLEY has recently admirably shown, the political principles were always the same, however the practical application from them at various times may have differed. Will it, then, be urged by the future historian that Mr. SEWARD'S principles always remained the same, and that he separated from his party only upon the question of method or of policy? Is his political sagacity to be vindicated by placing him with Mr. DIXON and Mr. DICKINSON and Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON? Is posterity to be taught that the man who said at Rochester that there was an irrepressible conflict between liberty and slavery, and who should have known what his words politically implied, seriously believed, when slavery had been abolished by civil war leaving millions of freedmen needing subdued rebel masters, that justice and honor and peace demanded that every right and every chance of future defence should be left to the mercy of those masters? Will history represent this as the principle of Mr. SEWARD or only as his policy?

To a contemporary it seems as if the sad and severe Clio must depict Mr. SEWARD as a man who had become the representative of a cause in which he had no moral convictions. His sagacity and his humanity seem to have shown him that the conditions of this country were finally hostile to slavery, and that a political party founded, like the Democratic, upon the necessities of slavery, and directed by great slave lords, must presently fall before the combined conscience and industry of free laborers. But it was the view of a shrewd politician rather than of a statesman or a moralist. This view explains his familiar intimacy with Mr. WEED; and it is certainly doubtful whether either of these gentlemen saw that the moral element was the real strength of their party. Mr. Seward was both an optimist and a doctrinaire, but he lacked the moral earnestness and conviction that could alone explain the actual situation. He honestly thought, doubtless, that the slave lords of the Democracy would fight the battle out under the forms of law, and tranquilly submit to inevitable destruction. Had Mr. Seward, as the representative of enlarging liberty, been as vitally in earnest as Davis and Mason and the rest were, as the representatives of increasing slavery, he would not have talked airily about the settlement in sixty days, or have written to our ministers abroad that they were not to suffer the question of slavery to be mentioned in discussions of the rebellion. The champion of liberty in America, when he was taken by the throat by Slavery, repelled the sympathy of every European friend it had.

The same want of moral conviction—one of that quality which is indispensable to a statesman, the perception of the strict relation between morality and the public welfare, drew Mr. Seward into the support of the most cruel, arbitrary, and unjust policy of Andrew Johnson. Other motives may have influenced his action, motives that no one who has ever been a friend of Mr. Seward's will suggest. But the absence in the complexity of motives of human conduct the honorable and the unworthy are strangely blended—is enough for us to find a satisfactory explanation of a career at once illustrious and lamentable without involving personal dishonor.

The future student of our history who follows this political life of forty years, will not forget amidst his grief and consternation at the close, that he will be moved by sympathy for shallanders of a furious President upon spotless and honorable citizens—who declared that the man who said he didn't care whether slavery was voted up or down, would live in grateful remembrance with Abraham Lincoln, and who exultingly prophesied in his own State the defeat by five thousand majority of every whom he had politically taught, and who had helped to save the country to liberty and mankind—was the same man who had bravely proclaimed the higher law—who had exposed in calm and terrible detail the ghastly despotism of slavery —and who, crossing the frontier, had planted before the whole world of slavery upon its own domain the standard of equal liberty. Had Mr. Seward been what the young men of fifteen and twenty years ago believed him to be, his fame would have been as sweet and sure as any in our history.

THE CABINET.

General Grant said, before his inauguration, and when Mrs. Grundy was sick with curiosity, that he should choose his Cabinet to please himself. But every body was sure that he would choose it to please somebody else. Every body composed a Cabinet entirely satisfactory to the composer, and General Grant did the same. He, however, had the advantage of every body, for he could inaugurate his to the Senate. If the Senate was surprised, it did not manifest the emotion, and immediately confirmed the President's choice.

The principle of that choice was obvious. The Cabinet as nominated is not a board of politicians, and it plainly means business. In other words, the President has first sought for his Secretaries honesty and ability, and then sympathy with the Republican party. He evidently conceives that his first duty is not to provide for the party, but to secure the efficiency and economy of the public service by agents selected from the party. It is impossible to deny the view of his duty it implies. It is delightful to think of the gnashing of teeth on the evening of the 5th of March among the political leaders.

Mr. Washburne, the personal friend of the President, is well known to the country from his long public service. Steward, wary, honest, economical, the conduct of our foreign affairs will be firm and direct, and it is fair to presume that his contributions to the literature of diplomacy will be more emphatic than diffuse.

As we write the position of Mr. Stewart is uncertain. Confirmed as promptly as he was nominated, he unexpectedly accepted—and then he was incapacitated by the law of '89, and it is not now known whether Congress will concur with the President's suggestion that Mr. Stewart be made eligible. The nomination was unexpected, but upon reflection it was warmly approved. Mr. Stewart has great practical experience and knowledge of financial subjects as every great merchant must have. How skilful an administrator of the public finances he would be can only be inferred from his singular success in private administration, and could only be proved in his case, as in the case of any one else in the country whom the President might have called to the place, by experiment.

Mr. Stewart would bring into the office a signal genius for organization, untiring energy, a powerful will, indexible firmness of purpose, a searching eye, and an unsparing hand for every irregularity. Those who had fondly hoped that the days of Grant might be even as those of Johnson would be suddenly and completely undeceived. In his Department Mr. Stewart would be as good as a Civil Service bill. He has not been a party politician, and has, consequently, no enormous train of dependents to gratify. He belongs to none of the cliques, or rings, or factions in his own party, but he is in full sympathy with the party; and his administration of the Treasury would be the beginning of such efficient work in that Department that the spectacle of official capacity and industry, and the consequent saving to the Government, would shed lustre upon the party, and most warmly commend it to the confidence of all good citizens. If Mr. Stewart is not to be the Secretary, let us hope that his successor will have qualities as admirable and essential.

General Schofield has the complete confidence of the President and the respect of the country. General Cox is of a representative of the volunteer soldier in civil war, a man of admirable ability and accomplishment, and of great executive faculty and experience. Mr. Borie, known to the country, is selected by the President from his own conviction of his fitness for the duty to which he is called. Mr. Creswell is a Southern radical of the best type. Mr. Hoar is one of the oldest men in New England; of signal sagacity, of ample and various accomplishment, and of a personal probity so pure that it is easy to understand the President's confidence and choice.

These gentlemen are the President's council. Ability, patriotism, experience, integrity, spotless honor—how such a combination fills the last Democratic Cabinet! Turn to it for a moment, reflective reader, and thank Heaven for what this republic has escaped and what it has gained! The central figure is James Buchanan. His name is spite epithet. His Secretary of State was Lewis Cass, an old man who trembled and disappeared. His Secretary of the Treasury was Howell Cobb, who did what he could to empty it, and fled. His Secretary of War was John B. Floyd, a Virginian politician, who gave the national arsenals away. His Secretary of the Navy was Isaac N. Toucey, who sent the ships away, that the fatal blow at the country might be struck. The Secretary of the Interior was Jacob Thompson, who aimed the blow. It seems not unnatural that the organ of a party which called these persons into the Cabinet should denounce the choice of the new President. But as Grant is to Buchanan, so is his Cabinet to that evil conclave. It represents the qualities of honesty, honor, unity, justice, and peace; Buchanan's for dishonor, disunion, inhumanity, and war.

SISERA'S PROSPECTS.

Father Hecker's cheerful confidence that America will be Roman Catholicized by the end of the century must be a little disturbed by such events as which lately occurred in Auburn. The Bishop had appointed a priest, and directed another to officiate in his place. But the congregation would not hear the newcomer, although he had been specially asked for him. Nor would they listen to the Bishop, but drove Bishop and priest out of the church, and then, holding a meeting, resolved that they would not submit to the appointment, and, if necessary—which was rather a comical conclusion—would appeal to the Pope.

This action, which in Buffalo several months since, shows that the Roman Church, even should it justify Father Hecker's prediction, will hardly be the Church of Gregory VII. or of Innocent III. It will undergone extreme if not essential modifications. This spirit of independence, of inquiry, of self-reliance, of open defiance of sacerdotal arrogance, is very good Americanism; but it is very poor Roman Catholicism. It is one thing to appeal to the Pope against a Bishop—it is a very different thing to silence the Bishop without appeal, and put him out of doors. This is indeed very much akin to the spirit of a certain gentleman who smiled certain theses to a certain church-door.

So also the quiet defiance and disregard of the priestly orders against Fenianism in this city, and four years ago in Boston, and the dependence which reveals the ecclesiastically disorganizing influences of religious liberty. Nor is there any doubt that the more intelligent Catholics in this country regarded the Pope's recent diatribes against modern times, common schools, and human progress, with the same amusement which the rest of us gave to a Protestant mind. Mr. Parton's articles some time ago spoke the old church fair, and he stated impressively, and in round numbers, the statistics of the Catholic increase. In the year 1800 there were about 90,000 members of the Roman Church in the United States; now there are nearly 5,000,000. The Catholics were then one-seventieth, they are now one-sixth of the whole population. The increase of the wealth of the Church is amazing; and naturally enough when the most costly property is given to them by municipal bodies that expect by such means to buy the votes of the faithful. Many of the chief officers in this city are said to be Romanists; and an Italian paper recently stated that the Roman Court already ruled New York. The purpose of the Church as a party is seen in its policy of a sectarian separation of the school money.

But the increase of the Church is by immigration, not by conversion. It always had a hard tussle with the Anglo-Saxon and was worsted. Every year there are a third of a million of immigrants from Europe who come among us, and the great mass of them are Roman Catholics. But in the second and third generation their love are very palpably relaxed, and even Bishops may be ordered out of church by them. The conversions are chiefly among the poor and sentimental classes possible in the land of rum. Rose bushes which infest rose-bushes and low vines, may easily be destroyed by hand, or shaken into a vessel of water. The best agent for destroying bugs in gardens is the duck; but the duck is reliable, although workmen consider it beneath their dignity to use it in this effective manner.

The tendency to omit the performance of duties of this description is due to a want of that forethought and activity which are evidenced in what is called public spirit. When the mind is embodied by what is higher than a blind selfishness, attention is paid to all those causes or injury which affect the public good. But the narrowest selfishness should prompt to the destruction at every opportunity of those bugs and worms which infest gardens and orchards; for it not done, it is only a question of time when they shall have a complete mastery over production; whereas, by the use of proper efforts, the producer will have the mastery over them.

INSECTS DAMAGING TO VEGETATION.

Dr. Loring of Salem, recently delivered the annual address to the Agricultural Society of New England at Boston, after which he was unanimously elected by hearty acclamation vote. It is certainly a good sign that gentlemen of learning apply themselves to the resuscitation of the soil of New England. Agriculture is the primary interest; and inasmuch as most cultivators of the soil pursue the plan of rapid exhaustion, it is essential to success, if not to safety, that the dangerous tendency be arrested. Indeed there can be no greater enemy to the country among agriculturists than those who wear out the soil. It constitutes a crime which should be punished by penal laws.

In the upland districts of the Southern States, where the pine prevails, lands are cleared and abandoned after a few years. It is deemed cheaper to repeat this system than to fertilize. But new forests must be the ultimate effect of such a policy. In New England the soil has been exhausted by cropping with the aid of too little fertilization. It can be renovated on an extensive scale only by applying the land to pasturage with cattle and sheep, inasmuch as any other plan would exceed the expense which many farmers would apply.

The enrichment of the soil by these means will be greatly promoted by the use of ground plaster spread over the soil in advance of spring rains. Turning in clover, or in some soils buckwheat, if the rotary system, where the ordinary mode of enrichment is too expensive; but where this is not the case, there is no better outlay of capital than to improve the soil to that capacity which will yield large growth without the extravagance which exposes crops to lodging before the reaper can perform his work. Money thus invested is supremely interest without risk, and without the necessity of calling upon an elective judiciary to aid in its collection.

Dr. Loring, in his address, shows, with remarkable clearness, the fallacy to theories with which we are inclined to differ.

"At my own suggestion," he says, "the question whether insects injurious to vegetation may not be easily, however, practically exterminated by letting loose upon them some other insect tribes which will war and feed upon them, was referred to the attention of entomologists; and I trust man may one day be relieved from the enormous ravages of parasitical flies which will relieve him in his strife with cankerworms and canker-worms, with the curculio and the borrowing maggot, and slugs, which now infest our orchards in spite of all the various nice and ingenious stilles, and la ngite of tar, and tree-protectors, and gunpowder and lime."

The neglect to exterminate insects belongs to that indifference to the future of the community which exhibits itself in wearing out the soil. Insects are not free in numbers, but when there is neglect to destroy them they increase with alarming rapidity. The worm which infests apple trees in June and simultaneously with the first life of the leaf. The same agency brings them both into existence—the beneficent warmth of spring. If the tree were full-leaved in the sun should not be able to heat to the eggs, which are glued to the finest extremity of the limbs on the side of the tree on which the sun first bestows its morning ray; nor could the young worm obtain its nourishment, which it first derives from the tenderest sprouts. The conditions for its destruction are all then favorable, as it is then that it is engaged in the construct its white tent in portions of the tree easily reached—generally where two limbs, strong enough to support the structure, commence to fork. The wild cherry is also inhabited in the same manner by the same family. But the apple-tree, with its drooping branches, affords a better means of destroying the eggs as in advance of the start of vegetation than the wild cherry, as those on the former may generally be reached from the ground.

The theory advanced by Dr. Loring for the destruction of these worms is to set in motion some winged enemy to pounce upon them as they move over the tree in their rapid work of stripping it of its leaves. A more certain one exists, if the search for the mass of eggs glued securely to the limb is omitted. It is to climb the tree and with the hand remove and destroy the tent at the time when fully inhabited, which is the case when the webs are not yet evaporated by the morning sun, or when the worms drives them from their daily meal. They are at first tiny, and the shining tent corresponds in size; but they grow rapidly, and they enlarge their habitation accordingly. It is not then so pleasant to handle them, but so tough is the exterior of their dwelling that with little skill it may be unfastened without touching its inmates, and thrown to the ground to be trampled presently with the feet.

An orchard of two or three hundred trees may be overhauled in this way in a few mornings, and relieved of the great damage of these insects. Even though it be, thousands of farmers allow them to increase in their orchards for want of some effective means for their sure destruction, when nature has provided the best possible in the hand of man. Rose bushes which infest rose-bushes and low vines, may easily be destroyed by hand, or shaken into a vessel of water. The best agent for destroying bugs in gardens is the duck; but the duck is reliable, although workmen consider it beneath their dignity to use it in this effective manner.

The tendency to omit the performance of duties of this description is due to a want of that forethought and activity which are evidenced in what is called public spirit. When the mind is embodied by what is higher than a blind selfishness, attention is paid to all those causes or injury which affect the public good. But the narrowest selfishness should prompt to the destruction at every opportunity of those bugs and worms which infest gardens and orchards; for it not done, it is only a question of time when they shall have a complete mastery over production; whereas, by the use of proper efforts, the producer will have the mastery over them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 1:

In the House, appropriations were made for the Bangor Custom House, and public buildings in Knoxville, as well as for certain territorial surveys.

March 2:

In the Senate, the measure providing for an increase of the Judges of female clerks and of the treasurer was defeated.—An appropriation of $5000 was made for Lincoln Memorial Room.—The bill relative to telegraphic communication between the United States and the foreign countries was passed.—The restriction of the Constitutional Amendment by the Tenure-of-Office bill came up and received considerable discussion. The bill proposed by Senator Sumner's amendment being rejected by a two-third vote. The Tenure-of-Office amendment was passed. After debate the bill was defeated.

In the House, the Land Grant Railroad bill was passed.

March 3:

In the Senate, the Public Credit bill as reported by the Conference Committee was passed 43 to 26. Also the Army Appropriation bill.

In the House, Speaker Colfax tendered his resignation and received an unanimous vote of thanks. Mr. Pomeroy, of New York, was declared Speaker pro tem.—The Con^ gress report on the Public Credit bill was agreed

March 4:

The Fortieth Congress expired at noon by limitation. Vice President Colfax was sworn in and took his place as President of the new Senate. The new House was organized by the election of James G. Blaine as Speaker.

March 6:

In the Senate, a message was received from President Grant, asking that Mr. A. T. Stewart might, by the Act of Congress, be relieved from the operation of the statute of 1789 prohibiting him from holding office in the Cabinet, and urging the confirmation by Senate of his interest in trade. Objection was made by Mr. Sherman, who introduced the Civil Service Reform bill, and the bill went over under the rules.

March 8:

The Senate, in executive session, received and immediately confirmed the following nominations by President Grant to the offices of the Cabinet:

For Secretary of State, Elihu B. Washburne, of Illinois.

For Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander T. Stewart, of New York.

For Secretary of the Navy, Adolphe E. Borie, of Pennsylvania.

For Secretary of the Interior, Jacob D. Cox, of Ohio.

For Postmaster-General, John A. J. Creswell, of Maryland.

For Attorney-General, E. Rockwood Hoar, of Massachusetts.

Governor Delano, of Ohio, was nominated for Commissioner of Internal Revenue; Registered-General Newcomb for General; General Sheridan for Lieutenant-General; General Schofield to fill the vacancy made by Philip H. Sheridan's promotion. Also, for the Brigadier-Generalship six Colonels. These nominations were also confirmed.

The Secretary of War has ordered an election to be held on the 30th of March, at which every male citizen of the State of Virginia, twenty-one years of age, and a resident of the State for a year or more, will be entitled to vote. The object of the election is to ascertain the sentiment of the people of Virginia in regard to the Constitution framed by a recent Convention, and to vote for or against the ratification of the same. The election will be held under the supervision of the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

General Sheridan has issued an order relative to the Ku-Klux of Virginia, instructing Colonel Ruger to notify the civil officers of his district that if they do not arrest the authors of the outrages committed, and not prevent the occurrence of such outrages in future, the civil and judicial establishment of the entire district, region, to be subsisted and forged at the expense of the citizens, and a sufficient force of troops will be sent thereto to perform and property is again afforded by the civil authorities.

Several important military assignments have been made. General Sheridan has been assigned to the command of Louisiana, General Reynolds to Texas, General Canby to Virginia, and General Gillem, commanding in Mississippi, has been returned to his regiment.

General Sheridan and his staff have arrived at Fort Leavenworth. The very report that the Indian war is ended, and that not a hostile Indian can be found inside the limits of the military district.

James Grant, who has been on trial for some time in Richmond for the murder of B. Rives Pollard, was found "not guilty" on the 6th and discharged.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Lamartine, the French poet and historian, died on the 1st of March at Paris.

In the Spanish Cortes on the 4th of March a committee of fifteen members was nominated to prepare the Constitution, define the rights and liberties of citizens, and establish a form of government.

The North German Parliament was opened on the 24th by a speech from the King of Prussia.

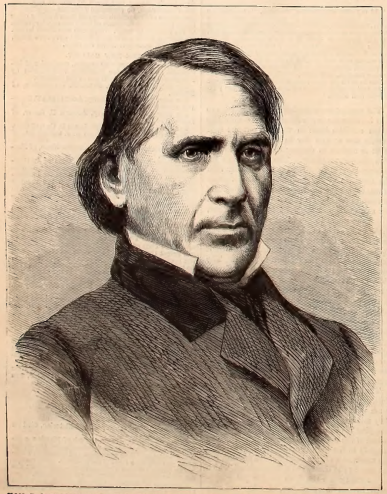
The ports of Jeddo and Nagasia, Japan, have been thrown open to foreigners. The former has been made the permanent capital.

JESSE R. AND HANNAH GRANT, FATHER AND MOTHER OF THE PRESIDENT.—[PHOT. BY LANDY, CINCINNATI.]

THE NEW SPEAKER.

THE Forty-first Congress on March 4th organized by the election of JAMES G. BLAINE of Maine as Speaker. The vote stood for Mr. BLAINE, 136; for Mr. KERR of Indiana, 57.

Mr. BLAINE was born in Washington County, Pennsylvania, in 1830. He graduated with honors at Washington College in his native State, and afterward removed to Maine and engaged in the profession of journalism. For several years he edited the Kennebec Journal, and subsequently the Portland Advertiser. He served four years in the Maine Legislature, during two of which he was Speaker of the House. In 1862 he was elected to Congress, serving as a member of the Committee on the Post-office and Post-roads. He has been re-elected for three successive terms in the House, where his political influence has always been important and on the side of progress. His election as Speaker in the place of COLFAX is a high but well-deserved honor. May his new career be as honorable, as successful, and as satisfactory as that of his predecessor!



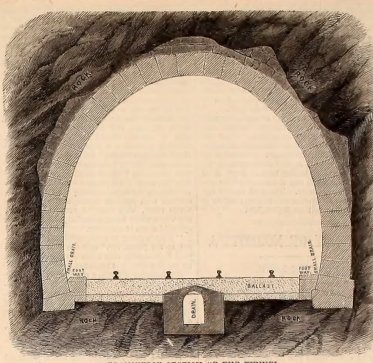
HON. E. B. WASHBURNE, SECRETARY OF STATE.—PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 168.]

HON. JAMES G. BLAINE, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE.—[PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.]

THE MONT CENIS TUNNEL.

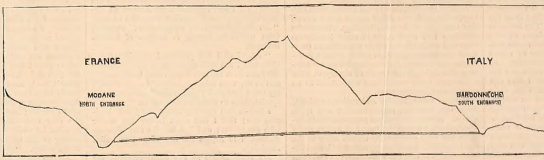
THE traveler is tempted to linger in that marvelous region of the Graian Alps, about Mont Cenis and its group, within sight of the streets and piazzas of Turin, which displays some of the greatest wonders of mechanical science amidst the sublime mountain scenery of aerial peaks and precipitous chasms, of roaring torrents and silent upper fields of snow. The works of the Grand Tunnel are now constructed along three-fourths of its whole length, between the valley of the Arc in Savoy and the valley of Bochemolles, opening into that of the Dora Riparia in Piedmont. We present a few illustrations relating to the tunnel and the means by which its excavation is carried on. The whole undertaking was kept in abeyance for some years, during the political and military disasters of that period which followed CHARLES ALBERT'S defeated attempt, in 1848, to liberate the North of Italy from the Austrian dominion. It was revived in the reign of his successor, King VICTOR EMANUEL, by the masterly statesmanship of Count CAVOUR, under whose patronage the lines of railway on each side of the Alps, both in Savoy and in Piedmont, were consolidated in the hands of one company, bearing the name of the LYONS. The Piedmontese line was at the same time constructed as far as Suza, which lies at the very foot of Mont Cenis, twenty miles from Bardonnèche.

At length the time came for piercing the Alps—the men and the tools for this great work. An English Engineer, Mr. BARTLETT, had patented, in 1855, a machine for perforating rock by a pointed iron bar, which was to be darted forth out of a tube charged, like an air-gun, with condensed air. It will, of course, be understood that the use of such an instrument is merely to bore a series of small holes, about two inches in diameter, which are to be filled with gunpowder for blasting, as is done in an ordinary mine. But Mr. BARTLETT'S apparatus was not suitable for a long tunnel, as it required a steam-engine to compress the air. No such engine, with its furnace or fire, could be kept at work in the far interior of the tunnel, miles away from the outer atmosphere. Steam-power must be superseded altogether. SOMMEILLER, a native of the Vallée de Sixt in Savoy, GRATTONI and GRANDIS, natives of Piedmont—all students of the University of Turin, and intimate friends of each other—in 1854, becoming acquainted with Mr. BARTLETT'S use of the air-force to pierce holes in rocks, perceived that the combination of water-power with that striking and boring power would be just the agent wanted for the tunnel work of the Alpine railway. The design of these young engineers was promptly recognized and assisted by a truly liberal government. A bill was immediately passed by the Chamber of Deputies at Turin authorizing the Ministry to make experiments under the direction of Messrs. SOMMEILLER, GRANDIS, and GRATTONI, at the public cost; and M. SOMMEILLER was provided with a seat in Parliament that he might explain his plans for himself. Machinery was ordered from Belgium, manufactured by Messrs. COCKERILL, near Liége, and set up at a place in the vicinity of San Pier d'Arena, near Genoa, where the double process of converting water-power into reserved air-power, and of applying the air-power, conveyed in long tubes, to the perforation of hard rock, was thoroughly tried with every possible variation. The result will be the conquest of the Alps, in the first instance, and subsequently, we doubt not, a future revolution in the system of underground mining, which will be conducted hereafter with a much higher degree of rapidity, economy, and safety than it has yet attained.



TRANSVERSE SECTION OF THE TUNNEL.

The arch of the tunnel is nearly semicircular; it is 25 feet 3½ inches wide at the base, 26 feet 2½ inches at the broadest part, and 24 feet 7 inches high at the Modane end, but 11½ inches higher at the Bardonnèche end. Its roof and walls are cased with masonry, as shown in the transverse section; at the Bardonnèche end the vault is of brick, and the sides are of stone, but at the Savoy end the whole is built of stone. Two lines of rail are laid down upon the floor of the tunnel, along which trains of wagons, drawn by horses, bring in the implements or materials for the work, and carry out the fragments of stone and rubbish from the excavation, to be thrown into a heap outside.



SECTION OF THE ALPS SHOWING THE COURSE OF THE RAILWAY TUNNEL.

Before we look at the boring apparatus in the working galleries of excavation let us notice, more particularly, the mode in which the pneumatic power, or condensed-air force, employed there to drill holes in the rock, is generated and conveyed where it is wanted. If a quantity of air be compressed into one-sixth of its ordinary space, it acquires an elastic force equal to six times the common pressure of the atmosphere—namely, 84 pounds to the square inch. As the neighboring stream here does not flow equally well in all seasons, the water of the Arc is pumped up by hydraulic engines, and allowed to rise to a certain height in two vertical columns, at the top of each of which is a valve, opening cavard, communicating with the chamber for the condensation of air. The action of a piston makes the water in each column alternately rise and fall; by which, in its rising, the air above it is driven up through the valve, and can not again escape; but in the falling of the water a vacuum is created, which is filled by the pressure of common air from outside. The condensed air, with the density and elastic force of seven atmospheres, is kept in huge receivers, or steam-boilers, always ready for use; they have been left full-charged during twenty-five days, without losing more than a five-thousandth part of the stored-up power. An iron conduit-tube, or series of tubes, rather less than a foot in diameter, jointed together by strong rivets, is laid upon tiles along the tops of a row of square pillars of masonry going into the tunnel. The continuous tube of inflexible length conveys the pneumatic force from Fournaux or Bardonèche, where the air is condensed, to the most advanced part of the works, in the very bowels of the mountain, where the face of the rock is stabbed, torn, and blasted by the daring ingenuity of man.

BORING-MACHINE IN THE SECOND WORKING GALLERY.

The width and height of the intended excavation, including the space to be filled with masonry at the roof and sides, are so considerable that it has to be carried forward in three drifts or galleries, at different elevations. These do not keep pace with each other, but the lower or main gallery is the farthest in advance—at least in the Fournaux direction; while at the present end, we believe, the advanced gallery is at the top, near the roof of the tunnel. The entrances to each gallery are made by large doors, turning on pivots, behind which the workmen take refuge from the explosion and shower of stones when they fire the rock with gunpowder. As the work progresses the three galleries are enlarged by manual labor, and thrown into one broad and lofty excavation, in which the walls and vault are then built to complete the tunnel. It is at the finally-cut extremity of each working gallery, or, as we should say, at the head of each drift, that the boring apparatus is used. That which is employed in the upper galleries is smaller and lighter than in the lower, and may be armed with only two or three piercing tools, instead of nine or ten; but they are applied in the same manner.

It will be sufficient for our readers to observe that an iron frame or carriage, traveling along the rails which are laid up close to the under face of the rock, holds some rather complex machinery, which has a threefold action—namely, that of a piston in a cylinder for propelling, something like a poggun, the boring tool against the rock; and, secondly, a rotatory motion, which at intervals turns works the valve of the propelling cylinder—an ingenious combination—and gives a twist to the boring tool when it enters the rock at each successive stroke. The boring tool, drill, or needle, or whatever it be called, is simply an iron bar, with a point 2 inches wide, almost like that of a chisel or adze, and very frequently sharpened, hundreds and thousands of these tools being soon worn out. They are connected with their respective propelling cylinders by flexible tubes of India rubber, so that the men in attendance can shift the point of a tool not only straight forward, but to the right hand or to the left, or upward or downward, making the holes touch each other, or enlarging the size of the excavation. A second pipe accompanies each borer and spouts in a little water to moisten the rock. The whole apparatus, likewise commodious by a larger flexible tube, or hose, from the iron tube from which the air draws its supply of condensed air. The strokes of the tools hunting the rock make a noise which resembles the rattling of a set of muskets. We need that to bore eight holes of the requisite depth, which is 3 or 4 feet, in a hard piece of rock, the boring tools must give 37,500 strokes, and the rotary cylinder makes an equal number of revolutions. The machinery therefore often gets out of repair, and on this account, as well as for the sharpening of the drills, the work-shops at each end of the tunnel are busily employed.

When the requisite number of holes, for which varies with the situation of the working and with the nature of the rock, have been bored for one blasting, the engine travels back out of the gallery; the men charge the holes with mining-powder, fix a fuse or light a match, and retire behind the closed doors till the rock is blown up. A strong jet of compressed air is then thrown in, to disperse the smoke and to enable them to breathe as they go forward. The trucks or wagons are brought up to remove the broken stone; the road is cleared, and the machine again comes on to make a new attack, which is usually aimed rather to one side of the breach already made, so that the whole width of the gallery is soon cleared. Sometimes, we believe, the alternate operations of boring and blasting can thus be performed in one gallery since or four times a day. But the substance of the mountain is one part is schist or limestone, in another part very hard quartz; and the rate of working is not always the same. Last year, in the Italian section, they were able to excavate a length of 9 feet daily, whereas this year 6 feet is all they can do; and the average progress of the Savoy portion is not more rapid. There is not an insignificant loss of power, about one-sixteenth part, from the prolongation of the conduit through which the condensed air passes to the workings. The heat in the tunnel is felt to be oppressive, which may be due to the discharge of excessive caloric from the condensed air. Visitors, before entering, change their clothes for a blouse and pair of linen trousers; the workmen are often naked to the waist. But the atmosphere is not foul, or closer than in an ordinary mine, there being a special apparatus, before noticed, for the ventilation of the tunnel. It is lighted all the way by gas in pipes laid along the ground, with oil-lamps in the recesses of the arches. Always burning, and the water is carried off by a covered drain in the middle of the floor.

The work never ceases, day or night, the men being divided into three gangs or "shifts," who labor each eight hours at a time. They are strong, sturdy, thick-set Piedmontese, indefatigable in their sober good-humor. Three-fourths of this gigantic task is now accomplished, the air-driven machinery having been at work since 1861. It is expected that the tunnel will be finished three years hence. The total cost of the tunnel and of the approaches of approaches is estimated at no less than £5,400,000.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER XXVII.

SCHLOSS HUNYADI.

WHEN I had made known my rank and quality I was assigned a room—a very comfortable one—in one wing of the castle, and no more notice taken of me than if I had been a guest at an inn. The house was filled with visitors; but the master, with some six or seven others, was away in Transylvania, boar-shooting. As it was supposed he would not return for eight or ten days, I had abundant time to look about me and learn something of the place and the people.

Schloss Hunyadi dated from the fifteenth century, although now a single square tower was all that remained of the early building. Successive additions had been made in every imaginable taste and style, till the whole presented an enormous incongruous mass, in which fortress, farmhouse, country-seat and pleasure-palace had their share, size alone giving an air of dignity to what numberless faults would have condemned as an outrage on all architecture.

If there was deformity and ugliness without, there was, however, ample comfort and space within. Above two hundred persons could be accommodated beneath the roof, and half as many more had been occasionally stowed away in the out-buildings. I made many visits, but all unsuccessfully, to find out what number of servants the household consisted of. Several were livery, and many—especially such as waited on the guests' bauble as myself—were dressed in blouse, with the crest of the house embroidered on the breast; while a little army of peasants, in their costume, or in the picturesque dress of the peasantry, lounged about the court-yard, lending a hand to embarrass or harass a groom, fill a bucket of water, or strap down a beast, as some weary traveler arrived or left with his post-wayworn. If there seemed no order or discipline anywhere, there was little confusion, and no ill-humor whatever. All were happy and idle, after the fashion of life, so far as I could see from my window, went on cheerfully and joyfully, if not very regularly or well.

If there was none of the trim propriety, or that neatness that rises to elegance, which I had seen in my father's household, there was also no profusion here, a boundless abundance, that, contrasted with our mode of life, made us seem almost mean and penurious. Meat came and went unceasingly, and, to all seeming, not known to any one. An unbounded hospitality awaited all comers, and all comers were tapped and caroused to night none remained on the morrow, nor, perhaps, even a name was remembered.

It took me some days to find out, and to know that there was nothing singular or strange in the position I occupied, living where none knew who I was, cared, or to care so much as cared to inquire my name or country.

In the great hall, where we dined all together, the distinguished guests at one end of the table, the lesser notabilities lower down, and the menials last of all, there was room for the greatest of sudden arrivals; and it was rare that the meat went over without some such. A hearty welcome and a comfortable place were ever, and the work of festivity went on as before.

I was soon given to understand that not only I might shoot and fish when I pleased, but that every appliance to do so agreeably was at my disposal, and that I might ride, or drive, or shoot, or sledge just as I liked. Only, however, I was cautious to show that my personal pretensions were of the very humblest, this fact seemed to give additional zest to my enjoyment of all these courteous civilities.

"We're always glad when any one will ride the jackass," said, in anger to me, a new arrival for want of exercise, and if you like three mounts a day you shall have them."

It was a rare piece of good luck for me that I could both ride and shoot. No two accomplishments could have come in such request as these, and I rose immensely in the estimation of those among whom I sat at table when they saw that I could ride a mask-jumper and shoot a wood-pigeon on the wing.

While I thus won such humble sufferings there was a higher populous than I, whose praise and longed for. As the company—some five-and-twenty or thirty persons—who dined at the upper table withdrew after dinner they passed into the drawing-rooms, and we saw them no more. (In the music and dancing, in which they passed the evening, we knew nothing, and took no own way, had our revels, which certainly amply contented those who had no pretensions to higher company; but this was precisely what I could not, do what I might, divest myself of. Like one of the characters of my old favorite Balzac, I yearned to be once more in the "salon," and among "ces espaules blanches," where the whole game of life is finer, where the parties are nearer, and the thrusts more deadly.

An accident gave me what all my ingenuity could not have effected. A groom of the chamber came suddenly one evening into the hall where we all sat to ask if any one there could play the new Csardas called the "Stephan." It was all the rage at Pesth; but no copy of it had yet reached the out-of-the-way district in which we were, and had the music with me; and, of course, offered my services at once. I had studied for a moment to make some slight change of dress, I found myself in a handsome salon with a numerous company. In my hand I had almost as little beyond the fact that most of the persons were in the national costume, the ladies wearing the laced bodice, covered with precious stones, and the men in velvet coats, with massive turquoise buttons, the whole effect being something like that of a splendid suit in a harlequin.

"We are going to avail ourselves of your talent at the piano, Sir," said the Countess Hunyadi, approaching me with a courteous smile. "Let me first offer you some tea."

Not knowing if fortune might ever repeat her present favor, I thought it profit by the opportunity to the utmost; and while cautiously repressing all desire to contrived to show that I was master of some three or four languages, and a person of education generally.

"You are probably of your nationality, Sir," said the Countess to me. "If not too great a liberty, may I ask your country?"

When I said "England," the effect produced was almost magical. A little murmur of something I might even call applause ran through the room: for I had unconsciously touched the hard, baroque dearest to the Hungarian heart, and I heard, "An Englishman! an Englishman!" repeated from mouth to mouth, in accents of kindest meaning.

"Why had I not presented myself before? Why had I not come to sit next to the Countess? Why not have made it known that I was here?" and so on, were asked eagerly of me, as though my mere nationality had erected me with some special claim to attention and regard.

I had to own that my visit was a purely business one, and that I came to see and to confer with the Count; and had not the very slightest pretension to expect the courtesies I was then receiving.

My performance at the piano crowned my success. I played the "Csardas" with such spirit as an Englishman I know the English are to the measure he delights in, and his enthusiastic oncres rewarded my triumph. "Adolf, you must learn that!" I know the Englishman is dying to have a dance," said the gay young Countess Palli; "and I am quite ready to be his partner." In a few minutes we were all whirling along in all the mad mazes of the "Csardas."

There is that amount of display in the dancing of the "Csardas" that not merely invites criticism, but positively spends on outspoken admiration whenever any thing like excellence accompanies the performance. My partner was celebrated for her beauty and beauty of her dancing, and for those innumerable interpolations which, fancy or caprice suggesting, she could throw into the measure. The sweet and response to these by appropriate gesture, to catch the spirit of each mood, and be ready for each change, are the very supposed use of which I need not say with what passionate ardor I threw myself into it. At one moment she would advance in voluptuous abandon, as if full of the timid homage, she would turn and fly off in the wild transport of a waltz movement. Then it was that I found myself overtake her; and, clasping her, whirl away, till suddenly, with a bound, she would free herself, again to dream into some languishing, some mood of deep dejection, or of mad and exuberant delight. It was clear that she was bent on trying the resources of my skill, and the very last flourish and the loud plaudits that greeted my successes had evidently put her pride on the mettle. I saw this, and was, as I thought, that the contest had begun to pique: so, taking the next opportunity as she passed me, I declared that I had not but the Hungarian costume—where the clink of the spur and the jingle of the lussar equipment blend with the tune—my "Csardas" was perfection.

Over any over-again were regrets uttered that the Empress, who loved the dance at Pesth, was done by timid and unimpassioned dancers, and who had, in consequence, carried away but a faint idea of its real fascination, could have witnessed our performance; and some even began to plan how such a representation could be prepared for her Majesty's next visit to Hungary. While they thus talked supper was announced; and as the company were marshaling themselves into the order to move forward, I took the opportunity to slip away unnoticed to my room, and, with my heart beating tumultuously, to note the result of accident, and that nothing but a generous courtesy could regard me as a guest.

I had not been many minutes in my room when I heard a footstep in the corridor. I turned the key in my lock, and put out my light.

"Herr Englander! Herr Englander!" cried a servant's voice, as a sharp knock shook the door. I made no reply, and he retreated.

It was clear to me that an invitation had been sent after me: and this thought filled the measure of my self-gratulation, and I drew nigh my fire, to sit and weave the pleasantest fancies that had crossed my mind for many a long day.

I waited for some time, sitting by the fire-light, and then with my lamp, I had a longer letter to write to Mlle. Sara; for up to then I had said nothing of my arrival, nor given any account of how behind-hand I stood.

Had my task been simply to record my life and my impressions of those around me at Hunyadi, nothing could well have been more easier. My few days there had been actually crammed with those small and pleasant incidents which tell well in goodly correspondence. It was all, too, so strange, so novel, so picturesque, that, to make an effective tableau of such a life, was merely to draw on memory.

There was a barbaric grandeur, on the whole, in the vast building; its crowds of exiles, its crowds of retainers who came and went, appeared at no bidding but their own; in the ceaseless tide of travelers, who hospited for the night, went their way on the morrow, no more questioned by the hospitality, to all seeming, than by a thing they had their own right to do. Details there were of neglect and savagery that even an humble household might have been ashamed of; but the whole was—how shall I say?—large, even in that ocean of boundless extravagance and cost, and speedily lost sight of.

It was now my task to tell Sara all this, cultured by the light, a warm light, too, of my own enjoyment of it. I pictured the place as I saw it on the night, and told her how I should not imagine for a while in what wild region I found myself: I narrated the way in which I was assigned my place in this strange world of archdiggers and unter-lagers for my friends, who mounted me and often accompanied me in my rides; how I had won the very highest encomiums from hill-tops and eminences which pertained to the great Count, boundless plains that in summer would have been waving with yellow corn, and far-stretching woods of oak or pine lost in the long distance; and, last of all, coming down to the very moment when I was writing, and the incident by which I had been promoted to the society of the castle, and how I had passed my last evening.

My pen ran rapidly along as I told of the splendors and magnificence of the scene, and of a company whose brilliancy seemed called up by the presence of the enchantment. "They pass and repass before me in all their gorgeous bravery as I write; and as the violins and the music, accompaniment to my foot keeps time with the measure of that Csardas that spun and which before me till my hand would have a mad intoxication."

It was only when I read over what I had written that I became conscious of the questionable taste of recording these things to one who might have to read them after a day of heavy toil, or a sleepless night of watching. What will she think of me, thought I, if it be thus I seem to discharge the weighty trust confided to me? Was it to mingle in such gaieties I came here, or will she deem that these follies are the fitting prelude to a grave and difficult negotiation? For a moment I had half determined to tear the letter in the fire, and limit myself simply to saying that I had arrived, and was awaiting the Count's return, but my pride, or rather my self-love, carried the day; and I could not repress the delight I felt to be in a society I cring to by so many interesting ties, and to show that I was not in my true element—here breathing the air that was native to me.

"Pray not to be supposed to forget," I wrote, "that it was not for these pleasures you sent me here, for I bear well in mind why I have come, and what I have to do. Counsel Haydon is, however, absent, and will not return before the end of the week, by which time I fully hope that I shall have assured such a position here as will easily contribute to my ability to serve you. I pray you, therefore, to read this letter by the light of the moment I now pen it, and, though I may seem to lend myself too easily to pleasure, to believe that no seductions of amusement, no flatteries of the world, shall ever from the fixed devotion I owe you, and from the fidelity to which I pledge my life." With this I closed my letter and addressed it.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE SALON.

THE morning after my Csardas success a valet in discreet black brought me a message from the Countess that she expected to see me at her table d'hôte, and that I learned the names and rank of the persons I had met the night before. They were all of that high noblesse which in Hungary assumes a sort of feudal grandeur, and by frequent intermarriage really possesses many of the close familiar interests of the family. Austria, we indeed Germany, from her rule, are rarely received in these intimate gatherings, and I learned with some surprise that the only strangers were Count Palli and myself—the former as the man styled them—who were then among the guests. "The lord" was with the Count on the shooting excursion; my lady having confined to her room by a heavy cold she had caught out sledging.

Shall I be misunderstood if I own that I was very sorry to hear that an Englishman and a man of rank was among the company. Whatever is our foreigners might extend to my small accomplishments I could lay claim to, I well knew would not compensate in my countryman's eyes for my want of station. In my father's house I had often had occasion to remark that while Englishmen freely admired the advances of a foreigner, and accepted his acquaintance with a courteous readiness, with each other they maintained a cold and studied reserve; as though no difference of place or circumstance was to obliterate that insular code which defines class, and limits each man to the exact rank he belongs to.

When they shall see, therefore, that I, whose my titled countryman will treat me—the distance at which he will hold me—and the measured firmness with which he will reject—not my familiarities, for I should not dare them, but simply the ease of my manner—these foreigners will be driven to regard me as some ignoble upstart who has no pretension whatever to be among them. I was very unwilling to encounter this humiliation. At which time I was not sailing under false colors. I had assumed no pretensions from which I was now to retreat. I had nothing to disown or disavow; but still I was about to be the willing guest of a society, to a place in which, in my own country, I could not have the faintest pretension; and it was just possible that my countryman might bring this fact before me.

He might do worse—he might question me as to who and what I was; nor was I very sure how my tact or my temper might carry me through such an ordeal.

Would it not be wiser and better for me to avoid this peril? Should I not spare myself much mortification and much needless anxiety? Thus thinking, I resolved to wait on the Countess at once, and explain frankly why I felt obliged to decline the gracious courtesy she had extended to me, and refuse an honor so full of pleasure and of pride.

She was not down as her—and I scarcely knew how to approach my theme in presence of a third person. With an effort, however, I spoke what I had come for; not very collectedly, indeed, nor perhaps very intelligibly, but in such a way as to convey that I could not engage to what she might look at least like a false position, and was almost sure to entail all the unpleasant relations of such. "I, Madam," said I, "am but a nobody; and in my country men of rank never associate with nobodies, even by an accident. My lord would not forgive you for thrusting him into such acquaintanceship, and I should never forgive myself for having caused you the unpleasantness. I don't imagine I have made my meaning very clear."

"You have certainly made me very uncomfortable," broke in Countess Hunyadi, thoughtfully. "I thought that we Hungarians had rather stiff notions on these subjects, but these of your country leave them miles behind."

"And are less reasonable besides," said the Pasi. "Across the Moldau society is being continually recruited from so rich a bourgeoisie."

"At all events," cried the Countess, suddenly, "we are here in the Moldau Hunyadi, and I am mistress. I invite you to dine with me; it remains for you to decide how you treat my invitation."

"Put in that way, Madam, I accept with deference." And I bowed deeply and moved toward the door. The ladies acknowledged my salute in silence, and, I fancied, with coldness, and I retired.

I was evidently mistaken in attributing coldness to their manner; the ladies received me when I appeared at dinner with a marked cordiality. I sat next Madame Pasli, who talked to me like an old friend; told me who the various people at table were; and gave me great pleasure by saying that I was sure to become a favorite with Count Hunyadi, who delighted in gayety, and cherished all those that promoted it. Seeing what interest I took in the ways of Hungarian life, she explained many of the customs I saw around me, which, deriving from a great antiquity, were nevertheless soon destined to pass away before the advance of a higher civilization. I asked who she knew of the English guests. It was nothing, or next to nothing—Count Hunyadi had made their acquaintance at Baden that summer, and invited them to pass the winter at Jassa with him. Countess Pasli had herself arrived since they came, and not seen them, for "my lord," as she generally called her husband, set out once to join the shooting-party; and my lady had not appeared since the day after her arrival.

"I only know that she is a great beauty, and of most charming manners. The men all rave of her, so that we are half jealous already. We were expecting to see her at dinner to-day, but we hear that she is less well than yesterday."

"Do you know their name?"

"No; I believe—I heard it—but I am not familiar with English names, and it has escaped me: but I will present you by-and-by to Count George Sandwich, who was at Baden with the Hunyadi met them—he'll tell you more of them."

I assured her that my curiosity was most amply satisfied already. It was a chasm which I did not expect to find an acquaintance, far less a friend.

"There is something almost forced in this humility of yours," cried she. "Are we to find out some fine morning that you are a prince in disguise?" I begged to marry at her pretty conceit that Madame Hunyadi asked the cause of her mirth.

"I will tell you later," said she. We soon afterward rose to go into the drawing-room, and I saw as they laughed together that she had told her what she said.

"Do you know," said the Countess Hunyadi, approaching me, "I am told by Madame Pali's mind, and I shall never rest till you reveal your secret to us."

I said something laughingly about my incognito being the best coat in my wardrobe, and the matter dropped. That night I sung several times, alone, and in duet, with the Pasli, and was overwhelmed with flatteries of my "fresh tenor voice" and my "admirable style." It was something so new and strange to me to find myself the centre of polite attentions, and of those warm praises which consummate good-breeding knows how to bestow without outraging taste, that I found it hard to repress the wild delight that possessed me.

If I had piqued their curiosity to find out who or what I was, I had also stimulated my own ambition to astonish them.

"He says he will ride out with me to-morrow, and doesn't mean to pass him a lively mount," said one, speaking of me.

"And you mean to gratify him, George?" asked another.

"He shall have the roan that hoisted you out of the saddle with his hind-quarters."

"Come, gentlemen, above all not have my protégé injured to gratify your jealousies," said Madame Hunyadi; "he shall be my escort."

"If he tries me he plays himself—no need not be much alarmed about him. The fellow can do what he likes at the cannon game."

"I'd give fifty Napoleons to know his history," cried another.

I was playing chess as he said this, and turning my head quietly around I said, "The secret is not worth half the money, Sir; and if it really interests you, you shall have it for the asking."

He muttered out a mass of apologies for his fussed excuses, to all the embarrassment of which I let him struggle alone, as work in which in the absence of ambition there is envy; in the absence of avarice, parsimony; in the absence of war, bitter animosities. The mind is reduced with that which troubles it, till in the estimate of results no gain whatever can be found.

It seems strange that while Spain has abolished religious houses, their worst features should be perpetuated in a country like England. Here the nunneries are under the against public inspection, and there is no check upon the superiors. In any one of these establishments a girl may be enduring, without being able to communicate with their friends, indignities and persecutions like those described in Diderot's Nun. It so happens that the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin has been occupied with a convent case while this book is going to press, inquiring into the wrongs of Miss Saurin. A young lady of sixteen, in the Loretto Convent School, Rathfarn, Bray, wished to leave it to reside with her mother. The mother had frequently written letters to her daughter, but they had all been returned unopened. On application the Superior had not been allowed to deliver a letter to the young lady. An other case is to be brought before the Belgian courts. A girl of fifteen, belonging to one of the best families of the neighborhood, was placed by the Lady Superior in a damp underground cell. She died attracting the attention of a woman, when, from the narrow opening by which her prison received a little light from the garden, she succeeded in attracting the attention of a man working there, who consented to procure for her writing materials, and to convey a letter to her brother-in-law. The letter, on receiving the communication, went to the convent and asked to see his sister-in-law. It was informed that she was in religious retirement, and could not be seen. He succeeded in accomplishing his purpose, but had to call in a strong force of police, when it was found on visiting the cellars underground that five other nuns were confined in the same manner. In a free country can these cruelties be perpetrated beyond the control of the law?

CONVENT LIFE.

"WILT thou be a nun, Sophie?
Nothing but a nun?
Is it not a better thing
With life and love to laugh and sing?
To be loved and sought, Sophie,
To be wooed and won?
Dost thou love the shadow, Sophie,
Better than the sun?'

'Tis an ancient song, ladies:
In days of yore it well?
Tired of balls that last till day,
Tired of throwing time away,
Far from every-where, with the ladies,
You are fain to dwell.
May you not discover, ladies,
Life's burden, after all?

You would think of heaven, ladies,
'Neath a crucifix—
Linger in delusive dream
Till the bell should ring for mass—
Call wild visions down, ladies,
With your lire to mix—
Play with lambs and babies,
Foolish Papist tricks.

Ball-room and boudoir, ladies,
Local, amid your flowers—
Shrink from the Superior's whip,
Kneel, and kiss the floor, and strip—
With those vile hands, ladies,
Wield the house-maid's broom:
That's the sort of life, ladies,
Mid the Convent's gloom.

Dreariness and dirt, ladies,
Sullenness and strife,
Better far in youth to die,
Than for fifty years to try
This sad, sordid prison, ladies,
This mere death in life.
Who would be a nun, ladies,
That could be a wife?

Must you be a nun, Sophie,
'Neath a luckless star?
Have you made your little mind
Up to be for life confined—
Bullied by a mistress, Sophie,
Foolish as you are?
Better take a master, Sophie,
He'd be kinder far.

THE POPE AND EDUCATION OF GIRLS.

THE Pope appears to deplore the movement for the education of girls heartily. He evidently holds that if the girls of Europe are to be educated, the women of Europe will cease to be Roman Catholics, and if the women of Europe cease to be Roman Catholics, it is all over with the Pope. The particular occasion of his anxiety is the foundation of a college for women at Montpelier, which has been supported and patronized by a "highly pious princess;" but which the Pope says will "infuse" women's minds with "the pride of a vain and impotent science," instead of fitting them to be good mothers and useful members of society. It is curious to see even the Pope compelled to encounter the modern spirit on its own ground, and not on his own. If he said what he thought plainly in bare stanzas, it would be that schools and colleges for men and women alike should be abolished, as tending to inflate the mind with "the pride of a vain and impotent science," but he is compelled to take the weaker ground of denouncing education for women only. For the ignorance of men it is no longer possible to contend. The ignorance of women is still the strength and hold of the Papacy; but would it not be better policy to resist it by secret organization, than thus openly blurt out the facts?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FRIEND.—"I will consent to all your desire," said a fractious lady to her lover, "if you will only give me what you have not, what you never can have, and what I know you can give me." What did she ask for? —A husband.

Why is the President like an American gift?—Because he is a U. S. Grant.

At an auction of miscellaneous articles out of doors it began to sprinkle, when a by-stander advised the auctioneer that the next article he had better put up should be an umbrella.

Why should womankind be considered insane?—Because they are all mad-dened.

Judge R., whose house has been burglarized no less than three times within the last six months, had the top story of the aforesaid house burned off last week. In a friend's house, commenting on the fact, he facetiously adds: "The dearest place on earth to me is Home, sweet home!"

What fairs should young men shun most?—False deceivers.

"That is colder hard on Grant, that remark by Colfax," "what?" was a reasonable reply. "Why, Colfax says Grant will turn out the worst President we ever had." Colfax was on Belknap's side.

CHANGE OF NAME.—By the use of an Auricomus: Something—or other, Miss Hannah Brown has resolved to change her lovely locks to dusky gray still. Jones says that she ought to be re-christened Dyer-Brown. Jones is a wag.

Lord Lovell he stood by the garden-gate,
With his shining velocipede,
And whispered low till to his Lady Bell,
Who wished for his Lordship good-speed, speed, speed.

Who wished for his Lordship good-speed.

"When will you be back, my Lord Lovell?" she said,
But he gave her question no heed—
Toward his feet in he stirrups and galloped away
On his famous velocipede, pede, pede,
On his famous, etc.

Then Lady Bell cried, in needle alarm,
"What a monster my Lord is, indeed,
To ride away from his bride on the wing,
On that horrid velocipede, pede, pede!"
For he rode on a pest, pede, pede.

Lord Lovell returned, broken-hearted and sore,
Broken-armed and, alas! broken-kneed,
For he struck on a post, nearly knocking the ghost,
And smashed his velocipede, pede, pede.
And smashed, etc.

MORAL.

Remember the fate Lord Lovell has met,
Stay at home with your wife for the rest of your life,
And beware of the velocipede, pede, pede.
And beware, etc.

"This is capital ale!" said an old toper; "see how long it keeps its head!" "Yes, sir," said a by-stander "but consider how soon it takes away yours!"

A STABLE SECRET.—A Mare's Nest.

"My lord!" said the foreman of a Welsh jury when giving in their verdict, "we find the man who stole the mare not guilty!"

A good Northampton lady who had never cooked oysters but in one way, recently determined to gratify the family on their return from a visit with a dish of the delicious. She explained to the caterer that: "I found it very difficult to dress them," said she, "so I shall tell on to their wives and cut the stomachs off. I guess they'll be good."

An old lady in New Jersey, having read an account of the burning of a gingerbread nut manufacturing establishment, became terribly alarmed less a gingerbread nut house standing in her cellar should burst and blow the house up.

If a bird can sing and won't sing, what's to be done? Why, take it to a chirpodist to cure it.

A New Orleans lady, wishing to surprise her husband with the present of a dozen shirts, went to a furnishing store, asked if they could "make her a dozen shirts," and ordered them sent home without his knowledge. The clerk took the order, but requested her to "step this way a moment." She did so, when the furnisher whipped out a tape-measure, and proceeded to take the breadth of her shoulders. "Why, what are you doing, Sir?" demanded the astonished lady. "Why, taking your measure, to be sure!" was the confident reply. "Well, Sir, I want a dozen your shirts!" "My shirts! Why, didn't I tell you shirts were my business?" "No, Madam: I thought they were for you," was the reply.

A LOSE MAN.—The pawnbroker.

"Very good, but" laser too polated," as the catfish said when he swallowed the bait.

BURNING WORDS.—A dictionary in flames.

"What branch of education do you have chiefly in your school?" "A willow branch, Sir; the master has used up almost a whole tree."

THE INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT GRANT, MARCH 4, 1869.—FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY GARDNER AND BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 186.]

GRANT'S INAUGURATION.

We devote a large portion of our space this week to the illustration of the memorable events of the Fourth of March. It was a day of unusual excitement in Washington, even as compared with previous occasions of a similar character. President GRANT, owing his elevation to a popular purpose which nothing could withstand rather than to a distinctively party choice, awakens, therefore, an enthusiasm among the people that is not inspired by the element of political conflict. His stands forth a living symbol of the dawning era of peace and good-will.

Washington, of course, was crowded with visitors from every section of the country. From New York alone it is estimated that there came twenty thousand persons to participate in the ceremonies of inauguration. The rain disappointed many of the spectators by dimming the outward display of the occasion, and prevented everyone — that had been prepared, but their interest in the main event of the day was not diminished.

The vast procession started from General GRANT'S head-quarters a little before 11 o'clock A.M. General GRANT was accompanied by Mr. COLFAX. Both gentlemen were dressed in full suits of black. Upon arriving at the White House it was ascertained that Mr. JOHNSON was not to take part in the ceremonies; he was even then about to enter his carriage, and the cannon which saluted the outgoing President was also the signal for the moving on of the procession to the Capitol. As if to greet the new President with auspicious omens, the bright sunshine had displaced the rain of the morning. The cortege arrived at the east front of the Capitol at five minutes before noon.

General GRANT then entered the Senate-room, where, in the presence of the Senate, the Judges, Justice CHASE, the Supreme Court, and a brilliant audience of ladies, the oath was administered to Vice-President COLFAX by Mr. WADE, as shown in the illustration on the first page.

A procession was then formed, which passed to the east front, where General GRANT took the oath of office, administered by Chief-Justice CHASE. The cannon in the adjacent square boomed forth the inaugural salute by way of salute, and in the midst of applauding cheers the new President arose and delivered his Inaugural Address.

In connection with our illustration of the inauguration we give on page 180 portraits of JESSE R. and HANNAH HALL, the father and mother of our new President. As our readers already know, GRANT'S ancestors were Scotch. MATTHEW GRANT, the first American emigrant, came to this country in 1630. The father of the President was born in Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, in 1794. His mother was a Miss HANNAH SIMPSON, of Montgomery County, in the same State. They were married in 1821 in Ohio, to which State both had moved; she in 1819, and he some years before. JESSE R. GRANT was present at his son's inauguration, and was quite severely injured after the ceremony, by falling down a flight of stone steps on the east side of the Capitol.

Our illustration of the inauguration is engraved from photographs by BRADY, of Washington, which, as specimens of photographic art, excel any thing hitherto produced in such a connection.

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER I.

REDDED'S REASONS FOR MARRYING ANY BODY WHO WOULD HAVE HER.

IN one of the narrowest and dullest lanes in the neighborhood of Walham Green lived George Turner, Esq., solicitor, of Lincoln's Inn. The house was the largest in the lane, had certainly pretensions to be, or to have been, a "gentleman's" house, for there was a coach-house and stable beside it; and the garden before and behind was full three-quarters of an acre.

The other houses in the lane were eight-room-ed, semi-detached, brown brick boxes of houses; with long gardens in front, and little back-yards, with a wash-house and a cucumber frame each. They were miserable little places; yet Rebecca Turner, the youngest daughter, while lolling and yawning, could envy their inhabitants in possession of the key many times a day.

For there was life among them. Those among them who were thrifty, or well to do, or childless, or whose children were good, had pretty plots of flowers even; but this was rare, for there were too many children; and so, on a washing-day, the clothes-lines and poles were always up in the front gardens, stamped hard and black by a hundred little feet. Nay, there was another reason against flowers. The landlord of that lane did not see his way to more palings; and so, if you wanted flowers, you must keep them in repair yourself. Yet there was life enough there. The neighbors—the women—dawdled into one another's houses, and gossiped—nay, now and then, best friends, quarreled. Once there was a fire; and Miss Turner, the present eldest daughter, seeing them running, hoped it was not their house. Ah, well, luck, said Miss Rebecca, with such singular emphasis that her elder sister let her be.

Turner's house, or The Cedars, stood back from the road, in a block of mangy grass, and a blotch of mangy, soot-stained gravel, and accounted for its apparent usurped title by one miserable stump and one miserable bough of the tree of Lebanon, which solitary bough pointed meekly and sorrowfully to where its brother had once stood. Behind the house was a bit of kitchen-garden, and a bit of grass unmown for years; which would have been something had it been secluded, but even that was denied you. It ended in a wide, wild waste of market-garden, stretching away acre after acre. The timber on the estate consisted of a broken-down mulberry-tree and a large quantity of sooty lilac.

The house, though in habitable repair, was in that half state of dilapidation which is sometimes a good deal more melancholy than a really good downright ruin. The ruin says to you, "Here, come here, I belong to you as much as to any one now — come and help me to decay." And tells them to you accordingly: whereas the half-dilapidated house says only, "We have seen better days." Turner's house was dark red brick, with a high tile roof, perpendicular to the top of the garret-windows, and then sloping like the roof of the neighboring row of roofs. Its door was approached by high steps, and the windows of the living-rooms were large, and contained thin wooden frames and baby glass panes: some were with a knob in the middle, which made looking out of them a ridiculous process to indulge in: internally, the furniture was principally of horse-hair and dark mahogany. And Rebecca Turner was the only lady.

In this house she lived. Mr. Turner was in religion of the strictest form of Calvinism and Sabbatarianism, attending only two services of theological ones on a Sunday, and never allowing a novel or a book of poetry into the house. There had been a time once when Rebecca had objected to all this; before she had grown up; but that was all over. She had, unlike her sister, grown up good-looking. Her father, indeed, had consulted religious women of the congregation: they had been unanimous; the girl Rebecca was much too good to go out by herself. Even that time she was a prisoner, for her father was no man to be trifled with. Certainly, under that a girl of spirit was capable of any kind of pleasure, should one very wet Sunday evening, after chapel and a servant's walk, as she was going to bed, emphatically wish she was dead, wish she had never been born, and most particularly wish she had been a boy.

"If I had been as ugly as you, I could have gone any where I chose, and done as I liked. It was old Mother Russel and Mrs. Akin's fault that him up to my being pretty. I wish they were dead with all my heart."

"Why, Miss Rebecca! After chapel, too!" said her sister Carry, solemnly.

She didn't say she wished that was dead: she only clenched her hands and looked savage. That was the last of it all—all the dull misery of her life came before her stronger than ever at the mention of chapel, and she cast herself sobbing on the bed.

"I wish somebody would come and marry me," she said, at last. "I don't care who, any young man ever come near us. I'd marry Jim Akers, I'd marry any body—except that beast," she added, suddenly, with a shrill distinctness, and pointed to a small chance in favor of the beast's prospects, and then by degrees she sobbed herself quiet.

CHAPTER II.

MRS. RUSSEL TELLS MISS SOPER SO MUCH AS SHE THINKS PROPER, AND NO MORE.

THE lady so disrespectfully mentioned by Miss Rebecca as old Mother Russel, was taking tea with Miss Soper. Mrs. Russel had been, some said, love in a cottage, and that was certainly, with few exceptions, the oldest inhabitant there; Miss Soper, on the other hand, was a comparatively new comer. These, it will be remembered, were the two ladies who had given poor Rebecca such very dire offense by persuading her father that she was too young to go to the play or concert; and, having just talked through some of their other neighbors in whom we are not interested, and having come to the Turners, Mrs. Russel saw no will just make bold to listen a little to them.

Miss Soper was a very different woman—pale, gaunt, black, rigid, with a face like a Roman-nosed horse. She had been for some years lecturer in a small school-room, and had saved them moderately. It is possible that she may have been a good-natured woman once, but the constant pressure of the world had not left about her ill-natured. Religion with her meant a slight excitement and society, but little more.

Miss Soper was a very different woman—pale, gaunt, black, rigid, with a face like a Roman-nosed horse. She had been for some years lecturer in a small school-room, and had saved them moderately. It is possible that she may have been a good-natured woman once, but the constant pressure of the world had not left about her ill-natured. Religion with her meant a slight excitement and society, but little more.

Miss Soper was a very different woman—pale, gaunt, black, rigid, with a face like a Roman-nosed horse. She had been for some years lecturer in a small school-room, and had saved them moderately. It is possible that she may have been a good-natured woman once, but the constant pressure of the world had not left about her ill-natured. Religion with her meant a slight excitement and society, but little more.

"That's a bright, clever-looking girl, that Rebecca Turner," she said. "Quick to learn."

"A deal too quick," said Miss Soper.

"She seems quicker than her sister."

"Caroline is a real good pious girl, and takes after her father."

"Rebecca don't, then?" said Miss Soper.

"No, Rebecca is another sort of girl. She looks so like her mother sometimes that I shall like a mould of jelly" (which was an apt illustration). "She takes after her mother; and Turner is a man who washes his dirty linen at home, but I misdoubt he has trouble with her now. If he hasn't, he will."

"Did he have trouble with her mother, then?"

"Do you mean to say you have never heard it" said Mrs. Russel, in astonishment.

"How could I? I had not come to the Green. Did you, Miss Soper, eagerly.

Mrs. Russel took her cup in her hand, and having stirred her tea, used the spoon for rhetorical purposes, and solemnly and immediately began.

"There's never been murder done in that house, my dear, for there's many a slip between cup and lip, but it's been hollered often enough. Awful nights have been in that house, my dear, between Turner and his wife," she continued, drawing closer and speaking low; "she yelling for a knife to kill him, and he, calling him every bad name she could lay her tongue to; he praying at the top of his voice, to pray the evil spirit out of her, until he'd have his temper and fist hold of her, and you'd hear her trying to bite him; and the little children a-screaming, and the servant-girl a-crying, and all the lane out to listen! Ah, quiet as Turner looks now, he has had something to go through in his time. You may well say he had trouble with his wife."

"Was she mad?"

"He never dared say it of her all events," said Mrs. Russel. "I'll tell you all I know. She was a lady. Says you, so are we. I mean a real lady. Says you again, so are we. But I mean a real, high-born carriage lady, you know."

So did Miss Soper, who nodded. "And how did she come to marry him, then?"

"Well, Turner is a good figure of a man, though it was not that. He had got the management of her affairs when she was left a widow, and he managed them well enough to excite her gratitude; and she had been ill-used, and her friends had dropped her, and I fancy she thought she might do worse, and so she had him; and a bad job it was. But if a good sound Protestant woman as Papist and a worshiping with her eyes open he must take the consequences."

"A Papist!" almost screeched Miss Soper. "Mr. Turner married a Papist!"

"Well, she had a fine penny of money, mind you, and she was a thorough worldling, and careless of religion; and Mr. Turner thought he could convert her. We used to have her name down for conversion in the general prayer ever so long after they were married, and had words with him. But it all came to nothing; she laughed him to scorn when he spoke to her about it, all of which he has told us in the confidence-meetings; and she found that out, and got furious, and things went on from bad to worse until Caroline being born put things to a crisis. It was the first that Rebecca was born, Mrs. Turner fell ill, and asked for a priest to come to her, she having, of course, gone to church on her own accord; and he made answer that no priest should cross his doors, not if she was on her death-bed. That was the worst scene she had had, for she started up in a shawl and petticoat to run all the way to Cadogan Terrace by Sloane Street, and had to be brought back by force. Well, then nothing went right any way, and she seemed to lose head. She accused him of taking her money, and insisted that one of the children should be brought up a Papist, and used to smuggle off Rebecca continually to mass and confession, and such things, and some say got the child baptized into the Romish faith."

"It is extremely probable," said Miss Soper; "and how did it end?"

"It was after a worse row than usual," said Mrs. Russel, lowering her voice again. "It was the worst and the last, and there had been violence—it all came out at the inquest—and she went out screaming and said to her husband, house, but I never saw nothing of that, and others will confirm me; and when she came back she had gone away with little Rebecca, having word that she would never see the child no more, for that he had taken it away to save its soul."

"He was a fool," said Miss Soper.

Mrs. Russel eyed her curiously. "You're a sensible woman, ma'am," she said; "though I doubt if we are very generally, seeing that he saved it from Popery. But," added the vulgar old gossip, flushing up scarlet, "if my man had come home to me and children in the state he's times I'd have— But as I was saying, when she hears that, she outs into the lane and carries on to two neighbors, Mrs. Akin (the widow) woman, you know, my dear soul, Jim Akin's, the costermonger's, mother, whom she had been down with Rebecca for years herself) says she never heard any thing like it. There was nothing but it was—no vulgar language nor swearing—but just downright awful cursing, like that in the Bible; and it frightened all that heard it. Then she went off into hysterics and up stairs and the maid had run away. And when he came home the neighbors told him what they'd seen, and how the child's Caroline now) had been a-crying all the afternoon. And when they burst in there she was a-lying stone-dead at the bottom of the stairs."

"What did the inquest say?"

"Nothing. Whether she fell down, or flung herself down, there was nothing to show. The child only said that it had found its mamma asleep on her face, and that it wanted its tea, and couldn't make her wake. Well, ma'am, and that's the history of that little mystery."

"I'll go and see 'em," said Miss Soper emphatically. "What time do they have their tea?"

CHAPTER III.

REBECCA'S LOVE, AND WHAT SHE THOUGHT OF HIM.

MR. TURNER, a man of about sixty, must have been at one time handsome, but now, although his features were good, his complexion was gone; and the continual habit, persisted in for so many years, of self-contemplation, had left an expression which was not very pleasant on his face: a look which an ill-natured person might say was something like conceit, or, at any rate, as though he was continually saying, "I am George Turner, that is who I am, and who the deuce are you?" His conversation was, like that of the other men of the neighborhood, entirely about himself; arguing, one would fancy, from a certain feeling of being wanting in the more ornamental business of life, and from a determination that the hearer should know what an exceeding fine fellow he was.

Partly from religion, and partly from temper, he had been very careful to banish every thing graceful from his house, so that there should not be a trace in it to say to the last comer-in that Rebecca's, who craved for such things, petitions for cocks and hens, for rabbits—nay, even for one poor little dog bird. However, in an old house, where there are rats and mice, you must have a cat; and you'll not hinder a cat having kittens. And when it came about that Rebecca had two kittens to play with; and her father, letting himself into the house at half past four on a winter's afternoon, found Rebecca, utterly happy, lying in the dark before the fire, playing with her two kittens, one of which had a blue ribbon round its neck, and the other a red.

"Get up," he said, "and don't lie there like a heathen. Get up, and make yourself tidy. There are people coming to tea."

Rebecca never answered; that would only make her father colorably and openly angry, and she would have had the worst of it. But by long practice in this happy household she had got the habit of annoying him, and yet of keeping within the law.

"Pretty little darlings!" she said, with effusion, as she played with a cat on each arm. "I wonder if you have immortal souls, dears; if so, they don't seem to be much trouble to you."

"Don't talk such nonsense to me. People would say that you were mad, if they heard you. For a grown girl to be kissing cats, too, and a grimalkin like that!"

"Whose coming to tea, pa?"

"Mrs. Russel and Miss Soper."

"Daniel Lambert and the Old Dragoon. Ps, I wonder if Miss Soper was regularly discharged from the army, or whether she deserted. If I was her I should quite run off that muscle, and let my whiskers grow. Who else is coming?"

"Mr. Morley," said Turner, without any open manifestation of anger. "For certain reasons; and also, I believe, Mr. Hagbut."

"Oh, pa!"

"I am at a loss to conceive why you should make an exclamation at Mr. Hagbut's name," said Turner.

"Are you?" said Rebecca. "I am not. If you were as young and pretty as I am, how would you like such a—minister of the gospel, setting down beside you the whole evening, reading bits of Scripture to you which bore on the subject of love and marriage. If he wants to marry me, he'd don't he say so like a man—and get his answer"

"I should feel highly flattered by Mr. Hagbut's attentions," said Mr. Turner; "and, moreover, I should reflect that his suit was backed by your father. Only, mind one thing, Rebecca—you refuse that gentleman at your peril. I insist on the match, mind that. You dare refuse him, that is all."

Not one word did Rebecca say to this, but left her father secretly fuming with anger. She went up stairs to her room, and began her toilet very slowly and very thoughtfully, and as she brought the face grew darker and darker, until the muscles in it began to quiver, and there grew upon it a look of deep horror and deep loathing terrible to see. She arose stealthily, and went with her candle to look in the mirror of her room, and secretly taking out a book began reading with shaking hands; the book came open easily at the place she wanted, and she was deep in the passage when she was utterly scared fury her sister's voice in the room, crying petulantly, "Why, Rebecca, you'll never be ready in time. Mr. Hagbut's come already."

"I'll be ready directly, dear Carry; don't tell on me. It is only one of Walter Scott's novels, and it is so interesting at the end."

"So it seems," said matter-of-fact Carry. "Why, you are as pale as a ghost, and it of a tremble? Now I can see why the ministers forbid us to read such godless rant."

One of Walter Scott's novels, she said. Could it have been the "Bride of Lammermoor?" Heaven forbid!

Although she was going into company which she disliked, and although there was at least one man there whom she hated, and whom she wished to hate the more, yet in the retirement of beauty she dressed herself prettily, and coming calmly and proudly into the room with a bow, sat down by Miss Soper.

Mrs. Russel and Miss Soper were there, and two minutes, one of which she had seen before, but one of them was only known too well.

He was a very large, stout man, with a head on the other side of an additional chin, and a small end uppermost. He had a furze of gray hair, and whiskers shaved close in the middle of his cheeks; he had large blue, almost opaque eyes, very large ears, and a continual smile on a mouth made for talking. Probably black dress clothes and white tie were to be becoming a dress as exists—on certain people; on him they were hideous; his collarless cravat was in the way, and the coat of his waistcoat displayed ears, and the coat itself was perfectly straight down the back, so as to set off his great stomach better in profile. His calfs were disproportionately great fat hands, and his short, ill-made trousers scarce met his clumsy shoes. The whole man was a protest against beauty or grace of life in any way; to Rebecca he was loathsome, hideous beyond measure; and she was to marry him—unless she herself, alone and unaided, could fight a battle against all her little world. Poor thing! it was hard for her, it was, indeed. Forgive her desperation.

This horrible great moon-calf rose from his chair when she entered, and with a leering conscious smile on his face stood there, following her with his pale eyes, until she sat down. Mr. Russel looked "arch"—a horrible thing for any body to do off the stage of a third-rate theatre, still more horrible in the case of a fat old woman. Miss Soper, au fait at things of this kind, moved from her seat and gave it up to the Rev. Mr. Hagbut, so that he now sat next poor shuddering Rebecca.

"Will you ask a blessing, Mr. Hagbut?" Mr. Sensum came the easy words from the fat mouth, in the well-practiced, whining falsetto; dextrously quoted were the well-known texts of Scripture, so obviously that he brought in the Marriage in Cana, and made through that an allusion to earthly marriages. "He has not asked me yet," she thought; "and if I am firm they can't kill me."

His style of talking was what one may be allowed to call execrable; that is, he inquired, every syllable, and even when he came across one which was unavoidably short he lengthened it as much as possible. Then again he put the emphasis of his sentence just where no one else would have put it, and on the whole was one of the most painfully labored masses of artificiality and affectation ever seen. That the man may have been a good man I do not deny; I have only to do with his effect on Rebecca.

He gave himself, if not the airs of an accepted lover, at least of a man who was sure of his game.

"You heard my discourse the last Sabbath evening, Miss Hagbut," he said, bringing his head as near hers as he could.

"I heard it," said Rebecca; "but I did not attend to it."

"The spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak," said he, smiling.

"I don't think that the spirits was willing," she answered. "I hate sermons."

This was very confusing, but under these circumstances one may say something.

"The prayer, or the hymn, pleases you better, doubtless?"

"I hate the prayer worse than the sermon, but I like some of the hymns—nay, most of them. I should like the service to be all music, light, and a sermon-less, as it was in the Catholic church where I used to go with my poor mother."

"Vanity, my dear daughter, vanity."

"I don't think that the spiritual vanity about it. Why, when you are praying extempore before a large congregation, and take pains, you are thinking all the time how it will accord with the congregation. I have watched you."

Really it was very uphill work with this young lady; but as she was beautiful she was, and that she would have a little property. Mr. Hagbut drew nearer still to the shrinking hot form that held the love-sick soul.

"Are you cold, dear Miss Turner?" he drawled.

"No, I am uncomfortably hot," she snapped out. "I think that I am not well. I think that I shall go nearer the door, if you will let me pass."

He was forced to do so, and with a great gasp she went and sat beside Mr. Morley and her father: her father seeing the Rev. Hagbut in earnest-sin-loving, looking exceedingly foolish, went to his assistance, and bound up the cracks in that savory vessel, leaving Rebecca sitting with Mr. Morley.

Now Rebecca knew Mr. Morley to be a Dissenting minister, as her father described him, in a "great amount of reasoning unnecessary to be given in the light of her natural enemy, and was prepared to do battle with him on the very slightest provocations. She could not, however, avoid confessing that he was a considerable improvement on that other horrible fat man with a head like an egg.

Indeed, she might have said, a very great improvement on that. Mr. Morley was a man with a well-shaped head, good and singularly amiable features, hair but slightly grizzled, curling all over his head in a deep brown crimpy confusion, and a beautiful set of regular white teeth, which contrasted well with the complexion, and which were pretty often shown by a much used but rare smile. He looked a man every inch of him, although his face was gentle even to softness.

He had also terrible sorrows and great troubles. He had been brought here as the friend of Mr. Hagbut, he having to-day preached a sermon for him, of course, which was commended heartily by Mr. Turner, who in the openness of his heart toward a minister and a friend of Mr. Hagbut, had in the course of the day given him which was in store for Rebecca. So Mr. Morley had watched while talking to Mr. Turner; and he had seen beautiful, low, exhilarating sunshine on the one side, and on the other a depth of loathing aversion which was terrible to him. He said to Mr. Turner,

"They will be happy, you think?"

"Any woman could be happy with such a man as that as Mr. Hagbut." And when he had said it he scorned himself. Yet for mere deceney's sake, seeing that Morley knew, he put in the rider, "If she does not love him in the way of the world now, she will get to do so. Hundreds of girls would give ten years of their life to be in her place."

"That is doubtless true," said Morley, quietly, and the conversation went on to other matters, until it so chanced that the beautiful girl, with rage and fury in her heart, came and sat beside him.

He had a pleasantly-modulated voice, a voice of cultivation too, and he spoke to her.

"The wind has quite gone down. But it blew hard down at our place last night: I expected some of my chimney-pots down several times. The Ethiss, in the outside tier, broke from her moorings, and has stove the bows of one of the screw colliers; yes, it blew very hard from east, hitting to southeast, and you a sailor at all?"

"I know nothing of the sea."

"Pity; you should. I am half a sailor myself. I should know something about it, for half my work lies among sailors. Have you never been to sea at all, then?"

"I have never left this most utterly abominable spot in all my life."

"Well, I don't want to flatter you," said Morley, "and as I will say what is prudently dull. My place is considered almost the very worst and most wretched in London. I am surrounded with sin, crime, and occasionally, I am sorry to say, murder; but I would sooner be there than here."

"Where do you live, then, Mr. Morley?" said Rebecca, becoming interested.

"At Limehouse."

"Is it uglier there than here?"

"Very far uglier. This place is, in all that the eye desires, a paradise to it. If an educated man, like myself, were doomed to live in Limehouse in idleness, he would break his heart."

"You have not broken yours."

"Plenty. I am sorry to say."

"Where you can do exactly as you please, and not be called to account for it afterward?"

"Certainly not. Any novel will assure you, there is no country such as you describe. Not in all the countless millions of stars which you see on a frosty night is there a country like that. Such ships would have plenty of passengers, though."

"It is a weary world, then," said Rebecca. "Do you believe in the immortality of the soul?"

"Certainly I do."

"Some do not. Is it not so?" asked Rebecca.

"Scarcely any," said Mr. Morley.

"Yet it is such a comfortable doctrine, I should have thought, to any one ill-used on this think, to believe, that death did end it all, and that there was to be no more trouble, no more headache, no more anger. It is really not so, then?"

"Assure yourself of that. Ask yourself, Is it conceivable that the whole of this causes you, as mysteriously, by acting on your muscles, to raise your hand to your head—the will which may prompt you to that action, and the use you from a shameful fate—can die? I could speak at length of these things to you, but there is your father beckoning."

She rose without another word, and went toward her father, who was sitting beside Mr. Hagbut. He stood up, and pointed to his seat.

She, however, stood, and Mr. Hagbut, rising, took her right hand between his two fat ones, and looked her in the face with his sweetest smile.

She was deadly pale. There was too much fat covering the nerves of Mr. Hagbut's hand, or he would have felt, surely, the creeping horror in hers. It shrunk as it touched his, and knew that it slid out and fell dead and pale by her side before he had time to speak.

"She has gone to ask," said the unconscious nobody, "a little favor of my sweet Christian sister. I was going to ask if I might see her tomorrow morning for half an hour, just to ask a little question, to which I think I shall have a favorable answer. May I come?"

"O Lord, yes!" gasped Rebecca. "Come to-morrow and let us get it over," and so left the monumbundity.

"She has gone with him," said Miss Soper to Mrs. Russel, as they blundered home together in the fog.

"Lucky gal! of course she has," replied Mrs. Russel.

"He will have trouble with her," said Miss Soper. "I have seen her." And the pair of themselves out of window before now; and he will have trouble with her."

"Well, I guess so that, Henrietta," said Mrs. Russel, growing confidential in the dark, and in anticipation of the little hot supper which Miss Soper knew that she would partake of, together, and blundering up against the next lamp-post in her fat walk. "I've seen modern Hin, for although he is a Saint, he keeps his saint's temper pretty much in the cupboard; she'll have to manage him, I guess, or he'll be one to do."

I know men, and the management of them. I've had to manage them."

Mrs. Russel's knowledge of men was confined to two, her husband whom she had managed into death by worry and delirium tremens; and her present lodger, who was continually drunk during the 40th regiment, now in New Zealand, from which island he had dutifully written, saying, that now the water was better for him, he could express his mind more free." Which he proceeded to do.

Morley and Hagbut walked eastward together through the fog, and Morley was the first to speak.

"Hagbut," he said, "are you going to marry that girl?"

"Assuredly, my brother," said Hagbut.

"Have you thought of what you are doing?" asked Morley.

"Indeed, yes, with prayer," said Hagbut.

"But, see here, Hagbut. You are as shrewd as another. Let us speak as though we were of the world, worldly. Are you not making a great fool of yourself?"

"I think not, brother Morley," answered Hagbut, for you forward to give up such advantages as religious phraseology give him. "I think, looking at the matter even as one unredeemed and still of this world, that it promises well. The girl is fair to look upon, and she will have a little property."

"But do you think she cares for you?"

"Undoubtedly. No constraint has been put upon her, and she has as good as taken me. Good-night, I dare say, dear brother. Good-night."

Omnibus after omnibus passed Mr. Morley, yet somehow he preferred to walk, and he left them steadily for Ratcliffe Street, dark as the night was. And he walked on, and thought, and thought of one thing only—this approaching marriage. It seemed to him so monstrous a proceeding altogether. If the girl consented it would have been bad enough, but against her will—

Why the girl's beauty alone ought to insure her a good match, and a decent husband, with any one of a dozen young men of her own age; and she had fortune too, he heard; and for the whole of it to be given up to the shrine of such ugly, windy donkey, with the education of a charity-school boy, and the manners of a bear. How pitiful a case for one so beautiful! And then he went on thinking of her beauty, and pitying her all the way home. Which was not good for the peace of mind of the Rev. Alfred Morley.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE velocipede mania is spreading. It must have its run like any other fever. It may become chronic, though some of the more violent symptoms gradually cease and collapse; or perhaps the collapse is to come before the crisis, or they may be simultaneous! Just at present, however, we are in the very coolness of this country, at least, seems to be concentrated upon the construction of velocipedes. Every novel will tell you that numerous means may be credited, there is—or is going to be, when a velocipede is in question. Thing in this first age—monocycle, which can be driven sixty miles an hour; a bicycle warranted to carry a man of average weight on a single rail of a railroad track; and probably tricycles and quatercycles of indefinite speed. The machines are generally being furnished with all conveniences, even to lanterns and lunch-boxes! Nobody can tell where this will end. Some such accident as did recently in Cincinnati; when a young man taking a velocipede ride down a long story of a building, lost the control of his machine, and was precipitated through a guarded hatchway to the cellar beneath. Instances are not rare, however, where steamers to circulate reports that in certain cities the velocipede was prohibited, and that every conductor suits in the total disappearance of both rider and machine! Yet nothing seems to check it.

An advertiser of Providence announces that in the month of June next he will propel a velocipede of his own manufacture from that city to three thousand miles in thirty days, averaging one hundred miles per day. The object of the performance is to take place in April, under the direction of the Managers of the Prospect Park and Coney Island Driving Parks. It is expected that the races will create a great excitement.

Some wit, dedicated in the genius necessary to invent a new thing, has declared that he will be could in a Massachusetts town, by exhibiting an old-fashioned spinning-wheel. Now the boys are so careful with those who were unfamiliar with that ancient machine, and a party of them have prepared to print—it is "Velocamilipedestrianism," and is defined to mean "a novelty moving by a power skillfully applied with both feet."

A group of fine figures is now being modeled in clay by the sculptor Palmieri. These figures are to be cast in bronze, and to be placed over the entrance to the "grand entrance" of the new reservoir in the Central Park. Most of our art-works of this kind are cast in Munich, but this is to be cast in America.

Professor Silliman having transferred himself and his kitchen from Boston to New York, it is announced that he will soon be favored with some practical scientific articles. There is no doubt but that whatever he writes will be well worth reading.

It has been proposed to establish the Siamese twins in England, but the suggestion does not meet with universal approval. The Leeds Mercury earnestly protests against such an exhibition. It is of opinion that in no case such a show should such creatures be allowed to exhibit because he made a vulgar spectacle of noble physical structure. But to do such a thing in this country is ridiculous. We have emerged from their hiding-place, and are on their way from surgeon to surgeon, praying that they have enough to save them, at the risk of death, from the "death in life" which they endure. Here—this appears to the bloodied contempt of all that is reverent, all that is pitiful, all that is ordinarily human.

Chicago's Board of Education refuses to a supposed witch. The owners of cows in the vicinity of that somewhat fast locality have come to think their cows bewitched.

A certain woman, however, had very liberal supplies of milk from her cows. Her neighbors called her a witch—declared she said the woman had bewitched their cows. The unfortunate "witch" found herself assailed by abuse, by threats, shrieks, stinks, and finally other impediments. So serious did the matter become that some of the neighbors met in the house of certain parties. She claims that the only witchcraft of which she is guilty consists in feeding her cows well and keeping them clean, which few of her rivals in the milk business do.

La Onia still holds out against over 20,000 inhabitants are empowered by law to levy a one-tenth of a mill tax for the benefit and support of public libraries.

A free public library has recently been opened in Cleveland containing 2000 volumes.

The Hudson River has upon week before last sufficiently for a steamboat to force her way to Poughkeepsie. At that point there were inches of solid ice for a distance of nine miles. At one part of the way the ice was four inches thick. On the return trip, a few days afterward, however, navigation was closed by the severe weather.

A young man applied for a situation as private tutor. He was subjected to a series of questions which somewhat puzzled him. "Can you," said the examiner, "parse Cain you draw, young man?" "Certainly," replied the candidate. "Can you square the circle?" "Certainly," replied the youth, "if you'll square it." "Can you," said the examiner, "solve a problem: if fifteen, a hundred loaded with cabbages; at sixteen, no inference; at twenty, a bill of exchange. If I were an actor, I believe I could draw the largest kind of a house; but, being a teacher, I am content to draw a salary, and the bigger the better." "You'll do," was the reply.

Hydrophobia still continues to be somewhat prevalent and fatal in New York and vicinity. We notice a very simple antidote communicated to the Herald by a physician of Long Island. It is said to have been best successfully for hydrophobia and the bites of snakes, centipedes, scorpions, and other venomous animals, and to have been so efficacious that it has been adopted by the Governments of India, New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, Queensland, and South Australia.

Recently.—Liquor ammonia fortis.

Dear.—For an adult, thirty-five drops in a wineglassful of water; twelves to fifteen years old, twenty to twenty-five drops in a table-spoonful of water; eight to twelve years old, fifteen to twenty drops in a dessert-spoonful of water; four to eight years old, five to ten drops in a dessert-spoonful of water.

The King of Burmah professes the greatest liberality in regard to the Christian religion. He proposes to build for at his own expense an immense institution, large enough to accommodate one thousand boys, and has himself donated five hundred dollars for books.

A correspondent of one of our daily newspapers, in communicating "London Gossip," gives the following incident, which, whether true or not, contains a moral:

"Seven hundred years ago some good old soul left some land which lay in London as a perpetual maintenance for three poor women and a cat. The property is worth now £40,000 a year. The three poor women still hold cat—friends of the trustees—are maintained; and the other £39,000 a year, £20,000 per annum, is expended in salaries on the uncles, aunts, cousins, applicants as secretaries, treasurers, chaplains, visitors, etc., who see to the proper distribution of alms, catechise the old women, and strike the cat."

There is every prospect that during the coming year the building business will be unusually brisk in the upper portions of the city. In the past year 1,731 residences were completed in this city. Many others were commenced. The statement has been made that a single ward in Brooklyn—the Ninth—upward of two thousand houses were erected in 1868, all of which will await tenants on the first of May. The indications are that there will be plenty of houses in the market, to be sold or to let, all who shall desire them in the metropolis. Landlords will scarcely dare run the risk of keeping their tenements empty, as they were desirous to do; and tenants need not feel compelled to submit to the increase this year, as they sometimes have in past years.

From South America comes the report of more earthquakes. The shocks quite heavy shocks have been experienced as Callao and Arica, and slight ones at Valparaiso. Quite a time ruging at Lima, Arequipa, and other places. Nevertheless matters go on about as usual, though there must be something frightful in being, as it were, on a volcano which may open the destructive mouth at any moment. The ladies of Lima are said to be considerably excited over "Flagellate," which writes for them in excellent Spanish, and whose articles have been eagerly read. Examples of some of the churches and convents have pronounced it a veritable Sodom and Gomorrah, and fled.

The Germania Journal, a new periodical, contains some valuable hints in regard to what should be done in case of fire. We give one or two items which seem to be of special practical utility:

"If the fire has not yet caught it is better for the inmates of the dwelling not to stop to dress themselves, but to endeavor to make by blankets, etc., hastily as well themselves of the best means of escape that is open to them, and thereby shutting off the draft. Doors may frequently be closed by means of chairs, the backs of which are turned against the door, and which will be rendered so much the more effective in shutting off the draft. Blankets, bed-quilts, or thick woolen shawls should be thrown over the head and body liberally, and the window being the last and only alternative, get out of window all and as quickly as possible."

From a long list of Danish Proverbs we select a few choice ones:

All wish to live long, but none to be called old.

Take help of many, advice of few.

He who thinks everything is only man's advice will have a crooked horse.

Good every body and its food, but does not throw it into the nest.

He who says what he likes must hear what he does not like.

Empty wagons make most noise.

If God bids thee draw, He will find thee a rope; if He bids thee fly, He will find thee wings.

Better suffer for truth than prosper by falsehood.

The Boston Transcript calls attention to the excessive amount of writing required of children in the public schools. It says: "Although we have, theoretically, the best system of education known to our progressive schools, instances of children who have been sick, and in some cases seemingly to be saved from death by efforts to stand well in their classes or secure promotion, are of everyday occurrence. Nervousness is the disease so naturally which can only be learned by devoting a part of the Sabbath to study."

We are inclined to believe that the same criticism may be made upon the public schools of New York city.

The Chicago Sorosis (the newspaper, not the Club) has the following logic:

"Two things in the world exist and not the same.

Woman's sphere is equal to man's but not the same. Woman and man are certain many things alike, because she does not want it, and secondly because such a claim would be unwomanly.

Adaptation and disuse are the conditions precedent to the exercise of any right or function.

The heart and brain can not change places, or perform each other's work, but what the head and body are not equally important?

Can the nerves say to the blood "you are out of your sphere when you perform the following in the every minute part of the body?"

Has the body politic should the two elements enter, man as head, woman as heart, both equally important and indispensable?

In China barbers shave as if they meant something by the operation. A victim gives up his head entirely to the process, which was performed without "lathering" the face. "After the beard was taken off," he says, "the barber took a sharp, long, needle-shaped spoon and began to pierce my ears. He explored every crevice and corner, and dislodged wax, concretions, bits of wax and dirt that had been accumulating there since my childhood. Having been satisfied with picking about my ears, the barber suddenly twisted my neck to one side in such a manner that it cracked as if the vertebræ had been dislocated. "Hold on!" I shouted, alarmed for the safety of my neck. 'All right,' replied the fiend, 'me no hurt you;' and he continued to jerk and twist my neck until it was limber as an old woman's dish-rag. He then felt to beating my back, breast, arms, and sides with his fist, and pommeling the muscles until they fairly ached from the beating they had received. He then pushed a bucket of cold water over me, and having dried my skin with towels, declared that his work was done."

THE REALITY (AS SHOWN IN THE HULL CONVENT SCANDAL).—[See Page 183.]

CONVENT LIFE—THE ROMANCE.

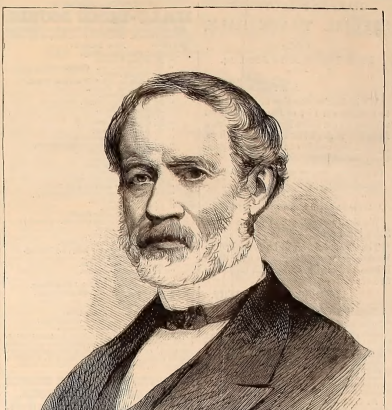
HON. E. B. WASHBURNE,

SECRETARY OF STATE.

THE appointment of Mr. WASHBURNE as Secretary of State is significant, not so much of the President's friendship toward a fellow-townsman, to whom he is bound by very strong ties, as of his determination to secure officers as heads of departments who will carry out the purposes which he has so plainly indicated as the controlling ones of his administration. Mr. WASHBURNE, known as "the watch-dog of the Treasury," as well as "the father of the House" (though he is only 53 years of age), is given the highest position in the new Cabinet. As Mr. GREELEY says of all the appointments, this "means business."

ELIHU B. WASHBURNE was born in Livermore, Oxford County, Maine, September 23, 1816. He has had two brothers in Congress, one from Wisconsin and the other from Maine. He studied law at Harvard University, and removed to Galena, Illinois, where he entered upon the practice of his profession. He was elected as a Whig to the Thirty-third Congress, and has been a member of the House for nine successive terms. At the death of THADDEUS STEVENS he became Chairman of the Committee of Appropriations; he had for many terms served as Chairman of the Committee on Commerce. It was not until the beginning of the war that WASHBURNE became acquainted with GRANT, whom he then recommended to Governor YATES for a Colonel's commission. Even before the remarkable victory at Donelson, Mr. WASHBURNE felt that GRANT was to be the "coming man" of the war, and his friends said that he had "GRANT on the brain." He urged and obtained his promotion to a Brigadier-Generalship. After the battle of Pittsburg Landing, when GRANT was under a cloud, WASHBURNE'S fidelity to the General was only equaled by the steadfast friendship of SHERMAN in the field. WASHBURNE, at a later period, introduced the bills which made GRANT Lieutenant-General and afterward General.

Mr. WASHBURNE is well fitted for the position to which he has been called, not, indeed, by diplomatic experience, but by his strength of character, his sound judgment, and his unflinching integrity.



ADOLPH E. BORIE, SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.—(Phot. by Wendercth, Taylor, & Brown, Phila.)

ADOLPH E. BORIE,

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Of the officers nominated for the new Cabinet there are three of foreign descent—A. T. STEWART, J. D. COX, and ADOLPH E. BORIE. The latter, nominated for Secretary of the NAVY, is a prominent citizen of Philadelphia, though not a politician. His father came from Bordeaux, France, and became a distinguished merchant in Philadelphia, where the subject of our sketch was born in 1809. ADOLPH was graduated at the Pennsylvania University at the early age of sixteen; eight years afterward he went to Paris and there completed his education. On his mother's side he is descended from one of the San Domingo families who left that island during the troubles with the blacks, and who, settling in Philadelphia, formed a small colony, which is now represented by some of the most cultivated and distinguished families in the city.

MR. BORIE, after his European travels, returned to Philadelphia, and became one of the well-known firm of M'KEAN, BORIE, & Co., 150 Dock Street. He has, by his industry and tact, amassed a large fortune. He was an old line Whig. In 1862, when the Union League was organized in Philadelphia, Mr. BORIE was one of its founders, and is now its Vice-President. Except in this way he has never taken part in politics. During the war he contributed largely, both by his means and his influence, to the enlistment of soldiers for the Union armies. He was introduced to General GRANT after the close of the war by General MEADE, and the acquaintance ripened into friendship. Every consideration that ought to influence the President in his choice of a Secretary of the NAVY renders the appointment of Mr. BORIE to that position fit and satisfactory.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY.

THE history of Howard University, of which we give an illustration on this page, enforces an important moral in connection with the construction of public buildings. The numerous accidents which have happened in this country from the recklessness of speculative builders—among which, as being the most disastrous, the falling of the Lawrence Mills, over ten years ago, stands out most prominently—ought ere this to have taught their terrible lesson. In connection with the Howard University we do not purpose to denounce any thing or any body, but only to state a few facts.

For some years past an attempt has been made to bring into use for building purposes a patent composite block which should displace common brick. A company was organized in New York city; the manufacture of the new blocks was commenced on a large scale; a large number of edifices were constructed from it in various parts of the country; and patent rights were sold for different geographical sections. Indestructibility, beauty of color and texture, and cheapness were claimed for the new invention. General HOWARD and other gentlemen organized a company in Washington, purchasing the patent right for $10,000. Thus it happened that when the Howard University for the education of colored youth was set on foot a hundred and fifty acres were bought north of the Capitol, and it was determined to build the edifice, as also the private structures upon the grounds, of the new material. It is asserted that $300,000 of public money has been used in forwarding the enterprise. The blocks were constructed from sand taken from the grounds, mixed with lime.

The result has been a failure. The material does not answer its purpose. Portions of the buildings constructed have crumbled, and none of them are considered safe. It may be that the blocks were not properly manufactured, or that they were too hastily used; but certainly, as manufactured and used in this case, they have proved unsatisfactory and useless. Our illustration shows a pile of these blocks in the foreground.

THE VELOCIPEDE OF THE OLDEN TIME.

WE gave recently a picture representing a velocipede of fifty years ago. The Gentleman's Magazine for February gives the following interesting information concerning the velocipede:

"France revived the obsolete machine, and gave interest and excitement to its use by altering its form from the four-wheel species, safe as a three-legged stool, to the graceful two-wheeler that demands skill and dexterity from the rounder. From our neighbors across the Channel the furor migrated to our brethren across the Atlantic, passing over us. The go-ahead vehicle is exactly suited to American ideas; walking, say the New York wags, is on its last legs. Schools, with the imposing name of Velocinasiums, for teaching the young idea how to gyrate, are being established; races are being rolled; men and boys are whizzing here, there, and every where, at the speed of twelve miles an hour. Inventors are improving the machines, and manufacturers are making them wholesale, the supply at present falling short of the demand. Our turn may come yet. Or have we had it? There was a considerable rage for velocipedes in England some thirty years ago. There may be those living who can recollect seeing no less a man than Michael Faraday spinning one up Hampstead Hill; he was very fond of the exercise, and, we may infer, saw good in it. Did he originate his own machine? The velocipede appears to have had several inventors. Nicéphore Niépce, one of the fathers of photography, has been set down as the first. But he was not. An old Paris newspaper, bearing date of July 27, 1779, tells of some wayfarers of locomotion performed by MM. Blanchard and Masurier, with a machine whereof the description exactly represents the old form of velocipede, only it was unsteered with a figure-head in the shape of an eagle, whose outspread wings served as rollers to the steering-wheel. But this may not be here the earliest of pedal locomotors. It is natural to suppose that the idea would suggest itself to the first man who travelled abreast into circular motion—to the inventor of the crank, in fact."

THE HOWARD UNIVERSITY, WASHINGTON, D. C.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

P. K. Dyer, Esq., who before the war enjoyed the confidence of the commercial community as an Advertising Agent, has now an additional claim upon their support and patronage. Having faithfully served his country during the war, and sacrificed both property and health, he again offers services and experience to those wishing to advertise, and is entitled to confidence and success. Address him, care of the New York Sun.

For the Delicate Skin of Ladies and Children. — Colgate & Co.'s Aromatic Vegetable Shaving Soaps are highly recommended by dancers and dealers. Sold by druggists and dealers in fancy goods.—[Com.]

Waltham Watches are the best and the cheapest.—N. Matson & Co., Chicago.

Dyspepsia Tablets cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. At druggists per Box: Mailed for 60. Sold by druggists. S. G. Welling, 571 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FINE WATCHES AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

SOLID GOLD

Hunting-Case Lever Watches, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jeweled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, $36. Lady's Lever Movement, Gold Balance, $20.

FINE SILVER

Genuine Hunting-Case Watches, Lever Movement, First Quality, $18; Extra Quality, $16.

IMPERIAL DUPLEX

Engraved Movement, Full Ruby Action, Sweep Seconds, large size, Warranted Seven Hunters Cases, $15.

AMERICAN MOVEMENT

Best Silver Cases, Plain Jeweled, $13; Full Jeweled, $16.

SOLID GOLD

Genuine Hunting-Case Watches, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jeweled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, $48; Extra Quality, $40; Watches of every description, equally low, sent by Express, to be paid for after they have been received, examined and accepted. Parties so ordering paying express charges.

Address all orders to

S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
63 & 64 JOHN ST., NEW YORK.

SILVER.	GOLD.	DIAMONDS.

Enameled White, $1.00 by Mail.

JOHN FOGGAN & CO. 78 NASSAU ST., N.Y.

Boosey's Dollar Series of Popular Operas for Piano-Forte, with Overture and words of Music, splendidly bound in vermilion and gold, now ready. The cheapest and most extensive collection of Modern Music in the world. Mailed free on application. Any work sent on receipt of price.

BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

Alaska Diamonds.

The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to real diamond, manufactured by our own factory, in artistic diamond settings, warranted fast colors, and sold by us at one sixtieth of the cost of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Look at our Price-List.

Ladies' Solitaire Finger-Rings, $8 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Rings, $8, $6, and $10. Cluster Finger-Rings, $8, $10, $12; Cluster Ear-Drops, $8, $10, $12.

Cluster Sets, $16, $18, $20, and $25 each; Cross Sets, $20 and $25.

Gents' Solitaire Pins, $7, $8, $8, $10, $15, $20; Rings, $8, $10. Gents' Cluster Rings, $8, $10, $20, $30.

Cluster Pins, $10 and $12; with tail, $10; Cross Pins, $6, $8, and $10; Pencil and Pen set, $6, $8, $10.

We do our business direct from our factory, located in a city which has a world-wide reputation for fine jewelry.

Orders for less than $5 should be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods sent free. Exceeding that sum sent by express. We refund customers paying all express charges. A Large Discount to the Trade. TRY US. Address

STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO., Providence, R. I.

NEW MUSIC.

VELOCIPEDE GALOP, Illustrated..... 50c.
FLEECY MILK WHITE—Strauss..... 50c.
Rufus McGee, 35c.; The Haunting Thought, 40c.
You'll Sometimes Think of Me ..... 35c.
Live in my Heart and Pay no Rent ..... 30c.
Visits de Fleurs Americaines, 10c. each. Sent mailed.

FREDERICK BLUME, 1128 Broadway, 2d door above 26th St. Branch, 869 Broadway.

No excuse now for Fingers and Magazines lying about loose all the year.

CONANT'S IMPROVED
PERIODICAL COVERS,

for Harper's Weekly or Bazar, sent by mail for $1 25. They bind the numbers firmly every week.

Address R. CONANT, 39 Nassau St., N. Y.

"Just a good thing."—New York Tribune.

Magazine Size, 50 Cents. Sheet-Music Size, $1 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
SPECIAL TRADE SALE,
1869.

From March 16 to April 24,

Franklin Square,
New York, March, 1869.

We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following terms, for Cash, from the 16th of March to the 24th of April, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore:

On Orders of $ 100 at one time, 25 per cent. discount.
" $ 500 " 30 " "
" $1000 " 33⅓ " "
" $2000 " 35 " "

And an additional deduction of Five per cent. for Cash.

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Spring.

The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers personally, or by mail enclosing five cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

AMERICAN SILVER WATCHES.

Rout's Silver Chains and Rings have stood the test for the last 10 years, and are now sold by leading Jewelers throughout the United States.

Silver Rings, 15 different patterns, 10 cts. to $4 each.
Silver Chains, 25 different patterns and sizes, from $1 to $20 each.
Samples sent by mail on receipt of prices.
Priced Catalogues sent any where on application.
Special Card to the Trade.

A. I. ROOT & CO., MEDINA, OHIO.

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity. Patented.

A most wonderful and elegant Sewing Machine. Noiseless in operation; sews with double or single thread, makes the Double Stitch with extraordinary rapidity.

It stitches beautiful and firm; a perfect machine."—New York Tribune.

"For the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the Household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Lady's Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very fast, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"Beautiful as a Rower."—Leslie's Gazette of Fashions.

All persons who may be offer for sale Imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement of Patent rights. Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in a box with printed instructions, for $25 00; or C. O. D.

Agents wanted every where. Circular containing Illustrated Information sent free. Address

APEX SEWING MACHINE CO.,
323 Broadway, New York.

"GRACE GREELEY," AGENTS Wanted to sell "Recollections of a Busy Life." The Autobiography of HORACE GREELEY and the history of his time; in it elegant volume of 614 pages, with a perfect Portrait of the Author, and other beautiful Illustrations. Sells very rapidly. Price, $3.50, extra cloth; $5, sheep; $6, library. Liberal Discount. Send for circular to J. B. FORD & CO., 164 Nassau Street, New York.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of

100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, AND ORGANS,

of six first-class makers, at extraordinary prices for cash, or will take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid; the same to let, and rent money applied if purchased.

WANTED AGENTS to sell Blake's $1 Patent Chair Spring. Can make from $10 to $20 per day. Price to Agents reduced. Send for Circular. GEO. E. GOWDY & CO., 25 Cortlandt Street, N. Y.

"Know thyself." For "Self-Made Men:" "How to Rise in Life; Whom Great Men Marry; Man's Power over Woman; Perfect Beauty, and How to Read them; Eyes, Noses, Lips, Cheeks, Chins, Complexion; Affection, Temper, Emotion, &c., in March No. Phrenological Journal. Only 30 cts., or $3 a year. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

LIBRARY OF LOVE, Etiquette, Courtship, Love, Dress, and Write Letters correctly; a book. No. MAGIC PICTURES, wonderful and amusing, 25 cts. a Package. W. C. WELLS, 3 Arbor Place, N. Y.

IVINS' PATENT HAIR-CRIMPERS.—Every lady should have them. Sent anywhere by mail. Made only by E. Ivins, 1301 Marshall St., Philadelphia.

HITCHCOCK'S
HALF-DIME MUSIC.

Printed on heavy music-paper, 4 pages, colored titles. Music and Words. Mailed for 5 cts. each, or the whole 40 for $2 00. NOW READY:

No. 46. Belles of Broadway.
" 49. Flying Trapeze.
" 37. Rose of Love. (Instrumental.)
" 37. Susan's Story.
" 36. I will Not Ask to Press that Cheek.
" 35. The Rosy Wreath.
" 34. The Old Church.
" 33. Light of the World. (Sacred.)
" 32. Beautiful Bells.
" 31. Union Galop.
" 30. Olympic Schottische.
" 29. Up in a Balloon.
" 28. There's a Charm in Spring.
" 27. See the Conquering Hero Comes.
" 26. Pride and Fame.
" 25. The Passing Bell.
" 24. Still I Love Thee.
" 23. Waltzing down at Long Branch.
" 22. Rolling Stone Broadway.
" 21. She might not Suit your Fancy.
" 20. Arna-Arn. (Polka Mazurka.)
" 19. The Rose of Erin.
" 18. Silver Chimes.
" 17. The Old Cottage Clock.
" 16. He Lov'd me, and we All. (Sacred.)
" 15. Maggie's Secret.
" 14. Little Maggie May.
" 13. The Danish Boy's Whistle.
" 12. Thomas Hilken, my Baby, my Darling.
" 11. Genevieve Waltz.
" 10. Beautiful Miss Rolka.
" 9. Champagne Charlie.
" 8. Prairie Bird.
" 7. I really don't Think I shall Marry.
" 6. Good-by, Sweetheart, Good-bye.
" 5. Not for Joseph.
" 4. Wax Doll.
" 3. We'd better Bide a Wee.
" 2. Willie we have Missed you, Robin!
" 1. Captain Jinks. Macingan.

The above can be had of any music, book, and periodical stores, or by enclosing the price, 5 cts. each, to the publisher. Other single editions will rapidly follow. Agents wanted. BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 30 Spring St., 2 doors (under St. Nicholas Hotel).

IMPROVED ALUMINUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

Prices from $16 to $22.

From the Scientific American of April 11, 1868.

"The color of this metal closely resembles that of 18-carat gold. It is more grateful to the eye, and its lustre brilliant," &c., &c.

When desired, these Watches will be sent to any express office, and permission of examination granted upon payment of Express charges.

Description of goods and metal sent free upon application. An inspection of my goods earnestly solicited.

JESSE R. HUNTSIN VUILLEMIN,
44 Nassau Street, New York.

For sale by all respectable dealers.

CANVASSING AGENTS WANTED.

THOUSANDS OF DOLLARS CAN BE MADE by selling a series of three superb Pictures in Oil Colors, representing historical events in the life of President Grant, viz.:

1. THE BOY GRANT AS A HORSE-TAMER.
2. LIEUTENANT GRANT AT THE CAPTURE OF THE CITY OF MEXICO.
3. GENERAL GRANT RECEIVING HIS LOG CABIN ON HIS FARM IN ILLINOIS.

The Pictures will readily sell for $1 each.

Send 50 cents and we will get a specimen by mail, postpaid.

A. LESLIE,
P. O. Box 4121. 214 CENTRE STREET, N. Y.

SUBSTITUTES IN THE DENTAL RANKS

are not desirable; therefore, keep the natural teeth sound and pure with Sozodont, the genuine vegetable alkalizing Solvent. Do this, and they will last as long as the mouth lasts, and the breath itself will never be tainted.

FRESH GARDEN and FLOWER SEEDS, prepaid by mail. For 10 cts. per oz., the best sorts Asparagus, Beet, Carrot, Parsnip, Radish, Spinach, & Turnip. For 15 and 25 cts. per oz., the best Cabbage, Celery, Cucumber, Lettuce, Melon, Salsify, Squash, and Tomato. For 40 cts., Onion and Peppers. The above sent in 5 cts. packets, 75 sorts Garden and Flower Seeds, $1. Catalogues gratis. Early Rose Potato at 25 cts. per lb.; $2 by mail. Seeds on Commission. Agents wanted. B. M. WATSON, Plymouth, Mass.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information sent free. Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen book of types, cuts, borders, &c., &c., 70 cents. DAVID WATSON, Agt's, Adams Press Co., 59 Cortlandt Street, New York.

THE LANGHAM HOTEL, London.
JAMES M. SANDERSON, Manager,
formerly of New York.

EVERYBODY.—"PLEASANT AND PROFITABLE." Send stamp for particulars to S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Published by Harper Brothers.—Price 25 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
have just ready:

An Illustrated Edition
OF
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, JEALOUSY.

By CHARLES READE,
Author of "Hard Cash," &c.

PRICE 25 CENTS.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send "Griffith Gaunt" by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents.

THOMAS R. AGNEW,

ESTABLISHED 1836,

260 Greenwich St., corner Murray, New York.

IS OFFERING CHEAP,

FOR CASH:

COFFEES.—Green, Roasted, and Ground; all grades to suit the palate and the pocket of the million; 18c., 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., 40c.; Mocha, 50c.

TEAS.—Every body knows that I should know who they buy teas of, as all who sell watches are not watchmakers. Mr. Agnew spent three years in China, and knows exactly what teas are, and does not deal in damaged goods of any kind; consequently every package I sell is warranted as represented, or the money returned.

MOLASSES.—Mr. Agnew has his agent in New Orleans, an expert in the business, who ships him the choicest of the crop.

RICE.—Mr. Agnew has a house in South Carolina, who ship him the best head rice in market.

FLOUR is received direct from the mills, Genesee, Indiana, and St. Louis, best brands in market, from $7 to $16 per barrel.

GROCERIES.—Every thing desired in families, hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, steamships and sailing vessels is sold by Mr. Agnew, who is a live man, working 18, 19, and 20 hours every day for the advantage of a century. He is a steam-cooch compared with the old fashioned grocers, who have been known to put in a soup-pat barrel, or as lackeys for others, and now begin to find they have got a long way headed. In a word, Agnew is as far ahead of the trade as Dexter is of the cart-horse when trotting. He is the man for the people—quick as lightning and punctual as time.

SENSIBLE Bookkeepers, Artists, Engineers, Draughtsmen, and Students should all use the SENSIBLE ERASER AND PAPER CLEANER, the best Erasing Preparation ever invented. Sold by Stationers and Dealers in Artists' Materials. Sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents, by N. BRADLEY & CO.,
P. O. Box 4797. 75 John St., N. Y.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE.

First-class, low-priced. Agents Wanted. For terms, address CHICOPEE S. M. CO., Boston, Mass.

$245 A MONTH, TO AGENTS. 49 New and useful articles. Address
JOHN J. HOWARD & CO., Alfred, Me.

TEN PER CENT. COUPON BONDS of the Town of Lansing, Ingham County, Michigan. For sale by A. WILKINS, Detroit, Mich.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

I.

Charles Reade

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, JEALOUSY. By Charles Reade, Author of "Hard Cash," "Never too Late to Mend," "The Little Wife," "Love me Long," &c. Fully Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

II.

HARD CASH. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By Charles Reade, Author of "Love me Little, Love me Long," "Never too Late to Mend," &c. With Illustrations. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

III.

J. D. Baldwin.

PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Great Peoples and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to a still Greater Civilization of the Rhiopians or Cushites of Arabia. By John D. Baldwin, Member of the American Oriental Society. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

IV.

Thomas Bosé.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK: Its History, Condition, and Statistics. An Official Report to the Board of Education. By Thomas Boese, Clerk of the Board. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

V.

William Hepworth Dixon.

HER MAJESTY'S TOWER. Historic Studies in the Tower of London. With Frontispiece Plan of the Tower. 2 vols., Cloth, 40 cents.

VI.

Anthony Trollope.

THE KELLYS AND THE O'KELLYS. Beautifully Illustrated. Part I. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

VII.

Miles O'Reilly.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF CHARLES G. HALPINE (Miles O'Reilly). Consisting of Odes, Poems, Satires, Lyrics, and Legends. Illustrated. Many have not heretofore been collected together. With a Biographical Sketch of the Author. Portrait. Edited by Rosamr B. Roosevelt. Portrait on Steel. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

VIII.

F. Whymper.

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE IN THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA, formerly Russian America—now Ceded to the United States—and in various other parts of the North Pacific. By Frederick Whymper. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

IX.

Sir Samuel W. Baker.

CAST UP BY THE SEA; or, The Adventures of Ned Grey. By Sir Samuel W. Baker, M.A., F.R.G.S., Author of "The Albert N'Yanza Great Basin of the Nile," "The Rifle and Hound in Ceylon," &c. Unabridged. With Ten Illustrations by Hammond. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

X.

The Rev. John L. Nevius.

CHINA AND THE CHINESE: a General Description of the Country and its Inhabitants; the Religious, and Forms of Government; its Religious and Social Institutions; its Intercourse with Other Nations; and its Present Condition and Prospects. By the Rev. Josep L. Nevius, Ten Years a Missionary in China. With a Map and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

XI.

The Rev. Lyman Abbott.

JESUS OF NAZARETH: his Life and Teaching; Founded on the Four Gospels, and Illustrated by Reference to the Manners, Customs, Religious Beliefs, and Political Institutions of his Times. By Lyman Abbott. With Designs by Doré, De Laroche, Fenn, and others. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE
GREAT AMERICAN
TEA COMPANY
RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM
THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF
CHINA AND JAPAN,
and sell them in quantities to suit customers
AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show:

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 75c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 75c., 80c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by giving our which we sell at the low price of 26 cents per pound, and warrant the perfect satisfaction.

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 38c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.
FORSMOUTH, Ohio, August 26, 1868.
To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York.

GENTS: The cargo you have here will not be alone. They say I have learned the road, and that I have got to send another cargo over them. So, boys, you see it, in the shape of my seventh order since the 6th of May last, making one hundred and forty-four chests and forty-four casts I have sent you since that date.

Hoping this will be as good as former orders, I remain Yours, &c., JOHN W. HAWKINS.

10 lbs. Uncol'd Japan, Mrs. Kempton....at $1 00...$10 00
5 " Imperial.....do.....at 1 25... 6 25
5 " Young Hyson...A. L. Cummings, at 1 25... 6 25
5 " Gunpowder...Miss Stephens, at 1 25... 6 25
4 " Coffee.....J. L. Chapman, at 40... 1 60
5 " Gunpowder.....O. A. Watkins, at 1 00... 5 00
4 " Imperial.....F. Taylor.....at 1 25... 5 00
5 " Young Hyson...J. Hopkins.....at 1 25... 6 25
5 " Coffee.....at 30... 1 50
5 " Gunpowder.....John Stephens, at 1 25... 6 25
4 " Young Hyson...Wm. H. Doray, at 1 25... 5 00
4 " do. do. ...H. Malone.....at 1 25... 5 00
4 " do. do. ...N. Newcomb...at 1 25... 5 00
4 " do. do. ...Noah Campbell, at 1 25... 5 00
5 " Gunpowder...Judge Miller...at 1 50... 4 50
5 " Coffee.....A. Gale.....at 1 25... 6 25
2 " Imperial.....Mrs. Bird.....at 1 25... 2 50

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collecting on delivery; but larger orders will be forwarded by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to prove satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a Club may not reside, by sending us a description, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third. Circulars for Clubs furnished on sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, in order to prevent all fraud should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Establishment, as it appears in the advertisement. This will prevent their orders falling into the hands of the wrong parties.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 6845, New York City.

LOVELINESS RESTORED.

Why should faultless features be clouded with freckles, blotches, pimples, colds-sores, or any species of eruption when STARKWEATHER'S IODO AND SULPHUR POWDERS will correct the unhealthy? EXTERNAL APPLICATIONS are worse than useless. The cause of all these discomforts arises, as is the blood. It lacks iron to give it vitality, and the action of sulphur to neutralize the acrid secretions. The Powders, taken night and morning, will soon communicate a coarse through the superficial vessels—a glow rich, healthful, natural; while the skin a delicate tinge of rose and literally extinguishing the stains and excrescences referred to.

Sold by Druggists. 1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 6 Packages, 72 Powders, $5. Mailed Free.
HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N. Y.

MME. DEMOREST'S SPRING AND SUMMER MAMMOTH Fashion Plate, comprising all the leading styles of Ladies' and Children's Dresses, accompanied with full-sized cut Patterns of the principal figures, and full descriptions; $2 50. Sent post free on receipt of price. Address MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, N. Y. Every merchant and dressmaker should procure this elegant plate of fashions.

DEAFNESS, CATARRH, SCROFULA and Specialty.—Cures legally guaranteed or money returned. By the Inventor of the Celebrated Patent Improved Cochlear Vibrator for Incurable Deafness, Invisible Tubes for Deafness, Catarrh, and Throat Sound. Send for free Treatise. DR. J. H. STILWELL, 180 Bleecker St., N. Y.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold
$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.
THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.
Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been illustrated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus watches, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE)

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. By adopting this name we are Fish-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by patent to keep correct time, and equal in neatness, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $250. Chains of every style, from $2 to $5.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Gold Pens and Masonic Pins, &c., all in the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), so we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our prices. Our regular customers will not be imposed upon by the lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches are only to be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to remit money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. Letters should be addressed to the express company, plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is at

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.
C. E. COLLINS & CO.

GREAT
BANKRUPT SALE
OF
FINE GOLD-PLATED
AND OROIDE OF GOLD JEWELRY, with 200 Cases of
SWISS and LONDON WATCHES,
AMOUNTING TO $10,000,
TO BE CLOSED OUT AT ONCE
5000 pieces of Jewelry for $100 00;
Genuine Swiss Watches $50 00 per Dozen;
and all other Goods in Same Proportion.
CIRCULARS SENT FREE.
Address LOCK BOX 431,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—I am now prepared to furnish all the workingmen with constant employment in their homes, the whole of the time, or for the space moments. Business new, light, and profitable. Fifty cents to $5 per evening is easily earned by persons of either sex, and a boy or girl who works with any one of them can earn as much. Great inducements are offered those who will devote their whole time to the business. It is essential that every person who sees this notice may send me their address and test the business for themselves. I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, and valuable sample sent by mail for 10 cents. Address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Me.

WILD CHERRY BARK AND IRON.—FERWILD'S COMPOUND SYRUP OF WILD CHERRY. This is an invaluable remedy for Clergymen and Students, who require a medicine that will immediately proceed by overwork and anxiety, for Merchants and Professional men, and all whose occupations require great mental energy and equally unduly excited. It is also particularly adapted to Ladies of delicate and weak constitution and nervous condition of blood. It is unlike every other preparation of Wild Cherry, containing the Tonic properties of Iron. Sold by all Druggists. Prepared by H. & J. BREWER, Pharmacists, Springfield, Mass. Sold in New York by J. F. HENRY, 91 Park Row.

THE WHITLOCK
EXPOSITION.
A Perpetual Fair, 35 & 37 Park Place.
The Exposition has been permanently established as a part of The Whitlock Exposition Reporter, a journal of interest to every Housekeeper, Manufacturer, Farmer, Horticulturist, and Housekeeper.
Is Circulated Quarterly, 100,000.
Address WHITLOCK EXPOSITION, Box 6788, N. Y.

CLARKE'S NEW METHOD for MELODEONS and REED ORGANS. Just published. A Complete Instructor, Reference, and Collection, and an Improvement on all other Methods for the Simplicity and Progress of Learning. Price $2 50. Sent by Mail, Postpaid. Solos, Voluntaries, and Recreative Pieces. Arranged expressly for Melodeon, American, Metropolitan Prince & Co., Carhart & Needham, Burdett, Estey, and all other Reed Organs. Send for the Melodeon and Harmonium. By WILLIAM H. CLARKE. Author of "The American Church Instructor." Price in Boards, $2 50. Sent postpaid.
O. DITSON & CO., 277 Washington St., Boston:
C. H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

Holloway's Pills.—The Difficulty peculiar to Females to be effectually prevented by the timely use of Holloways' such is the experience of humanity in all climates, countries, and varieties of the female constitution.

VELOCIPEDE WHEELS,
MANUFACTURED BY
S. N. BROWN & CO.,
Pittsburgh, Pa.
They also make a prize article of Spokes and Hubs for light Carriage and Buggy Wheels. Send for Price List.

EMPLOYMENT that pays. For particulars, address S. M. SPENCER & CO., Bratleboro, Vt.

100,000 BROOK TROUT.
Four Months old. For Stocking Streams and Trout Ponds. Price $25 to $30 per thousand. Address WILLIAM BALDWIN, Shelburne Falls, Conway Co., N.Y., or MYRON PARDEE, Oswego.

$3000 Salary. { Address U. S. PIANO CO., N.Y.

GENUINE OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO.,
Geneva, Switzerland,
Manufacture, on strictly scientific principles, style, and finish, their celebrated Oroide Gold Watches, which are the most rare and costly description of Gold Watches. They are manufactured expressly for the American and Continental Trade. Each watch is fitted in the finest Swiss Movements, with Fish Patent Levers, Compensation Balance, Jewelled Escapements, Chronometer Balance, $25. Elaborately engraved, Hunting Case, Chronometer Balance, Expansion—the most exacting of our customers—have those watches highly recommended for accuracy, durability, symmetry, and utility of our celebrated watches, and pronounce them unsurpassed by any watches in the world. Each watch warranted by special certificate from the Oroide Gold Watch Co. to be perfect time-keepers, and to run correctly. Express Gold Oroide, $5, $8, $7, and $10. Clubs for Six Watches will receive an extra Watch free. Express will exhibit the Watch, &c., when requested, on receipt of reference from California, For Western Territories, and Texas, which where, to be paid for on delivery, except orders from Customers must pay all charges. AGENTS WANTED.—Send for circular containing full particulars. Address Oroide Watch Co., Geneva, Switzerland. Thousand Dollars yearly. Unlocated territorial agencies now ready. Reserve your choice. Circulars sent for stamp. On receipt of $100 Postal Order, a handsome Watch will be sent.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

nounce them invaluable as reliable time-keepers. Each Watch warranted by special certificate from the Oroide Gold Watch Co. to be perfect time-keepers, and to run correctly. Express Gold Oroide, $5, $8, $7, and $10. Clubs for Six Watches will receive an extra Watch free. Express will exhibit the Watch, &c., when requested, on receipt of reference from California, For Western Territories, and Texas, which where, to be paid for on delivery, except orders from Customers must pay all charges. AGENTS WANTED.—Send for circular containing full particulars. Address Oroide Watch Co., Geneva, Switzerland. Thousand Dollars yearly. Unlocated territorial agencies now ready. Reserve your choice. Circulars sent for stamp. On receipt of $100 Postal Order, a handsome Watch will be sent.

JOHN FOGGAN, Prest'r Oroide Gold Watch Co.
Only Office in the United States, No. 78 NASSAU STREET New York.

LICENSED BY THE
UNITED STATES
AUTHORITY.
S. C. THOMPSON & CO.'S
GREAT
One Dollar Sale of
Dry Goods, Dress Goods, Linens, Cottons, FANCY GOODS, Albums, Ribbs, Silver-Plated Ware, Jewelry, Leather and German Goods of every description.
These articles to be sold at the uniform price of
ONE DOLLAR EACH,
and not to be paid for until you receive what you are to receive.
The most popular and economical method of doing business in the country.
The goods we have in store for sale are described on printed slips, and will be sent to any address at the rate of 10 cents each, for postage, printing, &c. It is then at the option of holders whether they will send one dollar for the article or not.
BY PATRONIZING THIS SALE you have a chance to exchange your goods, should you take the goods mentioned on the printed slip not be desired.
The Smallest Article sold for ONE DOLLAR can be exchanged for Silver-Plated, Five-Bottled Revolving Castor, or your choice of a large Variety of other articles upon Exchange List, comprising over 100 useful articles, and one of which could be bought at retail stores for double the money.

TERMS TO AGENTS.
We send as commission to Agents:
For a Club of Thirty, and $3 00,
one of the following articles: 30 yards Cotton, Lady's Fancy Square Wool Shawl, Lancaster Quilt, Accordeon, Set of Stone Jewelry, Gold Watch, Gent's Gold Scarf Box, Fancy Dress-Pattern, Pair Lady's extra quality Gloves, Gold Pencil, Gent's Linen Bosom Shirt, Albumbers Quill, Honeycomb Quilt, Cottage Clock, White Wool Blanket, 16 yards best quality Cotton, 12 yards Delaine, one dozen Linen Dinner Napkins, &c.
For a Club of Forty, and $6 00, one of the following articles: 40 yards Shirting, Pair Housecloth Quilts, Cylinder Watch, 4 yards double-width Waterproof Cloaking, Lady's Double Wool Shawl, Lancaster Quilt, Accordeon, Silver-Plated Engraved Silver-Plated, Six-Bottled Revolving Castor, Lady's Fancy Striped Shawl, Silk Dress, Pair Fluted Forks, Pair of All-Wool Blankets, Pair of Alhambra Quilts, 40 yards Print, Gent's Linen Bosom Shirt, Gent's Right-Keyed Accordeon, Webster's National Pictorial Dictionary, or other articles, 90 yards Cotton, Delaine, one dozen Linen Dinner Napkins, &c.
For a Club of One Hundred, and $10 00,
6 yards Broadcloth, Fancy Cassimere Coat, Pants, and Vest Pattern (extra quality), Pair splendid Rose Blankets, Lady's All-Wool Long Shawl, 2 sets Silver-Plated Carpeting, splendid Victoria and Bow, splendid Alpaca Dress Pattern, Lady's Gold Watch, Gent's Gold Watch, Barrel Shot-Gun, Sharp's Revolver, one Pair fine Damascus Shot-Guns, Pair Silver-Plated Ice Pitchers, Match, Worcester's Illustrated Unabridged Dictionary (1500 pages), &c., &c.
☞ For additional list of commissions see circular.
Commissions paid in cash, or goods, as preferred.

Agents will please take notice of this. Do not send names, but number your clubs from one upward. Make your letters short and plain as possible.

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE OF THIS:
☞ Be SURE and send Money in ALL CASES to REGISTERED LETTER, which can be sent from any Post-Office.
The way of sending money is preferred to any other method whatever.
We can not be responsible for money lost, unless some precaution be taken to secure the letter.
SEND FOR CIRCULARS.
Send your address in full, Town, County, and State.
S. C. THOMPSON & CO.,
136 FEDERAL STREET,
Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied, for one year, from January 1st, to any two for $7 00.
Back Volumes. Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, or for Magazine, $5; the Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.
The Postage which the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable quarterly in advance. Pay quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.
Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription commences. Thus, 1869, 1 signifies that the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.
The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for JUNE and DECEMBER of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.
The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.
In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferred to Bank Bills, as, if lost or stolen, it can be collected. Bank Bills be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.
In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be plainly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $2 00 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

TWO GIRLS OF THE PERIOD.

RITUALISTIC PRIEST. "There, my Child, observe that Example of Humility and Devotion. How sweet to change the Vanities of the World for a Lot so Humble!"

FASHIONABLE CONVERT. "Oh, but that is not at all what I expected!—and wear such Awful Shoes? and—oh really, on second thoughts, I shall stick to Fifth Avenue."

GORHAM MFG. CO.
Sterling Silver Ware,
AND
Fine Electro-Plated Ware,
of the following trade-marks

Trade-Mark for Silver. GORHAM MFG CO. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate.

MANUFACTURED BY THE
GORHAM MANUFACTURING CO.,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

THE GORHAM WARE may be obtained of ADAMS, CHANDLER, & CO., No. 20 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

Waltham Watches.

3 Plate 16 & 20 Sizes.

3 Plate 16 & 20 Sizes.

These watches are by far the best made in this country, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

$20 A DAY—TO MALE AND FEMALE AGENTS—To introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only Licensed Shuttle Machine in the market sold for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Full particulars free. Address
W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio.

NO MORE TOOTHED WHEELS!!!
Use only Bursers with Patent Wick Raiser and Adjuster. Adapted to the present style of chimneys, and fitting all lamps. Will certainly last a lifetime.
AGENTS WANTED.
F. R. DOMINICK,
393 Hudson St., N. Y.

BLUNT & CO., 129 Water St., N. Y.
SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.
First Quality only. As VERY LOW PRICES.
PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

KNOX'S SEEDS.

We offer our new crop of
GARDEN AND FLOWER SEEDS,
for the season of 1869. Our Seeds, so long and favorably known throughout the United States, are justly esteemed wherever tried.

The following Catalogues will be sent free to applicants:

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OR HAND-BOOK OF SEEDS.
SEED NOVELTIES AND SEED POTATOES.
Containing Directions for Planting, Preparation of the Soil, and After Management, particularly adapted to the use of Gardeners, Amateurs, and all others to whom a knowledge of Gardening and Treatment of Seeds is necessary.

☞ MARKET GARDENER'S LIST, for Gardeners only.
☞ WHOLESALE PRICE-LIST, positively for the Trade only.

W. W. KNOX,
Successor to J. KNOX,
No. 137 Liberty St., PITTSBURGH, Pa.

$6. WATCHES. $9.
A beautiful Silver, Double-Case, English Movements, Steel Hands, small size, Full-Jeweled, warranted correct, with an elegant Vest Chain, only $6. Same as the above, Gold-Plated Engrav'd Hunting-Case, with chain, only $9. 18-carat Gold-Plated Watches, $12, $15, and $20. Silver Levers at $12 and $15. Ladies' Enameled and plain Watches, very handsome, $16 and $20. All kinds of good Watches cheap. Send for our Catalogue.
WILLSON & CO., Importers, 142 Fulton St., N. Y.

$25 to $50 A DAY can be made by any wide-awake, energetic man, by selling the American Pocket Policeman, a beautiful silver-plated combination lock and Chain—one to key—capable of 10,000 changes. Of almost universal application, combining utility, novelty, and beauty. Send stamp for circular, or $1 for sample lock and terms to agents. Address American Pocket Policeman Mfg. Co., P. O. Box 918, Chicago, Ill.

Dr. JNO. V. BURTON'S
TOBACCO ANTIDOTE,
WARRANTED, WITHOUT ALL DOUBT, TO CURE TOBACCO. Is entirely vegetable and harmless. To regulate and enrobe the blood, keeping the system free from all impurities, tonic and strengthening to the nerves, an excellent tonic and aperient, soothing to the stomach, and when the headache comes makes strong refreshing tea, establishes robust health, and prevents consumption. Sold by druggists, or sent by express per box, post paid, on receipt of money. Send for the injurious effects of tobacco, with many testimonials, references, etc., FREE. Agents wanted. Address
Dr. T. R. ARNOT, Jersey City, N. J.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
☞ Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.
[Trade-mark & Copyrighted.]

LARGE
VINES AND PLANTS
FOR IMMEDIATE BEARING.

WITH an increased interest in SMALL FRUIT CULTURE, there has arisen a great demand for Vines and Plants of the largest size and best quality. Young America is impatient of delay, and those advanced in life do not wish to "plant for their heirs" entirely, but desire themselves to "EAT THE FRUIT of their doings." We regard this desire as praiseworthy. While there is enjoyment in planting, cultivating, and watching the progress of growth, there is certainly increased delight in the fruition of our labors.

At considerable expense, we have grown and are now prepared to furnish stock that can not fail to give entire satisfaction to those wanting the earliest and best results.

Our special Price-List for Vines and Plants of the above character will be mailed to all applicants, and also, when desired, to those sending 10 cents for the Descriptive and Illustrated Catalogue and General Price-List.

J. KNOX,
Box 155, Pittsburgh, Pa.

£150,000,000
Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1868. Fee to search for any name, £1. Gee & Co., 9 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we propose, specially for home and office use, the plain Hungarian and Egg Bowls, and the Cylinder Stems. They hold the most tobacco, are the most durable and practical ones, being the easiest to clean. Or the Hawk's Bowls, having the largest surface to throw off heat. For travelling and street smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bend.

Being represented extensively throughout the country by our agents, we desire to have our Pipes—which are considered equaled by none—still more extensively used by those who wish a good article at a fair and reasonable charge. Therefore we have established the following rates:

We will sell a No. 2 Pipe for $5, and charge $1 additional for every number higher; therefore No. 4 costs $7; No. 5, $8; No. 15, $18. Pipes from No. 1 to No. 8 are considered full-sized ones; from No. 9 upward, large ones. In the price is included a Case and Stem.

See Amber Mouthpieces for Meerschaum Stems in Egg Pipes.

We send by Express to collect on delivery, amount and charges; but suggest that the amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance, to avoid the return charges.

In condition, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on thirty years' experience in the trade, having received our Diploma in 1839 by the respective commissioners in Europe; and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHAUM GOODS into this country.

We cut Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design, mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Work done. And, main of all, do not charge exorbitant prices. For reference, we refer to possession of commendations from thousands of our customers, representing all classes of society.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Genuine Meerschaum Goods,
Stores: 485 Broadway, near Broome, and 27 John St., 27, middle of the block.
SEND FOR CIRCULAR and PRICE-LIST to LETTER BOX 5846.

GENUINE WALTHAM WATCHES,
IN SOLID GOLD and SILVER CASES ONLY,
AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Silver Hunting Watches	$18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases	$80
Gold Hunting Watches, Ladies' Size	$70

Every Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Company. We will send these Watches by Express to any place, with bill to collect on delivery, and give the purchaser the privilege to open the package and examine the Watch before paying, and any Watch that does not give satisfaction may be exchanged or the money will be refunded. Every one is requested to write for our Descriptive Price-List, which explains the different kinds with prices of each.
Please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.
Address in full,
HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N. Y.

FURNITURE.
WARREN WARD & CO.,
Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.
Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.
ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

OSC

The Highest Cash Prices
PAID FOR
OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;
OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;
OLD BLANK BOOKS and LEDGERS that are written full;
and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Stockers, Insurance Companies, Banks, Patent Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Public and Private Collectors, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Companies, &c., &c.
JOHN C. STOCKWELL,
23 Ann street, N. Y.

ELGIN WATCHES.
CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing our watches, unless assurance is given to be of our make, of parties who advertise to send them "C.O.D." We have no connection with such houses, and do not furnish our goods to any house for that purpose. The excellence and good repute of the real ELGIN WATCHES have caused several Foreign and American Watch Companies to make INFERIOR IMITATIONS with the same or similar trademarks as ours. SPECIAL ALL AGENTS WHO ADVERTISE to send our goods "C.O.D.," no matter whom. To get the real ELGIN WATCHES purchase only of dealers in your vicinity or elsewhere whom you know to be honorable.
THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,
ELGIN, ILLINOIS.
Business Office, Nos. 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

KALDENBERG & SON, Manufactory of Meerschaum Pipes and Holders, with Monograms, Portraits, &c. Wholesale and Retail. Repairing in all its branches. Send for Pictures and Price-List. Box 6734. Stores: 22 William St., & 6 John St., & 27 Nassau St., corner John St. Received a Prize at the Paris Exposition, 1867.

THE DOLLAR SUN.
Chas. A. Dana's Paper.
The cheapest, neatest, and most readable of New York journals. Every body likes it. Three editions, DAILY, SUNDAY, and WEEKLY, at $6, $2, and $1 a year. Full reports of markets, agriculture, and Farmers' and Fruit-growers' Clubs, and a complete story in every Weekly and Semi number. A PREMIUM TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER. Specimens free. Send for a copy, with premium list.
I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher, New York.

DE DE JONGH'S
Celebrated
LIGHT-BROWN COD LIVER OIL
Universally recognized by the Faculty as
INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR
to every other kind,
and the unequaled remedy for
Consumption, General Debility,
and the Wasting Diseases of Children.
DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA in IMPERIAL HALF-PINTS only, sealed with a blue capsule, with the signature of his Trade-Mark.
SOLE CONSIGNEES,
ANSAR, HARFORD & CO., 77, Strand, London.
SOLE ASSIGNEES AGENTS IN AMERICA,
EDW'D GREEY & Co., 38, Vesey St., New York.
Sold by all Druggists at $1.50 per Bottle.
☞ Beware of felonious imitations.

"THROW PHYSIC TO THE DOGS,"
says Macbeth. Much of it might be so disposed of with advantage to mankind, but it would be hard upon the dogs. The "sweet oblivious antidote," which Macbeth asked for in vain, is, however, vouchsafed to the dyspeptic and bilious in TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT. It regulates the liver, invigorates the system; is a positive specific for indigestion and constipation; promotes perspiration and reduces fever. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

TARRANT'S
SELTZER
APERIENT.

A HORSE DOCTOR FREE.
SICK AND INJURED ANIMALS
CURED GRATIS.
THE SPIRIT OF THE TIMES,
the great Family, Sporting, and Literary Weekly Paper of the United States, employs a distinguished Veterinarian as Editor, who gives advice and prescriptions through its columns FREE to all inquiries concerning sick or injured horses or cattle sent to the paper by mail. The cures of hundreds of valuable animals is the best testimonial of the efficiency of The Spirit. Replies are made promptly to all inquiries, whether from subscribers or not; and the subscription of the complaint about which advice is asked for is always printed in connection with the answer, in order that the ability of the Professor may be subjected to the closest scrutiny of the Medical Faculty and the greatest number of horse-owner or veterinarian students. Should be without it. THE SPIRIT is a high-toned gentleman's newspaper, which (with the odd "Spirit of the Times") sheds luster and title to whatever is of forty years' standing, and is devoted to Hunting, Fishing, Racing, Field Sports, Literature, and the Stage. Subscription price, $5 a year. Single copies can be had at the news stands. Specimens postpaid.
EDITOR "SPIRIT OF THE TIMES,"
No. 201 William St., N. Y.

DRUNKENNESS.—C. C. BEERS, M. D., Hartford, Conn., guarantees a cure, or refunds the money. Send stamp for evidences.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.
A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, Plans, and Details to Working Scale of Country, Suburban, and Village Houses, with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE, Twenty Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
150 Designs, $1.50, postpaid.
GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect,
191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

See Back Page

VOL. XIII.—No. 639.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE RECONSTRUCTED CABINET.

SINCE the issue of our last Number there have been some changes in the Cabinet. Mr. WASHBURNE has resigned the position assigned him, and the Hon. HAMILTON FISH, of New York, has been appointed and confirmed Secretary of State in his place. VAN BUREN was the first New Yorker appointed to this office, the next was WILLIAM L. MARCY, and the third was WILLIAM H. SEWARD, who is followed by HAMILTON FISH.

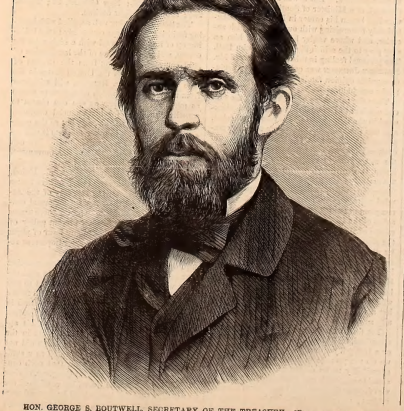
MR. FISH is a native of this city, where he was born in 1809. On his mother's side he is descended from PETER STUYVESANT, the last Dutch Governor of New Amsterdam. His father was the late Colonel NICHOLAS FISH. He was graduated at Columbia College, and subsequently entered upon the study of law, in which he would have acquired a position of eminence had not the management of a very large family estate monopolized so much of his time and attention. He entered political life in 1837 as a Whig member of our State Legislature. In 1842 he was elected to Congress from the Sixth District in this city. In 1846 he was nominated for Lieutenant-Governor, but was defeated. A similar nomination, two years later, led to his election by a majority of 30,000. In 1848 he was elected Governor. He served in the United States Senate from 1851 to 1857. He is a good Republican; and his personal character, his social position, and his ripe culture render him peculiarly well fitted for the position with which he has been honored.

THE case of MR. STEWART terminated in his resignation, and in the subsequent appointment of HON. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL as Secretary of the Treasury.

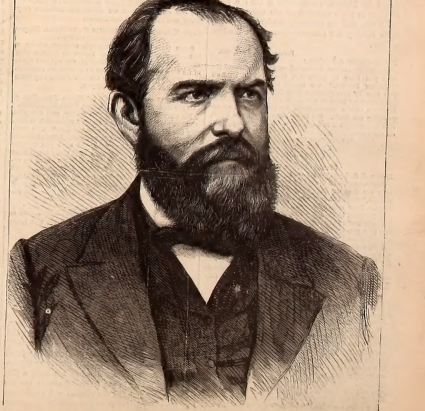
MR. BOUTWELL was born in Brookline, Massachusetts, January 28, 1818. His circumstances debarred him from a collegiate education. He was originally devoted to agricultural pursuits, but afterward abandoned these, and became a trader in Groton, first as an apprentice, then as a trader, and finally as a proprietor. His leisure time, meanwhile, was devoted to the perfection of his education. Thus his attention was attracted toward the legal profession, which he adopted, and in which he achieved a remarkable success. He was elected to the Massachusetts Legislature in 1842, where he served for seven successive years. In 1851 he was elected Governor of his native State, a position which he held for two terms. In 1860 he was a member of the State Constitutional Convention. He was a Bank Commissioner for two years, Secretary of the Board of Education eleven years, and a member of the Board of Overseers of Harvard College for six years. In 1861 he was a member of the celebrated Peace Congress, which failed to arrest the Southern movement. In June, 1862, he was appointed Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This position he resigned the following year to take a seat in the House, to which he has been three times re-elected. He has ably supported every prominent measure of the Republican party, and in the matter of impeaching President JOHNSON he was in advance of his compatriots. He is said to be a very strong advocate of a "protectionist" tariff. Pleasant and affable in his manners, he is an impressive speaker, and he has had a very large influence in controlling the counsels of his party.

HON. HAMILTON FISH, SECRETARY OF STATE.—[PHOT. BY W. KURZ, 805 & 807 BROADWAY.]

WE give also on our first page a portrait of HON. JOHN A. J. CRESSWELL, the new Postmaster-General. He was born at Port Deposit, Maryland, November 18, 1828. He graduated at Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, in 1850, and immediately after commenced the practice of law in his native State. In 1861 he was elected to the Lower House of the State Legislature. During the following year he served as Adjutant-General of the State, and while so serving was elected a Representative from Maryland to the Thirty-eighth Congress. In 1864 he was a delegate to the Baltimore Convention. In 1865 he was elected to the United States Senate for the unexpired term of HON. T. H. HICKS, who died during that session. He took a prominent part in the important debates of this session, contributing materially to strengthen the hands of the Republicans. Next to General RAWLINS he is the youngest member in the new Cabinet.



HON. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.—[PHOT. BY BRADY.]



HON. JOHN A. J. CRESSWELL, POSTMASTER-GENERAL.—[PHOT. BY BRADY.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1869.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO. ON the 16th of January, 1869, the following letter was published in the London Athenæum:

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 1, 1869.

We beg leave to call the attention of English authors and publishers to the following simple statement of facts which concern them no less than ourselves:

In accordance with our custom when publishing English books to make, if possible, a special arrangement with the author, or otherwise to lay aside a portion of the profits arising from our publication for his use, we entered into an agreement with MR. DICKENS' publishers to reprint an American edition of his "Great Britain." This was as far back as May, 1868, and immediately thereafter we made public announcement of the fact that it was forthcoming. It was published in December. A few weeks previous to the appearance, however, and some five or six months after we ourselves had announced the book, the MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, who made public advertisement of their were about to issue it. They had been already sufficiently notified of our intention to republish "Great Britain" "as soon as we became aware of their purpose we informed them by letter of our arrangement with the author. The MESSRS. HARPER, however, persisted in their determination; and, as a consequence, MR. DICKENS'S work, bearing their imprint and offered at a merely nominal price, is now before the trade. Of course the author's anticipated profits, no less than our own, will be precluded by a proceeding so directly in contravention of the courtesies of literature, and we have calculated, if persisted in, to destroy the remuneration to which foreign authors are equitably entitled.

A similar course to that above-mentioned was, we regret to say, pursued by the house in question on the appearance of MR. TROLLOPE'S "North America;" and the unremunerative price at which that work was published by the MESSRS. HARPER destroyed our profits listed by the American publisher. The author himself, and, of course, prevented the sale of our own edition, which otherwise would have accrued to him from the edition published by us.

As our object in making this communication is simply to place ourselves right before the public, we refrain from entering on the facts now presented. Whatever injury may result to English authors and publishers, should such practices become the rule instead of the exception, the responsibility will not rest upon us.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

The avowed object of this letter is to "place ourselves right before the public;" in other words, to present themselves to public attention as scrupulously honorable publishers in contrast with the MESSRS. HARPER, whom this letter accuses of violating the courtesies of the trade; and that the public judgment may be fully informed, we subjoin the whole correspondence.

From this we think it appears:

1st. That when the MESSRS. HARPER began the printing of the book they were entirely ignorant of the intention of MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO. to publish it.

2d. That MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO. did not make use of the ordinary and recognized channel of the trade to announce their intention.

3d. That the MESSRS. HARPER did not persist in their determination to publish, but offered to withdraw upon condition that the letter of MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO. was printed in this country, and upon payment of the small expense already incurred.

The allusion to BULWER'S novels in the letter of the MESSRS. HARPER is due to the fact that, notwithstanding the mutually satisfactory arrangement between LADY LYTTON and the MESSRS. HARPER, his works have been republished by MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO.; a proceeding in plain violation of the courtesies of the trade, and the necessary tendency of which is to destroy the remuneration of the foreign author.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 4, 1868.

MESSRS. Harper & Brothers:

GENTLEMEN,—The Nation of yesterday announces that you have in press MR. WENTWORTH DILKE'S "Greater Britain." We would respectfully apprise you that by arrangement with MR. DICKENS' English publishers we have received the early sheets and electrotypes of the illustrations, for the purpose of republishing the book. We have stereotyped the book, and will publish it in a few days. We pay a copyright on our sales.

We are, dear Sirs,
Yours truly,
(Sgd.) J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

MESSRS. J. B. Lippincott & Co.:

GENTLEMEN,—In reply to yours of yesterday we can only say that we duly announced DILKE'S "Greater Britain," and have commenced the stereotyping of the work. We now maintain the distinction which we intended to publish it.

Under these circumstances we think it no more than fair that you should pay us the expenses we have incurred, should we withdraw.

But, before we can consent to a withdrawal, we beg to inquire whether your edition is printed in this country from stereotype plates made in this country.

And, while we think of it, allow us to ask whether your edition of BULWER'S novels is printed in this country?

Yours, very truly,
(Sgd.) HARPER & BROTHERS.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7, 1868.

MESSRS. Harper & Brothers:

GENTLEMEN,—Yours of the 5th is received, and in reply we have to say that we announced "Greater Britain" as soon as MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW & SON'S Publishers' Circular, and have since kept the announcement public to as great an extent as we thought could be at all necessary for the information of the trade. We stereotyped the work at our own office, and have it printing. The only announcement we have seen now of your proposed edition is that in the "London Scotsman" of the 1st instant of December 1.

We print our edition of BULWER from plates which we purchased of a stereotype firm which has made them on his own account with the view of farming them out.

We believe we have answered all the inquiries of your letter, and have only to add that we receive the early sheets of "Greater Britain" from the author, and have agreed to pay a copyright therefor. It seems to us that we have done every thing in the matter that can reasonably be expected of us; have we not?

Truly yours,
(Sgd.) J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, Dec. 9, 1868.

MESSRS. J. B. Lippincott & Co.:

GENTLEMEN,—We have yours of yesterday. We daily announced "Greater Britain" from the 5th of January, in the Philadelphia Advertiser of the city, which we conduct in the Associated Advertiser of the city, which has been for many years considered by the trade the official paper for announcements of this class, so as to prevent the occurrence of difficulties of this character.

We presume that your announcement "as long ago as May 1" was made before the work was received by you, and not in the order we have referred to.

Under the circumstances we think that our suggestion of the 5th is the fair solution of our present mutual misapprehension.

We frankly say that your explanation in regard to the position of BULWER'S novels is entirely satisfactory to the act of discourtesy toward us on your part.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) HARPER & BROTHERS.

The correspondence here ended.

That MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO. may be enabled still further "to place themselves right before the public," we subjoin some extracts from a correspondence, which will show:

1st. That in September of last year MR. DILKE was arranged with MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO., of London, to publish from early sheets and electrotypes SIR SAMUEL BAKER'S "Cast up by the Sea."

2d. That in October MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO. were informed of this arrangement by MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.

3d. That, in error of shipment, the electrotypes were sent to MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO., instead of the MESSRS. HARPER.

4th. That in November MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO. received them, and, knowing that they were intended for the MESSRS. HARPER'S edition of the work, withheld them; and in January published the book themselves, at a low price.

5th. That not until a month after the issue of their edition did MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO. inform the MESSRS. HARPER that they had in their possession electrotypes which they knew, when they received them, were intended for the MESSRS. HARPER, to enable them to publish their edition in accordance with SIR SAMUEL BAKER'S English publishers.

From Messrs. Macmillan & Co. to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, dated September 25, 1868.

In reply to your letter of 1st inst., proposing two alternatives for SIR SAMUEL BAKER'S book, "Cast up by the Sea," we choose the first, viz., to deliver the early sheets and electros free of expense and sufficiently in advance of English publication to secure a simultaneous issue in America; and a royalty of 10 per cent. on your retail price for all copies of the work sold for five years after publication.

In conformity with this arrangement you shall very shortly have copies of the sheets, and the electros, which are for full-page illustrations, will follow.

From Messrs. Harper & Brothers to Messrs. Macmillan & Co., dated October 2, 1868.

* * * Though "Cast up by the Sea" has been republished in London, we have not yet received from you proof of the shipment of the electros. Your last letter on the subject (Nov. 26, 1868) says that you have sent them on the other early next week." Blanc then we have heard nothing of them.

The time of this delay and inattention has been the prior publication of the book by J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., of Philadelphia, whose advertisement, from this morning's paper, we inclose herewith.

From Messrs. Macmillan & Co. to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, dated October 16, 1868.

We have heard with much annoyance that the parcel of electros of illustrations for SIR SAMUEL BAKER'S book has been sent to Messrs. Lippincott instead of to you. * * * We can only say that we regret the accident very much, and shall delay it has caused.

From Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, dated October 19, 1868.

Some time since we received, without advice, a box containing electrotypes. Believing it came from Messrs. Macmillan & Co., we advised them of the receipt of its arrival, and asked them to give us an explanation, (first being due to them,) before we advised them that the box was intended for you.

From Mr. George Lillie Craik (of Messrs. Macmillan & Co.) to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, dated Nov. 21, 1868.

My partner is writing to you to-day, and will give you the particulars you desire in regard to the sending the electros of "Cast up by the Sea." The business has vexed and annoyed us much. Lippincott was well aware that we had arranged with you months before; and we can not believe that there could have been any doubt in the matter from the being on accident, the electros going to them. I blame Lippincott —having had such a transaction in hand of Octo-ber, that we had arranged with you—that he did not act fairly and transfer to you at once a package obviously intended for you.

In the words of MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., "We refrain from comment on the facts now presented."

THE CABINET.

THE changes in the Cabinet necessitated by the resignation of MR. STEWART and of MR. WASHBURNE and the nomination of General RAWLINS have been favorably received by the country and by the party.

MR. HAMILTON FISH, the Secretary of State, is a well-known citizen of spotless character and of long political experience, with a certain solid good sense and just instinct which have ranged him always upon the side of liberty and progress in our politics. He has not been a Republican leader in the technical sense; but has always commanded the respect and confidence of the party. He is of the same temperament as MR. SEWARD, and will be a wise, safe, sound and firm foreign policy undoubtedly coincide.

MR. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, the Secretary of the Treasury, carries to his Department the highest personal character, great ability, and long and varied experience in public affairs. As we said in the case of MR. STEWART, and as must be said in that of any man in the country who should be summoned to the Treasury, his especial qualifications for a sagacious and successful administration can be proved only by experience.

MR. BOUTWELL believes firmly in the necessity of the ascendency of the Republican party to the welfare of the country; but he is unfailingly and profoundly persuaded that nothing will commend that party to continued support more than capacity, industry, fidelity, and economy in the public service. While, therefore, he will undoubtedly prefer Republicans in his appointments, he will not accept mere "radicalism" as a receipt in full of the fitness of a candidate.

General RAWLINS has been the Chief-of-Staff to the armies of the United States, and his military career has been conspicuous and illustrious. The President knows perfectly the man and the duties of the office to which he has called him—and no appointment could command more satisfaction.

If the Cabinet as now arranged does not prove to be what the President hopes we may be very sure that it will be changed. But we believe that it will not think it necessary to lose the services of a man so thoroughly able and so acceptable to the best judgment of the country as Attorney-General HOAR merely because he is from the same State with the Secretary of the Treasury.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY.

THE Diplomatic Corps in Washington were recently introduced to the President "in their elegant costumes of diplomacy." BARON VON GEROLT, the Prussian Minister, made the speech of congratulation, to which the President replied, heartily thanking their Excellencies, and adding that it would be his endeavor to maintain the relations of peace and friendship with all nations that this country now enjoys. He will receive suggestions at any time on foreign relations; and it is evident, in the first place, that their harmony is not likely to be marred by any eccentric or precipitate conduct upon the part of the Secretary of State. That, also, is equally true of the President. But it is no less evident that the President's foreign policy is not that which the people of the country is. The treaty has never been considered upon its merits. It was a great deal better treaty than has been supposed in this country; and, as we think, was in many of its leading English journals conceded, virtually involved a surrender of the English position. But it was regarded here as the work of MR. REVERDY JOHNSON, a Democrat, by whom had begun his career in England by ostentatiously fraternizing with our chief English enemies, and whose vanity had betrayed him an easy prey to the subtle diplomacy of John Bull. The personal feeling in this country toward MR. REVERDY JOHNSON was quite enough to prejudice public opinion fatally against any treaty he might conclude.

Then the sore sense of injury which the official conduct of England during the war has excited in the American people is wholly unhealed, and this the English seem never to have comprehended. The evident eagerness to see our destruction which the English people showed in the crisis—the more deeply than the pecuniary losses it occasioned. The refusal to await the arrival of MR. ADAMS in London; the protestations of open building and equipping of rebel privateers in England; their hospitable reception in British ports; the evasive stomachaches of the Government; the open cheers at the escape of the Alabama; the belt of fire around the globe from burning American ships kindled by British torches; the base and malignant sneers of the British press, and the unfriendly words of leading British statesmen, all combined with the hereditary hostility to England, have produced a feeling in the United States which will apparently be satisfied by nothing but a virtual apology and offer of such indemnity as we may demand.

In fact this feeling, as we have more than once remarked, really leads to no settlement but war, or a tranquil waiting for revenge in kind. If we do not propose to allow the question of responsibility to be discussed, and require England to concede it as a preliminary to any treaty, the subject of indemnity remains but to verify the claims. But the treaty begins by referring the question to arbitration, which our feeling interprets as leaving to arbitration the injury to our honor. Plainly this is an end of the whole matter, and the merits of the treaty itself have not been considered. That the feeling of this country of which we speak is correct in supposing that the treaty leaves the responsibility to arbitration is proved by MR. SEWARD'S and MR. JOHNSON'S speech at Manchester on the 28th of February, in which he expressly says so. But when he says that "we are willing" to take this course, he exactly misrepresents the fact; for it is precisely our unwillingness that has defeated his treaty.

Now the President's view of the subject is probably very clear and decided. The report in his expression of opinion some weeks since may have been incorrect as to terms, but very possibly represents his feeling. If it does, the definition of proper negotiation will apparently be a preliminary acknowledgment of responsibility by the British Government. Rather than concede it, that Government would probably take the risk of leaving the question open. But the risk is tremendous. Englishmen must see that, in case of any war, their commerce would be destroyed by a swarm of American Alabamas, and that it is for the incalculable advantage of England that arbitration should hold her responsible. They believe that. It is the sole better sense of England. The people of that country will surely not insist upon the preposterous principle that a neutral can suffer privateers to be built in her yards to ravage the commerce of an ally; or that belligerent maritime rights can be granted to a belligerent without a port. Is the British Government ready to do directly what this letter sense would approve if done indirectly? That is the point which the new Administration will probably propose.

OUR PRESENT CONDITION.

THE statement made by the Clearing-House on Saturday, March 6, as compared with the preceding weekly statement, shows the following exchanges: Decrease, $71,477; increase; specie, $1,345,969 decrease; legal-tenders, $1,689,685 decrease; net deposits, $2,611,738 decrease; circulation, $37,004 increase. This is partly but appears to be unfavorable. This is partly due to the efforts of speculators in this market to prevent a rise in the securities of the Government, partly to the transfer of funds to the South to pay for cotton. The return for the week ending March 13 shows the following variations, as compared with the week of the 6th: exchanges, decrease; specie, $2,127,693 decrease; legal-tenders, $494,256 increase; net deposits, $211,979 decrease; circulation, $84,614 increase, which indicates some, but not much, improvement.

The market for cotton (middling) on the 6th was as follows: Upland Florida, 29½; Mobile, 29½; New Orleans, 29½; Texas, 28½. Although it was somewhat more active the effort to "gulvanize the market" did not succeed. It appears that owing to the low comparative price in Manchester on the cotton goods as compared with raw cotton some manufacturers had failed, others had partially stopped work, and there appeared to be a general feeling of anxiety for a short time. The anomaly, therefore, of a better market here for middlings than in Manchester exists. The market on the 13th was as follows: Upland Florida, 29¾; New Orleans, 29½; Mobile, 28¾; Texas, 29¼; showing a slight decline.

The South will be being well supplied with banking facilities, has an eye constantly to the building up of its finances, and with a high price for cotton, and the advantage of the legislation of gold contracts resulting from the dictum of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of BRONSON vs. RHODES, will withdraw from those contracts which will insure coin as much gold and silver as she can obtain to constitute a basis for her financial dealings. This at the outset will be easy, but as the South sees cause to do so, and in other words it will assume the shape of a sweet contest. We can not be indifferent spectators of this movement, as it gives a solidity to that great staple which is the ultimate stability of the whole Union. With the Pacific States and the Southern States sound in this respect, the recovery of the Atlantic States from their present abnormal condition must be facilitated. Our Southern States have only to be firm in their present policy of preferring gold and silver to paper, and they will soon accomplish the most important results for them and for all.

The resolutions offered by MR. SCHENCK that our bonds shall be deemed payable in gold except where the stipulation is expressed to pay them in currency, and declaring that all future contracts payable in gold shall be enforced in accordance with the decision of the action of President JOHNSON, who omitted to give them his approval; but what fell from the Court in the case referred to, although the question did not arise in the case, has been accepted as a sufficient adjudication of the point that such contracts are legal. The present Congress, in view of this decision of the Court, has reaffirmed the resolution that our bonds shall be deemed payable in gold, and omitted, we think erroneously, the portion relating to gold contracts.

The expediency of legalizing them results from the fact that the case of BRONSON against RHODES was a case which arose upon a bond and mortgage executed prior to the Legal-Tender Act of February, 1862; and although the bond by its terms was made payable in "gold and silver coin, lawful money of the United States," the decision of that case does not necessarily involve the decision of any case upon a contract made since. A majority of the court, however, in the opinion given, went to the extent of declaring that a contract made since payable in gold would be binding. This action of the court was due in great part to the omission of Congress to take any steps toward a return to specie payments, and was accepted by the country as correct, owing to the strong interest felt in various quarters in the legalization of gold contracts. Californians, the Southern States, and all merchants who kept gold accounts had a strong desire to have their transactions, which stood, as they supposed, on no other basis than the honor of the parties, placed upon the firm basis of law. They justly reasoned that, if their contracts in gold were made to stand on this footing, that gold would be obtained to perform them, and that it would consequently be held in this country.

In advance of the promulgation of the opinion delivered by Mr. CHASE, the only interest which existed for retaining gold and silver in the United States was that which arose from the act requiring duties to be paid in gold, and the act declaring that interest on the Five-twenties and Ten-forties shall be paid in that medium. The friends of the country to hold the precious metals within our own limits comply with the exception of the Pacific coast, limited to these wants. The residue was expelled; but now, as there is a deep interest for retaining the amount required for performing contracts made in that medium, the opinion in question, although strictly what is called by lawyers obiter dictum, may be regarded as the first step in the direction of the necessary reform in our currency. It will be expedient to regard this new feature in this light, and we regret to see the decrease for two days announced in the Clearing-House of $8,957,707 in the specie account. Every soundly-managed bank will take notice of the gold required by the new policy; but as we are not likely to have a sound policy inaugurated in such institutions, men of wealth who feel an obligation to aid a return to specie payments should be willing to do what the generality of banks seem disposed to omit, and obtain and specially guard gold. It will be a mistake to suppose that our legal tenders can be made equal to gold, except by such aid. This advantage would result from the condition, not of the Treasury merely, but of the country at large, and must be the work of time and improved strength. Banks like the Chemical and Bank of America are favorably situated for taking the initiative in a movement which will by degrees place all sound institutions on the specie basis. There is always danger of a relapse into the condition of a currency less lessly irredeemable, if the policy in the opposite direction is allowed to slacken. The opportunity for permanent improvement in the legalizing of gold contracts should not be lost, and should secure the constant attention of Mr. SECRETARY. An office in New York for redeeming the notes of interior banks, as recommended by Mr. CLARK when Controller of the Treasury, would exercise a powerful influence in the right direction.

There is much in the situation now to inspire confidence, not only as to the present position of trade, but also as to the future. When GRANT and COLFAX were nominated, the cry by the Republican, the other by the Democratic party, we had reached the point where the roads fork. Instead of taking that which led to the payment of the bonds in currency and to consequent repudiation, it is an inexpressible relief to know that the road toward specie payments, to honor and ultimate success, was taken. The tone of the inaugural of President GRANT will be approved by the outside world; but what is of more importance, instead of sinking down into the condition of acknowledged inferiority, which would have resulted from the acceptance and ascendency of the repudiating platform, we encounter to-day many signs of proud of the unequivocal honesty of the Administration.

THE REVOKED PARDONS.

ONE of President GRANT's first acts was to revoke the pardons of notorious offenders issued by his predecessor just as he was leaving office. And, indeed, why President JOHNSON did not confer a general jail-delivery is not clear. If there was a thing that his late lamentable Excellency enjoyed, it was pardoning counterfeiters and whisky thieves. His sympathy for the latter has been declared to be explicable, but that for the counterfeiters was a deliberate blow at the poorest people in the country. It is the old apple-women and poor widows and the hard day-laborers who suffer from spurious money—not the capitalists, who can detect it, or who can endure the loss. But there was probably an inward necessity in the case. Mr. JOHNSON was such an intolerable sham himself that he had a resistless sympathy for counterfeiters. There was indeed no reason, if he had the right to issue his Christmas proclamation, why Mr. JOHNSON should not have celebrated his closing of the White House doors by opening those of every State Prison in the country, and by a general immunity to those who were as yet unaccused of their crimes. There was, in fact, no reason why his character or career why he did not commit any folly whatever.

The authority of President GRANT to revoke the undelivered pardons of his predecessor is denied in some quarters. But it was not Andrew JOHNSON, it was the President of the United States who signed the pardons. If, then, for any reason he changes his mind before the pardon takes effect, he may properly withhold it. Signing and sealing a pardoning a man believed to be unjustly imprisoned and before the pardon the President has evidence that he has been deceived, and that the delinquent deserves tenfold severer punishment than he is receiving, may he not order the pardon not to be delivered?

It is stated that when Mr. JOHNSON signed the pardons he did all that he could do, namely, he expressed his will to relieve the prisoners. But if it were not Mr. JOHNSON but the President who did this, and the successor of the President's will changes, the President may properly revoke that order as he may any other. The CONSTITUTION, of course, completes a permanency of the executive power, whatever becomes of the person exercising it; and any act of executive authority not yet accomplished may by the same authority be revoked. If the Executive, on the 3d of March, had prepared a message to Congress recommending war with England, but the Secretary had not yet delivered it, would the Executive, on the 4th of March, whether the same or a different person, be obliged to send it? If not, certainly President GRANT is not bound to complete the unaccomplished acts of President JOHNSON.

SENATOR HALE'S BRIBERY BILL.

THE Report of Senator HALE upon the alleged corruption in regard to Railway legislation in this State should be very carefully read for illustrations of the hopelessness of reaching and punishing bribery under the present laws. The Report establishes conclusively that large sums of money were corruptly spent in the sessions of 1868 by those who were interested in Railway legislation; that lobbyists were thus enriched; that there is no proof of the actual bribery of any member, the Assemblymen not being mentioned, and that the charges in the Tribune and other newspapers were made upon rumor only and without evidence. The Tribune retorts that the Committee of Inquiry could not be concealed, and that only fools will believe that the Lobby pocketed more than the Legislature.

Whatever may be the faith of fools or the relative guilt of the Lobby and the members of the Legislature, the public opinion of the State is firmly persuaded that there is immense corruption at Albany. Every person familiar with what is called practical politics undoubtedly knows of the offer of bribes to affect votes, and of the payment of very large sums of money to prevent or to promote legislation; and every body knows that such a system can have but one result, and that the most disastrous possible. But under the existing law nothing is done to remedy the difficulty, and nothing is practicable. As Senator HALE most truly says, both parties, and the whole community, are involved in guilt, are now liable to the same punishment. He has, therefore, introduced a bill, of which the Committee recommend the passage, by which the giver of a bribe which is accepted shall be exempt from prosecution. This provision offers the means of obtaining proof, and it tends directly to the destruction of the policy of making a briber wholly in the power of the bribed. Whoever wishes to bribe must be very sure indeed of his man.

The same general provision was introduced by Senator THOMAS into Mr. ODDYKE, who submitted an admirable Report upon the subject, and who has since been tried for the crime charged with the crime it is provided that accused persons may testify in their own behalf. Such a change is at least one step toward an imperative reform. It will, we are very sure, be hastened by the Report of Senator HALE.

THE MAN ON HORSEBACK.

AMONG the other horrible spectres that have risen in the Democratic imagination with the inauguration of the General who unconditionally subdued the rebellion is Mr. CALEB CUSHING'S "Man on Horseback." In one of that gentleman's speeches before the war he admonished us that if we did not submit immediately to the will of Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS, Mr. BENJAMIN, Mr. MASON, Mr. SLIDELL, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. WIGFALL, and their obedient, humble servants, "the Democracy of the North"—if we continued to prate of liberty and equal rights and civilization when those eminent gentlemen, our natural rulers, had intimated their wish to flog and multiply their slaves in peace—why, one willful disobedience could end in one thing only—"a mounted Emperor on horseback to relieve the dissonant din of the raving ideologies of the hour."

Mr. G. P. R. JAMES was never content with less than two horsemen, but Mr. CALEB CUSHING is too thought that one would serve our turn.

This was the way in which the Democratic orators tried to fill with the consciousness of a common sense of the American people. To compel us to yield to the despotism of a man-selling oligarchy they threatened us with a military despot. To persuade us that the residuary legatees of that oligarchy ought to be intrusted with the Government they now announce that General GRANT is the man on horseback of Mr. CALEB CUSHING'S vision.

Mr. CALEB CUSHING was what the Democracy called "a statesman." Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR was another. The country is respectfully invited to deplore the absence of such "statesmen" and "statesmanship" from the present Administration.

MR. STEWART.

THE delay in consequence of the ineligibility of Mr. STEWART to the office of Secretary was an opportunity of making one of those noble propositions which may be distinctively described as American. Undoubtedly the honor offered him was great. The position itself is honorable. The confidence of General GRANT is an honor. But the universal feeling that the public service would immediately suffer by his appointment was in the highest degree honorable. But if all these things were honorable, certainly not less honorable was the intention.

To Mr. STEWART personally the affair has been wholly creditable. When his name was put into the Senate, amidst the outcry of surprise and contempt among cliques and sets, there was no question of his fitness, no doubt of the signal efficiency and economy with which he would conduct the business of his Department. If Mr. STEWART is grateful to the President for the honor that he wished to confer upon him, he can hardly be less so for the expression of public confidence in his ability which the President's intention evoked.

NOTES.

OUR friend the Easy Chair of Harper's Magazine, whose views are singularly harmonious with our own, lately spoke of a masterly copy of TURNER'S famous picture of the old Temeraire, by T. C. FARRAR of this city. Mr. FARRAR'S fidelity and skill in such work are remarkable. His sympathetic study in the school of MILLAIS and HOLMAN HUNT has admirably trained his power of patient elaboration, and his copies that we have seen deserve all the praises they have received. MISS FARRAR goes abroad early in April, and will execute commissions for copies of TURNER or of other masters whose works seldom cross the sea. His studio is at 1267 Broadway, and we have no doubt will promise the greatest satisfaction to those who may intrust orders to him.

MR. ALEXANDER MACMILLAN, the English publisher, was in this country a few months since, and upon his return read at Cambridge, in England, where he resides, a lecture upon the Yankees, in which he gives his impressions of that people. His observations are friendly and lively. But MACMILLAN had the sincerest wish to produce a good international feeling between his own country and ours, and if the spirit of his judgments should universally prevail it would be a dead cover for an Alabama treaty serious to impair our mutual peaceful relations. The lecture of Mr. MACMILLAN is privately printed; but we are very sure his beaucoup left the hall with a more intelligent sympathy for their Yankee brethren.

THE Senate has made an admirable choice of President pro tem. in Senator HENRY B. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island. He is a man of great political sagacity and experience, entirely familiar with parliamentary rule, and of urbane manners. He has been always in public life, and early reached the highest political honors of his native State. Efficient, diligent, and courteous in the discharge of all duties, the honor conferred upon him by his fellow-Senators is the highest tribute of their respect and esteem.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 8:

In the Senate, Rev. Dr. Newman, a Methodist clergyman, was chosen chaplain.

March 9:

In the House, Rev. J. G. Butler was chosen chaplain.—The Tenure-of-Office bill was again repealed, with only 16 dissentient votes.

March 10:

In the Senate, the bill to repeal the Tenure-of-Office Act was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

March 11:

In the House, Mr. Butler's resolution for a joint committee on Indian affairs was considered and finally passed by a vote of 91 to 47.—A concurrent resolution for an adjournment on Friday, the 26th inst., was agreed to.—A resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to report a bill to prevent frauds in naturalization, and to secure the surrender of fraudulent naturalization papers already issued was adopted.—Mr. Schenck introduced his public credit bill, and the second section being stricken out the bill was passed by a vote of 97 to 48.

SENATE COMMITTEES.

Mr. Sumner remains at the head of the Foreign Relations; Mr. Sherman, of the Finances; Mr. Chandler, of the Commerce; Mr. Cameron, of Agriculture; Mr. Wilson, of Military Affairs; Mr. Conkling, of Naval Affairs; Mr. Trumbull, of the Judiciary; Mr. Ramsay, of Post-Offices; Mr. Howard, of Public Lands; Mr. Pomeroy, of Indian Affairs; Mr. Edmunds, of Claims; Mr. Howe, of Mines; Mr. Willey, of Patents; Mr. Bowden, of Pacific Railroads; Mr. Morrill, of Education; Mr. Conkling, of Revision of the Laws; Mr. Corbett, of Engrossed Bills; Mr. Anthony, on Printing; Mr. Fenton succeeds Mr. Morrill, of Manufactures; Mr. Cragin, of Revolutionary Claims; Mr. Morton succeeds Mr. Sprague, of Mississippi and Florida affairs; Mr. Sprague takes the place of Mr. Henderson at the head of Indian Affairs; Mr. Edmunds succeeds Mr. Cragin, of Pensions; Mr. Chandler, chairman of Pensions.

Senator Anthony, of Rhode Island, was on the 5th elected President pro tem. of the Senate.

Hon. E. R. Wanton Smith has been nominated and confirmed Minister to France.

The New Hampshire election on the 9th resulted in a Republican victory, Onslow Stearns having been elected Governor by a majority of 1600, larger than was given the party last year. All the Republican nominees for Congress were elected.

The Georgia Republican State Convention met in Atlanta on the 9th. It organized on the 10th, and the State Legislature was asked that Congress would provide for the right enfranchisement of the colored people, reasserting the persons elected to the General Assembly last April. It is understood that Legrand W. Perkins will be offered, who declared Rogers, because the latter had been the principal witness against him, was a liar and perjurer, and that he was tried and convicted in Paterson, New Jersey.

The Massachusetts Senate ratified the Fifteenth Amendment on the 11th.

John M. Binckley, Solicitor of Internal Revenue, has resigned, and will go to Europe.

A singular statement has been made by a man, named Charles Cunningham, who was arrested last summer on a charge of burglary, and committed to the jail at Morristown, in default of bail. He was married. He declared that Lemuel Ely, who was also in jail, had offered, when he recovered Rogers, because the latter had been the principal witness against him, to get rid of Rogers, if Cunningham would swear that he was tried and convicted in Paterson, New Jersey.

The Massachusetts Senate ratified the Fifteenth Amendment on the 11th.

The Georgia Republican State Convention met on the 9th at Reformatory, and organized on the 10th, and the State Legislature on the following day. The Democratic hall had to be cleared by the police, so violent that the hall had to be cleared by the police, so violent that the Democratic members assembled and nominated H. H. Wells for Governor.

All the Republican Board of Council Commissioners, except Mr. Williams, were removed by the Democratic Mayor of Brooklyn on the 9th. Mr. Factor has subscribed $10,000 for the endowment of a Professorship of Physiology in Cincinnati College, and Mr. Lenox, New York, on condition that the citizens of Utica raise a similar amount, will endow a Chair of Geology in Hamilton College.

On the 8th, as some men were cutting a road through the snow-clad hills near Panton Corners, Vermont, they came upon the frozen bodies of Mrs. Hannah Bingham and her two children, and her grandson. The old lady had fallen, overcome by the cold and snow, only a mile from a house. She found, through the windows of which a light was shining, the bodies of her little daughter had attempted to help her mother, and her grandson within two rods of the window. The bodies of the deceased bore evidence of distance on his hands and knees. The old lady had been a widow for many years. Her husband was a soldier of 1812.

The night of March 5 was a terrible one for Chicago. Figures were given in attempting to put one of them, on Canal Street, at $100,000 damage.

A boiler explosion occurred at Rochester on the 9th, and three men were killed.

President Grant on Sunday, the 14th, occupied the front pew of the Rev. Dr. Sunderland's Metropolitan Methodist Church, Washington. He is a Methodist.

The Pittsburgh Annual Conference passed the Arkansas Senate on the 13th by a vote of 19 to 17.

Mr. Beatty, formerly a State Senator, and United States Senator from Kentucky, died in Louisville on the 11th.

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN.

On the 1st of March Mr. Gladstone, in a brilliant speech, lasting fully four hours, laid before the Parliament his bill for the disestablishment of the Irish Church.

SPAIN.

Judging from the debate in the Cortes on the 8th, the Republicans favor the elevation of Montpensier to the throne. They declare that the Duke should be appointed Generalissimo of Marshal. To the General Prim is attributed the success of the elections, and he is regarded as the Republican monarchy, with Montpensier as a regency of the Queen. Prim, however, will have the power over the whole matter, and deprecated the pressure brought to bear upon the Cortes by the Revolutionary party. The Spanish Government has telegraphed to General Prim to suppress the recent insurrection in Cuba, condemned to death in Cuba. The Minister of Finance has announced that the Government has power to raise 28,000 men. Minister Sagasta stated that the Government would not grant the pardon. Fifty-four articles were passed by the Cortes to discontinue military conscription.

Religious liberty has been created among the Roman Catholic clergy by the formation of Protestant worship in Madrid.

PRUSSIA.

On the 26th of February Count Bismarck accepted an invitation to dine with George Bancroft at the American Embassy in Berlin on the 4th of March—the day of Grant's inauguration.

CUBA.

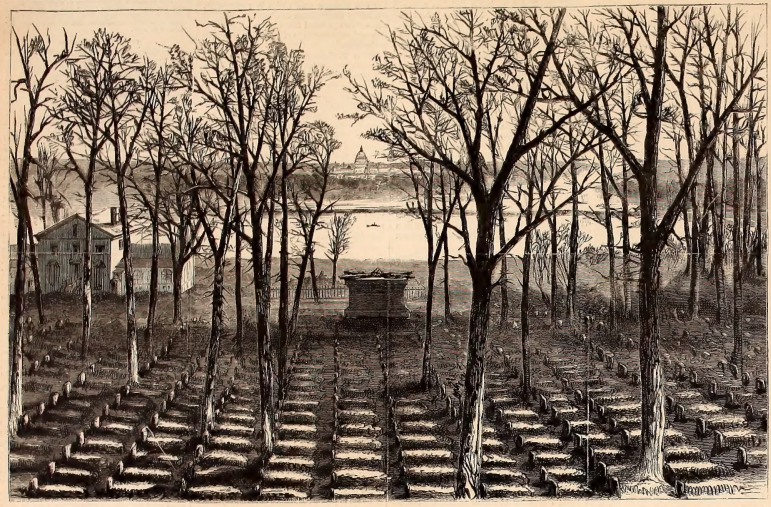
General Lesca, in his march from La Gnasaja to Puerto Prince, found the rebels, 4000 strong, intrenched on the Cubitas. A battle was fought, which, according to the Government reports, resulted in a victory for Lesca, the rebels losing 300 killed and wounded. In the Eastern Department many skirmishes are reported by those who carry the rebel flag, but whom the insurgents denounce as bandits. On the 9th the insurgent General Cubeo was shot by his captors.

The town of Mayari, the headquarters of the rebels in the Eastern Department, occupied by 3000 insurgents, is reported to be captured by the Government troops. The insurgents had intended to make after it and their entire force concentrate.

The Cuban Revolutionary Assembly, convened in Bayamo, has declared in favor of annexation to the United States, abolition of slavery, with indemnification to slaveholders sympathizing with the Cuban cause. The freedmen are to have the same rights and privileges as white men; they are also to bear arms.

MEXICO.

The rebels under Negrete have been defeated by Alatorre at Cuscala. Negrete himself had a narrow escape. The Mexican Government is confident of the speedy suppression of the revolt. Executions are frequent among them in Zacatecas. Ex-Governor Zarco, of Durango, charged with an attempt to assassinate President Juarez.



SOLDIERS' CEMETERY AT ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

ARLINGTON HEIGHTS CEMETERY.

IT is estimated that the number of graves filled by Union soldiers, dying in hospital or killed in battle, is over 300,000. The occupants of one-third of these are unknown. About 50,000 soldiers were drowned, or killed in battle and never buried, or occupy graves that have never been recognized.

A large number of our soldier dead rest in national cemeteries at Gettysburg, City Point, Chattanooga, Murfreesborough, and other places, where the burial-grounds have been carefully inclosed, and laid out with taste. In addition to these national cemeteries there are others which have sprung up at Washington and elsewhere by the accumulation of interments, chiefly from hospitals, and which have since been inclosed and partially cared for. Among these are the soldier cemeteries about Washington, including Arlington and Alexandria.

Our illustration shows the cemetery at Arlington Heights. The place is one crowded with sad and glorious memories. Here, in 1802, G. W. P. CUSTIS, the adopted son of WASHINGTON, built his mansion upon an estate of one thousand acres left him by his father. Across the Potomac not only the Capitol but also the other prominent buildings of Washington are distinctly visible from this eminence. ROBERT E. LEE, the noted Rebel General, came into the possession of this estate by his marriage with the daughter and heiress of Mr. CUSTIS. Soon after the war broke out the National forces took possession of the property for military purposes, and this appropriation of the estate still continues.

THE TOMB OF AARON BURR, PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY WM. R. HOWELL, 867 BROADWAY.—[SEE PAGE 198.]

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S

CHAPTER XXIX

AN UNLOOKED-FOR MEETING.

I COULD more easily record my sensations in the paroxysm of a fever than recall how I passed that night. I am aware that I wrote a long letter to my mother, and a longer to Sara, both to be dispatched in case ill befell me in my encounter. What I said to either, or how I said it, I know not.

No more can I explain why I put all my papers together in such fashion that they could be thrown into the fire at once, without leaving any the slightest, clew to trace me by. That secret, which I had affected to hold so cheaply, did in reality possess some strange fascination for me, and I desired to be a puzzle and an enigma even after I was dead.

It wanted one short hour of dawn when I had finished; but I was still too much excited to sleep. I knew how unfavorably I should come to the encounter before me with jarred nerves and the weariness of a night's watching; but it was too late now to help that; too late, besides, to speculate on what men would say of such a senseless deed, brought on, as I could not conceal from myself, by my hot temper. By the time I had taken my cold bath my nerves became more braced, and I scarcely felt a trace of fatigue or exhaustion. The gray morning was just breaking as I stole quietly down stairs and issued forth into the court-yard. A heavy fall of snow had occurred in the night, and an unbroken expanse of billowy whiteness spread out before me, save where, from a corner of the stable, some foot-tracks led toward the riding-school. I saw, therefore, that I was not the first at the tryst, and I hastened on in all speed.

Six or eight young men, closely muffled in furs, stood at the door as I came up, and gravely uncovered to me. They made way for me to pass in without speaking, and while stamping the snow from my boots, I said something about the cold of the morning; they muttered what might mean assent or the reverse, in a low, half-sullen tone, thankfor little invited to further remark.

For a few seconds they talked together in whispers, and then a tall, ill-favored fellow, with a deep scar from the cheek-bone to the upper lip, came abruptly up to me.

"Look here, young fellow," said he. "I am to act as your second, and though, of course, I'd like to know that the man I handled was a gentleman, I do not ask you to say anything about yourself that you prefer to keep back. I would only say that, if ugly consequences grow out of this stupid business, the blame must fall upon you. Your temper provoked it, is that not true?"

I nodded assent, and he went on:

"So far, all right. The next point is this. We are all to honor that, whatever happens, not a word or a syllable shall ever escape us. Do you agree to this?"

"I agree," said I, calmly.

"Give me your hand on it."

I gave him my hand, and as he held it in his own he said, with the faith of a gentleman, I will never reveal to my last day what shall pass here this morning."

I repeated the words after him, and we moved on into the school.

* * * * * * *
* * * * * * *
* * * * * * *

I had drawn my sofa in front of the fire, and stretching myself on it fell into a deep dreamless sleep. A sudden consciousness, and the excitement I had gone through, had so far worked upon me that I did not hear the opening of my door, nor the tread of a heavy man as he came forward and seated himself by the fire. It was only the cold touch of his fingers on the wrist as he felt my pulse that aroused me.

"Don't start—don't flurry yourself," said he, calmly, to me. "I am the doctor. I have been to see the others, and I promised to look in on you."

"How is he? Is it serious?"

"It will be a slow affair. It was an ugly thrust—all the small muscles pierced; but no internal mischief done."

"He will certainly recover then?"

"There is no reason why he should not. But where is this scratch of yours? Let me see it."

"It is a nothing, doctor—a mere nothing. Pray take no trouble about it."

"But I must. I have pledged myself to examine your wound; and I must keep my word."

"Surely these gentlemen are scarcely so very anxious about me, said I, in some pique. "Not one of them vouchsafed to see me safe home, though I had lost some blood and felt very faint."

"I did not say it was these gentlemen sent me here," said he, dryly.

"Then who else knew any thing about this business?"

"If you must know, then," said he, "it is the English Countess who is staying here, and whom I have been attending for the last week. How she came to hear of this affair I can not tell you, for I know it is a secret to the rest of the house; but she made me promise to come and see you, and, if there was nothing in your wound to forbid it, to bring you over to her dressing-room and present you to her. And now let me look at the injury."

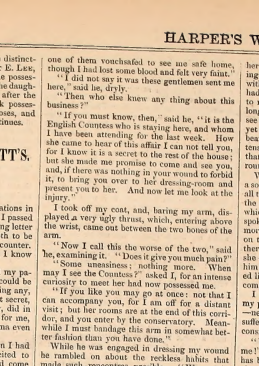
I took off my coat, and, baring my arm, displayed a very ugly thrust, which, entering above the wrist, came out between the two bones of the arm.

"Now I call this the worse of the two," said he, examining it. "Does it give you much pain?"

"Scarcely uneasiness; nothing more. When may I see the Countess?" asked I, for an intense curiosity to meet her had now possessed me.

"If you like you may go at once: not that I can accompany you, for I am off for a distant visit; but her rooms are at the end of this corridor, and you enter by the conservatory. Meanwhile I must bandage this arm in somewhat better fashion than you have done."

While he was engaged in dressing my wound he rambled on about the reckless habits that made such rencontres possible. "We are in the middle of the seventeenth century here, with all its barbarisms," said he. "These young fellows were vexed at seeing the notice you attracted; and that was to their thinking cause enough to send you off with a damaged lung or a manslaughter. It's all well, however, as long as Graf Hunyadi does not have to fight it. But if he should, he'll turn them out, every man of them, for this treatment of an Englishman.



"THIS BOY IS MY SON, HUNYADI."

"Then we must take care, Sir, that he does not hear of it," said I, half fiercely, and as though addressing my speech especially to himself.

"Not from me, certainly," said he. "My doctor's instincts always save me from such indiscretions."

"Is our Countess young, doctor?" asked I, half jocularly.

"Young and pretty, though one might say, too, she has been younger and prettier. If you dine below stairs to-day drink no wine, and get back to your sofa as soon as you can after dinner." With this caution he left me.

A heavy packet of letters had arrived from Fiume, containing, I surmised, some instructions for which I had written; but seeing that the address was in the cashier's handwriting I felt no impatience to break the seal.

I dressed myself with unusual care, though the pain of my arm made the process a very slow one; and at last set out to pay my visit. I passed along the corridor, through the conservatory, and found myself at a door at which I knocked twice. At last I turned the handle and entered a small but handsomely furnished drawing-room, about which books and newspapers lay scattered; and a small embroidery-frame near the fire showed where she who was engaged with that task had lately been seated. As I bent down to receive my cousin's curtsy I heard a lively clever copy of an altar-piece of Albert Durer a door gently opened, and I heard the rustle of a dress. I had not got time to look round, when, with a cry, she rushed forward and clasped me in her arms. It was Madame Clerenzay!

"My own dear, dear Digby!" she cried, as she kissed me over face and forehead, smoothing back my hair to look at me, and then falling again on my neck. "I knew it could be no other when I heard of you, darling; and when they told me of your singing I could have sworn it was yourself."

I tried to disengage myself from her embrace, and summoned what I could of sternness to repel her caresses. She dropped at my feet, and, clasping my hand, implored me, in accents broken with passion, to forgive her. To see her who had once been all that a mother could have been to me in tenderness and care, who watched the long hours of the night beside my sick-bed—to see her there before me, abject, self-accused, and yet entreating forgiveness, was more than I could bear. My nerves, besides, had been already too tensely strung: and I burst into a passion of tears that totally overcame me. She sat with her arm round me, and wept.

With a wild hysterical rapidity she poured forth a sort of excuse of her own conduct. She pleaded all that I had seen her suffer of insult and shame; she spoke of her friendlessness, her misery; but, more than all, her consuming desire to be avenged on the man who had degraded her. "Your father, I know, was the man to do me this justice," she cried; "he did not love me, nor did I love him; but we both hated this wretch, and it seemed little to me what became of me if I could but compass his ruin."

I scarcely followed her. I bethought me of my poor mother, for whom none had a thought—neither of the wrongs done her, nor of the sufferings to which she was so remorselessly consigned.

"You do not listen to me. You do not hear me?" cried she, passionately; "and yet who has been your friend as I have? Who has implored your father to be just toward you as I have done? Who has hazarded her whole future in maintaining your rights—who but I?" In a wild rhapsody of mingled passion and appeal she went on to show how Sir Roger insisted on presenting her every where as his wife. Even at courts she had been so presented, though all the terrible consequences of exposure were sure to ring out on that the whole of Europe. The personal danger of the step was a temptation too strong to

I am better able to fight the battle of life now than I was then. I ask nothing of him—nor even his name. I, of you speak of other consequences—of what may ensue when his hosts shall learn the fraud he has practiced on them—" It was only as the fatal word fell from me that I felt how cruelly I had spoken, and I stopped and took her hand in mine, saying, "Do not be angry with me, dear friend, that I have spoken a bitter word; bear with me for her sake, who has none to befriend her but myself."

She made me no answer, but looked out cold and stern into vacancy, her pale features motionless, not a line or a lineament betraying what was passing within her.

"Why remain here then to provoke a catastrophe?" I resumed, gently. "Leave me. I have come for pleasure, you see enough to be aware there is little more awaiting you."

"I have come for pleasure. I am here to confer with Count Hunyadi on a matter of business."

"And will some paltry success in a little pedaling contract for the Count's wine, or his olives, or his Indian rice, compensate you for the ruin you may bring on your own fame? Will it recompense you if his blood be shed?"

There was a tone of defiant sarcasm in the way she spoke these words that stung me, if I would not yield to her persuasions, she would not hesitate to appeal to members of coercion. Perhaps she mistook the astonishment my face expressed for terror; for she went on: "It would be well that we brought these matters at once to make your breach with your father irreparable. Remember it is not a question of a passing sentimentality, or sympathy—it is the whole future of your life is at issue. If you be any thing, or any body, or a nameless creature without belongings or kindred?"

I sat for some minutes in deep thought. I was not sure whether I understood her words, and that she meant to say to me that I owed to my father to own or disown me, as he pleased. She seemed delighted at my embarrassment, and her voice rung out with its own clear triumphant cadence, as she said, "You begin at last to see how near the precipice you have been straying."

"One moment, Madam!" cried I. "If my mother be Lady Norcott, Sir Roger can not disown me; not to say, that already in an open court he maintained his right over me and declared me his son."

"You are opening a question I will not touch, Digby," said she, gravely—"your mother's marriage. I will only say that the ablest lawyers your father has consulted pronounce it more than questionable."

"And my father has then entertained the project of an attempt to break it?"

"This is not fair!" cried she, eagerly; "you lead me on from one admission to another till I find myself revealing confidences to one who at any moment may know himself my enemy."

I raised my eyes to her face, and she met my glance with a look cold, stern, and impassive, as though she would say, "Choose your path now, and accept me as friend or foe." All the winning softness of her manner, all those engaging coquetries of look and gesture, of which none were more mistress, were gone, and another and a very different nature had replaced them.

This, then, was one of those women of tenderness, and softness, and fascination, but who behind this mask have the fierce nature of the tigress. Could she be the same I had seen so submissive under all the insolence of her brutal husband, bearing his scoffs and his sarcasms without a word of reply? Was it that these cruelties had at last evoked this stern spirit, and that another temperament had been generated out of a nature broken down and overwhelmed by illtreatment?

"Shall I tell you what I think you ought to do?" asked she, calmly. I nodded assent. "Sit down there, then," continued she, "and write me a few lines to your father, and let him have them before he returns here."

"First of all, I can not write just now—I have had a slight accident to my right arm."

"I know," said she, smiling dubiously. "You hurt it in the riding-school; but it's a mere nothing, is it not?"

I made a gesture of assent, not altogether pleased the while at the little sympathy she vouchsafed me, and the insignificance she ascribed to my wound.

"Shall I write for you, then; you can sign it afterward?"

"Let me first know what you would have me say."

"Dear father.—You always addressed him that way?"

"Yes."

"Dear father, I have been here some days, awaiting Count Hunyadi's return, to transact some matters of business with him, and have by a mere accident learned that you are among his guests. As I do not know how, to what extent, or in what capacity, it may be your pleasure to recognize me, or whether it might not chime better with your convenience to ignore me altogether, I write now to submit myself entirely to your will and guidance, being in this, as in all things, your dutiful and obedient son."

"This is not fair!" cried she, eagerly; "you lead me on from one admission to another till I find myself revealing confidences to one who at any moment may know himself my enemy."

I raised my eyes to her face, and she met my glance with a look cold, stern, and impassive, as though she would say, "Choose your path now, and accept me as friend or foe." All the winning softness of her manner, all those engaging coquetries of look and gesture, of which none were more mistress, were gone, and another and a very different nature had replaced them.

This, then, was one of those women of tenderness, and softness, and fascination, but who behind this mask have the fierce nature of the tigress. Could she be the same I had seen so submissive under all the insolence of her brutal husband, bearing his scoffs and his sarcasms without a word of reply? Was it that these cruelties had at last evoked this stern spirit, and that another temperament had been generated out of a nature broken down and overwhelmed by illtreatment?

"Shall I tell you what I think you ought to do?" asked she, calmly. I nodded assent. "Sit down there, then," continued she, "and write me a few lines to your father, and let him have them before he returns here."

"First of all, I can not write just now—I have had a slight accident to my right arm."

"I know," said she, smiling dubiously. "You hurt it in the riding-school; but it's a mere nothing, is it not?"

I made a gesture of assent, not altogether pleased the while at the little sympathy she vouchsafed me, and the insignificance she ascribed to my wound.

"Shall I write for you, then; you can sign it afterward?"

"Let me first know what you would have me say."

"Dear father.—You always addressed him that way?"

"Yes."

"Dear father, I have been here some days, awaiting Count Hunyadi's return, to transact some matters of business with him, and have by a mere accident learned that you are among his guests. As I do not know how, to what extent, or in what capacity, it may be your pleasure to recognize me, or whether it might not chime better with your convenience to ignore me altogether, I write now to submit myself entirely to your will and guidance, being in this, as in all things, your dutiful and obedient son."

"Sign it 'Digby,' and address it to Sir Roger Norcott, Bart., Norcott Park, Yorkshire, England. Is that all?"

"Yes."

"Then I'll take it with me, and you can copy it at your leisure. Meanwhile I must bandage this arm in somewhat better fashion than you have done."

While he was engaged in dressing my wound he rambled on about the reckless habits that made such rencontres possible. "We are in the middle of the seventeenth century here, with all its barbarisms," said he. "These young fellows were vexed at seeing the notice you attracted; and that was to their thinking cause enough to send you off with a damaged lung or a manslaughter. It's all well, however, as long as Graf Hunyadi does not have to fight it. But if he should, he'll turn them out, every man of them, for this treatment of an Englishman.

"THIS BOY IS MY SON, HUNYADI."

"Then we must take care, Sir, that he does not hear of it," said I, half fiercely, and as though addressing my speech especially to himself.

"Not from me, certainly," said he. "My doctor's instincts always save me from such indiscretions."

"Is our Countess young, doctor?" asked I, half jocularly.

"Young and pretty, though one might say, too, she has been younger and prettier. If you dine below stairs to-day drink no wine, and get back to your sofa as soon as you can after dinner." With this caution he left me.

A heavy packet of letters had arrived from Fiume, containing, I surmised, some instructions for which I had written; but seeing that the address was in the cashier's handwriting I felt no impatience to break the seal.

I dressed myself with unusual care, though the pain of my arm made the process a very slow one; and at last set out to pay my visit. I passed along the corridor, through the conservatory, and found myself at a door at which I knocked twice. At last I turned the handle and entered a small but handsomely furnished drawing-room, about which books and newspapers lay scattered; and a small embroidery-frame near the fire showed where she who was engaged with that task had lately been seated. As I bent down to receive my cousin's curtsy I heard a lively clever copy of an altar-piece of Albert Durer a door gently opened, and I heard the rustle of a dress. I had not got time to look round, when, with a cry, she rushed forward and clasped me in her arms. It was Madame Clerenzay!

"My own dear, dear Digby!" she cried, as she kissed me over face and forehead, smoothing back my hair to look at me, and then falling again on my neck. "I knew it could be no other when I heard of you, darling; and when they told me of your singing I could have sworn it was yourself."

I tried to disengage myself from her embrace, and summoned what I could of sternness to repel her caresses. She dropped at my feet, and, clasping my hand, implored me, in accents broken with passion, to forgive her. To see her who had once been all that a mother could have been to me in tenderness and care, who watched the long hours of the night beside my sick-bed—to see her there before me, abject, self-accused, and yet entreating forgiveness, was more than I could bear. My nerves, besides, had been already too tensely strung: and I burst into a passion of tears that totally overcame me. She sat with her arm round me, and wept.

With a wild hysterical rapidity she poured forth a sort of excuse of her own conduct. She pleaded all that I had seen her suffer of insult and shame; she spoke of her friendlessness, her misery; but, more than all, her consuming desire to be avenged on the man who had degraded her. "Your father, I know, was the man to do me this justice," she cried; "he did not love me, nor did I love him; but we both hated this wretch, and it seemed little to me what became of me if I could but compass his ruin."

I scarcely followed her. I bethought me of my poor mother, for whom none had a thought—neither of the wrongs done her, nor of the sufferings to which she was so remorselessly consigned.

"You do not listen to me. You do not hear me?" cried she, passionately; "and yet who has been your friend as I have? Who has implored your father to be just toward you as I have done? Who has hazarded her whole future in maintaining your rights—who but I?" In a wild rhapsody of mingled passion and appeal she went on to show how Sir Roger insisted on presenting her every where as his wife. Even at courts she had been so presented, though all the terrible consequences of exposure were sure to ring out on that the whole of Europe. The personal danger of the step was a temptation too strong to

The words came from her pen as rapidly as her fingers could move across the paper; and as she finished she pushed it toward me, saying:

"There—put Digby Norcott there, and it is all done!"

"This is a matter to think over," said I, gravely; "I must be compromising your interests than my own by signing this."

"Those Jews of yours have imbued you well with their cautious spirit, I see," said she, scoffingly.

"They have taught me no lessons I am ashamed of, Madam," said I, reddening with anger.

"I declare, I don't know you as the Digby of long ago! I fancied I did when I heard those ladies coming up stairs each night, so charmed with all your graceful gifts, and so eloquent over all your failings; and now, as you stand there, word-splitting and phrase-weighing, canvassing what it might cost you to do this, where it might lead you to say that, I ask myself, is this the boy his father said, 'above all things he shall be a gentleman'?"

"To one element of that character, Madam, I will try and preserve my claim—no provocation shall drive me to utter a rudeness to a lady."

"This is less breaking than calculation, young gentleman, and not only humanity as yours so easily as a printed book."

"I ask nothing better, Madam; my only fear would be that you should mistake me, and imagine that any deference to my father's views would make me forget my mother's rights."

"So then," she said, with a mocking laugh, "you have got your courage up so far—you dare me! Be advised, boy, and do not court such an unequal contest. I have but to choose in which of a score of ways I could crush you—do you mark me?—crush you! You will not always be so lucky as you were this morning in the riding-school."

"Great Heaven!" cried I, "was this then of your devising?"

"You begin to have a glimpse of whom you have to deal with! Go back to your room and reflect on that knowledge, and if it end in persuading you to quit this place at once, and never return to it, it will be a wise resolve."

I was too much occupied with the terrible fact that she had already conspired against my life to heed her counsels of counsel, and I stood there stunned and confused.

In the look of scorn and hate she threw on me, she seemed to exult over my forlorn and bewildered condition.

"I scarcely think there is any need to prolong this interview," said she, at last, with an easy smile; "each of us is by this time aware of the kindly sentiments of the other; is it not so?"

"I am quite, Madam," I stammered out, "quite."

She made a slight movement, as I thought toward me; but it was in reality the prelude to a deep courtesy, while in her sweetest of accents she whispered, "Adieu, my preserver, Monsieur Digby, au revoir." I bowed deeply and withdrew.

CHAPTER XXX.

NASTY TIDINGS.

Or all the revulsions of feeling that can befall the heart, I know of none to compare in poignant agony with the sudden consciousness that you are hated where once you were loved; that where once you had turned for consolation or sympathy you have now nothing to expect but coldness and distrust; that the treasure of affection on which you had counted against the day of adversity had proved valueless, and nothing remained of all its bright hopes and promise but bitter regrets and sorrowful reproachings.

It was in the very last depth of this spirit I now locked myself in my room to determine what I should do, what course I should take for my future. I saw the stake for which Madame Clermont was playing. She had resolved that my mother's property should be broken, and herself declared Lady Norcott. That my father might be brought to accede to such a plan was by no means impossible. His extravagance and his enormity would have been great inducements, had he no other interest in the matter.

I began to reason with myself how persons poor and friendless could possibly meet the legal battle which this question should originate, and how my mother, in her destitution and penury, could contend against the force of the wealth that would be opposed to her. It had only been by the merest chance of her relatives and friends, all eager to support her in such a cause, that she had been enabled to face the expenses of the suit my father had brought on the question of my guardianship. How could she again sustain a like charge? What likely hood that her pecuniary condition would enable her to fee leaders on circuit and bar magnates, to pay the costs of witnesses, and all the endless outgoings of the law?

So long as I lived, I well knew my poor mother would compromise none of my rights that pertained to me; but if I could be got out of the way, and the event of the morning shot through my mind—some arrangement with her might not be impossible—at least, it was open to think of it now; and I could well imagine that they would build on such a foundation. It was not easy to imagine a woman like Madame Clermont, a person of the most attractive manners, beautiful, gifted, and graceful, capable of a great crime; but she herself had shown me more than once in fiction the portraiture of an individual, who, while shrinking with horror from the coarse contact of guilt, would willingly set the springs in motion which ultimately conduce to the most appalling deeds. I remember even then, reasoning to me one day, "It is in watching the terrible explosions their schemes have ignited that cowards learn to taste what they fancy to be the ecstasy of courage."

While I thought what a sorry adversary I should prove against such a woman, with all the wiles of her nature, and all the seductions by which she could display them, my eyes fell upon the packet from Fisme, which still lay with its seal unbroken. I broke it open half-carelessly. It contained an envelope marked "letters," and the following note:

"HER OWEN,—With this you are informed that the house of Hodnip and Oppovich has failed, dockets of bankruptcy having been already declared against that firm, the usual assignees will be duly appointed by the court to liquidate, on such terms as the circumstances dictate, the sum total of the estate and effects.

"Further negotiations regarding the Hunyadi contract on your part are consequently unnecessary, seeing that the same information you could obtain would in nowise avert or even lessen the blow that has fallen on the house.

"I am directed to inform you that the sum of two hundred and eighteen florins, twenty-seven kreutzers, which, at the current exchange, will pay your salary to the end of the present quarter, and also to state that, having duly acknowledged the receipt of this sum to me by letter, you are considered free from all engagement to the house. I am also instructed to say that your zeal and probity will be duly attested when any question arises touching the managers of this estate.

"I am, with accustomed esteem and respect,

"Your devoted servant,

"JACOB ULRICH.

"P.S.—Herr Ignaz is, happily for him, in a condition to bear tenderly the intelligence of his calamity. The family has retired for the present to the small cottage near the gate of the Abazia Villa, called 'The Nest,' where visitors complete privacy, and declines all condolences.—J. U.

"2d P.S.—The inclosed letters have arrived here during the night."

So intensely infused was my mind with suspicion and distrust, that it was not till after long and careful examination I satisfied myself that this letter was genuine, and that its contents might be taken as true. The packet it inclosed would, however, have resolved all doubt: they were those letters from my mother which my parent reference was made to other letters which had never reached me, and in which it was clear she made in which she had given my address was explained. She also spoke of Sara as of one she knew by correspondence, and gave me to understand she was then actually writing the humble incident of my daily life with loving interest and affection. She enjoined me by all means to keep myself from being marked by a visionary surrender of my position might be made terrible use of against me, should—and I can say nothing more terrible—I be made to question the legality of my marriage with your father.

"I have told you so much," said she, "of myself in former letters" (these I never saw) "that I shall not weary you with more. You know why I gave up the school, and through what meanness I consented to be separated from Norcott, though in such poverty as mine the assumption of a title only provoked ridicule. Mr. McBride, however, considered that a volunt than President BURR died, and was succeeded by his father-in-law, Dr. EDWARDS.

AARON BURR entered Princeton College at the early age of thirteen, and at his graduation received the highest academic honors. It is not necessary that we should trace his subsequent career, which is already so familiar to all readers of American history. His duel, in 1804, with Colonel HAMILTON, which terminated fatally for the latter, is the most memorable, as also the saddest event in his life. Colonel BURR took an active part in the Revolutionary war. He belonged to the LEE and GATES faction, and always affected to despise the military talents of WASHINGTON. In 1800 he was chosen Vice-President, but his success in defeating the candidate of his own party destroyed his own political influence. He died at the age of 81, on Staten Island, whither he had been removed for the benefit of pure air during the warm season.

In accordance with his own request Colonel BURR was buried at Princeton. He was interred with the honors of war. The professors and students of the college united in the funeral procession. He was buried near the tomb of his ancestors.

THE SKELETON HAND.

YIELDING to a miserable habit had ruined me. It had blasted my prospects, destroyed my business, alienated my friends, and brought me down to the lowest point of existence. The habit had altogether overcome me. In vain I struggled against it. The imploring looks and tears of my wife: the sight of my wan-faced and emaciated children turning their eyes to me, the author at once of their being and of their misery: the spectacle of the proud home and broad lands, once mine, but now in the hands of strangers—all these, which would well have stung to madness or driven to despair a less degraded being, reached me not, nor affected me in the depth of my degradation. I had reached the point at which no motive that might be urged could any longer affect me.

One evening I was sitting in my miserable home. The children were asleep. Exhausted by the day's labor, they had betaken themselves to sleep in hunger. My wife sat opposite to me on the other side of the wretched fire-place stitching some rags of clothing. I was sullen and silent.

At last I felt a craving for the stimulus that now was necessary to my life. Rising, I walked to the cupboard where it was kept. My wife knew well my intention. She followed me to the door.

I went there desperate and careless—only eager for the gratification of my appetite.

I reached forth my hands, tremblingly seized the bottle, and without hesitation put it to my lips.

But at that very instant, just as the bottle touched my lips, I felt a terrible sensation. It was as though some one had grasped my hand.

"Wife!" I cried in a deep, fierce voice. "Hag! do you dare?' and turning, with clenched fist, I struck at what I supposed was my wife. For I thought that she was trying in this violent way in desperation to keep me from drink.

But to my surprise I saw my wife sitting by the fire-place with her work in her hand, looking at me in wonder.

It could not have been her evidently.

A terrible feeling passed through me. Shudderingly I raised my hand to feel what it was that was on my arm, or if there was any thing there at all, which seemed to be grasping me so tightly.

Horror of horrors!

As I raised my hand I felt the unmistakable outlines of a bony thumb and bony fingers pressed against my flesh. It was a skeleton hand that clutched me by the throat.

My hand fell down powerless by my side; the bottle rolled upon the floor. My children, awoke at the noise, and wife and children all stared at me with white faces.

There I trembling in every limb, stood transfixed with terror, the awful shape of the supernatural now fully possessing me. Unable to speak I gazed with fear. A dreer came on my body, but my head was still held by the same dread and invisible power. I could not move that.

Unspeakable horror filled me. None but those who have experienced something like this know what it is to have such feelings. The body seems paralyzed, while the mind seems to be endowed with exclusive activity, and thus possessed new capacities for suffering.

But at last I felt the grasp relax. I staggered back, the grisly shape altogether, and I broke off to another corner of the room, endeavoring to go as far as possible from the place where this mysterious thing had seized me.

Soon my wife and children turned away, the former to work, the latter to sleep. They knew not what it was that had affected me, but concluded that it was some pain arising from sickness or sudden faintness. I did not speak a word, but resumed my former seat.

And now, gradually, my craving returned. Yet how could I satisfy it? My bottle was broken. It lay in fragments on the floor. But, ah! liquor was gone. What was I to do? The craving became irresistible. I had to yield.

So I took my hat, fumbled in my pockets and found a few cents, and taking an old bottle that lay in a corner, I went forth into the darkness. It was not without some feeling of trepidation that I entered the dark passage-way. Fear lest the same Thing of Horror might return agitated me. But I passed on unharmed, and reached my old resort, where I laid my bottle on the counter. The clerk soon filled it. With an irresistible impulse I clutched the bottle and rushed forth to drink the liquor.

I hurried off for a little distance and came to the head of a wharf. Here, unable any longer to resist my craving, I pulled out the cork so as to drink.

It was very dark. No one was near me. In the distance arose the low hum of the city; out in the harbor might be heard the noise of sailors and boatmen. I had a general idea of this as I stood there, though all my thoughts were concentrated on the bottle. At last I raised it to my mouth.

Scarce had the bottle touched my lips when again I experienced that terrible feeling.

My throat was seized; the grasp was more violent-ly, more fiercely, as if by some power which had already warned me, and was enraged at having to repeat the warning. My throat was compressed painfully in that fierce gripe; there was anger in it. A thrill of horror again shot through me. Again the bottle fell. Again my trembling hands and was crushed to fragments upon the stone pavement.

Again I raised my hands to my throat, though in doubly fear: but the motion was mechanical —a natural and involuntary effort to tear away the thing that had seized my throat—to free myself from the pain and the horror of that mysterious grasp. Again that grasp relaxed my hands, and again I felt there under my touch, plainly and unmistakably, the long, hard, bony hand which I had felt before. It was a skeleton hand. My hands fell down. I tried to shriek, but in vain. I gasped for breath, and thought that I would be suffocated.

But at length the grasp slowly and unwillingly relaxed. I breathed more freely. The agony of death was not over.

I paced the streets for a long time. At first every vestige of my appetite had been driven away by the terror of that supernatural grasp that passed it begun to return. Once more I felt the craving. True, the fear of another attack was strong, and I felt that I could not rest; but at last the craving grew too strong for the fear.

Nerving myself up to a desperate pitch of resolution, I turned again to the shop where I had last purchased the liquor.

"See here!" I cried, "I'm crazy for a drink; I broke that bottle. Give me a glass, for God's sake—only one glass!"

Something in my face seemed to excite the man's commiseration. He poured out a glass for me in silence.

With trembling eagerness I reached out my hand to take it. With renewed hand I raised it toward my lips. The grateful fumes already entered my nostrils. My lips already touched the edge of the glass.

Suddenly my throat was seized with a tremendous grasp.

It was as though the Power which was tormenting me had become enraged by my repeated acts of disobedience, and now by this final act to reduce me to subjection forever.

It was as if this Power was using with me the means of coercion which it was using on a dog, viz.: beat him for each offense, and each time harder till he is cured.

This time the grasping was terrible, it was fiercer than ever, quick, impetuous.

In that grand grasp my breath ceased.

I struggled. My senses reeled. I raised my hands in my despair. I felt again the bony fingers. I moved my hands along bony arms.

In my madness I struggled. I fought, and my fists wildly. They struck against what seemed like bony ribs.

The time during which I thus struggled seemed endless. The horror that was upon me can not be told.

At last all sense left me.

When I revived I found myself lying on a rude bench in the bar. It was early dawn. No one was near. In my bosom was a paper. I drew it out-fossilly, not knowing at first where I was, but soon the terrific event which had overpowered me came to my memory.

I rose to my feet, and tried to get out. The noise that I made awaked some one inside. He called out to me,

"Hallo there! Are you off?"

"Yes," I said.

"Wait, I'll let you out."

He appeared in a short time.

"You had a bad turn," said he, not unkindly. "You'd better look out for yourself, and not be out at nights."

I thanked him and left.

When I reached the house my wife waked up and looked half fearfully at me. Awakened at once over the whole of my past life I was sober. I kissed her and sat down in silence.

She looked at me in wonder. Tears fell from her eyes. She said nothing, but I saw that she was praying.

As soon as the shops were opened I went out and bought some grocery necessaries, which I brought to the room. I then left to go to my employment. Through the day I felt an incessant craving, but the fear was so great that I would far rather have cut my throat than risked having that hand there again.

As the day went on the terror remained undiminished. It was simply impossible for me to seek for intoxicating drink. I dared not.

My wife and children saw the difference; by her soft eyes, the gentle joy of her face, and the sweet, loving smile with which she welcomed me home, how deeply this change in me had affected her.

Weeks passed and gradually the craving subsided. Yet so vivid was the remembrance of that dread experience of mine that my horror remained fresh and unabated. To relapse was impossible. I dared not.

Thus forced to be sober, my circumstances improved rapidly. There was no longer any danger of want. Comfort came, and peace, and hope, and pure domestic joy.

Remorse for the sufferings which I had caused to my sweet wife made no more eager to make amends for the past, so I sought effete bitter memories from her mind. The revulsion of feeling was so great for her that she forgot that I had ever been other than kind. I made no parade of reform. I made no promises, and no vows. For me there was a close allude to the change. She showed her joy in her face and manner. She accepted the change when it came and rejoiced in it.

I still felt an anxious desire to get to the bottom of this mystery, and once I told the whole story to my wife.

He was not at all surprised.

Doctors never are. Nor are doctors ever at a loss to account for any thing.

"Pooh," said he, indifferently. "That's common enough. It was mania a potu. The brain, you know, becomes congested, and you see and feel devils and skeletons. Cases like yours are common enough."

To me, however, my case seemed very uncommon, but, whether it be so or not, my case has resulted in my salvation. And never will I cease, even should my power, to be grateful to that Power which came down clothed in terror to snatch me from ruin with that Skeleton Hand.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FROM Texas comes a brilliant report of newly-discovered petroleum springs. In fact, a misunderstander is raging in the vicinity of the city of Austin. The origin of the whole matter is that a little girl, some three or four months old, found on a hill a transparent stone about the size of a pea. The pebble is brought down into the bustle of an amateur city, straight, who pronounced it of the opaline class, and of value. The discovery of that source of the hills have been covered by earnest searchers for valuables. They have found an abundance of rattlesnakes quartz, fine specimens of the California pebble, some transparent carseline, a number of amethystine crystals, a number of pretty sparkling beryls, an occasional topaz, chrysopraze, or emerald, and a few unpolished agates. The hills are also covered with many beauty and hardness, approaching closely the domain of the diamond. One of these crystals is now exposed, two inches in length, and nearly an inch in its largest diameter. The surface is covered with a rough incrustation, having occasional openings of pellucid smoothness and polish, through which the resplendent interior is discernible. It is almost white, iridescent, shining with a yellow, adamantine lustre.

"Westward the star of empire takes its way." A book has been recently published in St. Louis, entitled, "A GRAMAR OF NATIONAL EMTHS; or, Argumental Basis of the Government of the National Capital from Washington City to the Mississippi Valley." The volume is illustrated with a map, a fine profile of the countries, the author appears to have considered his subject very deeply.

A Parisian actress had for many successive evenings seen a modest two-son bouquet of violets fall at her feet. She had also failed to receive it promptly, on inquiry found it came from a poor boy of fourteen, a frequenter of the upper gallery. The girl, touched by his modest offerings, sent to receive it personally at her door. The youth was standing behind the scenes when the lady of the theatre came off the stage. With a sigh he threw himself upon her, much to the astonishment of the by-standers. "You're mad!" No, he is not a toupe of dame creeping round the scene robes of the actress, and was trying with all his might to put out the fire. He succeeded so well that the girl was rescued, but the courageous youth was conveyed to the nearest hospital, fearfully burned.

WHAT MR. PROUT terms a "half chromo" is a lithograph free of charge, with a cash proof, upon which the colors are afterward printed. Such colored lithographs, though very pretty, have no "depth" about them. "Full chromos," on the other hand, are produced by carefully printing that over that, shading, and brightening, and blending and there a little, following the general method of the artist. The first color is commonly a neutral tint which serves for the outline, the print, excepting, perhaps, some spots which are to be rendered in gold. The very successful lithographic stone—and sometimes there are as many as fifty—has a separate color, which is applied to all, or to a portion of the print, as may be desired. This process is continued until at a short distance the chromo can scarcely be told from an oil imitation.

One of the latest novelties is a "Hard Times" party, which is announced at Mauiorille, Wisconsin. The invitations are issued requesting for the dance are issued upon the commonest kind of brown paper. "Ladies are expected to bake and boil their provisions, and gentlemen in their everyday clothing. Each one must bring a dozen of his best pickles. Fun to commence at 8 P.M. At 11 P.M. bean soup, crackers, and dried herring will be served, after which enough to go round."

A meeting was recently held at the Working House in Boston, the object of which was to investigate the causes which have prevented tramps taught to communicate without signs to others. A teacher of the Clarke Institution for Deaf-mutes answered questions of several of her pupils, who by no possibility could have known what the inquiries were, except from the movements of the lips, and almost every case they were answered promptly. Except that she spoke with great distinctness, and her lips exhibited what has not yet learned to pronounce words aright, and also with the peculiar intonation of deaf persons, one would have supposed that a conversation was going on under ordinary circumstances. Great interest was produced when she moved her lips without emitting any sound. Two young girls, who had never been in any deaf and dumb institution, but had been taught at home to speak and to understand others, on being introduced to each other, immediately began to talk together, like other people, without the use of signs. The oldest of the two was taught to be first educated in a large school where she was the only one who could not hear a sound.

The amount of fuel oil upon the animal system is that of a positive poison, its vapor producing nausea, headache, and vertigo. It also causes serious injuries to the lungs, injurious, and indicates bad distillation, or the use of damaged grain. It may be detected by agitating the liquor with water, when it is found for the oil to rise to the surface.

A California paper gives at some length an account illustrating the powerful influence exerted upon a boy of thirteen who had been sent to be educated at the Santa Clara College, which is conducted by a professional corps of Jesuits. The boy had been sent to this college by his mother, who was desirous that he should receive the best possible education. He was prepared to join the Church of Rome, against the wishes of his mother, and took the first fearful set of vows. The mother, alarmed at the changed style of her son's letters, and not being able to induce him to visit her, went to see him, and found him so under the influence of his solemn superiors that he refused to go home with her or to recognize her authority in any way. With the help of friends she brought the matter into court, where the rudest restraint exerted by the Jesuits was fully exposed, and the boy delivered to his natural guardian, with whom he gladly went when freed from the power of the Jesuits.

One of the latest reported amusements in Paris is the album of confessions. A handsome volume contains various questions engraved on gilt-edged pages, beneath which answers are to be written by those to whom the book is handed, signed with their initials. For example:

Question. Do you put faith in human nature?

Answer. I've lost faith in myself—how can I hold it in another?—V. P. F. 1868.

Colin depend! on whom the human nature may be?—C. de A., August, 1868.

Question. What is your age?

Answer. The candle, the moon, departs. Don't ask me. How should I know? Thought I was thirty-three; but my cousin, who was born the same year I was, declares she is only twenty-two.—Tom. X.

When such questions as, "Did you ever tell a falsehood?" "What do you most detest?" stare one in the face, the impertinence of the album provokes repartees absolutely worthy of Talleyrand or Ingoldsby.

For the purpose of arriving at the difference in time thus between San Francisco and Boston, the wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company were slightly connected for nearly a month from one side of the continent to the other; and the ticking of a chronometer in Cambridge University was observed and recorded in San Francisco, with a very remarkable degree of accuracy. This was done by connecting the pendulum with a magnet, consequently the vibration of the wire in such a manner that the main circuit was broken, and instantly closed again at every beat or tick of the large clock. By an ingenious contrivance the flight of electricity was actually measured, so to speak, or rather the time it occupied in its flight.

In many other large cities. A dinner company at the home of a prominent citizen of Boston. After remaining an hour or so at one table, were ushered into another room, where a second table, with elegant appointments, was laid. This opportunity for a double display of plate was not lost upon the host, who, in a unique club in Boston, consisting of twelve gentlemen, who do their own cooking when they dine together, which is once a fortnight. This club was formed forty years ago. No one can become a member who can not cook some delicious dish. They dine in a hot boathouse not far from the city, and have superb feasts. The wives of members are sometimes invited to take a lesson in cookery from their better halves, but are not allowed a finger in the pie.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A HUMBUG dress-maker in Detroit was giving some ladies a recipe for making mock cream, which she professed to have discovered herself in the real article. In order to prove her assertion she took a good wedding white tie, boiled it, then served, and said, "Many took it in preference to the real cream, not knowing the difference."

A MONEY BUSINESS IN A SMALL COMPASS.—A Cheese-monger.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A PUBLICAN AND A SINNER.—One rags that the Spirits may appear, the other tops that they may disappear.

THE "TEWDER" PASSION.—An engine-driver's.

A correspondent who has an unquenchable thirst for knowledge wants to know if the wheel of Time is ever tired.

"WHITE HAIR A DISEASE."—"How many children have you?" asked a gentleman of one of his laborers, looking around in surprise upon the family.

"Rather more than a dozen, Sir."

"Only make out eleven," said the gentleman.

"Why, I think I have a dozen, Sir," said Patrick, "for when one has to feed 'em!" exclaimed the happy father.

QUEER QUERIES.

At what time should a man be called?—Upon his wedding Eve.

How can gray whiskers be made to lose their odium?—Echo: O dye'em.

What do they now visit Egypt for?—To peer amid the pyramids.

What causes Irish rows?—Pat-riot-ism.

When does the rain become too familiar to a lady?—When it begins to pat her mutton on the cheek.

Why are cats like Mimic balls?—They mutilate (new tell).

When does a lawyer act falsely?—When he "makes acts to suit."

What is the greatest age into a rose?—When a bet, B-et, D-ed-d, N-ag-n, Q-uit, and K pounded.

"SEE-LOATH"—THE SUN, MOON, AND STARS!

SURROUNDED WITH A GIRL.—Of all the joys vouchsafed to a man by the Supreme Ruler, there is one he usually approaches heaven so near as sleighing with a girl—a SWEET girl; a loving girl; a kind, generous, confidential, honest girl; a darling, darling, darling, amiable girl, who never asks foolish questions of sleighing, dear little duck of a girl. Pile up your furs, darlings, and, with yea seeming, sudden start, I'll launch as I go dashing by with my jingling bells and my big, bellowing, bearded, scented gift; the trimmest, gayest, neatest girl; the funniest, freshest, merriest, fairest, handsomest, prettiest, and rarest, sparkliest, quickest, quirtiest, equarest, best of girls, and, with a wild, half-insane, unconscious yell—just the girl for a chap like me to love, and, with my arm around her waist, dashing and clattering, darling, the sweetest and the best of girls.

A pleasant story is told of a rather aged lady who has recently married a young lad. She was describing him at the station when he was going on some far journey, and was asked his age. After an instant of the most loving character she put her head into the window and said, "Dear Charles, remember that you are married." To which he replied, "Dear Caroline, I will make a memorandum of it," and at once tied a knot in his handkerchief.

A TENDER POINT—A bayonet.

A little boy, five years old, while writhing under the lash of the nurse, was told by her that he must arise up and take a powder she had prepared for him.

"I'll take it, Nurse," said he, raising himself on his elbow, and putting on a roguish smile, "Mother, I ain't a gun!"

"Where shall I put this paper so as to be sure of seeing it to-morrow?" inquired Mary Jane of her brother Charles. "On the looking-glass" was her brother's reply.

"Have you seen my black-faced antelope?" inquired Mr. Lascelles, who had a collection of animals, of his friend Bottlejack. "No, I haven't. Whom did you black-faced antelope mean?"

the week before and the week following.

Access is so damaged during these ceremonies that the visitor must secure his accommodations and his tickets some weeks in advance.

ST. PETER'S.

On Friday before Palm-Sunday, St. Joseph's day, the Pope, according to his custom on the Fridays in Lent, enters St. Peter's to pay his devotions there. Preparations for his coming are made by covering his pric-dieu with red velvet, and placing long rows of seats for the cardinals near the chapel-crypt beneath the dome. This ceremony does not strictly pertain to Holy-Week, and it is often thinly attended; but it affords the traveler a favorable opportunity for one of those numerous visits to the great basilica which he must make to acquire an appreciation of its grandeur.

We ascend the steps, cross the great vestibule, itself a hall longer and loftier than many a great church, lift a heavy, well-worn, quilted leather mat which hangs like a curtain to close the doorway, slide through, and stand within. A vast prairie of marble floor, of a mellow tinge, stretches before us as far as the eye can reach. In place of the sky, stupendous arches close us in overhead, fretted with massive carved panels. There is abundant light, but no consciousness of windows. They are of plain glass, half concealed above the cornice. Lofty arches open on either hand; but the enormous piers which support them, each as large around as a comfortable house, do not seem like pillars. The magnificent decorations of mosaics, statues, and marbles are dissolved and tempered to chaste simplicity by space.

CHURCH OF SAINT PETER AND THE VATICAN.

St. Peter's, capable of holding 54,000 persons, is well filled with a concourse of people from all nations and of every class. The gorgeous court attire of princes and nobles, the simple white bonnets of Sisters of Charity, the brown robes of Franciscan monks, the black robes of Dominicans, the gay liveries of servants, the purple and scarlet garments of high ecclesiastics, pages in black velvet, soldiers in bright uniform, peasants in homespun, goat-skin, and rags—the whole is a living picture of European life in all phases. Great tribunes have been constructed, to which only gentlemen in uniform or evening dress, and ladies in black, with a black veil on the head, can be admitted, by means of tickets previously procured through an embassador.

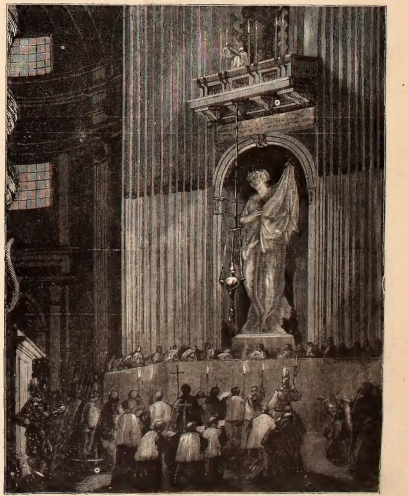
Such dress is rigorously required as a condition of admission to the seats in St. Peter's or to the Sistine Chapel. Now and then an ingenious American without a dress-coat pins up the skirts of his frock and tries to pass in, but is caught and exposed by the vigilant guards.

At the head of the nave is the throne of the Pope, on either hand the seats of the cardinals, beyond, the tribunes of the diplomatic corps and the Roman princes. On each side of the throne are bundles of the palms destined to be blessed by the Pope after the mass, and to be distributed to the cardinals, bishops, and ecclesiastic and civil dignitaries, who approach one by one and kiss the pontifical ring and the palm extended to them by his hand.

These palms are long, lance-like shafts of a clear yellow color, like dried rushes. They are seen throughout the churches of Italy on this day. The

"OPEN THE GATES AND LET THE KING OF GLORY IN!"

THE SACRED STAIRS.



EXHIBITING THE SACRED RELICS.

PIUS THE NINTH

The proportions of every detail are such that none but the most practiced eyes can at first sight realize the immensity. One must see it repeatedly in the contrasts afforded by varying throngs of human beings, the insignificance of vast crowds, the nothingness of individuals, the interminable distances traversed by processions, before his thought grows to the measure of its expanse. The grandeur of architecture here reverses the impression which great buildings ordinarily make. To the first view the surprise is not the greatness of the building, but the littleness of the men and women in it; and the spectator comes gradually to a conception of its majestic extent through an overwhelming consciousness of his own insignificance.

Of course every one tries his hand at criticising St. Peter's. But no one should form a fixed opinion on its builders' success until he has seen it fulfilling the function for which it was designed, that of the theatre for the great dramatic spectacles with which the Church endeavors to awaken and stimulate the religious feelings of mankind. It is easy to say that a Greek cross would have been preferable, although at the loss of a vast area, and that a Grecian portico would have been more imposing than a gigantic house-front. But when upon the great balcony the Pope appears before the world as the central figure in a vast and harmonious architectural frame; when the long nave of the church is lined with a perspective of soldiers, and the papal procession unfolds its full length, the observer feels that the same spirit that created the pageant planned for it the theatre in which it takes place.

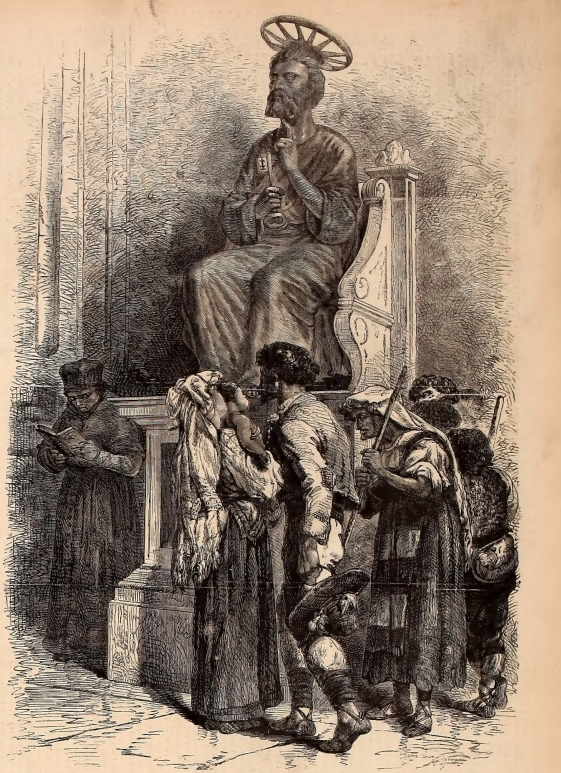
PIO NONO

The admirable full-length portrait of the Pope, who for nearly a quarter of a century has been the central figure of these scenes renders any description of his person unnecessary. He was born in May, 1792—or, as some Romans assert, in 1790—and chosen Pope in June, 1846.

His age and feeble health, in connection with the intense political and ecclesiastical interests that depend upon his continuance, have long turned public attention to the question of who, or what, should be his successor.

THE BRONZE SAINT PETER.

As the visitor passes up the nave toward the altar and the pride-dieu of the Pope, he sees before him, upon the right, seated upon a marble chair on a high pedestal, the bronze statue of St. Peter, with a metallic halo around his head, and holding the key in his hand, in the attitude of surveying the scene before him as the presiding genius of the place. In all the great pageants which take place within these walls, this statue, conspicuous above the heads of the crowd, although, like other human forms, diminished and dimmed by the vast building which overshadows it, is present in the consciousness of the observer, and enters into the idea of the scene. There is some dispute among antiquarians whether this is an authentic statue of the apostle, or one adapted to the purpose from among the heathen relics of Rome. But the faithful, ignorant of such controversies, pay their devotions at the foot of the statue, signifying their reverence by devoutly kissing the projecting toe of the left foot. Before applying his lips the votary wipes the toe with his cuff, by way of preparation, and the effect of this contact, incessantly repeated through many ages, is visible in the very sensible diminution and the polished color of its extremity.



THE BRONZE SAINT PETER.

HOLY-WEEK IN ROME.

With many travelers in Europe Holy-Week in Rome is the culmination and turning-point of the tour. Italy is the apex of European travel, Rome the pinnacle of Italy, and Holy-Week the climax of Rome. The week begins with Palm-Sunday, the heads of many are braided in various forms and sometimes gilded. The congregation of children often seen in a parish church, each holding a palm aloft, all agitated in a constant motion by the restlessness of the children, is a very pretty spectacle.

When the Pope has distributed the palms the scene of Christ's entry into Jerusalem is actually represented by a procession in which they are borne. A donkey, as in the Greek church, opens the scene to which the spectator is transported. The procession is formed, and the Pope, borne on the shoulders of men, and surrounded by all that is brilliant or gorgeous, passes down the centre of the church, between hedges of soldiers drawn up to keep off the intrusive thrust of the crowd. The Pope, and every cardinal, prince, and priest in the procession, like the little children in the Greek church, carry palms in their hands. The imposing cortege passes out of the church, and the voices of its singers are heard again in the distance, announcing its entrance into the vestibule; but the doors are closed, and a band of priests forming a semi-circle stand guarding them within. The voices without chant the verses, Open the gates and let the King of Glory in! The semi-chorus within reply, Who is this King of Glory? And thus, with responsive action, at last the door is struck open, and the representative of the King of Glory advances, while the chorus recounts his triumph.

RELICS.

Monday and Tuesday are occupied with less important ceremonies; but here is also a great "religious" mass, amidst the relics to be visited and the special local ceremonies of particular churches. It is difficult to choose what is possible to see all. There is the Bambino, or "baby boy" of S. Maria in Aricoli, a doll-like figure of wood, said by one of its custodians to have been carved from a stick of olive, from the Mount of Olives, four hundred years ago, but said by another to have been made by St. Luke as an image of the infant Jesus. This figure is wrapped in elegant swaddling clothes, which are perfectly incrusted with jewels of every kind that have been presented to it by worshipers. It is sent for in cases of sickness all over Rome. Placed by the bed of the sick, the bed of death or confinement, it promotes, if not secures, relief and recovery. It is shown to visitors who ask for it at the church, unless, indeed, it should happen to be out on a professional tour.

The visitor in Rome wishes to obtain some souvenir, if not for himself at least for some Catholic friend or servant. There is none better than a fac-simile of the nail with which one of our Saviour's hands was pierced upon the cross. This can be bought at the church of S. Croce in Gerusalemme, where the original is shown, and where the reed on which the sponge was put to his mouth, the inscription set over the cross' head, and many other interesting relics are contained. Other churches contain others equally precious.

GRAND PENITENCIER.

The forgiveness of certain grave sins is reserved to the higher ecclesiastics on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of Holy-Week. A cardinal assends a tribune, and is seated upon a throne in St. Peter's, and also in St. John in Lateran, and, while a brilliant throng gather about him, noble penitents accuse their guilt and receive from his absolution and spiritual counsel. Minor ecclesiastics occupy the confessional-boxes, which are ranged against the walls of the great transepts, and each, holding a long, light wand, strikes gentle blows upon the group of humble peasants kneeling before him, thus symbolizing the forgiveness of their sins.

THE SACRED STAIRS.

Holy-Week in Rome would not be complete without a visit to the Sacred Staircase. Over against the church of St. John in Lateran, quite at the other end of the city from St. Peter's, stands the building known as the Scala Santa. The visitor enters a long and lofty vestibule, from the opposite side of which there rise several broad and massive staircases separated from each other by parallel walls. Each staircase consists of twenty-eight steps. They appear as if, together, they constituted the great ceremonial of some vast edifice above. The central staircase is covered with planks of oak, beneath the edges of which a cut has been made to preserve the steps much worn. This central staircase is, by tradition, the staircase of Pilate's house in Jerusalem, from which our Saviour passed when going to crucifixion. In the oak planks which now protect it, at intervals of several and again at the twelfth step, a plate of glass let into a hole cut for the purpose in the plank, permits the devout worshiper (by no lay of faith) what remains of the spots of blood which fell from the suffering Redeemer. It is permitted to any one to go up and down the staircase at the sides, but no one is allowed to pass over the Sacred Staircase except upon the knees. A monk seated at a little desk by the side ready to call back any heedless stranger who may attempt to ascend them except in this way. The following statement, printed in a neat slip distributed by the monk to visitors, indicates the object of this ceremony:

THE VISIT TO THE HOLY STAIRS.

One of the most sacred remembrances of the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ is certainly the Holy Stairs, worthy of the veneration of all Christians, since they were mounted so many times by our Divine Redeemer, and sanctified by his precious Blood during the last hours of his life.

These stairs, brought from Jerusalem to Rome, under the protection of the Empress Helena, about the year 326, are kept in the chapel called Sancta Sanctorum, universally celebrated, fave at all times been much frequented by both sexes, of every class, who mount the steps on their knees.

To engage more particularly Christians to accomplish this act of devotion, so precious and useful to the soul of the devout, S. Leo the IV. towards the year 850, and Pascal the II. by his Bull of the 5th August 1100, first year of his election (the Original Bull is conserved in the Archive of the Basilic of S. John of Lateran) granted 9 years of indulgence for each of the 28 steps of the forestaid Holy Stairs, once of the Prætor's house of Pontius Pilate, which shall be severally on the knee, with a contrite heart, praying or meditating on the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

Pius VII, by a Decree of the Holy Congregation of Indulgences September the 5, 1817, renewed the indulgences, and perpetually, for ever, that Holy Stairs be shrined in a de nuis in Purgatory.

ROMA 1860.—with approbation.

There are now women loitering about the door ready to do this penance for any one; so that for the trifling consideration of two copper sous, one can have the benefit of nineteen thousand two hundred and fifty years is taken off his future punishment.

Arrived at the head of the Sacred Staircase, the visitor, kneeling, finds himself before a grated window into a sombre little chapel, which is called the Holy of Holies, and where a very ardent and highly valued image of Christ is kept, among many other precious relics, and is uncovered to view once in the year.

MASS IN THE SISTINE CHAPEL.

On the days succeeding the triumphal procession of Palm-Sunday the services are more sorrowful and penitential, until the church is in mourning, and the Lamentations are chanted on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday the most important services of the week take place in the presence of a very select audience in the Sistine Chapel. This chapel is a large hall in the Palace of the Vatican, connected by a great staircase with the church of St. Peter's. Its lofty walls and long ceiling afforded scope for the greatest paintings of Michael Angelo. The human countenance and figure in these latter walls are the most impressive, if not the most imposing of the work. The mournful service is called the Tenebræ, because performed in the night. On Friday the deepest gloom prevails. The altars are stripped, the canopies removed. Purple robes are held aside, and all is mourning. As the Lamentations are sung one candle after another is extinguished, until the climax of the service is reached in the Miserere—a music such as is not elsewhere heard in the world.

THE WASHING OF FEET AND THE LAST SUPPER.

Every part of the services of the week has a character of life and reality to it which gives the whole the effect of a dramatic representation of "The Passion of Our Lord." On Thursday the mournful service is suddenly broken by the notes of joy. The priests appear in white garments, and the Gloria in Excelsis is sung. On this day is enacted the scene of the Last Supper and the washing of feet.

Thirteen priests are selected for the occasion, the selection being a matter of honor. They thus represent the Apostles while the Pope and cardinals attend and serve them in the washing and at the Supper. These ceremonies take place in different parts of the building, and on account of the crowd it is difficult if not impossible for a spectator to obtain both time and room.

EXPOSITION OF RELICS IN ST. PETER'S.

Toward evening after the execution of the Miserere an imposing ceremony takes place in St. Peter's. A throne is erected upon a tribune in the Basilica contains, among other relics, the lance, a piece of the true cross, and the napkin of St. Veronica, upon which the impression of Jesus's face was made when the pitying woman wiped his brow. The ecclesiastics, who alone can enter this chapel, appear in solemn procession by the arch, and illumined by lights placed for the purpose, which scarcely penetrate the surrounding darkness, they lower the relicts before the low moments into the view of the worshipers and spectators.

BLESSING THE WORLD.

On Thursday, after service in the Sistine Chapel, in the forenoon, the great Benediction of the City and of the World is pronounced from the balcony of St. Peter's. This ceremony is repeated under still more imposing circumstances on Easter Sunday about noon. The front of St. Peter's two lofty colonnades run forward, encircling, like outstretched arms, an immense area, which is paved and ornamented in front of the Vatican palaces, and which, on such occasions as these, is filled with a crowd of spectators, in carriages and on foot, and with troops under arms. The balcony over the upper central window of the facade is the point to which all eyes are directed to see the Pope, who usually appears there in solemn benediction. The vastness of the area is not apparent to the eye, so grand are its proportions. Some idea may be formed of it when it is said that it is five minutes' walk from the end of the colonnade in the fore-ground of the picture to the door of the church. The Egyptian obelisk is seen rising over the colonnades on the right is the Vatican, the palace of the Pope.

THE PROCESSION.

Easter Sunday is the culmination of these ceremonies. By five o'clock in the morning a crowd of visitors in grand toilet are awaiting patiently the opening of the doors, for the seats have been reserved have arrived and taken their places. A double rank of military is formed to open a route for the procession through the nave of the church; and to the sound of military music the procession enters, forming a bewildering cortège of whose brilliance and richness no verbal description suffices to convey an idea. The Pope is seen borne on the shoulders of men, wearing his crown, and shielded by the great plumes of peacock's feathers which are borne behind him. On this day, one of three times in the year, he officiates in person in the celebration of the mass. The elevation of the host, ordinarily indicated by the sound of a bell, is, on this occasion, signalized by military music, with the blasts of trumpets from a band concealed on high in the dome.

In the evening the vast area in front of the church is again crowded by spectators to witness the illumination of St. Peter's. Every line and angle in its architecture, including the vast ribs of the dome and the cross which crowns all, is drawn against the night sky in the blazing light of lamps and torches.

THE END OF LENT.

The season of sorrow which the Church commemorates is at an end, and pleasure and business resume their sway. Horse-races and military reviews draw Rome out of itself on a Sunday afternoon in the month beyond the walls. The throng of visitors is diminished by the attractions of Florence and Naples. The picnic excursions to neighboring mountains or ruins, and the fox-hunts in the Campagna, revive. And Rome grows more quiet, preparing for the hot magnificence that before the season shall come round again, bringing the world to witness Holy-Week in Rome.

POETRY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER IV.

IN WHICH REBECCA LETS HER SENTIMENTS BE KNOWN, NOT ONLY TO HER LOVER, BUT TO THE WORLD IN GENERAL.

AND, alas! for poor Rebecca. She was in very evil case indeed. She would have wandered for help from man, but there was none to help her; as for prayer, religion had been for a long time hated by her, so that way out of her trouble was denied her.

The phase of anger and scorn in which she had had shelter from love was gone now as well as alone. The reaction from it was a feeling of plaintive, pathetic loneliness, infinitely mournful. This is the most pronounced silent mood they in their turn produced calm, and calm thought.

Thought sadly lame, incoherent, unconscusive, but thought still. Here was an evil, to her mean real and horrible, to be escaped from. How was she to move alone against the world?

Sheer angry persistent defiance and wrath? How would that do? Well enough as long as it lasted; but could she depend on it to last for ever? Would they not beat her by sheer perseverance? Again, her father was wrong—impossible men of strong physical capacity: could they not wear her out? merely tire her out? Her look at such a question out in body by her long effort, as weak as a child, sitting on the floor crying and calling on her dead mother, without even knowing it, to go to bed. A forthnight's fight with her father would reduce her to this state permanently, and they would be able to do as they liked with her. That would not do.

Craft, procrastination? No, that would not do with her father. She knew him too well for that. It would only weaken her hand, and the end would be just the same. No, try again, poor Rebecca!

The Roman Catholics! Her face brightened, and her breath came fast as she thought of that. If she ran away to the Roman Catholics they would take her in for her mother's sake, and shelter her behind their altars. She believed that she had been christened into their Church: if so, they would know it in Cadogan Street, and that would give them a right over her. It seemed for a moment a perfect plan, but it was soon dulled. The case of Miss T——— was fresh then, and she knew that as a minor (she was but nineteen), a magistrate had to trace her, her father to demand her, and she would be brought back a culprit, in a worse case than before.

Evils lately had been heaped by one-half of them into this air. She had found no solution as yet, yet she felt in her instinct as to thinking, that one would come. It made her almost gasp in her desperation, when she first got the faith, that the certain end of her trouble was in her reach if she only thought long enough. So that, when some wandering fiend said to her, "If the worst come to the worst, Putney bridge is close by; and when the tide is ebbing strong there is an undrawn there which gives back nothing alive," she laughed, and shaking out her black, sharply-curled hair before the glass, looked at her beauty, and said: "Not for him, will but for myself. I am not such as he."

Suicide—no!" she said, proudly; and all in a moment, as she said the words, a crude, shapeless idea crossed her into her brain, dazing her and making her gasp.

Whence came it, this frightful amorphous idea? Was it only the last result of some mental sorites, tangled beyond the possibility of reduction; or was it a direct suggestion from the unseen powers? Be it as it may, it came in one way or another? It was so shapeless at first that it made her afraid; but so she, in her desperation, steadily faced it, it crystallized itself, and took form. The form it took was ugly enough, yet it looked beautiful to her beside the hideous fate to which she was to be condemned to-morrow.

Suicide! Why did lost women commit physical suicide? Why did weak, cowardly women gather courage to leap off diary places into dark water—off places which they shuddered to look at with their protecting lovers' arms round their waist? What gave them this preternatural courage? Why, they had committed suicide before. They had done that which left them no place in this English world. Done that which made them a loathing and a scorn to father, brother, sister—to every one, save mother—and she had none. What if she were to pretend to do that which would make it at all events utterly impossible for this horrible old man to marry her? Who, then? Was there no escape there? There was.

For her father she had no pity whatever. He had brought it on himself, and it would do him good. Her mother had been her only friend, and he had ill-treated her mother. She knew the whole of the old story, partly from memory and partly from cross-examining her cousin sister Caroline. She had no pity for him. He knew well her hatred for this match, and had disbelief enough in it. Let him look to himself.

But here came a difficulty. How was she, after she had gained her own object, to exhilarate herself? What means should she use to prove herself utterly stainless and innocent before the world, whenever it should suit her to do so? She had given him a week to bear thinking over this. Without holding in her hand irrefragable proofs of her own innocence, she would feel, and indeed her part to-day, and would have made it impossible for her, at the proper time, to hurl back the scorn of their miserable little world upon itself. The way out of this difficulty came on her suddenly, like a clear flash of light; and she laughed at her own stupidity in not thinking of it before.

The night wore on, and she packed away her clothes in her drawers, putting a few necessaries in a carpet-bag. She counted out her money—£18 odd—more than sufficient for her purpose. Then she sat down and wrote a short letter to her father:

"SIR,—It has pleased you, in spite of my frequently-expressed repugnance, to urge on my marriage with Mr. Ralph Darrell.

"As I desire to remain single, I have chosen, between two evils, to integrate myself from my family sooner than contract such a monstrous alliance.

"Your daughter,

"REBECCA."

It was now broad daylight until half past six. At which time Jim Akin, the coster-monger, and Mr. Spicer, the sweep, saw her come out of the door with her carpet-bag, clear it before her, and walk straight away, apparently in the direction of Putney bridge.

"Off at last," said Jim Akin.

"Wonder she hadn't gone afore," said Mr. Spicer. "She's a' stood it a dratted sight longer nor I thought she would. Who's the young man, then?"

"Doubt there ain't nerry one," said Jim Akin, "I ain't seen nobody round."

"She is off to the Catholics, then," said Mr. Spicer. "Her mother was one, and so is my wife. They'll be good care on her."

"I am glad of that," said Jim Akin, the costermonger; "for she is a gallus kindly, good wench. She's worth what I call a deal, that gal has. She nigh kep my old girl when I was in—in the orspital."

Mr. Spicer, worthy from a habit of regarding the world from his early youth out of the tops of chimneys very early in the morning, when there was little about, was a philosopher. That also, was one of his clean days; he had had his bath overnight, having sent one of his assistants to the "dabs" for it, and was a respectable tradesman instead of a grimy ruffian. He philosophized thus:

"Gals is much the same as boys is. I've hammered and leathered a boy into a cross flue and he has choked himself for spite. I've coaxed and another boy into it. I've coaxed and he has gone through it like a ferret. That girl has been leathered too much morally. I hope she'll do no more harm than going to the Catholics. Meanwhile it ain't, neither for you nor for me, to give the office on her."

Mr. Hagbut, coming for his answer at ten o'clock, found a scared household. Turner had not gone to business. He received Mr. Hagbut in the parlor.

Turner's state of mind was fury, nothing short of it. His daughter had utterly disgraced him, and perhaps it was a blessing

There were worse wenches than she. You and I are two fools, I doubt, Haghat."

Mr. Haghat began, "Perndventure—"

"Say perhaps," said Turner, testily.

"Perhaps, then," said Mr. Haghat, solemnly, "your other daughter is at home, likewise the handmaiden?"

"What do you want with them?"

"Only, in the presence of Christian witnesses, to say that you may not be with me and your daughter as it was before. The few sheep in the wilderness—"

"What do you mean, man?" said Turner, sternly. "Do you mean that it is all over between you and my daughter?"

"Doubtless," said Mr. Haghat. "The flock—"

"Hang the flock!" snapped Turner. "Can't you see that my poor girl would not touch you with a pair of tongs; that she would sooner ruin her reputation (and she is a high-spirited girl) than have any thing to do with you? Of course it is all over. We were fools to think of it."

"Doubtless," said Mr. Haghat.

"Look here, man," said Turner, speaking as the men and the lover: "there will be one to be thing understood about my girl. She has left her father's roof, and I don't know where she is gone. But if you, or any of your good women, dare to say one word against her character, without legal proof, by the living Lord I'll make you sweat for it, or I'm no lawyer! Perhaps I've been wrong with the wench, perhaps I was wrong with her mother; but you mind what I tell you."

So Rebecca had won her first round. She would have laughed had she known it, but she did not. She had taken down a dress of gray hair, and had twisted it in one of her own black curls, and had said: "How long will it be, Elizabeth, before you make my hair as gray as mine with their nonsense?" And old Elizabeth had said: "Well, we shall see the set at the next station, and I have not seen it for forty years."

This was not a lucky day for Mr. Haghat. He could not by any one who would sympathized with, which was very terrible. Some lamented with him, some piously congratulated him on his escape; while the more unbelieving of his congregation, those who could not be well refused, made him tell them all about it. A jilted man always looks more or less of a fool. The world has always put in force its penalty of contempt against those who are unsuccessful in love or war; and Mr. Haghat knew that he was undergoing it, and, using his vast powers of looking for light, he actually succeeded in doing so. A most unsuccessful day!

Meanwhile, one thing was certain. Whatever had become of Rebecca, she would be persecuted by no more offers of marriage.

CHAPTER V.

THE LITTLE FRIENDS.

LEADEN STREET, Chelsea, is one of those streets which utterly and entirely belong to the poor. It is a street where you may see the very poor at home in person, and looking at the stalls and shops where they traffic for their daily bread; may guess how hard it is for them to live.

The largest and most frequented shop on one street was the coal and green-grocery shop, dealing also in potatoes, bundles of fire-wood, and ginger-beer. The grocer's was a Saturday-night shop, as was also the butcher's. The green-grocer's, however, supplied some little regular wants which might arrive at any moment. Half a hundred of coals, a bundle of wood, a couple of pounds of potatoes, were things in demand all the week round. Tidbury were seldom still.

Tibbey himself was a very little man, like an innocent little bird, with a little face, and a retreating way of serving in his shop that reminded you of a robin or some other soft-billed bird. Mrs. Tibbey was hearty, large, blonde, stout, and gray, and she looked as though she might have been something of a beauty in her youth; and, indeed, she was beautiful now, as far as an expression of gentle goodness could make her so.

This couple were perfectly devoted to one another, and were always at the shutter of either. In religion they were Primitive Methodists; and they were childless.

Except indeed by adoption, as it were. One child, whom Mrs. Tibbey had nursed, was very near to both the parents, and always remembered in their prayers night and morning. She had risen from their knees, and almost had her name in their mouths when the door opened and she stood before them.

Rebecca, ready dressed for traveling. Before they had time to ask her ingenuities she said, "Dear, I have run away to you." Whereupon Mrs. Tibbey, as a preliminary measure, folded her in her arms.

"And I want my breakfast, please; I am so hungry. Please put some more tea in, Mr. Tibbey, for I shall want a deal, and I hate it weak. And could you let me have the cat? Then I will tell you all about it."

She was as full of truth these good souls as she was at home; but, ah! with what a different willfulness.

"Yes," she said, as they began bustling about, "I have run right away, Mr. Tibbey. They were going to marry me to Mr. Haghat."

"My pretty lamb!" said Mrs. Tibbey, pausing in her preparations to swell in pigeon-like indignation, and coo out her wrath, "my pretty love, how dared they?"

"Like their impudence, was it not?" replied Rebecca, very anxious not to make the matter look too serious. "Well, you know I was not going to stand that—far from it—and so I have run away to you, Libber, to make my terms from a distance. And you will lend her to me for three days, won't you, Mr. Tibbey, just to take care of me?"

"Miss Rebecca," said the little man, "you may, I think, depend on Elizabeth, as heretofore, always doing what is right. And what is right in this case, my dear young lady, is that she should go with you where you will, so that hereafter the finger—do I use too strong an expression, and give offense?"

"Just what I want," cried Rebecca.

"Then I will use that strong expression—that the finger of scorn may never be pointed. And indeed," continued the little man, with the ferocious air of that most pugnacious bird the robin, "I should like to see the man who would dare."

What could Rebecca do but kiss him? She did it, however; and Mr. Tibbey toasted a muffin with many ominous shakes of the head, though he would say, "I shall have to look some of them up some day, if they don't mind their manners."

It was a dingy little parlor enough (though scrupulously neat), and smelt of the stock in trade, in addition to the usual which is the smell elsewhere, but have always, from early association, accompanied the Leaden Street, underlying the whiff of red herring, cat's meat, coal, with perhaps a whiff of turpentine from the bundles of fire-wood; there was the tree, low-London odor of soot and confined humanity, yet what a free little paradise it was to Rebecca! The inevitable parting from one face of the dim distance as yet. She was free, and with those who loved her; her heart was so light that she could have sung aloud.

These simple, gentle Methodists, primitive in more than their methodism, saw nothing very extraordinary in the step which Rebecca had taken. It seemed to them that she had acted with singular discretion in coming straight to them. Living there as they did in perfect purity and innocence, with sin and vice and poverty all around them, they were well used to far more terrible things than the mere fact of a young lady, sore-bested by an uncongenial marriage, taking refuge with them. Only one remark did Mrs. Tibbey make on the subject during breakfast.

"Why, my dear soul, your good pa must be mad to think of such a thing! Why, he is sixty!"

"He is very rich," said Mr. Tibbey, blowing a saucer of tea. "He is the richest customer in that commission. "He got no less than twenty—two-thousand—pounds with his last wife. She was the widder Ackerman of Church Walk, and he convinced her of sin, and married her."

"Law!" said Mrs. Tibbey, evidently not disinclined to hear more. "I have no doubt he was a great sinner before. Got all her money, did he?"

"Every shilling," said Mr. Tibbey, holding out his cup for some more tea. "It was thought there was more than that her cousin, Mrs. Morley, would have had some of it, for she brought him into the house. But she didn't."

"What Mrs. Morley was that?" asked Rebecca, interested.

"Mrs. Morley's wife of Lime'us 'ole, my dear. She is dead some years now. Overworked herself, tupposing round after him among the sick people in consumption, in the fever 'ole, and up Ratcliff 'ighway, and all along shore there to Wapping. And she died, poor dear, Ah! the only thing I can honestly say about her was never truly awakened, and fell away from grace to the extent of refusing the ordinances altogether. But he took her as I love Elizabeth. And she died."

"I know Mr. Morley," said Rebecca, eagerly. "Then, my dear, you know a man who is by a sweet saver in God's nostrils. He is not of my communion on this earth; but we shall know him in heaven, and her too, maybe."

"What was Mr. Morley?" asked Rebecca.

"A gentleman, my dear."

"I thought so," said Rebecca.

"Yes, a gentleman and a scholar," said Mr. Tibbey, "a man who knew the knowledge of this world, and of science—falsely so called—but is good for a true Christian; for the knowledge of this world is vanity."

"I should like to judge for myself about that," thought Rebecca.

"He was a doctor, but he got converted, and joined their communion. He was from Cumbridge College—one of the Simonites, I think. They call you 'Sar-but' when I tell up when he got converted. There is the shop. Now you and Elizabeth see what you are going to do." And so the great man went off to serve a client.

"Elizabeth," said Rebecca, "we must go from here this morning. Are you afraid to go to Broadstairs?"

"Not in the least. Would, indeed, very much like it."

"Then get ready," was all that Rebecca said; and the good woman departed to do so. The simple woman was entirely at the girl's disposal. She dreaded nothing but being left to go on that was concerned would have trusted her darling to any where. But she knew also, that so long as she kept by the girl her fair fame could not be touched; and she went with cheerful recklessness.

It was not long before they had found an omnibus in the King's Road. An hour and a half afterward they were rattling along through the chalk-pits of Kent toward the sea. In the evening they were having tea together at an open window in a little cottage, with the sea gossiping to them at their feet; the Foreland a dim black wall, close on their right, and the white-winged ships creeping away to happy lands, where there was no chapel and no Sundays.

So said Rebecca. "It is good for me to be here," she said. "I could almost fancy being so, except that man, if they would let me come here three days in the year. I could live six months in the recollection, and the next six on the anticipation. Libber, dear, let us run away again next year."

It was pleasant enough by daylight, it was pleasant enough by moonlight; but in the dark, dark morning, when the sea was down, and the awoke in the dark in a strange place, where was it then? Ghostly, horrible! What frightful machinery was this she had put in motion for the temporary destruction of her own good name and her father's? And how was it at that hour, about seven, at Wallins Street, Chelsea? What were they saying of her? And she must go back on it in three days—a ruined girl. Would she dare do so? or would she die of fright, of sheer terror, as she approached it? There was the horrible old house, and there waited her angry father at the door. She had only taken the sole means to save herself from a fate worse than death: and now, in the darkness, she felt like a murderess and an outcast. What had she done that God should plague her so?

She could lie no longer in her room. She rose and went to the window. The very blessed sea talked no longer under her windows, but had gone far out to the horizon, and was whispering there. There was no light in the sky, and there was darkness and terror in bed.

Darkness and terror! The crowning horror in Frankenstein is the closed room where the monster must be. Her crowning horror was the old house at Wallins Street, to which she must return and meet her father. The men who study a certain kind of wickedness say that what is wanted with a criminal is opportunity. I believe that if the Rev. Mr. Haghat had been able to take advantage of his opportunity, and had pressed his suit just then, poor Rebecca would have accepted him and thanked him. As she was in the dark, in the strange room, that man, coarse brute as he was, would have been a release from the closed, dull, disgraced house at home, with all its traditions and respectabilities violated in her wildly audacious person.

CHAPTER VI.

THE RETURN.

THESE were night-thoughts, how different were those of the day! The sea had come back and was rippling on the shingle crisply at her feet. The bright sun was overhead, and a brisk east wind was driving the ships past the down and down the channel, a pleasant sight. The outward-bound ones, full-breasted, crowded with canvas, gay: the home-going ones, sailless, melancholy, tossed by the contrary gales of wind; however, one need only look at the outward-bound ones just now, in three days' time one may think of the homeward.

Many ships went to and fro before Rebecca was tired of looking at them. She got more and more interested in them as time went on, asking all manner of questions about them from the fishermen and others on the beach; simple questions enough, considering those she asked in her very simplicity: even when her weary head was turned homeward they were still in her mind's eye.

Her despair at going back was so dull that it was more endurable. What signifies a little angony more or less?" Here, however, had been three days from which they could not deprive her; they would last her a long time these three days.

She came home about nine o'clock on the Saturday night. Elizabeth opened the door, and she passed in quite silently, and taking off her bonnet, sat down, whereupon her sister Caroline and Mrs. Tibbey both assisted Mr. Turner in opening the conversation.

"You may well cry, my poor child," he began; "you have done well out with this three days' anxiety, my dear; your sister seems none the worse for her disgraceful escapade."

"I am sorry you want my anger," was all she said. "You can scold while I eat it. Only make a finish and end of it as soon as you can."

"Rebecca, where have you been, and what have you been doing?" said her father.

"I am not going to tell you," she replied. "I am not going to say one word."

"Are you aware that Mr. Haghat's visits have permanently ceased in consequence of your extraordinary conduct, and that your character is not worth that?"

"It was you who drove me to this course by your cruel aborting of that most unnatural marriage. If my mother had been alive she would not have dared to do it. Have you any thing more to say?"

"I have," said Turner, getting thoroughly angry; "your sister's character and position are affected."

"What, old Carry; why what has she been doing?"

"I mean that her position is affected through you. You are answerable to her own, and he will come fast enough, I'll warrant you. My poor old Carry," she went on, kissing her sister. "I hope I have not lost you your sweet-heart. They drove me to it, you know."

Carry only introduced an imbecile whimper into the crying, as though she had been playing the organ and pulled out another stop. The stop would not go in again, and so she arose swiftly and went hysterically up stairs.

"Poor Carry," said Rebecca, dolefully. "I am very sorry. I could almost have liked the persistent self-inflicted misery of that Vergril family, and would have enjoyed herself thoroughly." So saying, she rose and rang the bell, and when the maid came, ordered supper.

When the maid was gone Mr. Turner had a few more words to say. "You are carrying matters coolly, Rebecca. But there is one thing I wish you distinctly to understand. The next time you leave my house without my permission you leave it for good."

"I quite understand that. You drove me out of it for the sake of my own purposes. I shall not go again. Have you any thing more to say?"

"Nothing at present."

"This may seem an unpropitious time to say what I am going to say, but I will say it, nevertheless," resumed Rebecca, very quietly and calmly. "Father, I remember something, and I know more. I know that this has always been a miserable and most unhappy house. I know that you and my mother were bitter enemies, instead of being as husband and wife should be. I know that all your recollections of my poor mother are painful, revolting, shocking; and I know that I being like her in person and temper have kept them alive. You and I have never been friends. Say that it has been my fault. I say that I am tired of it, and wish to be friends. I am sick of this everlasting antagonism of will between us; it has done no good. I have resisted you, but you are as obstinate as ever; you have tried to coerce me, with what success I have the last three days to tell. Why should this battle of this unnatural battle go on? Let us not let me love you? Such a little yielding on your part would make a heaven out of this most miserable world. Will you answer me?"

Not one word would he answer, except to say, "Have you any thing more to advance?"

"Yes, I have. I have thrown off a desperate, hardened woman, casting my good name to the winds to save myself from a fate worse than death, which you had prepared for me. Having those three days I have been lapped in love—a love abandoned and never failing, and surrounded by a religion purer and gentler than I knew, father; a religion which hoped all things, and believed all things. And in spite of my cold hearing and my hard words, I have come back softened and purified. Father, life is not so very long, and we are growing, never part again. If I have said hard and bitter things they came into the house, will you forgive them me as I forgive what you have said, and let us learn to love one another?"

No. His heart was dumb to it. He had never yielded to his mother, now it likely he would yield to the daughter? He told her in a surly voice to show her repentance and amendment by a return of obedience, and began his supper.

She spoke next, hard as iron. "My health will suffer if I am entirely confined to this house, and you know it scarcely will that. My will is up and down the lease if I promise not to go out of it. If you will not, I will go, if you think it worth having, I will give you my word of honor."

"You may go from one end of the lane to the other, but no further. I'll have no scandals my house. I shall be rich enough some think, but I'm well trusted—very few dream how much. And my good name is more precious to me than any thing else. I've tried to keep it, and I have not yet, in a loud excited manner. "And any other would have made thousands where I've made hundreds; and no one has ever breathed a word against me in the dirt except your mother and you. And I served God faithful," he went on, now beginning to weep, "and I did. And I tried to keep my name clean: the greatest in the land have said to me, 'Turner, you are not a lawyer, you are a saint.' I am a friend, we can trust you here, your name is unspotted;' and God has afforded me like this. First your mother, and then you."

Rebecca's bolder and more generous nature, which loathed ill-disguised, the main cause of her petulance, was thoroughly overcome. She went to him and took both his hands, saying, quickly:

"Father! father! your good name shall not suffer from me. I am as innocent as the day. I can prove my innocence at a moment's. Do you think that I have done any thing unworthy of you? Do you think that I did not have my proofs before me as clear as noon?"

"Proofs! silly girl, yes; but who will believe them? You little know this wretched world and its tongues. If you will have it, I believe that will ever quiet old Russel and old Soper's tongues? You are a fool if you do."

"And who are they?" asked Rebecca, loftily.

"The tongues of the world we live in. The tongues which would turn against me first of all, and ruin me in our religious community, if any thing went wrong. You don't know the world, and are a fool."

"I wish you had been away with me these three days, father; you might have got to despise this little, simple child of ours."

But he remained sulky and silent. Yet in a surly strange manner he took her into his confidence before she went to bed.

"You are a bold, courageous girl," he growled. "I needn't ask that, this week's experience shows that."

"I believe that I have good courage, father."

"That's lucky, because your sister Carry is a nervous fool. And you are a light sleeper, too, I know."

"Yes, the slightest thing awakes me."

"Then see if you can make yourself useful. If you hear the very slightest noise in the night, come to me in my bedroom just as you are, shake me, and pull me out of bed. You will find a light burning. I am apt to be mazed and stupid when first awakened. Are you afraid of firearms?"

HORRORS OF THE EMIGRANT SHIP—SCENE IN THE HOLD OF THE "JAMES FOSTER, JUN."—[SEE PAGE 206.]

"I never saw any. I will do what you tell me. I will trust you thoroughly."

He went to a drawer in the side-board, and came back with a Deane and Adams revolver in his hand.

"See here," he said. "If I am not fairly awake, you will find this on the stand by my bed's head. If any man comes into my room before I am ready, take it—so—hold the barrel toward him—so—and keep pulling the trigger back—so. And screech murder the while. Can you do that?"

"I will try. But why is this? Have you much money in the house?"

"Money and worse."

"Could you not pay it into the banker's?"

"No, I daren't. I know too much. You would not be fool enough to talk of this?"

"Is it likely?" she said, smiling. "Will you say good-night?"

"Yes, I will say good-night. But mind, your treatment depends on your behavior. If you think you are forgiven, you will find yourself mistaken. I'll have obedience."

And so he went. And she began putting away the consumable portions of the banquet, that portion of the family supplies which, by a fiction current in such houses, the little servant is supposed habitually to pick and steal (their little servant would as lief have eaten molten lead). She had put away the cheese, the sugar, the whisky, and had locked the cupboard. She had got the ham, the loaf, and the lettuce on a tray, and was starting down stairs to lock them up in the larder away from the cat, who was all the time playing a game combined of cat's-cradle and puss-in-the-corner between her feet, mewing in a bland whisper, when she drove the tray into her father's chest, and brought him up short. "Ho!" he said. "Putting the things away. That's right."

The cat at once intertwined herself between his legs and amiably tripped him up.

"Bother the cat!" he exclaimed; "but she reminds me, though. I don't want to make it any duller than I can for you, Rebecca; only I will have order kept. You asked me last year if you might have a dog. And I said no."

"You did."

"I say yes now. You can have a dog, if it is a pleasure to you—"

"May I have a large one, or a little one?"

DISTRIBUTION OF RATIONS TO THE INDIANS AT MEDICINE BLUFF CREEK.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 205.]

"Any size; but let him be a barker, a tearer, a dog that never sleeps. Silcox has got dogs that would tear the heart's life out of a man, if he bent his black brows at them, and the other day I saw his grandchildren playing at horses with them. Get a dog like that, if you can; but get a barker."

CHAPTER VII.

THE NEW LIFE.

In the whole history of insurrection: I honestly believe that comparatively few are entirely successful. The position of the insurgent party is, in most instances, after a short time bettered. The fact is, one would fancy that no government is strong enough to stand many serious insurrections, and therefore, as soon as its stomach or its safety will allow, gives magnanimously what it would be dangerous to refuse to a high-spirited and well-organized minority—like Rebecca.

Her insurrection was not entirely without its fruits. If you come to consider, a daughter who has shown herself able and willing, under provocation, to absent herself promptly and secretly from home—making you look like a fool, and harassing you with inexorable terrors—is by no means a young lady to be trifled with. I once, in the range of my own personal experience, knew a young lady of tender years, in a certain school, who had the singular physical power of being very ill under the slightest contradiction; I mean ill as people are ill off the North Foreland. That child ruled the school, and learned just what she chose—which was nothing.

Turner was going to have no more escapades in his house. If Rebecca had only known her power she might have done pretty much as she liked, but she did not know it. Her feeling was, that she had utterly overstepped natural bounds, and had been on the whole, for her father, kinder than anyone. Her feeling about her escapade was one of sheer terror, now that the old manner of life was all around her. It would take a still more dreadful provocation to make her take such a step again.

Women, trained for so many centuries to entire dependence, are not good at a long, steady defiance to association and habit. That they are capable of it, the whole world knows; but if it is for them the most sustained effort which it costs them makes them coarse, fierce, and unwomanly. This continual effort of defiance will soon make, from habit, a woman's voice hoarse and manlike.

Rebecca happily escaped this. Her father had yielded, grudgingly, indeed, yet still readily; more than she had hoped for. Her condition was improved. The heretofore forbidden fruit, with all its wonders, was at all events hers now. With fresh healthy vitality, with the curiosity toward the world and its ways of a child in the wood, this boy, with its swarming, dirty population, was as a deeply interesting book to her, which she was eager to read.

She was the first moving in the household on Monday morning: the intervening Sunday she had passed in bed. She roused the maid, and left the others sleeping. When they came down there was breakfast ready, the Bible set by his plate, her father's cakes in their place, the newspaper warmed and ready for him, and his rasher of bacon hot in the fender. These facts, being taken by the allied powers as denoting contrition on her part, were received by her father in dumb silence, and by good Carry, who always trumped her father's trick, by a wondering sniff or two.

She did not care. She was to go into the house, and have a dog of her own. Hagbut was a thing of the past: that would soon win these two over.

The portion of Scripture which Mr. Turner had to read that morning was rather unpropitious to his purpose of twisting a moral out of it to hurt at Rebecca's head. It was the journey of Jonah to Nineveh. He thought that he should have to leave the moral exercitation to the prayer, when, stumbling on, he came to the fact that Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, exactly the time which Rebecca had been away. He emphasized this point so strongly, and paused so long, that Carry groaned, and the little maid—aroused suddenly from the orthodox religious coma, into which she always fell on the celebration of any form of worship, public or private—exclaimed, "Laws a mercy me!"

It was a great, though unforeseen, point or hit. His argument travelled between Jonah and Rebecca: but Mr. Turner was too old a hand not to see that it would not hold water too long. Rebecca thought that he would have twisted it into the prayer; but he knew better. He started from an entirely new basis of operations. "It don't matter," said Rebecca. "I shall catch it somehow. And so, when her father said, "Let us pray," she knelt down, wondering how he was going to do it.

He led up to his theme in the most masterly manner. It was feebly like some Scotch sermon which only remembers. You know the preacher's theme from his text, and you hear him go away into subjects apparently irrelevant, possibly three vague themes, which seem to have no relation to his text. You sit puzzled, and yet pleased, while he spins his first coarse mesh of yarn off into a single thread and leaves it. Then he spins you another heap of yarn into a thread, and leaving that, another; and then, taking his three threads, he spins them into a cord, which brings you back to his original proposition and his text. Then you take out your watch, and find that you have been sitting, with your intellect at its highest power, for one hour or so, and have thought it twenty minutes. A good Scotch sermon is not a thing to be despised. The Scotch are not considered to be devoid of brains, and they like them.

Turner's prayer had no similarity to a good Scotch sermon more than this. Rebecca knew that she would be his theme, and wondered how he would handle it. He handled it well enough for an Englishman. A Scotchman or a French preaching priest would have done it better; but it was creditable in a mere amateur.

Turner began by airing the old question of the permission of evil. The higher power doubtless did best, he wished that there might be no mistake about that; but, at the same time, he, Turner, did beg and pray the First Cause to reconsider his opinions, and take to governing the universe more in accordance with his, Turner's, ideas than heretofore. He proceeded to offer a singular number of practical suggestions to the First Cause, which he hoped might be practically attended to on the first opportunity. And then he began to draw up to Rebecca, who knelt with her head on one side, wondering what he was going to say.

It was in the thanksgiving part of the prayer that he overthrew and demolished Rebecca, to her great admiration and wonder. She had begun to think that he was going to leave her alone altogether, for she was at a loss to understand how he could have any great thanksgiving to make on her account; but when he began to thank the First Cause for such afflictions as had been sent him, and also for the strength which had been given to him in bearing them, she saw how he was going to do it—and admired.

She wondered much at his ingenuity in attacking her under a form of thanksgiving to the Deity. She wondered still more at the ingenuity of the details; but what she admired most of all was the singular, self-complacent egotism which underlay his whole prayer, and which cropped up at every point. She knew of old her father's habit, common enough to men who live in a little world, of talking of himself to other men; but to hear him, while attacking her, point out his manifest excellences to the Deity, and then compare himself to a miserable worm, filled her with pure astonishment. She had never before seen how entirely her father was given to self-worship. Abraham's pleading was reasonable; her father's was utterly unreasonable. When he came to the ultimate point of summing up his utterly blameless life, and thanking Providence for afflicting him with an undutiful and rebellious daughter to keep him from the sin of self-glorification, she was pained and dazed. She wanted to love him; how could she when he was so far from all else that she loved? Her father's religious exercise this morning had by no means a good effect on her. She was angry and bitter when she rose from her knees.

And she had meant to be so good. She left Carry to administer the little cares of domestic life which she, in the warmth of her heart, had prepared. She was silent and angry, and her father congratulated himself on having brought her to a sense of sin. He had brought her to a deep hatred of his form of religion.

She ate her breakfast in silence, but, keeping in mind the admissions of last night, saw that they must be kept before him. Toward the end of breakfast she said,

"I do love a dog; and I am to walk up and down the lane; that is allowed. I wish that some arrangement might be come to under which some arrangement might be come to under which I was not to be prayed at by pa before the maid, but that, I suppose, is hopeless. I can only say that, if it happens again, I shall rise from my knees and walk in the lane. I hate it."

"My dearest Rebecca!" said poor Carry.

"You may well say your dearest Rebecca, you two," said Rebecca, sullenly. "I meant to be as good as gold this morning, and submit, and be cheerful, and all that sort of thing. But I wish it understood that I will not be prayed at by pa, and thanksgivinged for by pa, or any one else. I may well state my existence at once. It is more than probable that very shortly I shall join the communion of the Primitive Methodists."

This was not quite such a dreadful threat to Mr. Turner as it was to Carry. Certainly, Mr. Turner suspected, the poor little Primitives were a low and poor sect, and the secession of one of the members of his household from a sect so rich as his, would thought it was, which nearly rivaled the National Church, would be as sad a thing as the secession of an ultra-evangelical in the National Church to Unitarianism or the Baptists. Yet, after all, if she did go, it would be one way of accounting for her eccentricity. He went on his boots and went to business in tolerable humor. If she did not do worse than go to the Primitive Methodists, and if that abandoned Primitive Christian would keep his eye on the house for a few months, matters would right themselves.

ISSUING BEEF TO THE INDIANS AT MEDICINE BLUFF CREEK.

Our correspondent writes from Medicine Bluff Creek where the different bands of Comanche, Kiowa, Apache, and Arrapahoe Indians are assembled, prior to their location on the reserves assigned them, and thus describes the scene which we present on page 205:

"The Indians are daily supplied with rations of beef, which is killed and piled up in a convenient location for distribution. Sometimes seven hundred head of beef on the hoof, and the Indians kill it for themselves; but they seem to prefer to have the labor of killing and quartering done by our butchers, as they can then come for and receive the quantity that may be apportioned to them. Nearly a hundred head of cattle are daily slaughtered to feed these, for the time, friendly Indians, who besides this draw rations of flour and bread. The Cheyennes have not yet come in. General Custer has gone after them to bring them in, quietly if possible; if not, he will attempt to force them."

Our late Secretary of War is to take the field against the Indians in place of General SHERIDAN.

FALSE AND TRUE.

Two walked under the olive-trees shading the walls of an ancient town,
Long ago, as with gold and purple canopied bravely the sun went down.

Strangely mated for lovers, they—he an eagle, and she a dove—
He with eyes of prophecy, under such a forehead as laurels love;

She with bashful and tender face, softly radiant with love's surprise—
Flushed with pink, like a peach-tree blossom under the fair Italian skies.

"Farewell, darling," he smiling said; "though this parting be bitter pain,
To the labor whose crowning wain me I must go—but I come again.

"Then, sweet love, how your heart will beat! From your swallow's nest looking down
You shall see how the eager people greet me back to the dear old town.

"Years may pass ere that golden day, fate and fortune may be unkind,
Yet no woman shall call me husband save the dear one I leave behind.

"Will you love me with patient love?—hold me precious the long years through?
Let us see, when the test is over, which of our two hearts proves most true!"

So he followed his guiding star to the region of song and art,
Wrought his dreams in the deathless marble, wooing Fame with a lover's heart.

Every shape of immortal youth which the soul of the artist thrills,
Charmed to sleep by some weird enchanter under the fair Carrara hills—

Gods and heroes of days gone by; saints and cherubs, a shining band—
Woke and rose, in their snowy beauty perfect under his master-hand.

Friendship sought him, and praise, and power; many a heart he wronged and rent;
Many a worship he won and wasted—smiling, spoiling, where'er he went;

Went the way that an artist loves, skimming the selfish sweets of life—
Giving to no one noble woman, loved and reverenced, the name of wife;

Yet he frittered his heart away, little by little, on many shrines,
Keeping nothing for her who waiting looked for him through her window vines.

So his beautiful years went by, smoothed by honors and ease and gold,
Till at last, after fourscore summers, all the days of his life were told.

Then they took him in splendid state back once more to the dear old town,
Where with his early love he wandered long ago as the sun went down.

Down the street as his funeral passed, leaning out from her casement high,
Pale and trembling, a white-haired woman gazed and wept as the crowd went by.

All are conquered by Fate or Time—there are changes in fifty years—
Fifty years! And alas, a widow gave the dead man these burning tears.

She whose youth he had sorely wronged, she whose heart he had starved and slain.
Now at his tardy coming uttered all her passionate grief and pain.

Eating the bread of lonely toil she had waited through tedious years,
Hoping all things, in tears and silence, fond and faithful despite her fears;

Then with a languid, cold conceit, after patience and hope were dead,
Welded another, whose constant passion sought her still, though her youth had fled.

Mean of people and chaut of priest rose and wailed like a soul in woe;
Flumes like midnight and trailing sables slowly swept through the street below.

"Oh, my darling!" she sobbed aloud, shaken sore by her utter woe;
"Oh, my dearest, is this the coming which you promised so long ago?

"You who honor the empty husk of your vow when your lips are dumb,
No proud woman has called you husband, and you come—as you pledged to come.

"Loyal to him whose name I bore, yet I loved you, and only you; Judge between us, oh tender mother, which is the false and which the true!"

HORRORS OF THE FEVER SHIP.

YEAR after year these stories come to us of the terrible calamities which fall upon overcrowded emigrant ships. But how many of these horrors pass unrecorded! Indeed it is only when some instance of monstrous suffering forces itself upon our attention that the veil is lifted, and the history of cruelty and pestilence is laid before us.

In the case of the ship James Foster, Jun., which arrived in the Lower Bay on the 8th instant, having left Liverpool on the 19th of last December, the suffering of the passengers were threefold. The terrors of the sea (rendering their passage an unusually long one), the cruelty of ship officers, and the brutality of the officers under whose protection they were placed, all combined to aggravate their misery.

The vessel at the date of clearance was considered to be thoroughly sea-worthy, and the accommodations for passengers and baggage guaranteed to be, if not perfect, at least sufficient to satisfy the Emigration officers at Liverpool. What was originally designed for the hold has been converted into a large square room, capable of accommodating about 150 persons. From the building of the emigrants together in this hole through ten long weeks, the most unsavory aromas pervades the place. There is, besides, an almost total absence of light, and when it is considered that there was no system for ventilation in case rough weather required the hatches down, the suffering of the poor wretches between decks can be easily imagined. At each side of the hold are erected tiers of bunks resembling a row of cupboards. These were appropriated by the passengers, the males on one side and the females on the other.

The fever broke out on the 8th of January, and during the passage about twenty-two of the passengers succumbed to this victims of disease and ill-treatment. One of the men, driven wild by the terrors which surrounded him, terminated his life by leaping overboard. The investigation, conducted by the Commissioners of Emigration after the arrival of the vessel, seems clearly to prove that the deaths as well as the effects of the vessel were possessed by a sort of demon of inhumanity. A number of the seamen were beaten and kicked and otherwise maltreated until their debilitated frames gave way under their tortures. One of the bands, a Dutchman, so one witness testifies, was killed outright by one of the officers.

The very fact that at sea the officers of a ship are under no jurisdiction through which an immediate remedy can be offered to their victims, naturally suggests the propriety and necessity of visiting their crimes with the severest legal penalties.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

My wife has used her WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine ten years without repairs, and has used one needle for the last three years.
Newburgh, N.Y. CHARLES J. GRAY.

AN ESSENTIAL ARTICLE IN EVERY FAMILY.—Colgate & Co.'s Toilet Soap is an essential article in every family. We feel safe in saying that a better article can not be obtained.—Northern Christian Advocate.

WALTHAM WATCHES are the best and the cheapest.—N. Matson & Co., Chicago.

DYSPEPSINA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Of druggists, or Box, Mailed for 60c. Sold by druggists. S. G. Wessling, 571 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WELLS'S EVERY MAN HIS OWN LAWYER, and Will Writer, any note or business writing more times its cost in a twelvemonth. Sent postpaid on receipt of 50 cts. Address
J. G. WELLS, Publisher, 493 Broome St., N. Y.

$6.50 WATCHES. $12.
The famous Over-Coin Hunting-Case Watch, Patent Detached Lever, Jeweled, $15 & $20. The same, Lepine Movement, $12. Ladies' Hunting Watch, solid silver, heavily plated with fine 18-carat gold, enameled very richly, $20. Ladies' Stem Winder, Patent Detached Lever, second, for timing horses, $20. Celebrated Am. Lever, $20 & $25. The above watches warranted. A handsome Silver-Plated Open-Face Watch, engine-turned edge, Jeweled Movement, $6. Sent safely by express. Address WILLSON & CO., No. 142 Fulton St., N.Y.

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.—A Complete Library of Modern Music for Voice and Piano.
12 Good-Friday and Easter Hymns ..... 50c.
Chopin's Valses, complete ..... 50c.
Beethoven's 45 Waltzes ..... 50c.
Complete Operas for Piano, each ..... 50c.
Mailed on receipt of price. Catalogues Free.
BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N.Y.

DYSPEPTICS, MARK THIS!

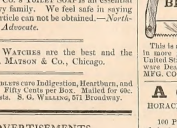
There is nothing tones the system like iron: there is nothing purifies the blood like sulphur. In every healthy person's organization iron is incorporated. Deprived of this metallic constituent the digestive apparatus and the secretory organs can not vigorously perform their functions. Supply the loss artificially by taking Allcock's IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS. The sulphur will purge the vitiative blood of impurities, the iron will invigorate the life-producing organs. If the blood is muddy or sallow, it will be made fresh and transparent. These results are guaranteed.
Sold by Druggists. 1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 6 Packages, 72 Powders, $5. Mailed Free.
HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N. Y.

BLACK-WALNUT PORTABLE RACKS for Parlors, Bedrooms, Stores, &c. Holds Books and Papers, &c. Sent by Express on receipt of price, $2 50. C. W. HALL & SON, 3 Astor Place, N. Y.

IVINE PATENT HAIR-CRIMPERS.—Every lady should have them. For sale at Variety Stores. Made only by A. Ivins, 1061 Marshall St., Philadelphia.

FROST'S BOOK OF TABLEAUX and SHADOW PANTOMIMES.
Containing 160 Tableaux Vivants, with directions for arranging the stage, costuming the characters, and forming appropriate groups.
BY S. ANNIE FROST,
Author of "The Parlor Stage," "Amateur Theatricals," &c.
TO WHICH ARE ADDED A NUMBER OF SHADOW ACTS AND PANTOMIMES, WITH COMPLETE STAGE AND PLAIN INSTRUCTIONS.
To those who desire to get up an evening's entertainment this book will prove invaluable assistant.
Paper Covers, price ..... 50 cts.
Bound in Boards, Cloth Back ..... 80 cts.
 The above book is for sale every where, and will be sent by mail to any address, free of postage, upon receipt of the price. Address as above.
DICK & PITZGERALD, Publishers,
18 Ann St., N. Y.
"The Comical Adventures of Mr. Tootles" sent free.

HITCHCOCK'S
HALF-DIME MUSIC.
Printed on heavy music-paper, 4 pages, colored titles. Music and Words. Mailed for 5 cts. each, or the whole 44 for $2 20.
NOW READY:
No. 44. St. Nicholas Galop.
" 43. Velocipede Johnny.
" 42. Gen'l Armies Dodt.
" 41. Santa Claus Corpher.
" 40. Circles of Broadway.
" 39. Flying Dutchman.
" 38. Power Loom Polka. (Instrumental.)
" 37. Susan's Store.
" 36. I will wed the Dress that Check.
" 35. The Rosy Wreath.
" 34. The Fairies' Dance.
" 33. Light of the World. (Sacred.)
" 32. Beautiful Robin.
" 31. Ixion Galop.
" 30. Olympia Schottische.
" 29. Up in Balloon.
" 28. Theresa's Lament for Jimmy.
" 27. See the Conquering Hero Comes.
" 26. Take Back my Heart.
" 25. The Passing Bell.
" 24. Still I Love You.
" 23. Waltzing down at Long Branch.
" 22. Rolling Stone Polka.
" 21. She will do but your Fancy.
" 20. Arabian Polka Mazurka.)
" 19. The Rose of Allan.
" 18. The Old Cottage Clock.
" 17. The Love Shines over All. (Sacred.)
" 16. Maggie's Secret.
" 14. Little Maggie May.
" 13. The Lovely Fay Whistle.
" 12. Come hither, my Baby, my Darling.
" 11. Lucrece Waltz.
" 10. Skating Rink Polka.
" 9. Champagne Waltz.
" 8. Praise of Tears.
" 7. Lovely does Think I shall Marry.
" 6. Love, Love, Sweetheart, Good-bye.
" 5. Not for Joe.
" 4. Sweet Spirit, Hear.
" 3. We'd better Bide a Wee.
" 2. Won't you Tell me why, Robin?
" 1. Nellie Gray. (Comic.)
The above can be had at the music, book, and periodical stores, or by subscribing for Nos. 5 cts. each, to the publisher. Other choice selections will rapidly follow. Agents wanted. BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 28 Spring St., New York (under St. Nicholas Hotel).



This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all Hardware Dealers. Made by THE LIVINGSTON MFG. CO., 29 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

A GREAT OFFER.
HORACE WATERS, No. 481 BROADWAY, N.Y.,
will Continue for 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at extremely low prices for cash, or will take from $5 to $10 monthly until paid; the same to let, and rent money applied if purchased.

$100 to $250 PER MONTH GUARANTEED. Sure pay. Salaries paid weekly. Agents wanted every where to sell our Popular Chromo Lamps. Full particulars free. Address the GIRARD WIRE MILLS, Philadelphia, Pa.

EMPLOYMENT.—"PLEASANT and PROFITABLE." Send stamp for particulars to S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THOMAS R. AGNEW,
ESTABLISHED 1836,
260 Greenwich St., corner Murray, New York,
IS OFFERING CHEAP,
FOR CASH:
COFFEES.—Green, Roasted, and Ground: all grades to suit the palate and the pocket of the million; 15c., 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., 40c., and 50c. Mocha, 50c.
TEAS.—Every body should know who they buy teas of, as all what are offered are not watchmakers. Mr. Agnew spent three years in China, and knows exactly what teas are, and does not take damaged goods of any kind; consequently every pound of tea sold is warranted as represented, or the money returned.
MOLASSES.—Agnew has his spout in New Orleans, an expert in the business, who ships him the choicest of Sugar.
RICE.—Mr. Agnew has a house in South Carolina, who ship him the best rice in market.
FLOUR is received direct from the mills. Genesee, Indiana, and St. Louis, best brands in market, from $6 to $10 per barrel.
GROCERIES.—Every thing desired in families, hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, steamships and sailing vessels is sold by Mr. Agnew, who is a live man, working 16, 18, and 20 hours every day for the benefit of a customer. He is a steam-coach compared with the old fossilized grocers, who have been brought up in a soap-fat barrel, or as lackeys for others, and now begin to find out things when gray-headed. In a word, Agnew is as far ahead of the trade as Dexter is of the cab-horses in Washington. He is the man for the people—quick as lightning and punctual as time.

HORACE GREELEY.—AGENTS Wanted immediately for the Life of Horace Greeley. The Autobiography of HORACE GREELEY will be published in two volumes, an elegant volume of 818 pages, with authentic Portrait of the Author, and fine or beautiful illustrations. Selling very fast. Now is the time to secure choice Territory and Liberal Discounts. Address J. B. FORD & CO., 164 Nassau Street, New York.

WILD CHERRY BARK AND IRON.—PERFECTED PURE SYRUP OF WILD CHERRY BARK. This is an invaluable remedy for Dyspepsia and Students, who are often debilitated and mentally depressed by overwork and study. Specimen copies sent to any all whose nervous system and mental forces are frequently taxed. Sent by mail, on receipt of 50 cents, postpaid to Ladies and Children of weak constitution and low condition will find this tonic above every other preparation in efficiency and pleasant taste. Prepared by H. J. & H. HITCHCOCK, Druggists, Springfield, Mass. Sold in New York by J. F. Henry, 21 Park Row.

DO IT NOW.—Don't delay, but send 25 cents at once for a copy of THE LEAVES until the end of 1869. It is the cheapest, the best, and the most popular Monthly published. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a stamp. Address
No. 40 Chatham Street, Box 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

No excuse now for Papers and Magazines lying about! Save all the year.
CONANT'S PATENT
PERIODICAL COVERS,
for HARPER'S WEEKLY or BAZAR, sent by mail for $1 25. They bind the numbers as they come every week.
Address R. CONANT, 38 Nassau St., N. Y.
"—A good thing."—New York Tribune.
"—Magazine Size, 50 Cents. Sheet-Music Size, $1 00.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Circulars containing full information about these Presses, prices, recommendations, &c., mailed free on application. Specimen-books of types, with borders, &c., &c., 25 cents.
DAVID WATSON, Ag't, Adams Press Co.,
No. 25 Park Row, (Printing-House Square), New York.

FRESH GARDEN and FLOWER SEEDS, prepaid by mail. For 16 cts. per oz., the best sorts Asparagus, Beet, Carrot, Parsnip, Radish, Spinach, & Turnip. For 10 cts. per oz., the best Cabbage, Celery, Chicory, Cucumber, Lettuce, Melon, Salsify, Squash, and Tomato. For 25 cts. per oz., Onion and Pepper. The above also in 5 ct. papers. 25 sorts Garden and Flower Seeds, by mail, for $1. Catalogue Early Rose Potato 25 cts. per lb.; $5 for 3 lbs. Seeds on Commission. Agents wanted. D. M. WATSON, Plymouth, Mass.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE.
First-class, and fully licensed. Agents Wanted. For terms, address CHICOPEE S. M. CO., Boston, Mass.

THE TANITE EMERY WHEEL Cuts fast, does not glaze, gum, heat, or smell, and is cheap. For circulars, address The Tanite Co., Stroudsburg, Pa.

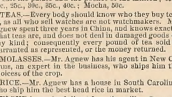
HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE, Claverack, N.Y. A first-class Boarding School for both sexes. Term opens April 8, 1869. Rev. Alonzo Flack, A.M., Pres.

670 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 75.
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
have just published:
Guiccioli's Recollections of LORD BYRON.
MY RECOLLECTIONS OF LORD BYRON; AND THOSE OF EYE-WITNESSES OF HIS LIFE. By the Countess Guiccioli. Translated by Hubert E. H. Jerningham. With Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

This work is strikingly able, with a keen appreciation of the subject, and with remarkable discrimination of the authoress's special traits.—Daily Telegraph.
This book is of great value; for it collects the various opinions of Lord Byron's biographers, presents them at one glance, illustrates them by the letters and journal of the poet himself, and subjects them to a final criticism.—Pall Mall Gazette.
Never before has Byron been so vividly portrayed and his character so thoroughly analyzed. The reader's interest never flags.—Morning Post.
No greater proof could be given of the renewed interest which is being felt with respect to Byron, his life, his character, and his works, than this publication.—Athenæum.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 75.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.
Prices from $16 to $22
From the Scientific American of April 11, 1868.
"The color of this metal closely resembles that of 18 carat gold, is more grateful to the eye, and has the same brilliant," &c., &c.
When desired, these Watches will be sent to any express office, and payment on express office, and payment on exhibition granted upon payment of freight charges.
Description of goods and metal sent free upon application. All warranted. Remittances of my goods earnestly solicited.
JULES JS. EUGENEIN VUILLEMIN,
44 Nassau Street, New York.
For sale by all respectable dealers.



The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity. Patented.
A most wonderful and elegantly-constructed novelty, Noiseless in operation—sews with double or single thread, makes the Duplex Stitch with extraordinary facility.
"Stitches beautiful and firm; a perfect machine."—New York Evening Express.
"For the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the Household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Lady's Book.
"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so readily understood a child can use it."—The Independent.
"Beautiful as a flower."—Leslie's Gazette of Fashions.
All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this machine will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents. Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in boxes, with printed instructions, on receipt of price, $15, or C. O. D. Agents wanted every where. Liberal terms. Extraordinary Inducements sent free. Address all orders to
APEX SEWING MACHINE CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,
Have just Published:

Anthony Trollope.
PHINEAS FINN, THE IRISH MEMBER. A Novel. By Anthony Trollope, Author of "He Knew He was Right," "Orley Farm," "Small House at Allington," "Can You Forgive Her?" "Castle Richmond," &c. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

J. B. Baldwin.
PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Great Peoples and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to a still Older Civilization of the Ethiopians or Cushites of America. By John B. Baldwin, Member of the American Oriental Society. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

Thomas Boesé.
PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK: its History, Condition, and Statistics. An Official Report to the Board of Education. By Thomas Boesé, Clerk of the Board. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

William Hepworth Dixon.
HER MAJESTY'S TOWER. Historic Studies in the Tower of London. With Frontispiece Plan of the Tower. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, 69 cents.

Miles O'Reilly.
THE POETICAL WORKS OF CHARLES G. HALPINE (Miles O'Reilly). Including all Odes, Poems, Sonnets, Epics, and Lyrical Effusions which have not hitherto been collected together. With a Biographical Sketch and Explanatory Notes. Edited by Robert B. Roosevelt. Portrait on Steel. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

F. Whymper.
TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE IN THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA, formerly Russian America—now Ceded to the United States—and in various other parts of the North Pacific. By Frederick Whymper. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

Sir Samuel W. Baker.
CAST UP BY THE SEA; or, The Adventures of Ned Grey. By Sir Samuel W. Baker, M.A., F.R.G.S., Author of "The Albert N'yanza Great Basin of the Nile," "The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia," &c., &c. Illustrated. With Ten Illustrations by Brand. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

The Rev. John L. Nevius.
CHINA AND THE CHINESE: a General Description of the Country and its Inhabitants; its Civilization and Form of Government; its Religions and Social Institutions; its Intercourse with other Nations; and its Present Condition and Prospects. By the Rev. John L. Nevius, Ten Years a Missionary in China. With a Map and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

The Rev. Lyman Abbott.
JESUS OF NAZARETH: his Life and Teachings: Founded on the Gospels, and Illustrated by Reference to the Manners, Customs, Religious Beliefs, and Literature of the Nations of his Times. By Lyman Abbott. With Portrait on Steel, Maps, Plans, &c. 8vo, and others. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3 50.

The Author of "Rachel's Secret."
NATURE'S NOBLEMAN. A Novel. By the Author of "Rachel's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

The Rev. Dr. Bellows.
THE OLD WORLD IN ITS NEW FACE: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868. By Henry W. Bellows. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Just ready.

☞ Harper & Brothers will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

MIXED (green and black), 80c., 90c., $1; best, $1 per lb.

ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH RESTAURANT AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 20c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.

GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c.; 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

POUGHKEEPSIE, MICH., August 26, 1868.

To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York.

GENTS: Your Teas here will not let me alone. They say I have learned the secret, and that I have got a private order from the dem. So here you have it, in the shape of a club order, and you will be 6th of May list, making five hundred and forty-five dollars and $13 cents. Hurry. I have not yet seen the last dollar.

Hoping this will be as good as former packages, I remain Yours, &c.,

H. W. WAITE.

No.	Name.	Amount.
10	Ira, Uncle'l Japan, Mrs. Kempton	$7 00...$10 00
9	Imperial	1 00... 1 00
8	Young Hyson A. L. Cummings, at	1 25... 3 75
7	Imperial Allen Stephens	1 00... 2 00
6	Coffee J. L. Chapman	40... 0 40
5	Gunpowder O. A. Whitcomb, at	1 00... 1 00
4	Imperial T. Taylor	1 25... 5 00
3	Young Hyson J. Hopkins	1 25... 5 00
5	Coffee	50... 1 50
4	Gunpowder John Stephens	1 00... 4 00
4	Young Hyson Wm. H. Dorsty, at	1 25... 5 00
1	do. do. H. Malone	1 25... 1 25
2	do. do. N. Newcomb, at	1 25... 2 50
4	do. and Verb Campbell, at	1 25... 5 00
2	Gunpowder Judge Miller, at	1 50... 4 00
1	do. A. Gale	1 50... 1 50
2	Imperial Mrs. Bird, at	1 25... 2 50
		$74 25

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars may better send a Post-office order or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders will be forwarded by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our grants are small, but we will be as liberal as we may afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put the name of our Post-office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from falling into the hands of imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,

Post-Office Box 5648, New York City.

Alaska Diamonds.

The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the real diamond, mounted at our own factory, in artificial gold settings, guaranteed five gold, and sold by us at one sixth of the cost of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Look at our Price-List.

Solitaire Studs or Finger Rings, $5 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Drops, $5, $6, and $10.

Cluster Sets, $10, $15, $20, $25, and $30; Cluster Ear-Drops, $6, $12, $14.

Cluster Sets, $10, $15, $20, and $25 each; Cross Sets, $20 and $25.

Cluster Finger Pins, $5, $6, $8, $10, $15, $20; Gents' Cluster Studs Rings, $5, $10, $15, $20; Cluster Rings, $6, $10, $12 each.

Cluster Pins, $10 and $12; with tail, $10; Cross Pins, $8, $10, and $15; Studs, per set, $5, $6, $10.

We do our business direct from our factory, located in a city which has a world-wide reputation for its superiority.

Orders for goods $5 should be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods sent free. Exceed this amount and we will send by express, the purchaser paying all express charges. A Large Discount to the Trade. TRY US. Address our

STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO., Providence, R. I.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE).

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an Improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in neatness, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $300. Choice of seven styles.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal, viz., Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bread-Pins, Pencils, Sleeve-Buttons, Collar-Buttons, Old Fellows' and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wearing.

TO CLUBS.—When Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our published prices. Our responsibility, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are bogus swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches can be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to send money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office, with the privilege of short-pay all express charges. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is at

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—I am now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at their homes, the whole of the time or spare moments. Business new, light, and profitable. Fifty cents to $5 every evening is easily earned by persons of either sex, and the boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. Those who engage at once will find that we will devote their whole time to the business; and, as every person who needs work may send me their address and test the business for themselves, I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, etc., sent free. Sample sent by mail for 10 cents. Address ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL that GREAT BOOK, THE

The Best, the Cheapest, and most RELIABLE FAMILY MEDICAL BOOK published. Superbly Illustrated. 475 pages. Best selling book out; largest commission. Circular and terms sent free. M. L. PETTIS, 80 Cedar St. (P. O. Box 4669), New York City.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $8, $13, $16. Offices, $15, $20, $30. Send for a circular to KELSEY & CO., LOWELL PRESS CO., 29 Water Street, Boston, Mass.

25 CENTS.—Now is the time to subscribe to the NEW YORK LEDGER for the Spring Campaign, and the cheapest monthly published. Each number contains a variety of interesting matter equal to any book. 25 cents will pay for it from now to the end of June. Single copy, 10 cents; specimen free; postage. Address O. A. ROORBACH, 102 Nassau St., N.Y.

STRANGERS Visiting Washington

Will find it to their interest to call at

G. C. Henning's Clothing Establishment,

No. 511 SEVENTH STREET.

The ladies'pocket-rule. The largest stock in the District. All goods are Custom-made, and one price only, to plain figures. Ten per cent. discount to clergymen.

VELOCIPEDE WHEELS.

MANUFACTURED BY

S. N. BROWN & CO.,

LEOMINSTER, MASS.

They also make a prime article of Spokes and Hubs for light Carriage and Buggy Wheels. Send for Price-List.

Holloway's Ointment—How painful and annoying it is to have the lips cracked and chapped, so that one can scarcely open the mouth or smile. A single application of the Ointment makes the skin soft and well.

$245 A MONTH. TO AGENTS. 49 New and useful articles. Address JOHN J. HOWARD & CO., Alfred, Me.

$3000 Salary. { U. S. PIANO CO., N. Y.

GENUINE OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO.

ONLY OFFICE IN THE UNITED STATES,

No. 78 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fine Swiss Movements	$15 00.
" " " Patent Levers	20 00.
Gentlemen's Fac-Simile Waltham Patent Levers	20 00.
" " Ditto, Chronometer Balance	25 00.
GENUINE WALTHAM PATENT LEVERS	30 00.
" " Ditto, Chronometer Balance	35 00.

All of our Watches are Hunting Cases. Warranted Perfect Time-keepers, and to retain the color of 18-carat Gold, representing Fine Gold Watches worth from $150 00 to $300 00. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Chains, Lockets, Studs, $5, $6, $7, and $10 each. Sent C. O. D., subject to examination, you to pay all express charges, and allowed to examine what they order, previous to paying, on receipt of express charges both ways.

JOHN FOGGAN, Pres't Oroide Gold Watch Co., No. 78 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

LICENSED BY THE

UNITED STATES AUTHORITY.

S. C. THOMPSON & CO.'S GREAT

One Dollar Sale of

Dry Goods, Dress Goods, Linens, Cottons, FANCY GOODS, Albums, Bibles, Silver-Plated Ware, Cutlery, Leather and German Goods of every description, &c.

These articles to be sold at the uniform price of

ONE DOLLAR EACH,

and not to be paid for until you know what you are to receive.

The most popular and economical method of doing business in the country.

The goods we have for sale are described on printed slips, and will be sent to any address at the rate of 10 cents each, to pay for postage, printing, &c. Itis left at the option of holders to decide whether they will send one dollar for the article or not.

By Peculiarity in our business we have a chance to exchange your goods, should the article mentioned on the printed slip not be desired.

The Smallest Article sold for ONE DOLLAR can be exchanged for Silver-Plated Five-Bottled Revolving Castor, or your choice of a large Variety of other Articles upon Exchange list, comprising over the useful articles in one of which could be bought at any retail country store for nearly double the number.

TERMS TO AGENTS.

We send our Combination Boxes as follows:

For a Club of Thirty, and $3 00,

one of the following articles: 30 yards Cotton, Lady's Fancy Square Shawl, Silver-Bottled Bristle Quill, Accordeon, Set of Steel-Bladed Knives and Forks, Violin and Bow, Fancy Cloth Dress, Gentleman's Fancy quality Cloth Boots, one dozen large size Linen Towels, Arkansaw Quill, Decorated Chamber Service, Fancy Cloth Wool Blanket, 12 yards best quality Print, 12 yards Delaine, one dozen Linen Damask Napkins, &c.

For a Club of Sixty, and $6 00,

one of the following articles: 40 yards Cotton, Pair Honeycomb Quilts, Cylinder Watch, 4 yards double width Waterproof Cloaking, Lady's Real Scotch Plaid Shawl, Lancaster Quilt, Alpaca Dress-Pattern, Engraved Silver-Plated Six-Bottled Revolving Castor, Set of Ivory-Handled Knives, with Silver-Plated Forks, Pair of All-Wool Blankets, Fancy Merino Quilts, 50 yards Print or a Marseilles Quilt, Decorated Chamber Set, Webster's Unabridged National Pictorial Dictionary (600 engravings, 1000 pages), 12 yards Delaine, one dozen Linen Damask Napkins, &c.

For a Club of One Hundred, and $10 00, of the following articles: 40 yards Cotton, Pair Honeycomb Quilts, Cylinder Watch, 4 yards double width Waterproof Cloaking, Lady's Real Scotch Plaid Shawl, Lancaster Quilt, Alpaca Dress-Pattern, Engraved Silver-Plated Six-Bottled Revolving Castor, Set of Ivory-Handled Knives, with Silver-Plated Forks, Pair of All-Wool Blankets, Fancy Merino Quilts, 50 yards Print or a Marseilles Quilt, Decorated Chamber Service, Webster's Unabridged National Dictionary (600 engravings, 1000 pages), 12 yards Delaine, one dozen Linen Damask Napkins, &c.

☞ For additional list of commissions see circular. COMMISSIONS FOR LARGER CLUBS IN PROPORTION.

Agents will please take notice of this. Do not send names, but write for circulars, and send Money by mail. Make your letters short and plain as possible.

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE OF THIS:

☞ The SIZES and WEIGHTS of CASES by REGISTERED LETTER, which can be sent from any Post-Office.

This way of sending money is preferred to any other method whatever.

We can in no case be responsible for money lost, unless some precautions are taken to insure its safety.

SEND FOR CIRCULARS.

Send your address in full, Town, County, and State,

S. C. THOMPSON & CO.,

136 FEDERAL STREET,

Boston, Mass.

HOVEY & CO.'S

ILLUSTRATED GUIDE

TO THE

FLOWER and VEGETABLE GARDEN

FOR 1869,

IS NOW READY, containing 150 pages, with 300 Beautiful Engravings, and a description in of 2500 varieties of FLOWER and VEGETABLE SEEDS, including the novelties for 1868, with

A BEAUTIFUL COLORED PLATE.

Our guide is the most valuable ever published, containing full and plain directions for the Culture of FLOWERS and VEGETABLES. A copy mailed to all applicants upon the receipt of 25 cents. Sent free to our regular customers. Address,

HOVEY & CO., 53 North Market St., Boston, Mass.

"EVERY BODY"

Should write at once and ascertain what we want of 20,000 male and female agents. You can make money by getting our immense "Exchange List, "free to one body. EASTMAN & KENDALL, 28 Hawley St., Boston.

The Finest Teeth WILL CAREFULLY PRESERVED BY USING SOZODONT. Every vegetable element of the article is used all to the benefit of every vegetable—is an antidote to dental disease. Neither the outer shell nor the bone it covers is likely to be seriously affected by any cause, if this healthful preparation be duly used, night and morning.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,

Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

AGENTS, FARMERS, GARDENERS, and FRUIT GROWERS.—Send for particulars of "Bent's Improved Fruit-Tree and Vine Improver and Insect Destroyer." Samples to test will be forwarded to any part of the United States, and perfect satisfaction guaranteed. Agents are wanted in every County in the United States. Address

J. AHEARN, 63 Second St., Baltimore, Md.

THE LANGHAM HOTEL, London.

JAMES M. SANDERSON, Manager, formerly of New York.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year.....4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year.....4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for the Price of Five.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces will be accepted at 20 cents each 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find the wrapper Date Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber is to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the first Number for January, and it is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to BANK Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be recovered without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

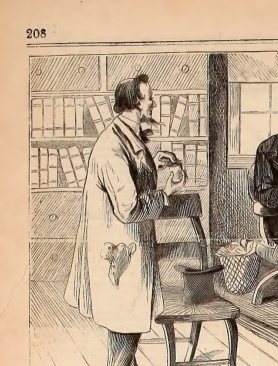
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $60; Half Page, $30; Quarter Page, $15—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Page, $1 00 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—Inside Page, $1 00; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



CLIENT. "Look here, can't I get off this Jury duty? I've got important business to attend to."
LAWYER. "Know the District Attorney?"
CLIENT. "No."
LAWYER. "Any Public Official?"
CLIENT. "No."
LAWYER. "Are you Irish?"
CLIENT. "No."
LAWYER. "Then you will have to serve or be fined."

GORHAM MFG. CO.

Sterling Silver Ware,

AND

Fine Electro-Plated Ware,

of the following trade-marks:

Trade-Mark for Silver. GORHAM MFG. CO. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

GORHAM MANUFACTURING CO.,

PROVIDENCE, R.I.

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

THE GORHAM WARE may be obtained of ADAMS, CHANDLER, & CO., No. 20 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

DR DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD LIVER OIL

Universally recognized by the Faculty as

INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR

to every other kind,

and the important remedy for

Consumption, General Debility,

and the Wasting Diseases of Children.

DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA in IMPERIAL Half-Pints only, sealed with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with the Trade-Mark.

SOLE CONSIGNEES,

ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.

SOLE ACCREDITED AGENTS IN AMERICA,

EDWD. GREEY & Co., 38, Vesey St., New York.

Sold by all Druggists, at $1.50 per Bottle.

☞ Beware of felonious imitations.

THE DOLLAR SUN.

Chas. A. Dana's Paper.

The cheapest, neatest, and most readable of New York journals. Every body likes it. Three editions: Daily, Semi-Weekly, and Weekly, at $6, $3, and $1 a year. Full reports of markets, agriculture, and Farmers' and Fruit Growers' Clubs, and a condensed review in every Weekly and Semi number. A premium to every subscriber. Specimens free. Send for a copy, with premium list.

I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher, New York.

THE PLANTING SEASON.

FRUIT TREES of the different kinds;

ORNAMENTAL TREES and SHRUBS;

GRAPE VINES, RASPBERRIES, BLACKBERRIES;

ROSES of their own roots;

EVERGREENS in great variety;

RHODODENDRONS, the best flowering shrub grown; and hundreds of other articles.

PARSONS & CO., FLUSHING, N.Y.

POLLAK & SON, Manufac'rs of Meerschaum goods. Store: 403 Broadway, near Broome, & 21 John St., middle of block. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 2646.

$150,000,000

Sterling. Undoubted Money and Estates Realizing, commencing 1868. Has to search for any minors. Bl. Gow & Co., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

BREWSTER & Co.

(OF BROOME ST.),

5th Ave., cor. 14th St.

Fine Carriages,

in all the fashionable varieties, exclusively of their own build, including

THE WELL-KNOWN

"BREWSTER WAGON,"

of which they are sole manufacturers.

Having fixed prices and but one quality, orders by mail will be as favorably executed as if given in person.

AGENTS FOR

CALLOWS' LONDON WHIPS.

For Tandem, Four-in-Hand, Phaeton, and Wagon driving; elegant in style, and superior to all others in quality.

Forwarded safely by Express to all parts of the country.

☞ Correspondence invited. ☜

STEM-WINDING

Waltham Watches.

These watches are of the well-known 3-plate style, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy. The manufacture of watches of this fine quality is not even attempted in this country except at Waltham.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Treat Disease Tenderly. Beware of aggressive slings that strike at the vitality of the patient. Sickness itself is a terrible debilitator. It needs no help to penetrate its victims. Violent calomel and cathartics kill thousands every year. Avoid them. Try TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT.—you have all the laxative elements that any case requires. It is the most genial of purgatives, and is also a superior tonic, an unsurpassed anti-bilious specific, and an admirable febrifuge.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

$20 A DAY—TO MALE AND FEMALE

AGENTS—to introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only Licensed Shuttle Machine in the market sold for less than $50. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Full particulars free. Address

W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

No. 102 Broadway, New York.

Assets - - $1,500,000.

All Approved Forms of Insurance Issued.

All Policies Non-forfeitable by their Terms.

Liberal Modes for the Payment of Premiums.

ANNUAL DIVIDENDS.

The Entire Profits of the Company Divided Equitably among the Insured.

DIRECTORS:

HON. JOHN A. DIX,
WM. WILKENS,
JOHN J. CRANE,
WM. T. ROGERS,
WM. M. VERMILYE,
CHAS. A. ROCKWOOD,
HON. GEO. OPDYKE,
MINOT C. MORGAN,
THOMAS HIGNEY,
HENT. B. SHERMAN,
AARON ARNOLD,
RICHARD H. ROWNE,
HON. JAMES HARPER,
JULIUS H. PRATT,
WM. W. WRIGHT,
CHAS. J. STARR,
WILLIAM ALLEN,
GEO. W. QUARTER,
GEO. T. HOPE,
JOHN H. SHERWOOD,
WALTON H. PECKHAM,
DAVID H. WRIGHT,
GEO. W. FARLEE,
WM. L. COGSWELL,
E. V. HAUGHWOUT.

WALTON H. PECKHAM, President.
HENRY V. CAHAGAN, Secretary.

LUCIUS McADAM, Actuary.
W. E. CRANMER, M.D., Med. Ex.
D. T. MACFARLAN, General Agent.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, Plans, and Details in Working Scale of Country, Suburban, and Village Houses, with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE $2 by mail, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. 150 Designs, $1 50, postpaid. Geo. E. Woodward, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York. Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

A POOR GIRL'S

LETTER. New Song from Periclole..... 35c.
REMAND AS CAPTIVE ISBELLA. Periclole. 60c.
PERICLOLE WALTZES, 50c. "Telegram Waltz," 60c.
NOT FOR JOE Galop, 50c. "On the Beach Galop," 35c.
KAPOLEI-KAI (comic song). "I DON'T CARE" Pat. 35c.

Violin or Flute Arrangements, 35c. each. Music mailed.

FREDERICK BLUME, 1193 Broadway, N.Y.

MARVIN & CO.'s

CHROME IRON SAFES

ARE THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

265 Broadway, N.Y.

ELGIN WATCHES.

CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing our watches, or watches purporting to be of our make, of parties who advertise or send them C.O.D., or have no connection with such houses, and do not furnish our guarantee to insure for that purpose the excellence and good repute of the real Elgin Watches have caused several Foreign and American Watch Companies to make INFERIOR IMITATIONS with the same or similar trademarks as ours. Also, parties who are attempting to send our goods "C.O.D," no matter whom. To get the real Elgin watches purchase only of dealers in your vicinity or elsewhere whom you know to be honorable.

THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,
ELGIN, ILLINOIS.
Business Office, Nos. 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

Dr. JNO. V. BURTON'S TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO. It entirely counteracts the harmful effects of tobacco and provides a substitute for the nerve stimulus. Its use for a few days will be a revelation to any user. It is an excellent tonic and appetizer, enables the stomach to digest the heartiest food, makes sleep refreshing, and establishes vigorous health. Smokers and chewers for sixty years cured. Price Fifty cents per box. Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price. Dr. Burton's Antidote, with Dr. Newcomb's Pile Ointment, $2.50. Sold by druggists, or sent by mail.

DR. J. V. BURTON, Sole Proprietor, Jersey City, N.J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.

[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

KALDENBERG & SON, Manufac'rs of Meerschaum Pipes and Holders, with Monograms, Portraits, &c. Wholesale and Retail. Repairing in all its branches. Send for Drawing and Price-List. Box 6734. Stores: 59 Wall St., & 6 John St., & 71 Nassau St., corner John St. Received a Prize at the Paris Exposition, 1867.

GENUINE WALTHAM WATCHES,

IN SOLID GOLD AND SILVER CASES ONLY,

AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Silver Hunting Watches $18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases $50
Gold Hunting Watches, Ladies' Size..... $39

Every Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Company. We will send these Watches by Express to any place, with bill to collect on delivery, and give the purchaser the privilege to open the package and examine the Watch before paying, and may Watch that does not give satisfaction may be exchanged or the money will be refunded. Every one is requested to write for our Descriptive Price-List, which explains the different kinds with prices of each.

Notes state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.

Address in full,

HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N.Y.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.

Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the finest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

PRINCE & COS. ORGANS AND MELODEONS. 43,000, now in use. BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

NASBY'S PAPER.

THE TOLEDO BLADE.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with News from all parts of the World. Choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit and Humor, a Commercial Department, a Religious Department, a Children's Department, and a carefully-edited Agricultural Department. In short, it is our constant aim to make the BLADE so nearly as possible

A Perfect Family Newspaper.

THE NASBY LETTERS!

The rich, racy, rollicking humor of the Letters of "Rev. PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P.M., wich is Postmaster,"—their quaint irony, keen sarcasm, and cutting satire,—their merciless exposure of the heresies of political demagogues of ALL PARTIES, and, withal, their profound, philosophy and unanswerable arguments, have rendered them the most popular political literature ever published. These letters are written exclusively for the BLADE, and will be continued regularly in its columns.

A New Story by Petroleum V. Nasby will shortly be commenced in the BLADE.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and over, $1 50 each, and an Extra Copy to every person getting up a Club.

PAY! PAY! PAY!—We pay liberally, in cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the BLADE.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent at every Post-Office in the United States. Send for our Special Circular to Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and in the same time give us the address of a dozen or so of your friends, at as many different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

SPECIAL TRADE SALE,

1869.

FROM MARCH 16 TO APRIL 24.

FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK, March, 1869.

We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we shall send on the following terms, for Cash, from the 16th of March to the 24th of April, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of $ 100 at one time, 25 per cent. discount:
" $ 500 " 30 "
" $1000 " 33½ "
" $2000 " 35 "

And an additional deduction of Five per cent. for Cash.

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Spring.

The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers personally, or by mail enclosing five cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

O=C

The Highest Cash Prices

PAID FOR

OLD NEWSPAPER OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;
OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;
OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are written full;
and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Public and Private Libraries, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, &c.
Office, 82 ROCKWELL,
JOHN C. ST. CROCKWELL,
23 ANN STREET, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 640.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

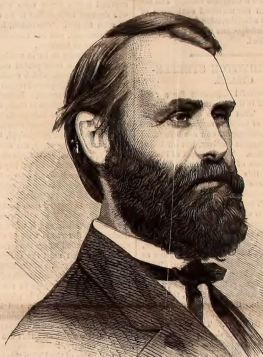
JACOB D. COX,

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

JACOB DOLSON COX, the new Secretary of the Interior, was born in Montreal, Canada, October 27, 1828. His parents were citizens of the United States. Soon after his birth they returned to New York city.

Mr. Cox graduated at Oberlin College, Ohio, in 1851, and then entered upon the practice of law in that State. He was in 1859 elected to the Ohio Senate by the Republican party. He began immediately after the opening of the civil war to organize volunteers, receiving a commission as Brigadier-General. Soon after he was ordered with his brigade to West Virginia, and placed in command of the District of Kanawha. Here, under command of General ROSECRANS, his command did effective, but not particularly brilliant, service. He was subsequently assigned to the Ninth Corps, and participated in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, commanding the corps after the fall of General RENO. For his services in this campaign he was made a Major-General. Subsequently he commanded, with credit to himself and the army, a division of the Twenty-third Corps during the Atlanta campaign, the numerous engagements which occurred serving to make that campaign almost a continuous battle. During the pursuit of HOOD'S army, following the fall of Atlanta, General COX commanded the Twenty-third Corps with uniform success. He also rendered gallant service with that corps during Hood's pursuit of General THOMAS'S army, which ended in the triumphant success of the Union forces at the battle of Nashville.

Scarcely had the war closed when he was nominated and elected Governor of Ohio. He was generally understood to be a Conservative Republican, owing to his preference of a system for the forcible colonization of negroes to the extension of suffrage to that race. Mr. Cox is a well-read lawyer, an elegant and forcible writer, and a studious scholar of history and politics.



JACOB D. COX, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.—[PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.]

EBENEZER R. HOAR,

ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

EBENEZER ROCKWOOD HOAR, the new Attorney-General, was born in Concord, Massachusetts, in 1816. He was graduated at Harvard in 1836, and immediately entered upon the practice of law. In 1848 he was a prominent and effective speaker at the Worcester Convention, over which his father presided, and at which the Free-Soil party in his State was organized. After a short experience in the State Senate he was placed on the bench of the Court of Common Pleas.

In 1854 he delivered a very notable charge to the Suffolk Grand Jury, expressing the indignation of New England sentiment at the return of ANTHONY BURNS. He took part as a delegate in the Philadelphia Convention of 1856, where the Republican party was born. Governor BANKS, in 1859, appointed him Judge of the Massachusetts Superior Court, to succeed Judge THOMAS. The New Attorney-General is a cousin of the retiring incumbent of the office, Mr. EVARTS.

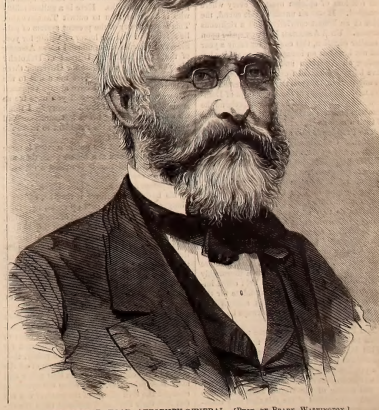
JOHN A. RAWLINS,

SECRETARY OF WAR.

THE President has made his late Chief-of-Staff his Secretary of War. It was fitting that one who had been so long associated with him, and who had proved himself a faithful servant through the eventful campaigns of a long war, should become his principal military adviser. With SHERMAN at the head of the ARMY, and RAWLINS at the head of the War Department, the people may well feel satisfied as to the future conduct of military operations.

General RAWLINS is a native of Illinois, having been born in Jo Daviess County, February 13, 1831. He is the youngest officer in GRANT'S Cabinet. He received a common school education, and until he was 23 years of age he was engaged in agricultural pursuits. He then entered a law office in Galena, Illinois, where he first became acquainted with GRANT. Next year he was admitted to the bar, and in the practice of law he was tolerably successful. His partner was MISS EMILY SMITH, of Goshen, New York, in 1856, and lived happily with her for five years, when she died, after having born of him three children.

JOHN A. RAWLINS, SECRETARY OF WAR.—[PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.]



EBENEZER R. HOAR, ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—[PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.]

General RAWLINS held no public office prior to the war, but he was known in Galena as an active and able Democratic politician. Soon after the Confederate forces fired upon Fort Sumter a large public meeting was held at Galena by the Republicans and War Democrats, at which President, then Mr. GRANT, presided, and General RAWLINS spoke. The speech of GRANT caused no surprise, as he was then unknown, and his views one way or the other made but little difference. The case was different with RAWLINS, however. He was widely known as a Democrat, and in his speeches last utterly denounced the Republicans. His declaration in favor of coercive measures was all the more surprising from the fact that at the time the great leader of his wing of the Democratic party, Senator DOUGLAS, had not yet made known his intended action.

In August, 1861, RAWLINS was, at GRANT'S request, appointed Assistant-Adjutant-General. He was chosen Chief-of-Staff in November, 1862, a position which he retained until his present appointment. In the line of promotion Captain RAWLINS was made Major February 16, 1862, Lieutenant-Colonel November 1, 1862, and Brigadier-General of Volunteers August 11, 1863. On March 3, 1865, he was confirmed as Brevet Major-General of Volunteers. He is said to be the most thorough and practical Adjutant-General in the Army.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1869.

THE PRESIDENT.

THE President probably did not expect that he was not to have trouble by getting into the White House, and he is not disappointed. The range of duties and the official methods are different from those to which he has been most accustomed, but he has the sagacity which swiftly adapts itself to changed circumstances, and a certain coolness which enables him justly to weigh reasons. Amidst the tempest of rumors and speculations from Washington, the wise man will fix his eye steadily upon what has been actually said and done by the President, if he would properly estimate the probability of his administration. It is well for every body to remember that for every office in the country there will probably be a dozen or more applicants. Consequently the number of the dissatisfied will be enormous, and when a Republican shall be found doubtfully over the new administration, it will be always a most searching inquiry whether he wished for any thing or had recommended any body, and whether his wishes and recommendation were successful. If, on the other hand, Mr. TOOTS, who thought nothing so democratic and delightful as a slave-holding despotism, suspects General GRANT of monarchical tendencies—why, Mr. TOOTS will be Mr. TOOTS.

The President's first word was his inaugural. It was brief, manly, decisive, and satisfactory. He said that the national honor must be maintained by fulfilling the spirit of the law, and that freedom of opinion must be every where protected. It was an unmistakable sound, the voice of an honest conviction, and a righteous purpose. Until ABRAHAM LINCOLN spoke upon a similar occasion, this country for many years had not heard at an inauguration any thing becoming an American and a man. Since we have happily emancipated from that baleful epoch let any man reflect upon the kind of person who was made President in the latter days of Democratic ascendency, and he will comprehend the immense progress marked by the mere presence of such a man as GRANT in the White House.

The President's first act was his choice of a Cabinet. Such sagacity it was a disappointment, as any Cabinet must have been, and the greater disappointment because the previous silence of the President had excited expectations that no result could satisfy. Mr. LINCOLN'S plan of calling into his Cabinet all his rivals in the nominating Convention was as severely criticised as that of General GRANT in summoning those whom he believed fitted for the duties of their offices. Mr. BUCHANAN'S Cabinet was a political, signally destitute of ability, and a mere conspiracy. Its single suspicious member was General CASS, whose recommendation was that he was a thoroughly disciplined Democrat, who had held office incrementally, and had been a candidate for the Presidency. There are obvious reasons why the selection of a Cabinet will always be a disappointment.

The President's first signature to a bill was given to that which embodies the declaration of his inaugural that the public faith must be maintained both in spirit and to the letter. It is a proclamation to the world that no kind of mean subterfuge or evasion will be countenanced by the people of the United States, and is a formal confirmation of the fact that they utterly condemn the dishonest public policy presented in the last Democratic platform.

There has been a long delay upon the part of the President to await the action of the Senate upon the Tenure-of-Office bill. Whatever the action of the Senate may be, we presume that the President will see his course to be plain. The initiative in executive administration belongs to him. If he is of opinion that the public welfare requires the removal of an officer he should nominate a successor, and leave to the Senate the responsibility of retaining him. But there is no disposition in the President or for the country to fear that the Senate wishes to thwart the President's desire of a vigorous and honest administration. If it does, if it should plainly connive at corruption or inefficiency, by refusing to confirm those whom the President might name for the purpose of pure administration, the Senate would certainly be held to the strictest accountability. The President is responsible for his "judgment" in suggesting the removal of an officer. But, as Senator CONKLING truly said, it is useless to suppose that he can not remove except for reasons that could be maintained in a court of justice.

The President is not a man to be dismayed by difficulties, and with an able and harmonious Cabinet; with a Congress friendly and not unruly; and with the intelligent confidence of the country, his administration is not likely to disappoint the anticipations which the hope of his election excited.

THE WASHINGTON STEEPLE CHASE.

THE most powerful argument for a good Civil Service bill is the spectacle now offered in Washington. That city is occupied by an enormous crowd of persons, many of whom are of the highest intelligence, and are influenced by the most honorable motives, but all intent upon securing office. The business of the nation, the legislation of Congress, are virtually subordinated to this pursuit. Senators and Representatives are dogged, and hunted, and besieged, and entreated, and their rooms more office-brokers. They can not help it. It is the ugly condition of their situation. A Secretary, or a Postmaster-General, or a Revenue Commissioner, or a notorious Democratic wire-pulling office-broker is not appointed without a faction for his "claims" and his "services," every body looks out for himself, and Auld Lang Syne Ben for another.

It is amusing and preposterous and exasperating to hear the arguments urged to persuade the influences upon the appointing power. The theory of the "spoils system" is that every man every American citizen is fully competent to any possible position. Here is an excellent opportunity to put the theory into actual test. Here is a capital plumber who insists upon appraising Canton silks. Here is a gallant middy who is just the man to outwit Talleyrand. Here is the theory of the practical system of public service. I had the honor of voting for you, Sir—will you please recommend me as Assessor of the Five Points? Please appoint me Consul, Sir, you were my candidate for Governor three years ago—will you just give me a line to the Foreign-Secretaryship? I have always supposed you were my friend, Sir—that I was fitted for Assistant Secretary of the Treasury? I think we staid in adjoining towns last summer—will you write privately to the President to make me Consul at Shanghai?

The result is that the public service is more wretchedly inefficient and at a higher price than any private work, and that it is not the object of office to a man's capacity to be concerned in it. An incompetent fellow finding himself going behind in his business, whose credit is suddenly plunges into politics; gets up clubs, meetings, processions; is the active man of the campaign, obtains requisite support, not a great deal of ability, and the election over, presents himself and his requests payment in an office. Is such a gentleman likely to be proof against the temptations of office? That he will be a thief, is evident; but may he not also prove to be a knave? Of course this is no reason for intrusting the public service to precisely similar gentlemen of the other party. If, indeed, the private system must continue, by all means let the offices be filled by those who sympathize with the Administration. This the people have a right to demand; for when they have pronounced for certain principles and a particular policy, they do not wish the vast, moral influence of all the offices in the country to thwart that policy and flout those principles. But when the system is changed the civil officers of the country will not feel that their livelihood depends upon the defeat or the success of a party, and much of the peculiar acrimony of our politics will disappear.

Certainly every good citizen must see that it is not desirable—that it is very perilous—that a Presidential election should be regarded merely as a grand battle for the spoils of the civil service. It is a corrupting tendency which this country can not possibly endure. The only practicable present remedy lies in putting honorest and capable men of the Administration party, not merely ile loud partisans, in office; but the relief must come from a reasonable Civil Service bill, which will make the competency for appointment to be determined by a party club or committee. We do not think that this Administration should disregard party in its appointments. But we do think that partisan considerations alone ought not to secure office.

THE PRESENT STATE OF TRADE.

SOUTHERN merchants arrived in New York earlier this year than last, and they are present in larger numbers than at any period except before the war. The anomaly of their arrival in advance of the usual preparation to meet them—at least, as to some description of goods—is due to the fact that last season goods were exposed before there were customers, and it was deemed inexpedient to be ready this year till as soon as the South, however, is now in much stronger, and has contributed considerable activity to business.

The tendency to be in market for purchases for spring at a much earlier period each season is a feature of the trade which conforms with great precision to the improved means of communication with interior points. Eastern and Western merchants are not here in force, as they may buy later and yet receive their goods in time. In former years goods purchased here were sent to their destination up the Mississippi, by way of New Orleans, to points which are now reached from New York and other Atlantic cities by railroad. Those that formerly went but by steamer; but there are large populations up the Red River, the Arkansas, and other tributaries of the Mississippi which have no means except water communication to receive packages sent from New York. Many months were consumed in the transportation, and if there were no spring freshets on the upper waters of the Mississippi, those who traded where the streams were shallow had to wait until the early summer heats had melted the snows of the Rocky Mountains, and furnished a sufficient depth of water. Now, however, there is a gain in the transportation to New Orleans, which is wholly by steamers, instead of sailing vessels, and large steamers run thence to the head of ordinary navigation, such, for instance, as Shreveport, on the Red River, and smaller steamers are then used for the "up country."

In all parts of the Union this tendency to defer purchases as late as possible is operating. And it is believed that with the substitution of short for long credits, as most traders rely on prompt sales in their respective localities to meet their obligations in New York. In the present condition of affairs long credits would be exceedingly impolitic, as it is impossible to know what changes may occur between the creation and maturity of paper having much time to run. All who look to safety and certainty should sternly discountenance the effort to extend the credits of trade which are now being made. The position to do a large business tempts many in New York to accede to the demand for longer time. The policy is dangerous to both buyer and seller, and if not resisted may bring both face to face with a ruinous shock.

The trade in dry-goods has been somewhat checked by the fall in cotton fabrics. These have fallen about two cents per yard, and the finer description of shirtings about one and a half cents, since the spring trade opened, and, although the city is well full of country merchants, many are tempted to wait for a further expected fall. Raw cotton was offered somewhat more freely at the close of the week closing on the 20th March, owing to some extent to failures among small cotton-spinners reported in Manchester, and to the inability of manufacturers there to elevate the price of their cotton fabrics to a level with the price of the raw material. A renewed disposition to resort to short time is announced. The Board of Trade returns for 1868 show a diminution in the British export of cotton and linen goods and woolen manufactures of nearly five millions pounds sterling, mitigated somewhat by an increase in the export of worsted stuffs and yarns of nearly a million and a half.

The total of exports had fallen off for the year, as compared with 1867, a million and a half, while the imports had increased nearly seven millions, leaving an account less favorable, as compared with 1867, of sixteen and a half millions of pounds sterling, or in currency nearly one hundred millions of dollars. Of this excess of imports £6,000,000 occurred in December, 1868. Some of the items of it for that month, as compared with December, 1867, are as follows: Oil-cake, £285,000; tallow, £658,000; butter, £559,000; cheese, £135,000; bacon and hams, £196,000; seeds, £412,000; cotton, £3,541,000; wool, £460,000. This is called by the London Economist of March 6 an extraordinary augmentation. These figures show unmistakably some of the effects of the drought of 1867, as much of the excess of importation was due to that calamity.

The question whence the large supplies required until after the new harvest will be obtained is a deeply interesting one to this country, as we have all descriptions of grain and food on hand to sell if the limits now affixed by English purchasers are advanced so as to tempt our farmers to send to market. Messrs. A. & C. STEWART, of Birmingham, in their grain trade circular of March 4, say: "In February we usually have some improvement in the value of wheat. This year, however, the price has declined 2*s.* per quarter, and flour, 3*s.* 4*d.* per sack. This we attribute to the quick passage of ships recently sailed from ports east of Gibraltar, that were filled with those ports as sea, springing on the market at one time great quantities of grain from the Danube, Black, and Azof Seas. There are now, however, only 180 left afloat from these places, against 490 at this time last year."

The dependent condition of the kingdom for food to maintain her population of over 30,000,000, and for the raw material which is used in manufactures, is met by efforts of unparalleled activity to obtain the needed supplies. No matter how abundant and bounteous the exuberance, real or supposed, of crops in one portion of the world is paraded in those countries in which there is a society which exists safe at moderate rates. This incessant activity, aided by exaggerated reports of the home production, enables English dealers to obtain the immense supplies required from foreign countries for subsistence at the lowest rates. The interest which leads to this policy is easily understood when it is known that for two hundred millions of dollars, measured by our currency, must be annually sent away to purchase food, and that this enormous sum must be earned from all parts of the world by the profits of manufacturing industry.

That a people thus situated should be able to dictate to every country—amply supplied not only with both the raw material and food, but also with coal, with water-power, and all the appliances for success—what we shall pay for her manufactures, and what we shall take for our food, would be impossible if we were not provided with financiers, the managers of banks, who contribute incessantly to this tributary alliance.

There is but one class in the Union which can save the country from this disadvantage. It is the great agricultural interest. That interest, if it continue sound in its finances, as we trust it may, this powerful interest, by holding its supplies until remunerating prices are offered at their farms, may avoid the slaughter which will be easy if they press their produce prematurely upon the sea-board.

Our harvest this year are much too large—due in part to the sale of our bonds in Europe at advanced prices; but notwithstanding this error in policy and the certainty of ultimate suffering, there is ample ground for expecting a satisfactory season. The quantity of paper-money will continue unaffected by any Congressional action, and we may go on safely for the present, looking with such apprehension as the future as to require all possible caution in our dealings.

THE COMMON SCHOOLS IN DANGER.

THE tax-payers of the city and State can not be too much upon their guard against the intention of the Democratic ring to tamper with the school fund. The steady purpose of the Romish Church is to endow its sectarian schools by the State—a purpose which must be inflexibly resisted by every man who loves liberty. The Romish Church is a political society for its own ends. Its alliance is with the Democratic city ring. Last year, in the Legislature, it was virtually proposed to endow the Romish schools; but the protest from the people of the State was so startling that the plan was abandoned, and what was granted was under the name of charity.

The intention of many of the Democratic managers in this city, who are also Catholics, is well understood. They propose to obtain complete control of the school system, that they may use the three millions of dollars of school-money for their party purposes; and then secretly, and in large, the ascendency in the Legislature, the schools of the Romish Church will receive a proportionate share of the State fund. The attempt was begun during the autumn, when it was proposed to turn out Mr. BOESE, the accomplished, efficient, and most satisfactory Secretary of the Board, and replace him by Mr. HITCHMAN, a young New York Democratic politician, who is one of the political friends of Messrs. SWEENY, TWEED, HALL, and COMPANY, who manage the party. Mr. BOESE is a Democrat, but he is also a man of long and active experience, and of the most intelligent and profound interest in the common school system. Mr. HITCHMAN is a politician merely, and he warmly supports the bill drawn by Messrs. SWEENY and Company, which is now before the Legislature.

Should this bill pass Messrs. SWEENY and Company become the Board of Education of this city. The Mayor, one of the firm, is authorized to appoint twelve Commissioners instead of three now elected in the school districts, who are to hold office until the end of this year; and at the next annual election twelve Commissioners are to be elected upon general ticket. The whole fund being meanwhile in the hands of the Mayor's appointees, and the 2000 teachers being within their appointment, an immense sum can be raised for the party, the election of the "right man" can be secured, and the change of the State policy of non-sectarian schools to a distribution of the school-fund will follow.

Of course, if the schools of one church may be removed by force, those of all churches may be. Sectarian lines will be drawn more and more sharply. The principle of impartiality once broken down any consequence may ensue. When the State recognizes any church it may choose to recognize but one. It will naturally prefer that which is most fully represented in the dominant party; and our good friend, Father HECKER, will undoubtedly smile as he supposes he sees this evidence of the good time coming when the Yankees will acknowledge the Pope as their spiritual sovereign.

The duty of the people of New York is plain. They are heavily taxed for the support of common schools. The new Constitution provides for the free instruction of all persons between seven and twenty years of age. Let the people insist that those schools shall be utterly free from the least taint of sectarianism. The action of the Romish priests that children ought to be religiously taught has nothing to do with the question. Nobody denies that children ought to be religiously taught, but every one vehemently denies that the State ought to teach them religion. To teach religion, it must have a religion; but while the State or the body of its citizens may be as religious as they will, they can not, as a State, profess or encourage any particular form or all forms of religion without imperiling religious and political liberty. The Democratic ring wishes to destroy the present common school system of the city, and the Romish party surprised the scheme. The immediate result will be to make the whole school system tributary to MESSRS. SWEENY, TWEED, HALL, and Company. The real objects are: first, the political advantage of those gentlemen; and second, the sectarian distribution of the State school fund in favor of the Romish Church as a bid for votes.

LATEST FROM THE DEMOCRACY.

THE late address of the Democratic members of the Indiana Legislature, who arrogate their places rather than vote upon the Fifteenth Amendment, is ludicrous and humiliating; but it contains the substance of the Democratic opposition every where. Kentucky has rejected the Amendment; so has Delaware; so will New Jersey; the Democratic members of the New York Legislature opposed it—and all virtually for the reason laid down in the Indiana address. This, therefore, may be considered the latest political manifesto of the party that calls itself the "white man's friend."

"We believe," say the Indiana gentlemen, "the government was formed for white men, in the interest of white men, as well as we know it was created by white men." The words are theirs; and grammar, truth, reason, and common-sense sink in one general ruin in this comical profession of faith. The real object of the founders of the government are so familiar to intelligent persons that it is needless to repeat them. Their general view was that slavery was incompatible with the principles of the government; but that it was rapidly disappearing, and would soon end, while color was not a bar to the welfare. If WASHINGTON, and MADISON, and HAMILTON, and JEFFERSON, and GEORGE MASON, and JAMES OTIS, and JOHN ADAMS, the men who signed the Declaration and the Constitution, were living to-day, every body knows how earnest would be their support of the Amendment.

And if it were not so—if the fathers had held a different opinion in their time and under their circumstances, is it impossible for Indiana Democrats to see that we live in other times and circumstances? Is it true that there are not always now that the suffrage is equal in the old slave States; now that we must have a vast population of paupers, created and the suffrage to all; now that agitation of the question is as wise and timely as the discussion of the Louisiana purchase; now that the country has finally and authoritatively pronounced upon the question why do not the Indiana Democrats take up a new line, which there might be some hope of holding? Precisely as much as when these bewildered statesmen opposing the prohibition of the African slave-trade. They will be sending petitions to the White House, praying General JACKSON not to relax his terrible hold of Mr. NICHOLAS BIDDLE. They will go to the people of Indiana upon the question of adopting the Monongahela Constitution. These worthy gentlemen call themselves "hard-headed representatives"—of legume vits or iron-wood?

The Indiana Democratic representatives declare that "every thing is made to bow to this insane folly of negro worship," but they propose to protest to the end. If "all constitutional and legal barriers, and middle walls of partition (sic) between the races, are to be broken down," what ghastly consequences will not follow? These people are to be educated! They are to labor! They are to be equal in the making of the laws that govern them! And if you break down middle walls of partition what is to prevent the ingenuous Democratic youth of Indiana from intermingling with those who are not white people? What is to become of the instinct of inferiority that we Democrats are forever praising of, if constitutional and legal barriers give way? If "the degraded colored race" are not to be treated as cattle, "then will our whole State be flooded with this population."

And more of the same, said the sententious but fatigued usher announcing the Smith family at the levee. The feeblest clap-trap of a desperate Democratic campaign speech of twenty years ago is paraded by these weighty Indiana gentlemen as an inevitable step of progress. And the party which will not learn, which in the midst of the war cried out for surrender, and when the war was over demanded repudiation and restoration of the rump of the slave power, can only falsify history and insult human nature in its frantic and futile effort to save some relic of antiquated injustice.

THE REPORT ON LEGISLATIVE CORRUPTION.

A QUIET observer of public affairs in this State for many years will probably arrive at the conclusion that with all their outcry against legislative corruption the leading journals are not very anxious for reform. Some time ago the Tribune directly charged Senators in a body with receiving money for votes. It emphasized its charge in the strongest manner by appeals to the conscience of the people in matter of universal notoriety. And, indeed, the corruption of some members of the Legislature is as generally believed as the fact of a Legislature. The Senate, however, investigated the chief paper of its majority as corrupt, ordered an investigation. Mr. MATTHEW HALE, Mr. TRAVER, and Mr. NICHOLS were the committee appointed, and three honest men never sat on any Legislature. Mr. HALE, the chairman, is an able and sagacious lawyer, cool and independent, and perfectly familiar with politics and politicians.

Now what did every body know when the investigation began? That under the present law it is impossible, even if there is also a fool, to obtain actual evidence of bribery. All that a committee of investigation can do is to collect circumstances and from them infer what has been proved. Is it the duty of the committee to report that a certain Senator is charged with crime; that they have taken pains to find the proof; that they have not found it, and that they believe him guilty? "No," says the impatient reader, convinced that a Senator did take bribes —no, but they can not prove it, and so does every body can draw the necessary inference. If they believe, with the rest of us, that one of their number took money and yet can not prove it, they can make the statement and infer the guilt; they say there is no proof, yet morally convict him, and then they can show how to convict in future." Certainly they may; and this is precisely what the committee did.

SENATOR MATTOON was charged with accepting bribes. The actual proof of that fact is necessarily wanting. It is notorious that to establish that large sums of money were spent for corrupt purposes; that lobby agents, who are named, received money for that purpose; that they had access to influence Senatorial votes; and the committee present chronologically MR. MATTOON's connection with the whole subject in such a way as to make it clear that he was any candid mind both of his guilt and of the committee's opinion. They certainly had no right to say that they believed the charge unproved, still less to declare Mr. MATTOON probably guilty, and move his expulsion upon their surmise. But having most carefully, conscientiously, and thoroughly investigated the charge—having ascertained that the Tribune asserted upon rumor merely, the committee proceeded to say, what other perpetrators would be chary of their investigation had confirmed, that until the law is changed such allegations must always be rumor, that hawks in or out of the Senate can always defy them, and that a change of the law is essential to proof of guilt.

If ever there were an honest and able committee making a faithful report and recommending a wise reform, it was here. They distinctly state that the proof carries them to a certain point which falls short of the vital fact. They show also that under the present law it is impossible to go further, and propose a method of reaching the important point; and thereupon they are denounced by the papers as "shirks" and "whitewashers." Of course, the Tribune, which had made the specific charge of which the committee gave all the proof that there is, was disposed to insinuate that there was more if the committee had wanted it; but why should the Times, which has so well urged the very difficulty which the committee encountered, and so strongly advocated the remedy that they suggest, turn upon them as if they were probably as deep in the mire as somebody in the mud? And the Evening Post, also, with which we always gladly co-operate in any honest reform, seems to be unwilling to prevent this cause.

Certainly the course which our friends have pursued in denouncing the efforts of the Senators to secure the exposure and punishment of bribery is not very encouraging to honest legislators. If the press denounces committees who try to prove that the press wishes to have proved, why should we talk about corruption? What bribery of public men is worse than the declaration of the whole journalism that they will be denounced in the papers if they do not say what they are expected to say?

LITERARY.

MR. BOWLES is one of the raciest and most stimulating of travelers who tell their adventures. His book of two or three years ago describing the overland journey to California was not only like Mr. OLMSTED's books of Southern travel, as full of valuable information as an egg of meat, but it was as breezy and picturesque as the trip itself. It was one of the heartiest American books ever written. And this delightful little volume describing the first record of an editor's vacation ramble to Colorado, and it may truly be said that what this book does not tell of Colorado is not worth knowing. But it is attractive not only for the hard facts of mines and ores, and other statistics, but for its vivid descriptions both of nature and of human nature. We have no room to quote, but if we had we could offer the reader "bits" and "landscapes" that would tempt him to write for Mr. BOWLES's new county will presently become, the Switzerland of America. Whatever the changes in that region, and however rapid, this volume and its graphic censor will have a perennial interest and value. (SMITH, ENGLISH, & Co., Publisher, S. BOWLES & Co., Springfield, Massachusetts.

THE COUNTESS GUICCIOLI's long-expected book, "My Recollections of Lord Byron," has just been issued by the HARPERS, and will be eagerly read by thousands of those upon whom the fame of Byron has a power and still active. They are indeed a striking and entertaining contribution to a period of literary history which is profoundly interesting to this generation. The book contains a summary of the many judgments passed upon the famous poet in detail, and represents him in some lights that are both novel and surprising.

THE Maid of Saragossa and MOLL PITCHER stand in a pleasant light of historical romance; but their sex never produced a truer heroine than HARRIET TUBMAN, who was born a slave in Maryland, and who, after her own escape, devoted herself to the rescue of others. A little volume has been published in Auburn, made up of the story of her life as she tells it, and as it is known to many of those who were most interested in the underground railroad. It is a pitiful but profoundly interesting tale. It makes the nerves of an honorable man tingle, indeed, to think that it is not a romance of some delicate and decrepit old country, but the true story of our American times and of a living woman. The work, which is very small, can be obtained by those who would help a really noble woman at A. D. F. RANDOLPH's, or by sending to WM. G. WEIR, Esq., AUBURN, N. Y.

MR. JOHN JAMES PIATT's "WESTERN WINdows," published by Robert Clarke & Co., is a volume of poetry from the West, remarkable for purity and simplicity of feeling, and for a true child passion. There is a delicate beauty in many of the verses, a genuine tenderness, which are delightful. Some of the ballads of the war in this volume have been surpassed, and will certainly remain as most true and striking contemporary pictures. The little volume comes from unbeaten ground, but it will worthy attention of all who follow with interest and curiosity the development of our literature.

SEVER & FRANCIS, in a cheap issue of their comely "Golden Treasury" series, give us PALGRAVE'S delightful selection of the best English lyrical poetry by authors not living, with the "Book of Golden Deeds," by MISS YONGE—a charming collection of romantic tales. They also publish, in a cheap but neat form, "Arne: a Story of Norwegian Life," by BOERNSTERNE BJORNson, who has made himself most pleasantly known to English story-readers, and who is said to translate his own works into English, French, German, and Italian. The same firm have issued MRS. SHELLEY'S "Frankenstein"—a story of which many of this generation of readers have heard, but which is now first made accessible to them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 15:

In the Senate, the bill for the Reorganization of the Navy passed with amendments.—The Tenure-of-Office bill was debated, Messrs. Trumbull, Sherman, Morton, Conkling, Howard, and Saunders speaking in favor of unconditional repeal.

March 16:

In the Senate, the debate on the Tenure-of-Office bill was continued. Senator Sherman made an effective speech in favor of repeal. Senators Carpenter and Edmunds ably argued on the other side.

March 18:

In the Senate, a resolution was adopted directing the Committee on Printing to inquire into the expediency of procuring the reports of proceedings in secret session taken down in his journal by the late Senator M'Clay of Pennsylvania.—The debate on the Tenure-of-Office Bill was continued. Senator Brownlow argued in favor of repeal.

March 19:

In the Senate, a bill to continue the Educational and Collection Departments of the Freedmen's Bureau was passed.

In the House, the Indian Appropriation bill was passed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

In compliance with the recent Act of Congress the Infantry of the army is being consolidated into twenty-five regiments. Each company will have a reserve for duty (captain, 1 first-lieutenant, 1 second-lieutenant, and not more than 6 sergeants, 6 corporals, 2 musicians, 2 artificers, 1 wagoner, and 100 privates. In the selection of field-officers General Sherman has regarded the proven merit of officers who distinguished themselves during the war. These among the colonels are: Brevet Major-General of S. W. Crawford, G. W. Getty, N. A. Miles, W. B. Hazen, John Gibbon, A. G. Gibbon, O. B. Willcox, L. C. Grittenden, T. H. Ruger, George Sykes, George Stoneman, E. R. S. Canby, and J. J. Reynolds, Inspector-General in the Lieutenant-Colonels we find J. H. Potter, A. G. Brackett, C. S. Lovett, R. Hunt, A. J. D. M'Cook, G. D. Bush, H. A. Morrow, August V. Kautz, H. Lazelle, Wager Swayne, A. B. Ayres, L. H. Pelouze, George Crosby, and Wm. Grower.

Lieutenant-General Sheridan is assigned to command the Military Division of the Missouri; Major-General H. W. Halleck to that of the Pacific; Major-General Meade to that of Major-General George H. Thomas to that of the Cumberland; Major-General Hancock to that of the Atlantic; Major-General Schofield to the Department of the Missouri; and Brigadier-General Brevet Major-General Sheridan to the Department of Louisiana.

Among the field-officers appointed by the recent order of the President are Colonels S. F. Heintzelman, Daniel Butterfield, Gouverneur K. Warren, J. C. Reynolds, Innis N. Palmer, Wagner Swayne, all lately acting as Brigadier or Major-Generals; Lieutenant-Colonels Joseph A. Haskin, Robert Pickens Hamil, Alfred Sully, James B. Wilcox (the author of "Rifle and Light Infantry"), Frederick T. Dent (a brother-in-law of the President), and Thomas M. Vincent, Assistant Adjutant-General. These latter have also ranked as Brigadier or Major-Generals of Volunteers. Several captains and sixty-four officers of all grades will be retained.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Corporation of Harvard College have completed the twenty-fifth year of their institution. Acton upon this momentous event was taken on April 7th. The college is only thirty-five years of age.

A number of rich paintings by Gustave Doré are now in the custom-house at this port awaiting the order of the owner. They are valued at about $100,000.

The Boston Peace Jubilee, among them The Wedding Scene at Bethany, The Last Supper, The Crucifixion, The Ascension, a monk-scene—were sent to the country some time ago, and have been on exhibition in Worcester and Springfield. The principal cities of the Union without paying duty.

The Fifteenth Amendment has been ratified, a few days after the arrival of the ill-fated vessel in that port.

Senor Morales Lemus has succeeded in the country fully empowered by President Grant.

The Provisional Government of Cuba is still in force.

The Fifteenth Amendment has been defeated in the Legislature of Delaware by a decisive majority.

The French cable company, through its agent, has purchased a tract of land at Duxbury, Plymouth County, Massachusetts, one mile south of Cut River, for the purpose of erecting a cable-house. Two cable-houses and buildings will be erected for the accommodation of the operators on the ocean-side and planting the patterns and other necessary apparatus.

General Samuel Fessenden, the father of Senator W. P. Fessenden, died at Portland on the night of March 21, at the age of eighty years.

Senator Sprague stated in a speech on the day after the death of his father-in-law that he intended to resume lawyers, and of the twenty-one remaining five were lawyers by legal education, and more than five remaining members are governed by lawyers and their teachings."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE draught of the New Spanish Constitution is soon to be submitted to the Cortes. It is said to establish complete civil and religious liberty, while it retains the Bourbons on the Spanish throne. Political disturbances have occurred in Andalusia owing to the opposition to conscription. Several small insurrections were waged and a large number of lives were lost.

The Prince of Hohenlohe has declined the direction of the Cross of the Legion of Honor upon Captain Jochmus, of the Turkish contingent, Commander of reward for his skill and indomitable courage in conducting the retreat in disaster which he contributed to that vessel. The French citizens of New York have given a banquet in his honor.

Dr. Petermann is preparing to send out a new Polar expedition. It will sail in June.

The waters of the Mediterranean have been successfully introduced into the Great Salt Lake basin by the Suez Canal.

Celestino Olozaga, a nephew of Don Salustiano Olozaga, late Minister to Paris, was killed in a duel, March 17, by Don Cristino Martos, leader of the Spanish Liberal Cortes and one of its Secretaries.

The Irish Disestablishment Parliament has passed a bill securing freedom of speech in all the Diets of Germany.

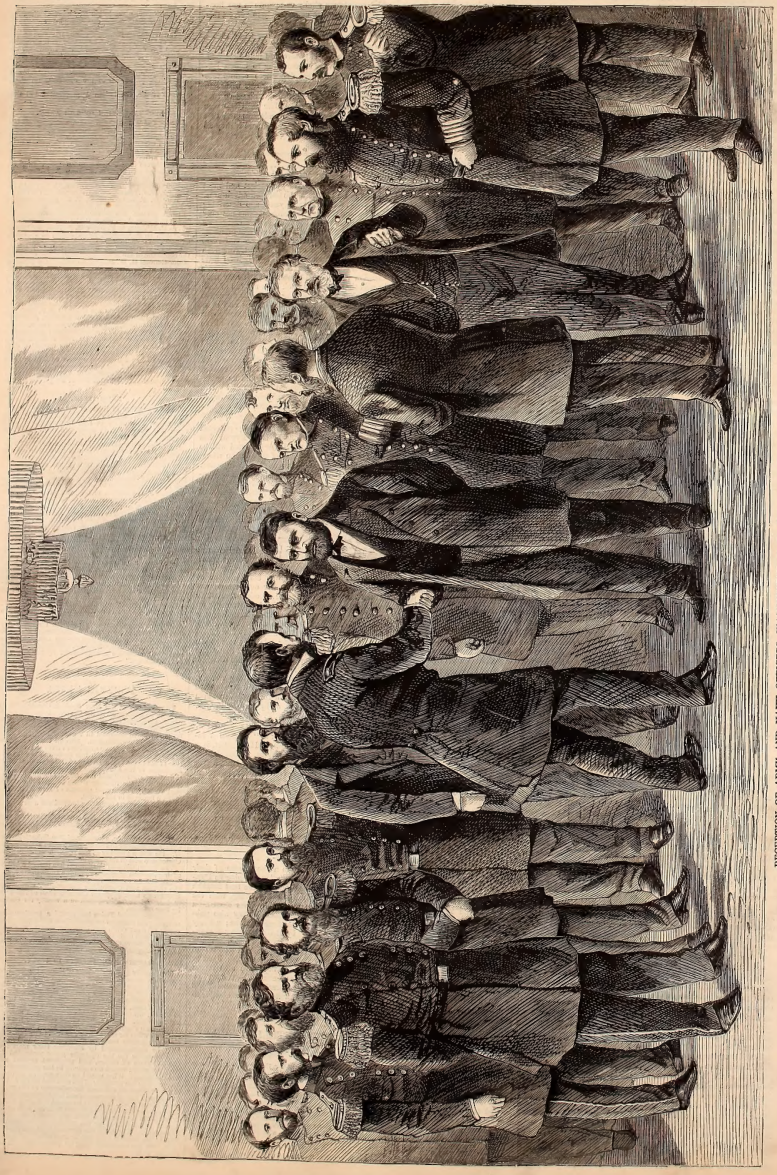
A prize contest for the Chancellorship between the Oxford and Cambridge Universities' eight-oared crews came off on the Thames on the afternoon of March 18, at four o'clock, and resulted in a victory for Oxford by three lengths.

Captain-General Dulce has issued a proclamation declaring the taxation on provisions and manufactured estate fifty per cent., and imposing additional duties on articles of consumption.

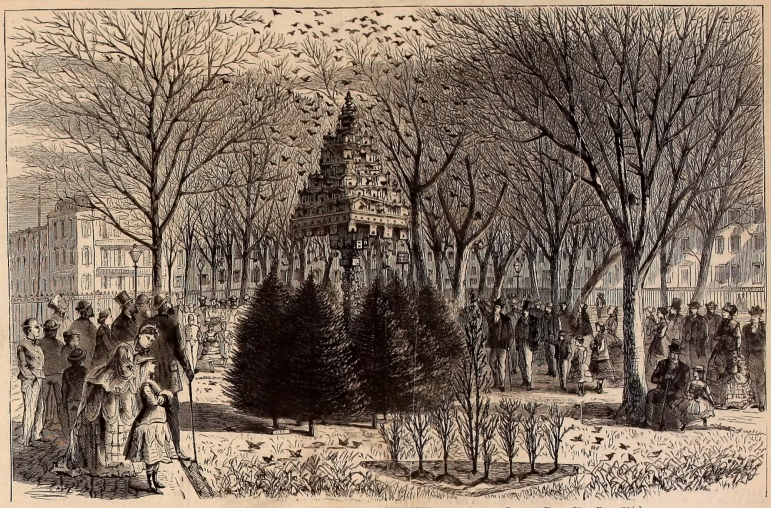
A slight earthquake shock was experienced in Lancashire, England, on March 16.

MARRIAGE OF PRIESTS IN ITALY.

The legality of the marriage of priests has been affirmed in the ecclesiastic court established by the Court of Appeal at Naples. The advocate of the priest who was desirous of entering into the married state argued that celibacy was in perfect contradiction to the spirit of the Holy Scriptures, and to the example of Christ, who selected for his disciples and apostles married men. Before the time of Hildebrand it was received with absurd of applause and vivas, which were renewed when the court on its exit from the court society the priests must be moralized, and this could not be accomplished by the celibacy of the clergy. The advocate for the opposite party contended for the celibacy of the clergy, and corrected many of the charges which would do violence to the prejudices of the multitude. What would be the result if a man who said mass in the presence of his wife and family? The Attorney-General followed the advocate of the priest in a speech full of eloquence, and distinguished by the most liberal views. He said that he would indeed be bold out his hand to a priest who took his wife to his bosom, but that one who took his concubine. The speech was followed by the widest demonstrations of applause. The court decided that the application for the priest's marriage is inadmissible, and directed that in the necessary shall be proceeded with according to law.



RECEPTION OF ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS, WASHINGTON, D. C.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 214.]



THE SPARROWS' HOME, UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 214.]

FULTON FISH-MARKET.

OTHER cities may boast of finer edifices, under the shelter of which the scaly inhabitants of our coasts and our rivers tempt the appetite of the epicure; but no city in the world can show so great a variety of fish as is daily displayed on the stands in Fulton Market, New York. Especially is this the case during the Lenten season, when a stroll through the avenues of the Market early on a bright spring morning is positively refreshing; the eye is gratified by the elegant outline and color of many of our fishes, and the sense of smell is not offended.

A visitor to the Market at this season will find, offered for sale, halibut, cod, haddock, striped bass, smelt, and shad, just taken from their briny element. Of fresh-water fishes he will be offered white-fish, pickerel, brook-trout, and salmon—this latter, kept by the new process of cold-air reservoirs, as fresh, sweet, and delicate as when taken from Canadian streams last summer.

FISH STANDS IN FULTON MARKET, NEW YORK.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

Formerly there appears to have existed some understanding between the shad and St. Patrick, for, on the 17th of March, shad were wont to allow themselves to be caught in the seines of our fishermen; but, for some reason or other, they have latterly declined visiting us until later in the season—those now offered in the Market being brought, for the most part, from North Carolina and the Chesapeake, and a few from Delaware.

The wholesale fish department in Fulton Market is quite an important interest, consisting of fourteen firms whose combined sales are over $2,000,000 a year, giving employment to a large number of men and sailors connected with 111 fishing-smacks which they own.

THE SPARROWS' HOME.

During the past few years our city and those immediately adjacent have been interested in the introduction of the English sparrow. In the parks of New York, and in the tree-lined streets of Jersey City and Brooklyn, the superabundance of insects, and particularly the annoyance of worms hanging from the branches and continually dropping upon passengers, became such burdensome nuisances that any means of relief was welcome. This relief was found in the sparrow. A few were imported, but they increased so rapidly that it is now becoming a question in some localities whether relief is not likely to become a nuisance themselves. They certainly are preferable to the worms; and our city government has done well, we think, in encouraging the sparrows to take up their permanent abode with us by affording them such pleasant homes as that on Union Square, which we illustrate on page 213.

It may be well to suggest to our readers in this connection that while it is wise to feed these birds in the winter time, it is better in all other seasons to turn them adrift to shift for themselves. In the very object of their introduction into this country would be thwarted by any other treatment.

RECEPTION OF ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS.

At 11 o'clock on the morning of March 12 the officers of the army stationed in and around Washington assembled at the Navy Department to the number of about 60. They were attired in full uniform, and proceeded in a body to the office of Secretary Borie, where they were presented to him by Rear-Admiral D. Ammen, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance. The Secretary received them in a most cordial manner, and impressed all very favorably by his affable demeanor. The presentation ceremonies lasted but a few moments, and when Secretary Borie had shaken hands with and exchanged a few pleasant remarks with most of them, the entire party, headed by Secretary Borie, went in a body to the Executive Mansion, where they entered the blue room and waited a few moments to be presented to the President. President Grant presently appeared, accompanied by General Sherman, and the officers were introduced to the President by Vice-Admiral Porter. The President shook hands with each of the officers, recognizing among those present were Vice-Admiral Porter, Rear-Admirals Smedburgh, Smith, Goldsborough, Dahlgren, and others.

While the naval officers were exchanging salutations, the officers of the army, headed by ex-Secretary Rawlins and General Sherman, entered and were announced. General Sherman approached the President, and the two shook hands warmly and vigorously. He then introduced the officers in turn. Among the distinguished officers present were Generals Harney, Ewing, Ingalls, Terry, Hardie, Heintzelman, Adjutant-General Townsend, and others. During the interview, the Secretary of War, General Rawlins, entered, and was instantly surrounded by the officers, who earnestly congratulated him upon his appointment to the War Office. It was a day of about an hour the interview terminated.

THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.

CHAPTER XXXI.

IN SORROW.

Or what followed that night of mourning I remember but snatches and brief glimpses. There is nothing more distinctly terrible than the mind in sorrow than the way in which the mere excitement of grief robs the intellect of all power of perception, and gives to the smallest, meanest incidents the prominence and force of great events. It is as though the jar given to the marvelous system had untuned us for the entire world, and all things came amiss. I am sure, indeed, I know it would have been impossible to have met more gentle and considerate kindness than I now experienced on every hand, and yet I found in a sort of feverish irritability as though expecting each moment to have my position questioned, and my right to be there disputed.

In obedience to the custom of the country, I was necessary that the funeral should take place within forty-eight hours after the death, though all the details had been carefully looked to by the Count's orders, certain questions still should be asked of me, and my assent obtained for certain acts.

The small Church of Hunyadi-Nagios was fixed on for the last resting-place. It contained the graves of eight generations of Hunyadis, and to accept a place among them to a stranger and a Protestant was deemed a high honor. Affliction seemed to have developed in me all the pride of my race, for I can recall with what sullen hauteur I heard of this concession, and rather took it as a favor accorded than accepted. A condescending sense of all that my father himself would have thought due to his memory was on me, and I turned my head to think that no mark of honor he would have desired should be forgotten. As a soldier, he had right to a soldier's funeral, and a "Honved" battalion, with their band, received orders to be present. Two miles around the landed gentry and nobles poured in, with bands of followers. Such a death in battle there was no such noble death as in the hunting-field, and the splendid prowess of my father's achievements had won him unperishable honor.

All was conducted as if for the funeral of a magnate of Hungary. At the moment when the deceased were proclaimed aloud as we entered the grave-yard, and each whose station entitled him to be thought a friend came forward and kissed the pall as the body was borne in.

One part of the ceremony overcame me altogether. When the final moment of mukkery had rung out over the grave a solemn pause of half a minute or so was to ensue, then the band was to burst out with the hymn "God preserve the Emperor!" and while a wild cheer arose, I was to spring into the saddle of my father's horse, which had been led up for the purpose, and to join the cheer. This soldier declaration that death was but a passing terror revolted me to the heart, and I declared that myself I could not do this. They would not yield, however; they regarded my reasons as childish remorse, and all half respected my courage besides. I do not know why I gave in, nor am I sure I ever did yield, but when the last solemn note had rung out slowly rose over the bier, I felt myself jerked up into the saddle of a horse that plunged wildly and struggled with its rider. With a rider's instinct I held my seat, and even managed the bounding animal with the hand of a practised horseman. The shouting and cheering shaken, while the air rang with the hoarse cheer of some thousand voices, and then a sickness like death itself gathered round me in spasms of horror, of where I was and why, came over me. My arms fell powerless to my sides, and I rolled from the saddle and fell senseless and stunned to the ground.

Without having received serious injury, I was for ill to be removed from the village of Nagios, where I was confined to bed for ten days. The doctor remained with me for some days, and came again and again to see his patient. The chief care of me, however, devolved on my father's valet, a smart young Swiss, whom I had difficulty in keeping at a distance, for which I fecily did he speak our language.

I soon saw this fellow was thoroughly conversant with all my father's history, and, whether in his confidence or not, knew every thing that concerned him, and understood his character to a nicety, almost to perfection. There was much adroitness in the way in which he showed me his, without the slightest approach to presuming my taste by any display of a supposed influence. Of his consummate tact I need give but one—very trivial instance. He had already contrived to denote the man. He, in addressing me as Sir Digby, remarked how the sound of my newly acquired title must be most pleasant to my mind at once, and ever after limited himself to saying simply, "Sir," which attracted no attention from me.

Another instance of his address I must record also. I had got my writing-desk on the bed, and was writing to my mother, when I had already dispatched two telegraphic messages, but as yet received no reply. "I beg pardon, Sir," said La Grange, entering in his usual noiseless fashion; "but I thought you would like to know that my lady has left Schloss Hunyadi. She took her departure half-an-hour ago, Sir."

"You mean—?" I faltered, not really knowing what I would say.

"Yes, Sir," said he, thoroughly aware of what was passing in my mind. "She admitted no one, not even the doctor, and started at last with only a few words of adieu to the servants." [ness.

"What impression has this left? How are they speaking of her?" asked I, blurting out against my will what was working within me.

"I believe, Sir," said he, with a very faint smile, "they say it all is Providence, and orders its. At least I have heard no other comments than such as would apply to these."

"Be sure that you give rise to no others," said I, sternly.

"Of course not, Sir. It would be highly unbecoming to do so."

"And greatly to your disservice besides," added I, severely.

He bowed in acquiescence, and said no more.

"How long have you served my father, La Grange?" asked I.

"About two years, Sir. I succeeded Mr. Nixon, Sir, who often spoke of you."

"Ah, I remember Nixon. What became of him?"

"He set up the Hotel Victoria at Spa, Sir. Yes, indeed, Sir, that he married, and married very well too?"

"No, I never heard of it," said I, carelessly.

"Yes, Sir; he married Mademoiselle Josephine Isabelle Pauline they used to call her at Brussels."

"What! Pauline Delorme?" said I, growing crimson with I know not what feeling.

"Yes, Sir, the same; and she's the size of old Pierre her father already; not but she's handsome still—but such a monster!"

I can not say with what delight I heard of her disfigurement. It was a malice that warmed my heart like some good wine.

"It was Sir Roger, Sir, that made the match."

"How could that be? What could he care about it?"

"Well, Sir, he certainly gave Nixon five hundred pounds to go and propose for her, and promised old Pierre his patronage if he agreed to it."

"Are you sure of this?" asked I, eagerly.

"Nixon himself told me, Sir. I remember he said, 'I haven't much time to lose about it, for the hotels are for sales, is quite ready to take her, on the same terms, and Sir Roger doesn't care which of us it is.'"

"Nor the lady either, apparently," said I, half crediby.

"Of course not. Pauline was too well brought up for that."

I was not going to discuss this point of ethics with Mr. La Grange, and soon fell off into a vein of reflection over each of these, and what they led to, which took me at last miles away from Pauline Delorme and her fascinations.

I would hardly have much to learn what sort of a life my father had led of late: whether he had plunged into habits of dissipation and excess; or whether my feeling of remorse had weighed with him, and that he sorrowed over the misery and the sorrow he had so recklessly shed around him; but I shrunk from questioning a servant on such matters, and merely asked as to his habitual spirits and temper.

"Sir Roger was unlike every other gentleman I ever lived with, Sir," said he. "He was never in high spirits except when he was hard up for money. Put him down in a little country inn to wait for his remittances, and live on a few francs a day till they arrived, and he never saw his equal for good-humor. He'd play with the children; he'd work in the garden. I've seen him harness the donkey-cart to go for a load of fire-wood. There's nothing he would not do to oblige, and with a kind word and a smile for every one all the while; but when remitting he'd get up with a dark frown on his face, and say, 'La Grange, get in your bills here and pay them; we must get back to Paris.' And off we'd go. I never will the banker's letter had come, and that whatever he might want it would not be money."

"And like it?"—Madame, I mean—no influence over him?"

"None, Sir, or next to none; he was all extremely with his wife, but, in dinner every day with great state, showed her every attention at table, left her at liberty to spend what money she liked. As for me, Sir, I never had a line to regret. I'm sure I had a bracelet, it was sent home. As to valet, I believe there are persons here who will testify to the change. I had two fourgons of her luggage alone when we came to the Schloss, and she was always saying there was something in the fourgon for me."

"Did not this irritate my father?"

"No, Sir; he was simply say, 'Don't whit, but write for it.' And I verily believe this indifference piqued her—she saw that no sacrifice of honor or duty was my thing, and this thought wounded her pride."

"So that there was not much happiness between them?"

"There was none, Sir! Something there was that Sir Roger would never consent to, but which she never ceased to urge on him; and I often wondered how she could go on to press a man of his dangerous temper as she did, and at times she would do so in the very verge of a provocation. Do you know, Sir," said he, after a short silence, "if I was to be on my oath to-morrow, I'd not say that he was not pushing his death when he met it. I never saw a man so sick of life—he was only puzzled how to lay it down without dishonor."

I motioned him to leave me as he said this, and of my father I never spoke to him more.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE END.

Two telegrams came from my mother. They were little more than messages. She had been ill, and was impatient to see me. In the last she added that she would shorten the distance between us to meet me, and begin to rejoice. It was to inquire for her at "Eldrige's Hotel."

I was no less eager to be with her; but there was a worry and confusion in which still delayed me. First of all, all my father's papers and effects were at Schloss Hunyadi, and some of these he all-essential to me. On arriving at the Castle, a sealed package addressed Sir Digby Norcott, Bart., in Madame Clermont's hand, was given me. On opening it I found it contained a bunch of keys, without one word of any kind. It was an unspeakable relief to me to discover that she had not even left her correspondence or her threats, and I could scarcely reassure my self that we had escaped so easily.

My father's personal luggage might have sufficed for half a dozen people. Not only did he possess every variety of clothes that an ordinary life could have required, but that he journeyed with every imaginable kind of weapon, together with saddlery and harness—gear of all fashion and shapes. Fishing-tackle and hunting-spears abounded; and lassos of Mexican make seemed to show that he had intended to have availed his experiences to the great savannas of the West.

From what I had seen of him, I was in no way prepared for the methodical regularity in which I found his papers. All that regarded his money matters was contained in one small oak desk, in which I found a will, a copy of which it was stated was deposited with Norton and Temple, solicitors, Farnival's Inn. The document ran thus:

"I leave whatever I may die possessed of in personal or real property to the wife I have long neglected, in trust for the boy I have done much to corrupt. With time, and in the enjoyment of better fortune, they may learn to forgive me; but, even if they should not, it will little trouble the rest of ROGER NORCOTT.

"I desire that each of my servants in my service at the time of my death should receive a quarter's wages; but no present or gratuity of any kind. It is a class that always served me with fear and dislike, and whose services I ever accepted with distrust and repugnance.

"I also desire that my retriever, 'Spy,' be shot as soon after my death as may be, and that my other dogs be given away to persons who have never known me, and that my heirs will be particular on this head, so that none shall pretend that they inherit this or that of mine in token of friendship or affectionate remembrance.

"There are also other objects of furniture in the care of Salter, the house-agent at Brussels, of which I beg my wife's acceptance—they are intrinsically of little value, but she will know how dearly we have both paid for them. This is all.

(Signed) ROGER NORCOTT.

"Witnesses, Joseph Grantes, head groom.

"Paul Lanton, house steward."

This will, which bore for date only four months prior to his death, did not contain any, the slightest allusion to Madame Clermont. Was it that by some ancient arrangement with her, I had taken care to provide for her, omitting, through a sense of delicacy to my mother, all mention of her name? This I could not guess at the time, nor did I ever discover afterward.

In a larger desk I found a mass of letters; they were tied in packets, each with a ribbon of different color; they were all in women's handwriting. There were several miniatures on ivory, one of which was of my mother as a girl of about eighteen. It was exceedingly beautiful, and wore an expression of girlish innocence and gladness perfectly charming. On the back, in my father's hand, there was—"Why won't they keep this look? I never believed it could exist."

Of the contents of the box I committed all to the flames except that picture. A third desk, the key of which was appended to his will, contained a manuscript in his writing, headed "My Clermont Episode, how it began, and how it was not long to be." I own it was with no small sorely to throw this into the fire without reading it; but I felt it would have been a disloyalty, which, had he lived, he never would have exacted, and so I restrained myself, and burned it.

One box, strongly strapped with bands of brass, and opening by a lock of most complicated mechanism, was filled with articles of jewelry, not only such trinkets as men affect to wear in shirt-studs and sleeve-buttons, but also many objects of women's wear; there were rings and charms, bracelets of massive make, and necklaces of great value. There were also several cross locks, to each of which was a locket, with a braid of very beautiful fair hair. This looked as though it had been worn, and if so, how had it come back to him again? by what story of sorrow, perhaps of death?

If a sentiment of honor and loyalty had made me burn all the letters, I had found there was no restraining the exercise of my imagination as to these relics, every one of which was linked with some story. In a secret drawer of this box was a considerable sum in gold, and a letter of credit for a large amount on Eschelles, of Vienna, by which it appeared that he had won the chief prize of the Frankfort lottery, in the spring preceding; a piece of fortune which, by a turn in his handwriting, I saw he believed was to cost him dearly: "What is the counterpoise to this bliss, in An infidelity, or a sudden death? I can't say that either affright me, but I think the last would be less of an infliction."

In every relic of him the same tone of mockery prevailed—an insolent contempt for the world —a disdain from which he did not exempt himself—went through all he said or did; and it was plain to see that, no matter how events went with him, he always sufficed for his own unhappiness.

What a relief it was to me to turn from this perpetual reference to some new affliction or to my dear mother's, written after their separation indeed, but in a spirit of such thorough forgiveness, and with such an honest desire for her welfare, that I only wondered how any heart could have resisted such loving generosity. I really believe would have spared even him at his humility. Every reference to their inequality of condition seemed to affect him like an insult; and so deep was the dread of her letters there, written, in pencil, "Does she imagine I ever forget from what I took her; or that the memory is a pleasant one?"

Mr. La Grange's curiosity to learn what amount of money my father had left behind him, and what was the disposition of his will touched my patience very hard indeed. I could not, however, exactly see how I could rid of him. He had long been intrusted with the payment of tradesmen's bills, and he was in a position to involve me in great difficulty if so disposed.

At last we set out for England; and never shall I forget the strange effect produced upon me by the first sight of my new station returned toward me. It seemed to me but yesterday that I was the companion of poor Hansel, of the "Lion's Head," at Canterbury, and his protégé, one of the favored of the earth. The fame of being rich spreads rapidly, and my reputation on that head nothing but modest reserve or forbearance of my valet. I was of another opinion—too, as the son of that daring Englishman who had lost his life so heroically. Heaven knows how La Grange had related the tragic incident, nor with what embellishment he had been pleased to adorn it. I can only say that half my days were passed in assuring eager inquirers that I was neither present at the adventure nor wounded in the affray; and all my efforts were directed to proving that I was a most insignificant person, and without the smallest claim to interest on any side.

Arrived in London, I was once more a "personage;" at least, to my family solicitors. My father's will had been already proved, and I was recognized in all form as the heir to his title and fortune. They were eager to know would I restore the family seat at Hexham. The Abbey was an architectural gem that all England was proud of, and I was eagerly entreated not to suffer it to drop into decay and ruin. The representation of the borough—long neglected by my family—only needed an effort to secure; and would I not accept the ambition of a parliamentary life? What glimpses of future greatness were shown me! what possibilities of charm that attained that I took him now with me! Never! And all this time I was pining to clasp my mother to my arms; to pour out my whole heart before her, and tell her that I loved a poor Jewish girl, silent and half-sad looking, but whose low soft voice still echoed within my heart, whose cold hand had left a thrill after its touch that had never ceased to move me.

"Oh, Digby, my own, own darling!" cried she, as she hugged me in her arms, "what a great tall fellow you have grown, and how like—how like him!" and she burst into a torrent of tears, renewed every time that she raised her eyes to my face, and saw how I resembled my father. There remained an ecstasy in this grief which she never wearied, and day after day she would sit holding my hand, gazing wistfully at me, and only turning away as her tearful eyes grew dim with weeping. I will not dwell on the days we passed together, full of sorrow they were, but a sorrow so hallowed by affection that we felt an unspeakable calm shed over us.

My first kindness to my father, as the first saw him, during her mind went to that period, and she never ceased to talk of that time of hope and happiness. Ever ready to ascribe any thing unfavorable in his character to the evil influences of others, she maintained that though occasionally carried away by hot temper and passion, he was not one bit the less of honor but had a heart of tenderness and gentleness. Curious to find out what sudden change of mind had led to the history of the incident, we received for answer, that though bound strictly to secrecy at the time, events had since occurred which in a measure removed that obligation. The advance, he declared, came from the house of Hodnig and Oppovich, Frankfort, having failed at that time, but there was no longer the same necessity for reserve. "It is only this morning," he added, "that we received news of the death of the Herr Ignas Oppovich, the last of this once opulent firm now reduced to utter ruin."

My mother's head, I guessed on each other in silence as we read these words, when at length she threw her arms around me and said, "Let us go to her, Digby; let us rest out this very day."

Two days after we were on the Rhine. I was seated with her together on the deck of a river steamer, when I was startled to hear a voice enter my name. The speaker was a party acquaintance of mine, who walked the deck with a companion to whom he talked in a loud tone.

"I tell you, Sir," said he, "that Lord Scott's, who has seen those new cool-fields and the Hexham property, can't have less than ten thousand a year."

"And he's going to marry a rich Austrian Jewess they say," replied the other, "as if his own fortune was not enough for him."

"He'll marry her, and desert her just as his father did."

I have but to say that I accomplished one part of this prediction, and hope never to fulfill the other.

REVOLT OF CONVICTS AT SING SING.

THE quiet little village of Sing Sing, on the Hudson, was, on the 18th of March, thrown into a fever of excitement by the startling announcement of desperate and murderous revolts among the convicts of the State Prison. The first of these occurred between three and four o'clock in the morning. At about that time Mr. FORREST, one of the night-keepers, went to the cells in one of the corridors, and released five convicts, whose duty it was to descend to the cook-room and prepare breakfast for the inmates of the prison. As the convicts stepped from their cells Mr. FORREST passed to the office, where he left the keys, and took another key which opened the cloor of the cook-room and the door of the latter place, O'NEIL, one of the convicts, drew Mr. FORREST'S attention to a corpse in the corridor, as they were moving away the keeper was seized, gagged, and bound.

After FORREST had been secured they stood him opposite the guard-post at a window, and then went to the cook-room, where they found another keeper, named EDWARD CLARK, at work at the stove, and, leaving him lying on his face. He was found dead where they left him, having probably died from strangulation. Having freed themselves, the convicts, five in number, made good their escape.

A little after noon three other convicts overcame the guard, got possession of some carbines, and sallied forth toward the depot Exchange, of Newburg, a vessel then lying at the wharf, and laden with lumber. In the mean time they had been joined by four others, and all being armed, they compelled the captain and all hands on the lumber sloop ashore. This order having been obeyed, the convicts rushed on board and attempted to get the vessel under way. She was, however, severely anchored, a fact which was unknown to them. But they cut the ropes. When the news of the second revolt reached head-quarters, a reinforcement of guards arrived.

The convicts, seeing the guards coming, began firing upon them from the muskets and carbines with which they had armed themselves. The guards returned the fire rapidly, and altogether about twenty-five shots were fired, when the convicts of the Exchange, seeing that one of the convict's was out of ammunition, walked up and seized the villain's musket, and clubbed him down.

At this juncture hundreds of men from Sing Sing village, armed with muskets and every weapon, arrived on the spot, and the rebellious convicts, seeing there was no chance for escape, quietly surrendered.

The two ringleaders—M'CAULEY and ALLEN —were wounded in this encounter, the former, it was supposed, mortally, and the latter dangerously. Before night two of the convicts who had escaped in the morning were recaptured.

It is a fact worth noting that there are but thirty keepers in the prison to guard 1338 men and 139 women. The number is limited to that amount by a law which was passed when the prison contained but 600 convicts. But one other keeper besides CRAFT has been killed since the occupation of the prison.

ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP RACE.

SOME interest has been felt in the fact of the Cunard Royal mail-steamer Russia, Captain T. Cook, and the Inman Royal mail-steamer City of Paris, Captain Murphy, both iron screw steamers, and the finest commercial vessels afloat, having left New York on the same day, and within one hour of each other, and arriving at Liverpool, the one but 35 minutes after the other, early on the morning of February 15, having made the passage from the Atlantic, with the 20 minutes stoppage at Queenstown, in eight days and about eighteen hours. The peculiar illustration in the matter in which the two ships kept pace together during the first four days. The logs show that at Queenstown the City of Paris had gained 42 minutes on the Russia, but that coming up the Channel the Russia recovered her lost ground, and the City of Paris, which had started first, got in at 8.45 A.M. on the 20th, and the Russia at 4.20. It is claimed on behalf of the City of Paris that she is not to be put down as her brief in consequence of her having to take the place of her disabled consort, the City of Boston, which was to have left on the four before and to trim her properly. On the other hand, it is claimed for the Russia that she was deeply laden, and that her speed has been reduced for several voyages. On the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th the vessels were in company. On the 13th, by the Russia's log, she passed the City of Paris; and, though the fact is not logged, it is stated by passengers that the Russia had afterward to stop her engines for more than a half hour in order to remove the cover of the air-pump, and to renew the Indian rubber of a valve.

It is the ambition of the Inman Company to run any risks in racing; and, though every art of seamanship was no doubt exercised, no blame both steamers, the pressure of steam was not increased beyond the ordinary limit. The Russia was built in 1867 by Messrs. J. and G. Thomson of Glasgow. Her dimensions are: length, 370 feet over all; beam, 43 feet; depth of hold, 24 feet; tonnage, 3,000, builder's measurement. Her engines cylinders are 86 inches diameter, and the piston-stroke is 3 feet 10 inches. The City of Paris was built by Messrs. Tod & Mac-Gregor, of Glasgow, in 1866. Her length over all is 365 feet; beam, 40 feet 4 inches; depth of hold, 26 feet 2 inches; tonnage, 3,000 by builder's measurement; diameter of cylinder, 89 inches; length of piston-stroke, 3 feet 6 inches.

A MARINE CANDLE.

THERE is found on the coasts of British Columbia, Russian America, and Vancouver's Island, a little fish not larger than a small, clad in a glistening armor, which is fat almost beyond conception. It is popularly known as the candle-fish, but its scientific name is the eulachon. Mr. Lord has carefully studied the habits and manners of this fish, and the uses to which it is put by the Indians. The Indians, he says, have joined their excursions against the candle-fish, which, sporting in the moonlight on the surface of the sea, form the appearance of a vast sheet of pearly waves. To catch them, the Indians use a monster comb or rake six or eight feet long, composed of a piece of plank pierced, with teeth made of bone, if sharp-pointed nails are not to be procured. The canoe being paddled to the proper place next to the shoal, the other sweeps the rake through the mass, and brings it to the surface, teeth upward, with fishes, and often a dozen or more, fast impaled on each tooth. By the repetition of this process many canoes are soon filled. The canoes being loaded, the further voyage devolves upon the squaws, who have to do the curing, drying, and oil-making. They do not yet impregnate the fish with salt, but in glasses long smooth sticks through their eyes, skewering on each stick as many as it will hold, and then lashing another piece transversely at the ends to prevent them from slipping off the skewer. The fish are then dried and smoked by being suspended in the thick atmosphere at the top of the sheds, and this smoke is sufficient to preserve them fresh without salting—a process which the Indians never apply to fish. When dry they are carefully packed in cases of bark, or rushes, and are stowed away out of the reach of damp. Or they tell winter. "I have never," says Mr. Lord, "seen any fish half as fat and as good for Arctic winter food as these little candle-fish. It is next to impossible to broil or fry them, for they melt completely into oil." They are so marvelously fat that the natives use them as lamps for lighting their lodges. For this purpose the dried fish is perforated from head to tail by a piece of rush-pith by means of a long needle made of hard wood. The wick is then lighted, and the fish burns steadily, with a sufficiently good light to read by. The candlestick is a bit of wood split at one end, with the fish inserted in the cleft.

When by heat and pressure these little fishes are transformed into a liquid oil, and the Indians obtain instead of burning them, he supplies his own body with a highly carbonaceous fuel, which is burned slowly in his lungs and gives out heat to the air. Without a fair supply of some such food he would perish in the cold of a long Northern winter.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

ASSOCIATIONS have recently been formed in certain neighborhoods in this city to protect society against the incursions of beggars. The residents of many avenue and others in the vicinity of London have been overwhelmed by the alarming increase of "tramps" and beggars from the great metropolis. The custom of giving "only a penny," generally for the sole purpose of getting rid of importuning, has so encouraged impostors that the most vigorous measures have been found needful. At Blackheath, for example, the Mendicity Society has tickets to every family in the neighborhood; one of these is given to the beggar, by which he is sent to the office of the police officer of the society, at his rooms. If the ticket is presented, the officer makes inquiries, and, on the arrangements for the relief of the applicant, if deserving. Nothing but tickets is given to any individual asking help. If the case is unmerited, the beggar is on the point of starvation, he will be expelled with a dose of brown bread and the eye of the officer. This method is rapidly reducing the number of professional vagrants.

The Denver City Herald, despairing of furnishing news items of such a nature as to satisfy the various tastes of its readers, has announced a novel feature into its columns. This consists in leaving a blank space in the paper, headed with the request that the hypocritical ill it up themselves, on any special subject they think has been neglected. This method, worthy of the odd device of a certain merchant, who, beneath a blank square in a popular newspaper, inserted the following: "Whatever the above space was meant to fill, went by Messrs. Smith & Co. for advertising their goods;" but that editorial experiment so rapidly evince that they have as much as they can do, and therefore it is the object of the new plan to relieve.

The French people propose to honor the genius and character of Lamartine by erecting a statue in front of the Hôtel de Ville, where he bade the populace discard the red flag and take the tri-color for their standard. The proposed site is both historic and picturesque.

A very attractive window to the Fifth Avenue presents itself to the eyes of crowds of Twenty-second Street. One can not spend a leisure hour more pleasantly than in examining some of the works of art within the building. The walls of the sales-room are covered with fine engravings, choice chromos, and oleographs, while on the floor choicer pictures are in the elegant gallery up stairs. This room, which is handsomely frescoed and lighted, contains paintings by some of our best artists, and every one will feel amply repaid for visiting it.

An association has been formed by a number of benevolent ladies in this city for the purpose of giving aid to destitute young strangers, without regard to nationality or creed. The "Sisters of the Strangers," as they are called, will endeavor to find work for them, with food and medicine when necessary, and to obtain for any, employment in their own sex, needful medical, legal, or spiritual advice. Ladies may become members of the society by the payment of one dollar a month; but, of course, donations solicited from all who are interested in the object.

The number of accident cases of suicide on record lately occurred in Cincinnati. The gentleman who contemplated suicide by jumping from newspaper height under some errors in their notices, sent in advance to each of the prominent ones a sketch of his life and death.

They have a novel way of classifying novels in France. A lady entering a circulating library asks for a novel. "I don't know how to tell you exactly the kind I want," she says. "Oh, I think we shall be able to suit you," is the reply. "I mean something lively," explains the intending reader "the sort of book that would not be proscribed for the library of a young girl." "Marie," cries the keeper of the book-shop to her assistant, "novel for a woman of thirty-six."

A high authority announces that the fashionable expression of the month among the nice young men is "a bad cigar or a cheroot and ecorn!" Of course this is for ladies—fashions for gentlemen not out yet! Lips will be worn pale—not coloring a quite pure. Dresses worn square, and brought forward as much as possible to make the bosom look full. Cheeks to be tinged with a hectic flush. Blue eyes and fair hair still considered the fashion.

The gold-deserved honor has been conferred upon Miss Ellen Van Lew, in her appointment as Postmistress of Richmond. She was a resident there of Richmond when the rebellion broke out, and became thoroughly identified with many acts of courage of tendering aid and hospitality to the Union soldiers, especially to the prisoners. Many are indebted to her for substantial assistance and kindly sympathy during tedious periods of illness and confinement.

Are there any here to be the patience of a long-suffering public? The community are in some cases imposed on to such an extent that it is a wonder somebody does not rise in rebellion. Theoretically, the sidewalks are for pedestrians to walk upon; practically, they are not. Private individuals pull up the flagging with impunity, and render the walk unsafe for passengers. The city personal conveniences by building operations. In some of the cross-streets, up town, the sidewalks are in a most dangerous state, and they are obliged to take the street instead.

Garibaldi is said to have written a report, the object of which is to exhibit the corruption of the Roman priesthood.

The Cuban revolution will undoubtedly cause exportation of Herculaneum, suspended forty years ago, shall be vigorously resumed at his own personal expense.

The Cuban revolution will undoubtedly cause exports to be prohibited for some time to come: and the U. S. is probably the only exhibits of fine cigars in the United States, and the manufacture of sugar from it, will now be fairly tested. Tennessee is believed to be well adapted to this work; and the establishment of a large manufactory near Knoxville is already projected. France and Germany have for years engaged somewhat extensively in the manufacture of sugar from the beet. All the refuse of a sugar-beet factory can be utilized as food for cattle and fertilizers for the ground.

The mother of M. Alexandre Dumas, Jun., is dead. She expired at Neuilly, in the cottage, Avenue d'Orleans, with which her son provided her when he became independent. She is represented to have been a woman of great originality and of considerable vivacity; and her conversation was attractive from its piquancy and originality. She was the mother of two and a seamstress when the acquaintance between herself and Alexandre Dumas, Sen., began.

Two Colorado men were married lately when, after a couple of "high social gatherings" had been married in one of the city churches, the bridegroom left his blushing bride and his wife that they must part at the altar, and that she would never see him again. Without a word the bride's bridegroom walked unconcernedly away.

In Ohio a singular breach of promise case has been attracting attention. A plaintiff, aged fifty-seven years, was the defendant, a Miss Ferguson, aged twenty-four, and devoted to her his heart and hand. Matters were all settled, when suddenly the gentleman learned that the lady was of African descent, and he at once forbade his premises. A suit followed; doctors disagreed as to the symptoms of African blood exhibited in the young woman; and finally the unfortunate defendant was made to pay ten thousand dollars damages.

A Chicago journal gives the following unique advice: Young lady, don't gush. A gushing woman don't weigh. Be hard work, you know, and try to be always ready with a mouthful of compliments for all you meet, or with a thoughtful, superb, divine, delicious, adorable" for all you see, is apt to tire both the speaker and the partner. Be quiet and charming. Be any thing you please—only don't gush.

A music-seller was lately overpowered by a fastidious young lady, who wanted to purchase "Mr. Hood's song of a gentleman's under-garment."

A gentleman who had been married when in Lansing he went to a barber's shop to be shaved, where he found a young, intelligent-looking miss, who announced herself as the barber! "Indeed?" was the response; "well, if you are the barber, I certainly wish to be shaved." The traveler placed himself in position, and the fair operator went gracefully through all the preliminary duties, and commenced to flourish the shave in prompt time and in a dextrous manner. Sold the traveler declares he liked it, and congratulates the country on the discovery of a new avenue for the industry of women.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

JAMES OURAMAN, minister of Dumburton, had a curious habit of closing running communion, in a low tone of voice, as he read the Scriptures. Hence, no one was aware himself of the solemn close until he heard the gallery rise the next Sabbath prized. Here are two such cases, in point, it might be:

Reading of the swine rushing into the sea, he muttered, "Oh, that the devil had been choked, too!" Reading Peter's remark, "We have left all and followed thee," he said, "Ay, Peter, there are fools yet, go!" what had ye to leave but an old crazy boat, and may be you a mother-in-law?"

A TALE WITH A MORAL.

Lord Lovel he called for his milk-white steed,
And he rode away to the sea;
And a wicked fairy found who was sore in need,
A maiden with golden hair.

As soon as Lord Lovel had gone afield,
She went for him then and there;
"Now give of thy gold, fair child," she cried,
"Thy reward be the orphan's prayer."

"I will give thee the gold—not for orphan's prayer,
But for love of the child so fair!
But for a curl of thy golden hair,
For a curl of thy golden locked."

"It surely is mine," the damsel said,
"Lord Lovel, I truly swear."
So it was—and it didn't grow on her head;
The hair-dresser placed it there.

Lord Lovel gave gold for that lovely curl,
And more than he gave for the child;
And the maiden's smile showed her teeth of pearl,
As she said, "I will be reconciled."

Two physicians in consultation at the bedside of a patient disputed as to the nature of the disease. At last one of them exclaimed, impatiently, "Sorry, very well! have it your own way, but the post-mortem will show that I am right." The patient was not much encouraged.

A French doctor has discovered that a wasp-sting will cure rheumatism. Now what is a wasp-sting?

"Ah!" said a Sunday-school teacher, "Caroline Jones, what do you think you would have been without God's love and life?" "I guess," said the little woman, "said Caroline, "I suppose as I should ha'been a orphan."

The navy of the Sandwich Islands, it is said, consists of two fishing smacks and a raft—the former manned with twelve marines, and the latter with a one-gun.

An old lady who recently visited Oneida, was asked on her return if she had been to church. She replied: She passed a while and answered, "I guess not—I didn't see it, and if it did, it must have gone through in the night, when I was asleep."

A gentleman, giving a lecture to some boys, was explaining the meaning of the word navigate. He then asked, "Do you have all heard of a man drowning—how does that happen?" The ready answer was, "Come he can't swim."

A YANKEE LOVE "POME."

I liv tew court in whitter
The same time as Sue,
When all around is dreary,
And cold and wet with rain;
Because the old ones dred
The cold and stormy weather,
And hurry ugh tew bed,
Sue stayed with me.

Josh Billings says: "I am violently opposed tew ardent specrits as a beverage, but for manufacturin' purposes I think it a likely article."

Besides, like the beads of ladies, need a good deal of dressing.

Why is a prudent man like a pin?—Because his head prevents him going too far.

REVENUE FIDELITY.—"You ought always to take me out with you when you go fishing," said Tom; "they say that happiness was born a twin." "Yes, love," put in Susanna Swin, "and the twin's a Jacob D. Cox. Hamilton Fish. John A. Rawlins. John A. J. Cresswell. President Grant.

PRESIDENT GRANT'S CABINET IN SES

nt Grant. George S. Boutwell. Adolph E. Borie. Ebenezer R. Hoar.

IN SESSION.—[Drawn by W. S. L. Jewett.]

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER VIII.

LORD DUCETOY.

THE moment that Turner had shaken the dust of his own house off his feet, the little anxieties of that house were cast in the back-ground, and he was in another world. For, to tell the truth, at this very time Turner's religion, and Turner's domestic troubles, were actually swamped in another great matter—had become for a time, as it were, relaxations. The man was living two disconnected lives (unless Rebecca could connect them), and the least disagreeable was to him almost a relaxation. This great matter shall develop itself.

On Waltham Green he caught the white Putney omnibus as usual; but not as usual did it drop him at the bottom of Chancery Lane. He got out at Arlington Street, Piccadilly, and made his way quickly to a private house in Duke Street, St. James.

"Is Lord Ducetoy up?" he asked of the quiet-looking servant in black who came to the door.

Lord Ducetoy was up, had finished breakfast, and was ready for Mr. Turner. He was shown up stairs into Lord Ducetoy's presence, and he looked on him with very great curiosity.

A handsome, well-made young man enough, light in hair, blonde in mustache, with the deep brown of the Western prairies still on his face; standing with his back against the chimney-piece, and lovingly wiping a gun with his handkerchief.

"How d'ye do, my dear Mr. Turner?" said Lord Ducetoy. "Thanks for coming so promptly. I, for I am in trouble."

"In trouble, my lord?" said Turner, very seriously. "Please tell me how."

"Well, it seems that I have not got my money."

"Your lordship has plenty of money. I can let your lordship have a thousand pounds at this moment."

"Then I wish you would. I wrote a check for a hundred pounds on my uncle, Sir Gorham Philpott, yesterday, and they have cashed it certainly. But they have written to me to say, as there is only £37 10s. in their hands, they request, either that more money may be paid in, or that our account may be closed."

"Oh, that is their move, is it?" said Mr. Turner.

"That is their move, my dear Mr. Turner," said Lord Ducetoy. "Rather a disagreeable one for me. You must know, as my uncle's old man of business, that I never expected to come into this entail on and this property. My uncle's death was utterly unexpected; my cousin's death at Madeira equally so. I was humming about in Canada, trying to invest a certain thousand pounds I had so as to bring me in a living, when I suddenly found myself an earl, with a considerable income. Coming home, I find my check nearly dishonored, at my own uncle's, for one hundred pounds. I am a quiet fellow, but must live. I should be glad of some money."

"There is plenty of money," said Turner.

"I should like to see some of it," said Lord Ducetoy.

Turner sat musing and looking at Lord Ducetoy for some little time. At last he said—

"I suppose you know that your estates are rather heavily mortgaged?"

"I have heard so much."

"And that the mortgages are held by Sir Gorham Philpott & Co.?"

Lord Ducetoy also heard that.

"Do you know that Sir Gorham Philpott & Co. are now Sir Gorham Philpott & Co., Limited?"

Lord Ducetoy laughed, and said "that he was not aware of the fact, but that their ideas of credit were certainly limited."

"They are, my lord," said Turner. "For limited liability is only another name for unlimited irresponsibility. Do you know nothing of the family jewels, of the family papers?"

"I know of the men about town, and cash, and papers. I suppose they are at the banker's."

"My lord, they are nothing of the kind. They are at my house. My lord, the limited is also long really bankrupt, which has been trading under the name, once respectable, of Sir Gorham Philpott, holds the mortgage on your estates, about the only asset they have. It has not seemed to me expedient to break with them, and bank with another house, lest they should not conveniently foreclose. But I have kept all out of their hands that I could. I, as executor under your uncle's will, have received the plate, the jewels, the deeds, under my own roof; and the responsibility of them is turning me gray."

"Could we not send them to Child's, or to Drummond's?"

"My lord, we owe Philpott's money—a great deal, I doubt."

"Can we pay it?"

"Yes, we can pay it. But their name is—and when the smash comes, we must take our chance with the others. I don't want our jewels and plate to be put into their bankruptcy."

"Then keep them where they are," said Lord Ducetoy. "I can trust you." And he whistled as he rubbed his gun, and said, laughing: "Well, I suppose now I have got money, I shall never be happy again. There is one thing I wish to say, in our prairie way, Mr. Turner. My mother says, that I can trust you through thick and thin; and so I mean to, for she never was wrong in her life. So if you find it possible, I should like to make our relations as friendly as possible. There is, by-the-way, a touch of New England in that, because I can't do without you. I don't mean that we are to rush into one another's arms, but if we try we may get friendly in time, I don't think it will take long." Here he got very red. "I only just remember my cousin. I hope to know her husband better. Will you dine with my mother and me to-day?"

Turner went up to him, and taking his hand, looked him frankly in the face, said, "Did she ask me?"

Lord Ducetoy nodded.

"Then tell her I will. It is best all over and done with. Tell her also, that the trouble we thought past has begun again in my daughter. Good-by. You may trust me."

CHAPTER IX.

THE SKYE TERRIER.

REBECCA'S good-humor came back the instant she was outside the garden and into Cue lane. She had nothing to carry to come, but Cary wouldn't. "You had better come," said Rebecca, "we shall have some amusement. I am going to Jim Akin just a dog, and he will be very pleasant." Cary would have liked to have gone very much, but she had said that she wouldn't in the first instance; and consistency, or, as some low people call it, obstinacy, is the brightest jewel in the British female's crown; so she declined to enjoy herself with her sister-in-law, and bore her self-imposed querulousness on the little maid.

Neither Jim Akin nor Mr. Spicer the sweep was out. Jim Akin it was well known, was only on Mondays, having worked Chelsea, principally Jews Row and Turks Row, with periwinkles, whelks, and pickled salmon, during the week, and resting before going out to buy stock from the market gardeners. With Mr. Spicer also it was a "close" day, few orders, and sufficient respectability to require their chimneys swept by the hand of a master caring to make preparations for the sweep on Sunday night.

Very respectable Mr. Spicer looked in his office duty clothes, comically unlike the hideous fiend like figure he was at his work. Rebecca had the advantage of the respectful counsel of these two excellent people on this occasion.

"If you please, Mr. Akin and Mr. Spicer," she said, after the usual salutation, "I want to get a dog. I am going to have no more a dog."

They were both deeply interested at once. Mr. Akin, being professionally more accustomed to conversation, dashed into the subject at once.

"Warmint or general, Miss?"

"I don't quite understand," said Rebecca; and so Mr. Spicer, a lumpish, heavy man, much looked up to in the Row, leaned against the fence and defined, after the Aristotelian method:—

"A warmint dog, Miss, are a dog as regards as a dog as is kept for the killing of warmint. Now there's a many kinds of 'em: bull-dog, bull terrier, fox terrier, Skye terrier, Dandy, Jack Dandy, and Skye. Similarly there's varieties in the nature of warmint, as badger, pole-cat, weasel, and rat. Of badger there is country badgers and old hands. Of pole-cats there is wild and tame. Of rats, why there's as much difference in rats, for bleu rats and white rats is in Christians. I've seen big rats as a new-born kitten could kill; and conrariwise, one of my young men he had a white rat which would eat up with an old rat, and I am blessed if the dog didn't eat and eat, and be his life, howling round the lanes, and the rat after him."

"I seen it," said Jim Akin.

"But I don't want a dog to kill any thing," said Rebecca.

"Miss wants a general dog, I expect, miller," said Jim Akin to the master chimney-sweep.

"Tip her some of your warmints," said he.

"General dogs, Miss," said the miller, complacently, "is generally mongrels, various; and I never seen none that was much account, but into consideration what dogs was made for. Still Providence made dogs for different purposes and for 'em, similarly as they do for fantails and pouters, and other rubbish that were only created for blowing and dancing. If I was you, Miss, there should be no prizes for any pigeons except carriers, and none for any dogs except real warmints."

"Greyhounds," murmured Jim Akin.

"And you may add pointers and setters," said Mr. Spicer; "but greyhounds is warmints. What you are a gentleman with a moor in the 'lands, talk about 'em; not now."

"Miss wants a fighting dog?" suggested Jim Akin, accepting the rebuke.

"Do she look like it, neighbor?" said Mr. Spicer, almost severely.

"A fighting dog isn't half a bad thing to mind a young lady, if she wanted to go a walking far by herself," said Jim Akin, not to be entirely driven from this point.

Mr. Spicer was very fond of his neighbor, but he had to ignore him, he was so ignorant.

"With regard to general dogs, Miss, which were your views?"

"Well," said Rebecca, "I should like a dog which would bark if it heard a noise, and a dog which would bite if I think I should like a little dog the best. I think I should like a little hairy dog, like the Queen's in the picture, you know, which is begging for Maclaw for its biscuit; if it did not cost too much."

I know nothing of the private life of Mr. Spicer or Mr. Akin's wife; but I am from my against gentlemen in that particular circle of society, I ask few questions. Many of ourselves had no education, and associated with, bought and sold with, and intermarried with the criminal classes, should we look on the lighter crimes with the same detestation we do now? A man whose wife's brother has been transported, and yet who gets treated as a respectable and trust-worthy person by the district inspector, seems to me to be a man to be meritorious. If a little stray dog follows him home, or if a stranger pigeon come into his trap, why, he is possibly not so chivalrously particular as you or I should be; when you get to the very verge of the criminal class you must make allowances.

Jim Akin and Mr. Spicer interchanged a glance, and then Jim Akin spoke. "I have got a little dog in my back-yard, Miss, which you might care to look at."

"Undeniable character," said Mr. Spicer. "Never 'ized, but character un-de-niable, against all the powers of creation."

Rebecca assented at once, and they went in through Jim Akin's close-smelling house, which had a wedged scent of washing, dirt, children, cabbage-stalks, baby, and cheese; and out into the little back-yard, separated from the neighbors' backs by a low, broken paling. There was no vegetation in it, except, at the farther corner, an elder-tree. And at the foot of the elder-tree there was what American flour-barrel, and at the entrance of the flour-barrel sat a little, tiny, innocent dog, chained up, and looking very unhappy.

It was a very beautiful little Skye terrier, a dog worth money, but grimed with ashes and soot, unkempt, unwashed, utterly and entirely miserable and wobegone. It was a dog which had been cared for, and loved, and tended in its time, so carefully raised, that it had lost its instinct of self-care, and had lost its mistress, or let itself be stolen, and had come to this. It cowered when it saw Jim Akin and Mr. Spicer; but when it saw a lady with them it looked up at her with its long hazel eyes, and held up its poor innocent little paw.

Her father might well call her a fool. I suppose that was the reason why to his light. Her heart seemed to swell suddenly within her, and her eyes not all unready for tears, for the little dog, and for Cary, who had appealed to her as Friday did to Crusoe. She went straight to the barrel, undid the dog, and took it to her bosom.

"I will buy this dog of you, Mr. Akin," she said, without turning round. "My father will pay for it. Send in a moderate price to him, or he will not let me have it. I will pay the difference. I will have this dog."

"Will you let me give you the little dog?" said a voice, close to her ear, behind.

She turned quickly round. It was Mr. Morley, the dissenting minister, who stood close beside her.

CHAPTER X.

MR. MORLEY.

NONCONFORMITY is to be caught suddenly in a sentimental mood among the tree-born Briton hasn't almost as much as he hates being caught in (respectable) sin. Rebecca had just been caught in a sentimental mood over a grimy Skye terrier, in company with a chimney-sweep and a costermonger, by a dissenting minister. In the revulsion caught on her face, the strange face, the situation, instead of being really beautiful, as it was one minute ago, was in the highest degree ridiculous—supremely so.

"How did you come here, Mr. Morley?" she asked. "I am surprised."

"I came to see you, and I saw you come in here, and I followed you."

"I am much obliged. My father's house is over the way. I think you asked me if you might pay for this dog? My answer is, No."

"There is nothing to pay," said Jim Akin. "Miss has took a fancy to the dog, and she is welcome to her."

"Do you mean to say that you will give me the dog as a present?"

"Certainly, Miss; and will swear to her aged in Christian's name."

"I'll take it, Jim Akin," she said. "And I'll never pay one farthing for it, except in good-will. If I don't pay you for it, I will pay you a kind. Let me give you one more chance—I will give you a five-pound note for this dog; I will go across the street and get it."

"Won't take it, Miss. I'll take it out in good-will. The mistake as you gentry makes, I continued Mr. Spicer, looking sententiously, and looking at Mr. Morley, who certainly looked like a gentleman, "is this: You thinks we're for cash, and all cash. We ain't so. I've got as much money as I want. You gentlemen as studies has got good words. Why can't you give us some of your good words once and again, in a friendly way, the same as I give she the little dog?"

"Well," said Rebecca, turning homeward with her new treasure in her arms, "all I can say is, that you shall always have good words from me; and so good-by, Mr. Morley, I have just been to cross with you. I am afraid you must think me very silly."

"On what grounds?"

"On the grounds of being very nearly crying for pity over a poor lonely little dog. If you like more as that, you may do so."

"What then?" said Mr. Morley, as they crossed the street.

"Why then, a fancy, I may be wrong, but I do fancy that you are the sort of person who would be just as likely to make a goose of yourself over such a matter as me."

"That is not grammar, you know, as it stands," said Mr. Morley.

"Then let it pass grammar as it sits," said Rebecca. "You know what I mean."

"I am afraid I do; and what is more and worse, I am afraid it is true."

"Then you do sometimes make a goose of yourself?"

"Have I not come to see you?"

"That is true enough. Talking of geese, what is the opinion of Pythagoras concerning water-fowl?"

"That a minister of the gospel had better mind his own business, and not come to visit houses where common stage-plays are read admirably."

"Only one single number of Knight's Illustrated, I give you my honor," said Rebecca, "You have read it, you know; at least, you seem pretty familiar with it. And did you really come to see me?"

"I did, indeed."

"I have leave to walk up and down the lane. Will you walk with me?"

Mr. Morley consented gladly.

"I want to talk to you very much, but about very many things. You seem to have had an education different to—to the kind I have seen here. For instance, you know Shakspeare?"

"I know Shakspeare very well."

"I know nothing of him but this one play. And that is so wonderful—so utterly unlike, both in thought and diction, to any thing I have ever seen before, that I can nearly say it by heart. Are the other plays to be compared in goodness to this one?"

"Certainly. In perfect dexterity and elegance, I rank Twelfth Night as high as any; but for no other qualities. Hamlet is the finest of them all."

"And what is that about?"

"The old Calvinist business—the business without beginning and without end—which keeps so many preachers on their legs, for the simple reason that, let them turn it inside out as often as they will, there is no answer to it. Hamlet, with its beautiful language and deep poetry, is, principally on examination, the permission of evil, and the responsibility in this world and in the next of bad or careless actions, communicated, as it would seem, almost unavoidably."

"And how does Shakspeare get us out of the old difficulty, familiar enough to me, I am sure?" asked Rebecca.

"The characters all stab and poison one another," said Mr. Morley.

"Mark my words, Mr. Morley," said Rebecca, stopping short, and stroking the head of her little dog, who, under the impression that it had only been stolen once more in a different sort of way, was licking a little paw, "I rank my words, Mr. Morley, that Shakspeare was a man not entirely deprived of understanding. I am aware that you prefer Milton, but you must turn from your pulpits, and so on. But there is something in the man."

"I never cursed him," said Morley. "I love him."

"You!" said Rebecca. "I never sat under you. Did you mean what you call your brethren—the man whose opinions you are bound to indorse does, though. I mean the man Hagbut, for I have heard him."

CHAPTER XI.

HETTY'S LOVER.

"IT is not so pleasant in here as in the lane," said Rebecca, looking round on the little dull, narrow-windowed sitting-room. "This is the place where I am scolded and admonished. I sit in there, do I not, when you sit there. Now, will you please begin and get it over."

"Can you suppose that I mean to scold you?" he said.

"I suppose that you have come commissioned by my father to see after my spiritual state," she replied. "Are you not Mr. Hagbut's successor? If so, I am afraid that you will have a thankless task."

"I assure you, on my honor," he said, eagerly, "that my visit is solely and entirely to you; that I dislike Mr. Hagbut; that I have no commission from that gentleman whatever. May I go on? I am much older than you, and, God knows, I wish you well."

"If you will confine yourself to those friendly grounds, I am sure that you may say what you like. If you intend to be truly my friend in a worldly sense of the word, you meet your half-way, for I am sure I want one badly."

"I am sure you do," he answered; "but you don't want my friendship as a middle-aged widower of forty-two, and have a daughter nearly as old as myself."

"A daughter!" said Rebecca. "I never heard of that before."

She looked puzzled as she said it, for she betrayed the fact that he was interesting to her, and that she had inquired about him.

"Yes, I have a daughter," said Morley, stroking his chin. "Yes; quite so. Hetty (that is short for Hephsibah, not for Esther, you will understand) is nearly as old as you are, I should say."

"I suppose she is very fond of you?" said Rebecca, still in conversation.

"Why, yes," said Mr. Morley, still stroking his chin. "Hetty is very fond of me indeed. But I will give you how much she loves me, and put confidence in you, Miss Turner, by telling you that my dear daughter is not a popular person."

"Is she cross?" asked Rebecca.

"No, she's not cross. When I say that she is unpopular, I mean that she is unpopular among our religious connection, and—well—is a great stumbling-block to them."

"She seems to be very much in my condition, then," said Rebecca.

"Very much indeed," said Mr. Morley, the truth being far too great to be kept back. "Very much so."

"Did she ever run away and hide for three days, as I did?" said Rebecca.

Mr. Morley did not answer in speech at all, neither did he look at Rebecca at all. He only looked at space, with a compound expression in which there was, simply in a very slight movement of the mouth, a touch of humor, but no anger or sorrow. Rebecca began to have an intense desire to know the young lady, and said on.

"She would be highly flattered, I am sure," said Mr. Morley, "if I told her so; but I shall not do it, however. By-the-by, may I presume to be sufficiently in your confidence to ask a favor?"

"Provided it is not a guilty secret, of course," said Rebecca.

"But it is," said Mr. Morley. "Don't say any thing about my daughter up here. This part of our connection does not know any thing about her. Even Hagbut keeps the dreadful secret, knowing that if any thing of her ways was known in the town, Russel and Miss Sage would at once find out or invent quite enough about her to make me perfectly useless as a minister to this congregation, when he wants my services, as he pretty often does. Besides, the girl is a connection of his. You will not mention her?"

"I will not, indeed," said Rebecca, pleased very much at being taken into any one's confidence and treated like a woman. "I am sure she is good."

"There is good in her somewhere," replied Morley, slightly shaving his white teeth; "you will keep my secret, then, from your Russel and Soper; now let us talk of other matters. You father looks very ill and worn."

"I have been behaving very ill, and have given him trouble. I ran away for three days to avoid doing something he had set his heart on my doing. I am very truly penitent for having given him trouble, but I would do it again to-morrow; and so would your daughter."

"People don't run away from me," said Mr. Morley; "they come again to come under me, I think. While I have been sitting here, and looking out of the window, I have noticed one, he has been to the house at last; he rings the bell: he asks for me; yes, and here your little maid shows him in."

And into the room came a magnificent young sailor, with the fresh, wild vitality of the sea shining in his bold brown eyes, showing in his noble free figure and his free smile. A splendid apparition just risen from the ocean, in his ocean's garb: such a youth as Rebecca had never seen before. As one looked at him who traveled eyes, there came on one dim memories of peaceful seas among soft blue islands far away: of ships, and icebergs: of wild, horrible, staggering nights when ruin was abroad, and death looked with pale face over the steersman's shoulder, or the dim-lit reeling bunnacle. A youth who had looked steadily on death often, and would look again and yet again without terror, and at the last fighting fiercely. Still young, handsome, and gentle.

The old narrow-windowed parlor seemed the darker and the dingier for his presence. With the exception of Rebecca herself, there had been nothing there so splendid for many years. Rebecca had never seen any thing like him: she had seen youth and vitality before, in Jim Akin and the like; but never any thing like this young man. She looked at him with keen curiosity and admiration; and Mr. Morley watched her.

"I have brought you earth, Sir," said the young sailor, who, by his dress, seemed of the superfine class. "Hetty told me that you would be here."

"Chapter of accidents," said Mr. Morley. "What business was it of Hetty's, or of yours?"

"Hetty said that you were to come home to dinner; and, indeed, we want you."

"You want me a great deal, I have no doubt," said Mr. Morley.

"Indeed, we do want you very much," said the young sailor; "in fact, Hetty would not let me into the house until you come. She only—"

"Never mind that, Sir."

"Well, I won't," he said, laughing; "but you know that you will not take her pleasure without your sharing it. And if Miss Turner," he added, with a bright smile, "will spare you to us this evening, we will try to make amends in future. May I be introduced to Miss Turner?"

"This, Miss Turner," said Mr. Morley, "is young Leonard Hartop. He is of the salt-water persuasion. The remarkable fact about him is, that he never in any way kind of ship but what that ship meets with a very serious accident. Likewise, on the occasion of such accidents, some one else is very much drowned. I introduce him."

"I am delighted, I am sure," said Leonard Hartop, "to make Miss Turner's acquaintance. In what you may be allowed to call, on an occasion of this kind, the flowering rule of trees, there is little doubt that our acquaintance will be improved to mutual satisfaction. For you must not believe all you hear, Miss Turner. His bark is worse than his bite. Nobody cares twence-hail-penny for him. Now, Mr. Morley, are you coming home to dinner?"

"Wait for me at the lane's end, boy, and I will come," said Mr. Morley; and the young sailor bowed and departed.

"What do you think of him?" he said to Rebecca, when he had gone.

"He is very splendid," said Rebecca, dreamily. "I have never seen any one like him."

"He is a splendid sailor," said Morley. "May I tell you a secret which would ruin us all if it was known?"

"There would be a little excitement about it," said Rebecca. "I think you had better tell me."

"Well, then, I will trust you. He is Hetty's lover."

"She must have good taste, then. I should not entirely break my heart if he was mine."

"No?" said Mr. Morley.

"Well, I don't know," said Rebecca. "That young man and I should never hit it off, you know. He seems as if he liked his own way."

"The most biddable lad going," said Mr. Morley.

"Then he wouldn't suit me. Hetty may have him. I want ordering about; I can't take care of myself. But, speaking to you as a minister, or, as the Papists call it, a father confessor, Mr. Morley, I confess to you that I could, with very small effort, have fallen in love with that young man. If Hetty has got him, let her keep him. I shall know Hetty one day, I see. For the present I have made my arrangements for marriage."

"I dare not ask what arrangements."

"I will save your conscience, then: I have, for my own purposes, made it impossible for any one to marry me; and I am going to marry old Tibbey."

"Tibbey, the Primitive Methodist, in Leader Street? He is married already."

"Not him, but his wife. I am going to marry her. At all events, I am going to get out of this house in some way. I would rather Heaven that I could turn Roman Catholic. They find a life and a business for women like me. If I could swallow their miserable superstitions I could join them to-morrow. Why do not you extreme Protestants make provision for women who are tired of themselves? Why not have a home for the poor, as do the Papists? You cry out at the Papists getting so many converts among women; what is the real reason? These Papists, with a false, low, and I hope moribund, form of Christianity, are the only sect which offers a career to an ordinary and intelligent woman. Whose fault is it that we are ill-educated? You have refused us education, and we are as clever as you. Whose fault is it that we pine? The Papists show us a suffering Christ through suffering humanity. They find a sphere for e very woman—"

"Which you would occupy for possibly a week."

CHAPTER XII.

HAGBUT'S NEW INTENTIONS.

SHE saw no more of her two new acquaintances for a fortnight, and the old life came back again with almost the old misery and dullness. Yet Rebecca was never exactly as she had been any more. She was more desperately unhappy—that I do not dispute—but her unhappiness now was of a different kind. It was active. The old conflict between her and her was imprisoned in a living tomb from her birth, hopeless, and without any room for fancy, which is one of the greatest consolations of misery. There was very miserable again now, but only because dreams, now become possible to her, seemed unattainable. She was in the world, and dreaming of all: her life was merely a painful sleep. And now, also, she had a companion and a confidant, in her little dog.

The man who has never known a woman who will confide to a baby or a dog matters which she would not confide to a man, knows nothing, must be unfortunate in his experiences. Poor Rebecca told her little Skye terrier a great many things about herself which she had previously believed as to herself, and which she would have denied with the extremest scorn to any person in the world, unless possibly in deep distress to old Mrs. Tibbey.

She had broken all bounds for the first time in her life. In her despondency and misery and disregard to Mr. Hagbut, she had been forced into arms; into a thoroughly successful revolution. True, that had left her worse than when she was, it were, to Cæsarism; but it rests with the politicians to tell us whether the individual or the nation ever looked back after the flame of mind again after one good taste of liberty. What has been done once may be done twice. The ruler of a once thoroughly revolutionized kingdom is uneasy on his throne; and what is more to the purpose, the subject knows it. At least Rebecca knew it, and so may, when she comes to consult, and her father most disagreeable, instead of "wishing she was dead," or declaring that she would much rather commit suicide, would only take her out of this, used milder formulas; only told her that if she had been married to her or to again, he would: and that Mab and she and Mrs. Tibbey would go to Ramsgate, and stay three nights instead of two, and ride on donkeys, and keep a nice little oyster shop, and never go to chapel any more. And if that nasty tiresome Hetty was next, Mab should be sold.

This babyish nonsense was very good for her. She had had too little of it in her childhood. Books like Hans Andersen's had never been seen in that house. It was well for her that she had still child enough left in her after her embittered life only to be let to play nonsense, and in a petulant childish way about Hetty; for she might have talked in a very different one a little time before. It was the thing she was in the way now, but which she never confessed to herself, was that she hated Hetty.

Hetty the unknown, Hetty the innocent. It was surely unreasonable.

It would be merely confusion of counsel to try and account for all she did. That Hetty was free; that she could come and go; that she had a father who loved her, and who was not watched by two pernicious old trots (meaning Mrs. Russel and Miss Soper); she did not believe in all that herself. Hetty was now, when she left the house, had been inclined to admire Hetty, until Mr. Morley, for reasons of his own, had told her that the young sailor was her lover.

She had not cared at the time; if he and Hetty had come arm in arm, the next day, and made love before her, she would not have cared much, more particularly if Mr. Morley had come too. But this grand young sailor had left his image on a late awakened and fully developed mind, and it would not go. He was the first really splendid man she had ever seen.

And he had appeared, only to draw her only friend, Mr. Morley, away from her. They had left her at once, to go after this Hetty, and all their schemes, and goings on down at Lime-house, the gate of freedom: for you might get on board a ship in Limehouse, and you might sail away any where—to the happy islands in the Western Sea, where there was no chapel-going, or tea-meeting, or Sunday-school, all of which Mr. Morley wished to establish there; or even further, to those islands where you could do as you pleased, and escape the consequences of your own actions: in which islands Mr. Morley did not believe. Mab, of course, only said (to the little dog.) But even to her sister, Carry, she grumbled, after a few days. She told her that she thought Mr. Morley had whisked him-self off with his young friend rather unceremoniously.

"I am glad to hear he has been here," said Carry.

"Yes: he came to see me. And I should like him to come again. But the young sailor, to whom his daughter is engaged, came and carried him off."

"Mr. Morley has no daughter," said Carry.

"Indeed, but he has though," said Rebecca. "And I wish he hadn't."

"Dearest Rebecca," said Caroline, with just such tact as she had gathered from her station, and her school, "believe a tender sister, when she tells you that Mr. Morley has no family."

"But I tell you he has. Hetty was alive a week ago; I bother her."

"You are in a perverted dream, my dear sister," said Carry. "Mr. Morley is perfectly unencumbered. And, in my prospects are, in a pecuniary point of view, very good indeed. I give you my honor he has no daughter. I tell you, you have been dreaming."

"That is true enough," said Rebecca. "I have been dreaming a deal too much. But who told you he had no daughter?"

"Mr. Hagbut, to-night, as Miss Soper's."

"How did he come to say it there? " said Rebecca, beginning to get a little uneasy about this mysterious Hetty's legal relation to Mr. Morley.

Carry was a certain kind of British woman, who when she saw occasion would walk clean through half a dozen quickset hedges, without, perhaps pausing to look for the gate. She did so on this occasion, as on many others.

"The fact of the matter is, my dear Rebecca, that Mr. Hagbut announced his intention to several mutual friends, of paying his addresses to me. He has not committed himself to me in any way as yet; but we are sufficiently studied my character. But he has said, with a view of my hearing it at second-hand, that if I should have been born in a higher station, and if he sees hopes of forming my character to his standard, he will overlook the disgrace which one member of our family has brought on it; and—"

"He is rapid in his determinations," said Rebecca, quietly.

"He is very determined. He is a man to be obeyed. But this is a little past the matter. Mr. Hagbut and Mr. Morley's very much inclined to marry you, in spite of all that has happened."

"Yes," said Rebecca, very quietly.

"Indeed he thinks so," said Carry; "and we all rejoiced with a great joy. I consider, that if Mr. Hagbut proposes to-morrow night he. And in the course of conversation I asked if he had any family; and he said that there was a daughter, but that she was dead."

"He meant dead in trespasses and sins, you know," said Rebecca.

"Do not talk so," said Carry. "Now you know the whole truth, my dear."

Burning lava over boiling water makes a good explosion, as Rebecca well knew. There were all the elements of it in Rebecca's heart. She could have killed them all with burning words. For them to order her, by resolution, to love and sell her like this. The way in which the crust of respectability forms quickly over the lava of revolution and hides it, once more, who will not look to the great cyclical advance of matters. mad. And really, Charles the Second and Dryden, at unconsciously the apparently results of Cromwell and Milton, is a bitter pill for a Whig. Men, maddened with this view of things, try to assassinate immediately after the event. Can we wonder that Rebecca felt a strong inclination to box her sister's ears?

Only for one moment. She was a clear-hearted woman, with all her faults. She saw her own sister before her, and saw her little petty woes and wrongs were forgotten. Easily forgotten, for she had friend herself. Instead of giving way to illtemper, she was sorry to good; and, kneeling before her sister, said:

"Carry, sister! we have always been good friends. Is there any reason we should not go on with that man. Are you forced? I was forced; but I beat them, the mean tattlers and timeservers. I am free, and I am hate it. Come away as I did, sister; and see what the world is out of this miserable lane. I will never leave you, dear; no more will Elizabeth Tibbey: no more will Mab. Fly from it, dear, with me. We could keep a little shop, or any thing: Mr. Tibbey would tell us. Or we would go to Mr. Morley, and he would tell us what to do. But oh, my dear, fly! There is time to save yourself: in Heaven's name think what you are doing."

Rebecca's wild appeal failed absolutely. Carry mind was not constructed. Rebecca's appeal to her, beautiful in its affectionate unselfishness, if in nothing else, was to her hideous and amorphous—ridiculous to her: her sister was a woman with a wild, ill-regulated mind: an object of pity. Yet, in her reply, she unconsciously allowed that there was reason in Rebecca's wild plea to her; for, instead of showing pity, she showed resentment. And Rebecca had so nearly won, that this resentment took the form of anger: anger expressed as she had heard it expressed in her family, a little coarsely.

"You fool, get up, and don't kneel to me; kneel to your Maker. You are the plague of our lives. When I am married to him you will always be held over my head like a whip. The old business was just hushed up, when you must break out. Get up."

She got up at once, but she smiled kindly, too. "You will be sorry for these words, Carry, dear, long after I have forgotten them."

"I know I shall, you wicked thing!" said Carry, sobbing bitterly. "Why did you tempt me to say them?"

"Because I did not like to see one I love marry a man utterly beneath her, and utterly unworthy of her."

Whereupon, poor old Carry gathered up her skirts, and walked through another quickset hedge, consisting of Mr. Hagbut's virtues, through which we will not follow her.

CHAPTER XIII.

A FRANK EXPLANATION.

WHEN the sisters had parted Rebecca was very angry again. For them to have spoken to you of name like this once more. "Still the question arises," she said, "is it not all their own incontrovertible folly? Mr. Morley is far too much of a gentleman to have spoken to any of them, at all events, before he spoke to me. He is inclined to like me, and he is kind enough of him; but he does not admire me."

Not admire her, except those of an interior friend. He has been very kind to me."

"Then how has this report come about?" asked her father. And Rebecca simply told him what Carry had told her.

"So you see," she added, "that my name is the subject of Miss Soper's tea-table in connection with his."

"What an abominable shame! Who said it?"

"Mr. Hagbut."

"Oh, I see," said Mr. Turner. "Yes, yes! quite so. My dear daughter, I have reason to believe now that Mr. Morley does not admire or less admire you, and that Mr. Hagbut has remarked it."

"And I never to be let alone?" cried Rebecca.

"Do not interrupt; listen—open your eyes. I have reason now to believe that Hagbut at least suspects the real course of time. He will, you may come to admire you, and that he has, knowing your proud and uncontrollable temper, put this report about in a way as to make you hate your attorney against Mr. Morley."

"What on earth is it to him?" she asked.

"Between five and six thousand pounds, my dear. If you marry so well as Morley—marry, in fact, a gentleman of respectability and strength of character, like him—you will have the same fortune as your sister. If you remain single at my death, you will have one hundred a year; if you make a foolish match, you will have eighteen shillings a week, tied up to you, and payable weekly. Did Hagbut tell you all this? I can in any way get rid of this match, he will not certainly five, and possibly seven thousand pounds."

"I will not," said Rebecca, with singular emphasis; "and I always told you so."

"This is rather sharp practice, certainly," said Mr. Turner, musing. "Now I may have made such sharp practice, or I may not. I can't say. I meet and am friendly with men who would do much things. But I am never angry with them. But I am angry now. For him to put his pudding brains against mine! Oh, Master Hagbut, this time you shall find that the rich old money sooner than you. For him to come lawyer. And over my head!"

"Why is my sister to be sacrificed to such a wretch?"

"He is not a wretch. She will lick him, and he will let her, and be kind to her. It is the same between priests and women in all churches. The world thinks the dust of the shoes of any man who could assume me of fearless —still more will a frightened and ignorant woman. He will be very kind to her, and she will adore him. Have you been saying any thing to her against him?"

"I fear a great deal," said Rebecca, in downright honesty, expecting an outburst.

"Do not do so again, my dear Rebecca. Nothing can more injure your best friend and wise, and so sow no seeds of discord. Remember that, child. This has not been a happy house; do not let your temper to make another such."

What between her father's kindness, and her ideal future of poor Carry, it was through tears that she promised to act that she would not.

"Do you like Mr. Morley?" he asked.

"Yes, very much indeed. But I could never think of marrying him."

"Don't let us deceive one another, Rebecca. Is there any one else?"

"No," she said at once. Who could there be? She was not allowed to go out of the lane, and never saw any one. But she said it with a blush, as an air that her father looked suspiciously at her, and said:

"Well, my girl, we had a great fight, and you won. Perhaps I am older and wiser than when I knew your mother. At all events, if I made errors with her I do not wish to repeat them with you. I have told you how you will be situated as regards money-matters. Further than that, no man commercial shall be put upon you here. Do you understand?"

"I am thankful."

"Keep your ears open and your attention awake, and never repeat what I am going to tell you. When you brought disgrace on this house as you did, that fellow Hagbut came to me to break off his engagement with you, as he was almost bound to do. But the way he did it showed me he was a rascal and a sneak, every inch of him. By Heaven! he little knew how near he was being pitched into the lane."

"And yet poor Carry—" began Rebecca.

"Hold your tongue! you have enough to do without minding Carry. Mind yourself, and listen to me. You say there is no one has your heart; I ask no further. But mind, if there were, and Hagbut knew it, he will, if he is likely to be entirely displeasing to me, throw him against you."

Rebecca sat perfectly silent, and her father saw that there was more than he cared to know. At last she said, "Please, father, has Mr. Morley a daughter?"

"He may have a dozen for aught I know. I only know his eminent character; I know nothing of his domestic life, except that he is a widower."

"Because he told me he had, and told me much about her. And Hagbut denies that there is any such daughter."

"Hagbut is probably overreaching himself in some way," said Mr. Turner, coolly. "Suppose, for an instance, that Morley had a daughter who had done him discredit, such as yourself, you know, he might possibly be scheming to keep her as long as possible in the back-ground, and make anger between you and Morley. In which, you see, he has already failed, for Morley has told you all about her. Mind, once more, in conclusion: if there is any man of whom I should disapprove in this case, Hagbut thinks he wins £8000 by your marrying him, and he will contrive that you should meet him. And so, good-night."

STATE BALL AT THE TUILERIES.

THE invitations to the balls at the Tuileries are drawn up by the High Chamberlain, the guests being selected from a carefully-prepared list of some 10,000 persons, and are distributed by mounted soldiers, or by servants in the Imperial livery of gold and green; the color of the card of invitation indicating the comparative rank of its recipient. Official and diplomatic personages and their families enter by a little staircase leading to the private apartments; but the main body of the guests alight at the door of a vast marble vestibule and pour in one unbroken stream up the grand staircase, being received on the landing by a splendidly-attired official, who takes their cards of invitation from them. The ball itself takes place in the Salle des Maréchaux, a vast saloon, receiving its title from its walls being decorated with the portraits of the first twelve Marshals of the Empire. This hall is the largest in the Tuileries; but, despite its size, the crowd is frequently so great that dancing becomes an impossibility, though numerous chamberlains in scarlet uniforms, and ushers with their necks encircled by chains of massy silver, are continually doing their utmost to maintain a clear space. At about ten o'clock the Emperor and Empress, preceded by the Duc de Cambacérès, Master of the Ceremonies, proceed to the ball-room through the Galerie de la Paix, where the presentations to them take place, as represented in our engraving. His Imperial Majesty invariably wears a blue dress-coat with gold buttons, knee-breeches, stockings, and the grand cordon of the Legion of Honor. The Empress, on a recent occasion, wore a dress of rose-colored gauze, spangled with gold and trimmed with festoons of flowers, a wreath of flowers intermingled with diamonds being twined in her hair. The quadrille of honor, the persons taking part in which are always designated by the Emperor, is usually danced in the throne-room, a reserved space being kept by the exertions of a body of honorary chamberlains. The etiquette of the days of the Bourbons, against which MARIE ANTOINETTE so energetically protested, still surrounds the present occupants of the Tuileries. We learn from the recently published "Book of Ceremonial" that, "if his Majesty wishes to dance, the first Chamberlain, or in his absence the Chamberlain on duty, must approach and receive from him his sword and hat," and that, "when the Emperor stops dancing, the first Chamberlain presents his sword and hat to him." Consequently, if by some unforseen catastrophe the first Chamberlain and the Chamberlain on duty both happened to be absent, the Emperor would either have to dance with hat and sword or not dance at all. At midnight the supper, which is laid upon a long horseshoe buffet in the Galerie de Diane, is announced. It is partaken of standing, and the retirement of the Emperor and Empress, who sup first with a few selected guests, is the signal for a terrible rush on the part of the rest of the company, a rush which, despite all the efforts of the various officials, frequently becomes a most undignified scramble. The ball invariably concludes with the cotillon, a species of figure-dance in which all kinds of accessories, such as wreaths of flowers, flags, paper hoops like those leaped through by circus-riders, gigantic pasteboard heads, etc., are made use of. The Marquis de Caux, the husband of ADELINA PATTI, was the leader of the cotillon at the Tuileries, and was celebrated for his ingenuity in devising new figures.

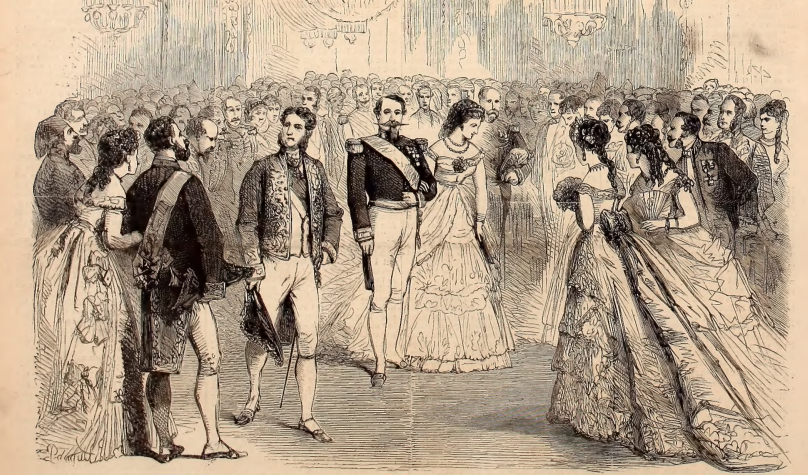
HON. HENRY B. ANTHONY, PRESIDENT PRO TEM. OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

HON. HENRY B. ANTHONY,

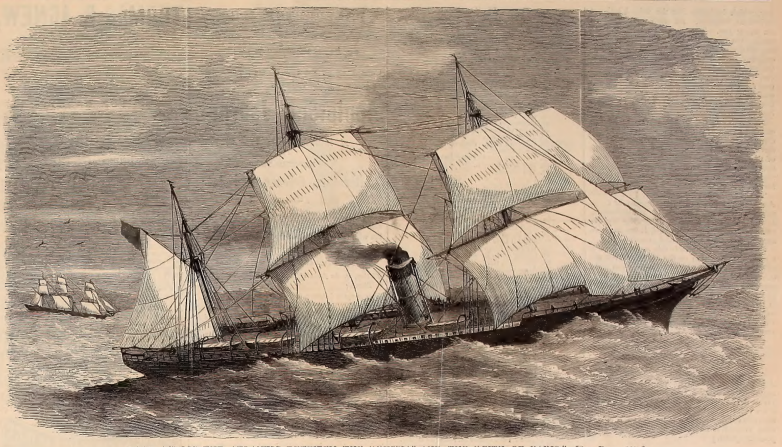
PRESIDENT PRO TEM. OF THE SENATE.

THE President pro tem. of the Senate is, as regards succession, the third officer in our Government. His selection, therefore, in view of our past experience, is an affair of great importance. The choice of Senator H. B. ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, for this position is the greatest compliment which could be paid him by the body with which he has been connected for the past ten years. The tribute is one which Senator ANTHONY well deserves.

Senator ANTHONY was born in Coventry, Rhode Island, April 1, 1815, of Quaker ancestry. He was graduated at Brown University in 1833, and in 1838 he assumed the editorial charge of the Providence Journal. He was elected Governor of Rhode Island in 1849; re-elected in 1850. He declined a second re-election, and became Senator in 1859. In 1865 his term expired, and he was again elected, his present term expiring in 1871. He was a member of the National Committee appointed to accompany the remains of President LINCOLN to Illinois. He is as popular in the Senate as he is honest and patriotic in the service of his State and the nation. Senator ANTHONY does not belong to the legal profession, and therefore is not touched by Senator SUMNER'S recent philippic. He is largely endowed with common-sense. No wiser selection of a temporary President could have been made.



A STATE BALL AT THE TUILERIES—PRESENTATIONS TO THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS BEFORE THE BALL.

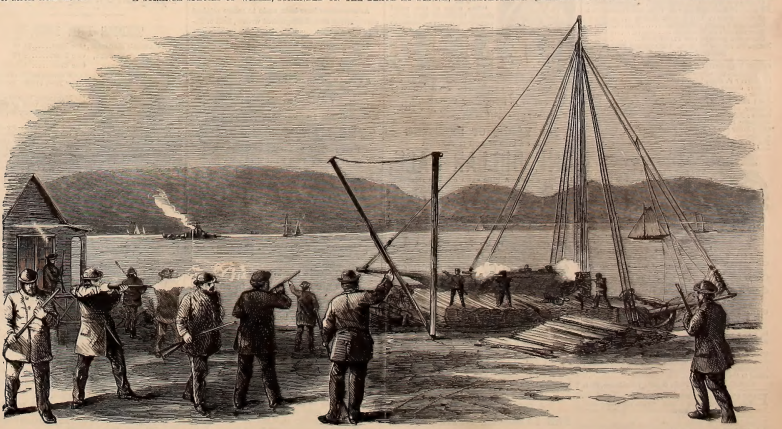


RACE ACROSS THE ATLANTIC BETWEEN THE "RUSSIA" AND THE "CITY OF PARIS."—[See Page 215.]

"CAST UP BY THE SEA."

This animal, classed scientifically under the head of Cetacea, was found on the beach at Dennis, Massachusetts, January 29, 1869. When found the blood was still warm, and it is supposed to have accidentally come too near the shore in the night, and by the force of the waves, which were high at the time, to have been driven entirely to the land, where, by its constant exertions to free itself, it soon became exhausted; at the same time the tide ebbing left it at some distance from the water, where it soon died. It measured 20 feet in length and 6 feet in height. It had a very large tail, measuring six feet across from the extremity of one lobe to that of the other; two pectoral fins two feet five inches long, also one dorsal fin nearly midway on its back, three or four inches high, thick at the base and narrowing toward the top. The head, the most peculiar and conspicuous portion of the animal, is globular on the upper part, tapering toward the lower side; the anterior part nearly perpendicular, the upper part a little in advance; and at the bottom is a projection very much resembling a bill, 20 inches long, slightly curved, giving the fore part of the animal a singular and striking appearance. No teeth were to be seen protruding through the gums, but on dissection several were found on the forward end of the lower jaw, which indicates that the animal had not arrived at maturity. No teeth were found on the upper jaw. The eyes were comparatively small. On top of the head, a little forward of the eyes, was situated the "spout-hole." The external surface of the body was jet black, smooth, and shone like oiled-silk. Its "blubber," a fatty substance covering the muscles, was from 2½ to 4 inches in thickness, and was sold for $175; the purchasers probably obtained from it seven or eight barrels of oil of a superior quality.

A STRANGE SPECIES OF WHALE, STRANDED ON THE BEACH AT DENNIS, MASSACHUSETTS.—[Sketched by J. H. Blake.]



REVOLT OF CONVICTS AT SING SING, NEW YORK—THE CONFLICT ON THE SLOOP "EXCHANGE."—Sketched by Stanley Fox.—[See Page 215.]

Massachusetts waters are known to be frequented at different times of the year by eleven distinct species of Cetacea; but as far as observations and investigations have gone none of those bear a close resemblance to this specimen; therefore, it is considered a species with these waters, and probably a new and undescribed species.

The skeleton has been obtained by Professor AGASSIZ, and is now at the Museum of Comparative Zoology, Cambridge, Massachusetts. It did not arrive, however, until after his departure for Havana, consequently it has not been examined by the distinguished savant.

Of this order of animals this is the sixteenth now in the possession of the Museum; but the crowded state of the rooms prevents any of them being exhibited. During the present year, however, the show-room is to be more than tripled in size by the extension of the building; and it is to be hoped ere long room will be found for exhibiting these skeletons all mounted naturally, when an excellent opportunity will be offered for studying and comparing them.

THE FRAGRANT BREATH OF BEAUTY

Attests the matchless purifying properties of SOZODONT. Every lady who has ever used it proclaims it a perfect antidote to dental decay. Two teeth are essential to a pure breath, and both are enjoyed by all who resort to this agreeable, wholesome and invaluable vegetable compound.—[Com.]

SEMMER AND WINTER.—COLGATE & CO.'S TOILET SOAPS we have used for years, and found them always softening to the skin in winter, and as pleasant in summer that we could not do without them.—Interior Tricscope.

WALTHAM WATCHES are the best and the cheapest.—N. MAYSON & CO., Chicago.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per Box. Mailed for 60c. Sold by druggists. B. G. WILLIAMS, 611 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS

VELOCIPEDES.

The Witty patents now date as follows:
No. 84,505, patented Feb. 11, 1862.
No. 90,393, patented Nov. 30, 1868.
No. 87,999, patented March 16, 1869.
The undersigned is now prepared to supply orders for all kinds of velocipedes now in the market. Parties desiring to sell said velocipedes in any part of the United States or to foreign countries, can have them boxed and shipped at the shortest notice.
Prices ranging from $75 to $150, according to quality and style of finish. A liberal discount to the trade or to parties purchasing quantities.
CALVIN WITTY,
Carriage and Velocipede Depot, No. 635 Broadway.

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.—A Complete Library of Modern Music for Voice and Pianoforte: 12 Good-Friday and Easter Hymns ..... 50c.; Chopin's Valses, complete ..... 50c.; Beethoven's 48 Waltzes ..... 50c.; Complete Ballad and Piano, each ..... 50c. Mailed on receipt of price. CATALOGUES FREE. BOOSEY & CO., 594 Broadway, N. Y.

THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL and WORLD of MAN contains the portraits, characters, and biographies of Harvey Parker, M.D., lecturer on the deaf and dumb; James T. Brady, Henry D. Barron, Henry Frank; illustrations on Horses, Horse-taming, John Stuart Mill; Phrenology and Religion; Fish Culture; Animal Magnetism; Napoleon's Head after death; Nothing but a Baby; The Planchette Mystery; Japanese Phrenology; A Good Inheritance; A Model Open Polar Sea? Music. Price $3 a year, or 30 cents a Number. Specimen sent. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted.

Alaska Diamonds.

The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or crystallized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the real diamond, is now manufactured in new factory, in artistic diamond settings, guaranteed not to change in color, and will stand the test of acid as well as the touch of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Look at our Price-List.

Ladies' Solitaire Ear-Drop Finger-Rings, $8 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Drops, $8, $10, $12; Cluster Finger-Rings, $8, $10, $12; Cluster Ear-Drops, $6, $12, $14.

Cluster Studs, $10, $12, $20, and $25 each; Cross Sets, $20 and $30.

Gents' Solitaire Pins, $5, $6, $8, $10, $15, $20; Gents' Solitaire Rings, $8, $10, $15, $20; Cluster Rings, $8, $10, $15 each.

Cluster Pins, $10 and $12; with tail, $10; Cross Pins, $6, $10, and $12 each, as per set, $5, $8, $10.

We do our business direct from our factory, located in a city which has a world-wide reputation for its fine jewelry.

Orders by mail will be promptly executed with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods sent free. Everything that can be sent by express, C.O.D., count to the Trade. SPECIAL Circulars. A Large Discount to the Trade. Address

STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO., Providence, R. I.

POTATO BAKER.—Housekeepers want it. Bakes as Soon Size a Pot. Saves time and fuel. Agents Wanted. DUDLEY & ROGERS, Rochester, N.Y.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT AND PILLS are the only remedies known for the cure of all bilious symptoms, derangement of stomach and bowels, old sores, ulcers, and cancers.

HITCHCOCK'S

HALF-DIME MUSIC.

Printed on heavy music-paper, 4 pages, colored titles. Music and Words. Price 5 cts. each; the whole fifty mailed for $2 50. NOW READY:

No. 50. Call Me thine Own.
49. Le Salve de Mon Pays.
48. Woodside Waltz and Polka.
47. Home, Sweet Home. (Instrumental.)
46. Pertichole's Letter.
45. The Moonlit Sea.
44. St. Nicholas Galop.
43. Velocipede Johnny.
42. Gems D'Armes Duet.
41. Gems from Norma.
40. Belles of Broadway.
39. Flying Trapeze.
38. Power of Love. (Instrumental.)
37. Susanna Story.
36. I will not Ask to Press that Cheek.
35. The Fairy Wreath.
34. The Life-Boat.
33. Light of the World. (Sacred.)
32. Beautiful Bells.
31. Ethiop Galop.
30. Olympic Schottische.
29. Up in a Balloon.
28. There's a Charm in Spring.
27. Set the Conquering Hero Comes.
26. Take Back the Heart.
25. The Passing Bell.
24. Still I'll Love Thee.
23. Waltzing down at Long Branch.
22. Riding down Broadway.
21. She might not Suit your Fancy.
20. Arm-in-Arm. (Polka Mazurka.)
19. The Rose of Sharon.
18. Silver Chimes.
17. The Old Village Clock.
16. His Love Shines over All. (Sacred.)
15. Maggie's Story.
14. Little Maggie May.
13. The Dandy Fifth Whistle.
12. Come hither, my Baby, my Darling.
11. Genevieve Waltz.
10. Skating Rink Polka.
9. Champagne Charlie.
8. Praise of Tears.
7. I really don't Think I shall Marry.
6. Good-bye, Sweetheart, Good-bye.
5. Not for Jesse.
4. Blue Eyes.
3. We'll Never Bide a Wee.
2. Won't you Tell me why, Robin?
1. Captain Jinks. Military Song.

The above can be had at the music, book, and periodical stores, or will be mailed, post-free, 6 cts. each, to the publisher. Other choice selections will rapidly follow. Agents wanted. BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 98 Spring St., New York (under St. Nicholas Hotel).

PURIFY THE SKIN

By removing all taint from the blood. This can be effected with absolute certainty by a short course of STAFFORD'S IRON and SULPHUR FLOWERS. Whether the initiating principle in the circulation be that which causes scrofula, salt-rheum, scald-head, white swelling, or any ordinary cutaneous eruption, the beneficial effect will be the same. The sulphur converts the pungent and unhealthy secretions of the body into a gaseous form, and they are thrown off from the surface by the increased vigor imparted to the circulation by the tonic action of the iron. The morbid matter then causes the exterior inflammation is discharged through the pores, and the cuticle regains its natural color and transparency.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS.

1 Package, by mail, prepaid, $1 Packages, 12 Powders, $5. Mailed Free.

HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N.Y.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

Prices from $16 to $22.

From the Scientific American of April 11, 1868.

"The color of this metal closely resembles that of 18 carat gold, is more grateful to the eye than gold, is metal brilliant," &c., &c.

When dressed, these Watches will be sent to any express office, with permission of examination granted upon payment of Express charges.

Description of goods and metal sent free upon application. An inspection of my goods earnestly solicited.

BENJAMIN VUILLEMIN,
64 Nassau Street, New York.
For sale by all responsible Jewelers.

100 YARDS OF SHEETING

For a Club of 100 in our great

ONE DOLLAR SALE,

If all returned. A little extra exertion secures it. Send for circulars and full information before ordering our clubs elsewhere. Our trial will convince you that our terms to agents are the lowest, and the quality of our goods unequaled by any other house in our line of business.

S. C. THOMPSON & CO.,
106 Federal Street, Boston, Mass.

BY subscribing to the MUSICAL INDEPENDENT, a large quarto monthly musical magazine, you can have a piece of music for $20 WORTH OF MUSIC FOR $2.

Each number contains, in addition to the usual amount of interesting reading matter, Four Pages of the choicest Songs, Duets, and Quartettes (with Piano, Organ or Melodeon accompaniment), and beautiful selections of Solo Pieces for Piano, Organ, or Melodeon, each by Marches, Waltzes, Polkas, Galops, Operatic Selections, &c. First six numbers now ready. Price, 20 cents per copy. Subscription, $2 50 cents each, by the Publishers, LYON & HEALY.
Chicago, Ill.

Cards and Circulars free. Address, as above.

AGENTS, FARMERS, GARDENERS, and FRUIT GROWERS.—Send for particulars of "Bent's Improved Fruit-Tree and Vine Invigorator and Insect Destroyer." Samples to test will be forwarded to any part of the United States, and perfect satisfaction guaranteed. Good Agents are wanted in every County in the United States. Address

J. ABEARN, 63 Second St., Baltimore, Md.

THE LANGHAM HOTEL, London.
JAMES M. SANDERSON, Manager,
formerly of New York.

D. APPLETON & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
90, 92, & 94 Grand St., N.Y.

Commence, on the 27th of March, the publication of Appletons' Journal,

A WEEKLY PAPER,

DEVOTED TO

Literature, Science, and Art.

APPLETONS' JOURNAL will be devoted to popular current Literature, an organ of advanced opinion with respect to all the great interests of society, of popular Science in its best sense, and of Art.

The department of Literature will embrace:

Fiction, in the form of both Serial Novels and Short Stories;

Essays upon Literary and Social Topics;

Sketches of Travel and Adventure;

Discussions upon Art, Books, and kindred themes;

Papers upon all the various subjects that pertain to the pursuits and recreations of the people, whether of town or country; and

Poems by our foremost poets.

A distinctive feature will be a fuller treatment of Science than is prevalent in popular journals. In this branch the Publishers have secured the services of the ablest and most authoritative thinkers, men who combine true genius with a knowledge with the power of clear and impressive statement.

Education, in its various aspects, personal and public, at home, in the school, and in the college, in its principles as a science, and in its practice as an art, will receive the full consideration to which it is undeniably entitled.

Illustrations will form an important feature in the plan of the Journal. Each number will be accompanied by either an Illustrated Supplement on some popular theme,

A Steel Engraving in the best style of the Art, or

A large Cartoon engraved on wood.

Novelty, freshness, and continual change will be aimed at in this department. The illustrations will usually be valuable as works of art; those on steel, and the Cartoons, consisting of views of American scenery, by our most distinguished painters, and illustrations of character and life, by our foremost draughtsmen. They will be printed with extra care on separate sheets, and may be either bound in the volume at the close of the year, or framed to hang upon the wall.

APPLETONS' JOURNAL will aim to be vigorous, earnest, and capable; valuable as an organ of thought, and pleasing to all the members of the household on account of its varied, sound, and entertaining literature.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made to secure original contributions from distinguished writers, both of Europe and America.

In the first number will be commenced

THE NEW STORY,

BY THE GREAT FRENCH WRITER,

VICTOR HUGO,

UNDER THE GENERAL TITLE OF

"THE MAN WHO LAUGHS,"

PART I.—THE SEA AND THE NIGHT,
PART II.—BY THE KING'S COMMAND,

For which the French publishers paid the distinguished Author 100,000 francs.

This novel has been in the author's workshop for twenty years, the idea of it having arisen in his mind contemporaneously with that of "Les Miserables." M. Hugo now places it in a new field, that of English history and English character, of which he has been a student and observer during his Jersey exile.

Price 10 Cents per Number, or $4 00 per Annum, in advance.

For sale by all Newsmen.

Terms for Clubs may be obtained of the Publishers. Specimen copies sent gratis.

The postage within the United States, for the JOURNAL, is 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, in advance, at the office where received. Subscriptions from Canada must be accompanied with 50 cents additional, to prepay the United States postage.

In remitting by mail, a post-office order or draft, payable to the order of D. APPLETON & Co., is preferable to bank notes, for if lost, the order or draft can be recovered without loss to the sender. In ordering the JOURNAL, the name should be clearly given, with the post-office, county, and State in full.

THOMAS R. AGNEW,

ESTABLISHED 1836,

260 Greenwich St., corner Murray, New York,

IS OFFERING CHEAP,

FOR CASH:

COFFEES.—Green, Roasted, and Ground; all grades to suit the palate and the pocket of the million; 10c., 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., 40c.; Mocha, 50c.

TEAS.—Every body should know who they buy teas of, as at this we do not believe are any watchmen; Mr. Agnew spent three years in China, and knows exactly what teas are, and does not deal in damaged goods of any kind; consequently every pound of tea sold is warranted as represented, or the money returned.

MOLASSES.—Mr. Agnew has his agent in New Orleans, an expert in the business, who ships him the choicest of the crop.

RICE.—Mr. Agnew has a house in South Carolina, which gives him the best Rice in the market.

FLOUR is received direct from the mills. Genesee, Indiana, and St. Louis, best brands in market, from $7 to $16 per barrel.

GROCERIES.—Every thing desired in families, hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, steamships and sailing vessels is sold by Mr. Agnew, who is a live man, is up at 6, 6, 7, 8, and 9 hours every day for the last quarter of a century. He is a steam-coach compared with the old fashioned grocers, who have been brought up in a snug-fal hermet, as do lackeys for others, and now begin to think of other things when gray-headed. In a word, Agnew is as far ahead of the trade as Dexter is of the cart-horse team trotting. He is the man for the people—quick as lightning and punctual as time.

These Engravings sell readily any where, and pay at least 100 per cent. profit. Now is the time to commence. Send for Circular, which has full particulars and Prices to Agents. Address

MOORE & CO., 111 NASSAU ST., N.Y.

Early Rose Potato.

ONE lb. EARLY ROSE sent by mail, postpaid, $1 00.
4 lbs. EARLY ROSE by mail, postpaid, $3 00. Best Early Sort in the Market. The earliest and most productive Corn: Several yields per acre. Pearl Weevil and black—weighing 46 pounds to the bushel; Spring Barley; Grass Seeds; Fowls; Eggs; Hogs: the great Reed Cutter, and four EXPERIMENTAL FARM JOURNAL —most valuable Magazine issued in this country—only $1 50 per year. Subscribe, if you want to make your Farm pay. Address

GEO. A. DEITZ, CHAMBERSBURG, PA.

25 CENTS.—Send it for a Package of three 25 MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS. Library of Love, Wife, Joe Miller, etc. Circulars FREE. Agents WANTED. W. C. WEMYSS, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869,

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one subscriber, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

A Bound Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 each, as one remittance; or two Copies for $30 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents additional for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscriptions begin. Discontinuances stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to write for a discontinuance.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Draft or Note be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or for a less space, $1 80 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Outside Page, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $1 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—Ordinary Space Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1; $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; finest, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH RESTAURANT AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (ground), 30c., 35c., 40c., 50c.; best, 60c. per lb.
GREEN (uncoasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

FORTSMOUTH, MICH., August 26, 1868.

To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Gentlemen:—Please send by bearer, Rev. York,

GIVEN: The people here will not let me alone. They say I have learned the trade, and that I have got to send another order for them. So here you have it in the shape of ten clubs, making five hundred lbs. of the list, making five hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-four cents. I have sent you since last date.

Hoping this will be as good as former packages, I remain, yours truly, &c.

10 lbs.	Uncol'd Japan, Mrs. Kempton...	at $1 00	$10 00
5	Imperial.....	at 1 25	6 25
5	Young Hyson...A. L. Cumming,	at 1 25..	6 25
5	Gunpowder...Mrs. Stephens	at 1 25..	6 25
4	Coffee.....J. P. Chapman	at 40..	1 60
4	Gunpowder.....O. A. Wattrous	at 1 25	5 00
4	Imperial.....F. Taylor	at 1 25..	5 00
4	Young Hyson...Prof. Hopkins	at 1 25..	5 00
5	Coffee.....	at 40..	1 50
6	Gunpowder.....John Stephens	at 1 25	7 50
5	Young Hyson...Wm. H. Dorsty,	at 1 25..	6 00
1	do. do. ...H. Nelson	at 1 25..	1 25
2	do. do. ...N. Newcomb	at 1 25..	2 50
4	do. do. ...Wm. Campbell	at 1 25..	5 00
5	Gunpowder.....Judge Miller	at 1 25..	4 50
1	do. .....A. Gale	at 1 25..	1 25
4	Imperial.....Mrs. Bird	at 1 25..	2 50
			$74 35

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them good and fresh, and never direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If we are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a Club does not exist, by ordering their teas, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third, by sending the Express charges by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—Consumers, and dealers, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, in the hope that part of our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the name of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus concerns.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5645, New York City.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold $15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS ORIOIDE WATCH FACTORY.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED ORIOIDE).

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we will in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing direct from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability; and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color in any climate, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies are improved Lepines; but there is a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in merit, style, and finish, to Watches generally sold for $100. The $20 Watches are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $3 to $6.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Latest Styles, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Odd Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and durability.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We prefer to supply no agencies, as each agency requires a commission, so we can sell more reliable Watches for less than our published prices. Our regular customers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest rates. Parties living where we have no agencies can order Watches and Jewelry as we advertise. The premise Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to send money in Letters, as we can not undertake to pay part of the risk. Remit by Drafts on New York, or by Express. Customers must pay all express charges. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Goods sent C. O. D. to be examined before paid for at our Office in Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

The True Medical Doctrine.

Nature, when struggling with disease, indicates unmistakably the true and only rational principles. Let not this demand of enfeebled nature be neglected. Respond to it promptly by commencing a course of a preparation which, when once thoroughly tried, the properties of a STIMULANT, an INVIGORANT, and an ALTERATIVE. Before three days have elapsed, from the taking of the first dose, its genuine beneficial character will be manifest in the bodily and mental condition of the patient. The pulse will be stronger and more regular, the tongue will begin to lose its coating, and the muscular and nervous systems to recover their tension, and the spirits to improve. Persevere, and a complete revivification of the vital powers and animal and mental powers is certain. In cases of dyspepsia and biliousness, the same salutary results will be obtained. The appetite returns, the sallowness of the skin disappear, and all the distressing symptoms which accompany disorders of the stomach and liver will rapidly subside. In certain changes of Spring and Autumn intensify these complaints by checking the perspiratory action, by which so much morbid matter is evaporated through the pores of the body, and therefore the BITTERS are especially useful in the dyspeptic and bilious at this season.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

Sabbath-School Superintendents

Should send 25 cents for a specimen copy of the latest and best Music Book for Sabbath-Schools, by J. E. WEBSTER, entitled the GOLDEN CHAIN RING.

A choice collection (160 pages) of the most beautiful Hymns and Tunes, arranged as solos, duets, trios, and choruses, all in good voice, and very easy. Send a specimen copy for this work. Published by LYON & HEALY, Publishers of Sabbath-School Music, Chicago.

No excuse now for Papers and Magazines lying about home all the year.

CONANT'S BINDER FOR PERIODICAL COVERS,

for HARPER'S WEEKLY or BAZAR, sent by mail for $1 25. They bind the numbers from week to week.

Address R. CONANT, 28 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

"We all agree that it is the best binder we have seen."—MAGAZINE SUN, 59 CENTS. SHEET-MUSIC SIZE, $1 00.

$10 A DAY to agents selling STUBBS' PATENT PLAITED HOOPS. Lowest-priced first-class. Perfect fit guaranteed. Price-list sent free. CLEGG & CO., 58 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

NASBY'S PAPER.

THE TOLEDO BLADE.

A large quarto sheet, containing fifty-six columns filled with NEWS from all parts of the World. Choice original and selected Tales, Sketches, Poetry, Wit and Humor, a Commercial Department, a Religious Department, a Children's Department, and a carefully-edited Agricultural Department. In short, it is our constant aim to make the BLADE as nearly as possible

A Perfect Family Newspaper.

THE NASBY LETTERS!

The rich, racy, rollicking humor of the Letters of "Rev. PETROLEUM V. NASBY, P.M., which is Postmaster," —their quaint Irony, keen sarcasm, and cutting satire,—their merciless exposure of the heresies of political demagogues of all parties, and, withal, their profound philosophy and unanswerable arguments, have rendered them the most popular political literature ever published. These letters are written expressly for the BLADE, and will be continued regularly in its columns.

A New Story by Petroleum V. Nasby will shortly be commenced in the BLADE.

TERMS.—Single Copies, $2 per year; Clubs of five, $1 75 each; Clubs of ten and over, $1 50 each, and an Extra Copy to every person getting up a Club.

PAY! PAY! PAY!—We pay liberally, in cash, all who assist us in extending the circulation of the BLADE.

AGENTS WANTED.—We want an Agent at every Post-Office in the United States. Send for our Special Circular to Agents.

SPECIMEN COPIES sent free to any address. Send for a copy, and at the same time give us the address of a dozen or so of your friends, at as many different Post-Offices, to whom we will send copies free and postage paid. Address

MILLER, LOCKE, & CO.,
Toledo, Ohio.

STRANGERS Visiting Washington should not fail to call at

G. C. Hennessy's Clothing Establishment,

No. 511 SEVENTH STREET.

The habiliments are: The largest stock in the District. All garments Custom-made. Gentlemen will find in plain figures, from which no deviation is permitted.

VELOCIPEDE WHEELS.

Manufactured by

S. N. BROWN & CO.,
Dayton, Ohio.

They also make all other article of Spokes and Hubs for light Carriage and Buggy Wheels. Send for Price-List.

LOVERS CHARM for Olio-de-Flora Locket or Chain. Sent to any address for 25 cents per piece. As a present it is a beauty, and as a pocket companion for sensitive and fond lovers it is invaluable. Wonderfu genuine. Try it. Sent sealed, paid-paid, for 50 cts., or 2 for $1. Address Olio-de-Flora & Co., Springfield, Mass. Box 64.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE.

First-class, and fully licensed. AGENTS WANTED. For terms, address CHICOPEE M'F'G CO., Boston, Mass.

LS PKA DWIZPBXWNZK.

THE CRYPTOGRAPH.

With Alphabet and Instructions. Post Free. ADAMS & CO., Publishers, 23 Avonsdale Pl., Boston.

THE TANITE EMERY WHEEL Cuts fast, does not glaze, gum, heat, or smell, and is clean. For circulars, address THE TANITE CO., Stroudsburg, Pa.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE, Claverack, N. Y. 27 A thorough Classical and Scientific School. Next session April 5, 1869. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Prin.

$245 A MONTH. TO AGENTS. 49 JOHN J. HOWARD & CO., Alfred, Me.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have lately Published:

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S WARD BEECHER. Fifty-nine Sermons. Selected from Published and Unpublished Discourses, and Revised by their Author. Portrait. Volumes, 8vo. With Steel Portrait by Halpin. Cloth, $5 00.

William Hepworth Dixon.

HER MAJESTY'S TOWER. Historic Studies in the Tower of London. With Frontispiece Plan of the Tower. 12mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

Thomas Bosse.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK: its History, Condition, and Statistics. An official Report to the Board of Education. By THOMAS BOSSE, Clerk of the Board. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

Miles O'Reilly.

THE POLITICAL WORKS OF CHARLES G. HALPINE (MILES O'REILLY). Consisting of Odes, Poems, Songs, Epics, and Lyrical Pasquinades which have not heretofore been collected together. With a Biographical Sketch and Explanatory Notes. Edited by HOSMER B. ROOSEVELT. Portrait on Steel. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

F. Whymper.

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE IN THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA, formerly Russian America—now Ceded to the United States—and in various other parts of the North Pacific. By FREDERICK WHYMPER. With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

Sir Samuel W. Baker.

CAST UP BY THE SEA; or, The Adventures of Ned Grey. By Sir SAMUEL W. BAKER, M.A., F.R.G.S., Author of "The Albert N'yanza, Great Basin of the Nile," "The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia," &c. Illustrated. With Ten Illustrations by Hard. 12mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

The Rev. Dr. Bellows.

THE OLD WORLD IN ITS NEW FACE: Impressions of Europe in 1867-1868. By HENRY W. BELLOWS. 2 vols., 12mo, Cloth, $3 50. Vol. II. just ready.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

$10 SEWING MACHINE

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity. Patented.

A most wonderful and elegantly-constructed novelty. Noiseless in operation; sews with double or single thread, makes the Stitch with extreme rapidity.

"Scarcely more than a toy; a perfect machine."—New York Tribune.

"For the lazy seamstress it is invaluable; for the Housekeeper it is a vacant place."—Godey's Lady's Book.

"It is not a complicated machine, and any child may, by an easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"Beautiful as a Watch."—Leslie's Gazette of Fashion.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine will be prosecuted to the extent of the law. Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in a box with printed instructions, on receipt of price, $10, or C. O. D. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free. Address all orders to

APEX SEWING MACHINE CO.,
26 Broadway, New York.

IVINS' PATENT HAIR-CRIMPERS.—Every lady should have them. For sale at Variety Stores. Made only by E. IVINS, 1301 Marshall St., Philadelphia.

GENUINE OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO.

FACTORY, GENEVA, Switzerland.

ONLY OFFICE IN THE UNITED STATES.

No. 78 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fine Swiss Movements.....	$15 00.
" " Patent Levers.....	20 00.
Gentlemen's Pac-Similie Waltham Patent Levers.....	20 00.
" " Ditto, Chronometer Balance.....	25 00.
GENUINE WALTHAM PATENT LEVERS.....	30 00.
" " Ditto, Chronometer Balance.....	35 00.

All of our Watches are Hunting Cases—Plain, Engine-Turned, and Elaborately Engraved. Warranted Perfect Time-Keepers, and to retain the color of its solid Gold, representing Fine Gold Watches worth from $150 to $250 00. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Chains, Latest Styles, $3, $5, $7, and $10 each. Sent by Express, C. O. D. Customers must pay all express charges, and allowed to examine what they order, previous to paying, on receipt of express charges both ways.

JOHN FOGGAN, Prest'r Oroide Gold Watch Co., No. 78 NASSAU ST., N.Y.

PHOTOGRAPHER (with great suavity of manner). "If I might propose—that is to say, I should suggest that you have a Profile picture taken—your Features are peculiarly and consistently adapted to that style. A Full Face would give you the appearance of taking Aim; besides, you will get credit for extreme Modesty in having only one side of your face taken."

GENUINE WALTHAM WATCHES,
IN SOLID GOLD and SILVER CASES ONLY,
AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Silver Hunting Watches $18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases . . . $80
Gold Hunting Watches, Ladies' Size. $70

Every Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Company. We will send these Watches by Express to any place, with bill to collect on delivery, and give the purchaser the privilege to open the package and examine the Watch before paying, and any Watch that does not give satisfaction may be exchanged or the money will be refunded. Every one is requested to write for our Descriptive Price-List, which explains the different kinds with prices of each.
Please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.
Address in full,
HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N. Y.

FURNITURE.
WARREN WARD & CO.,
Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.
Established 1826. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.
ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

$5. WATCHES. $12.
The famous Orvis Hunting-Case Watch, Patent Detached Lever, Jeweled, $18 & $20. The same, Lepine Movement, $12. Ladies' H. C. Watch, solid silver, heavily plated with fine 18-carat gold, enameled very richly, $30. Engine-Engine H. C. Silver, long sweep second, for timing horses, $20. Celebrated Am. Levers, $23 & $30. The above watches warranted. A handsome Silver-Plated Open-Face Watch, engine-turned edge, English Movements, $6. Goods sent C. O. D. Address WILLSON & CO., No. 142 Fulton St., N. Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

A Blind Adherence to Old Ideas is absurd in this age of brilliant discoveries. When an invalid can drink the actual counterpart of the famous Seltzer Water in his own chamber, why should he dose himself with revolting cathartics? TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT is the quintessence of that peculiar combination of alterative and tonic essences, and is admitted to have no equal in the materia medica as a remedy for indigestion, biliousness, general weakness, constipation, and tendency of blood to the head.

ALL BY DRUGGISTS.

KALDENBERG & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum Pipes and Cigar-Holders, with Monograms, Portraits, &c. Wholesale and Retail. Repairing in all its branches. Send for Drawings and Price-List. Box 6734. Stores: 10 North St., & 6 John St., & 11 Nassau St., corner John St. Received a Prize at the Paris Exposition, 1867.

£150,000,000
Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1600. Fee to search for any name, $5. Gen & Co., 8 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

PRINCE & COS. ORGANS AND MELODEONS. 43,000, now in use. BOWDOIN ST. CHICAGO, ILL.

GORHAM MFG. CO.
Sterling Silver Ware,
AND
Fine Electro-Plated Ware,
of the following trade-marks:

Trade-Mark for Silver. GORHAM MFG CO. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate.

MANUFACTURED BY THE
GORHAM MANUFACTURING CO.,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

THE GORHAM WARE may be obtained of ADAMS, CHANDLER, & CO.,
No. 20 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

OSCO
The Highest Cash Prices
PAID FOR
OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;
OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;
OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are written full;
and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Public and Private Libraries, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Offices, &c.
JOHN C. STOCKWELL,
29 Ann street, N.Y.

ELGIN WATCHES.
CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing our watches, or watches reserved two in front of our name, of parties who advertise to send them "C.O.D." We have no connection with such houses, and do not intend to furnish our goods to houses for that purpose. The excellence and good repute of the real Elgins have caused several Foreign and American Watch Companies to make inferior imitations with the same or similar trade-marks as ours, and parties who advertise to send our goods "C.O.D." no matter whether to get the real Elgin Watches purchase only of dealers in your vicinity or elsewhere whom you know to be honorable.
THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,
ELGIN, ILLINOIS.
Business Office, Nos. 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.
A practical work, just published, containing 100 Designs, Plans, and Details to Working Scale. Country, Suburban, and Village Homes; with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE Twelve Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
150 Designs, $1.50, postpaid.
Geo. E. Woodward, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York.
Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

POLLAK & SON, Manufr's of Meerschaum goods. Stores: 405 Broadway, near Broome, & 17 John St., middle of block. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 3846.

BREWSTER & Co.
(OF BROOME ST.),
5th Ave., cor. 14th St.
Fine Carriages,
in all the fashionable varieties, exclusively of their own build, including
THE WELL-KNOWN
"BREWSTER WAGON,"
of which they are sole manufacturers.
Having fixed prices and but one quality, orders by mail will be as favorably executed as if given in person.
AGENTS FOR
CALLOWS' LONDON WHIPS.
For Tandem, Four-in-Hand, Phaeton, and Wagon driving; elegant in style, and superior to all others in quality.
Forwarded safely by Express to all parts of the country.
☞ Correspondence invited. ☜

Waltham Watches
3 Plate 16 & 20 Sizes.

3 Plate 16 & 20 Sizes.
These watches are by far the best made in this country, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy.
For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD LIVER OIL
Universally recognized by the Faculty as
INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR
to every other kind,
and the unequaled remedy for
Consumption, General Debility,
and the Wasting Diseases of Children.
DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA in IMPERIAL HALF-PINTS only, sealed with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with his Trade-Mark.
SOLE CONSIGNEES,
ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.
SOLE AUTHORIZED AGENTS IN AMERICA,
EDWD DGREEY & Co., 58, Vesey St., New York.
Sold by all Druggists, at $1.50 per Bottle.
☞ Beware of felonious imitations.

$30,000 BROWN STONE HOUSE
No. 8 South Oxford St., Brooklyn, for sale. Call and see it. 22 & 30, 100. WM. A. BROSS.

SAFETY.

CHARLES PRATT'S ASTRAL OIL
Is intended to supply a great Public Want for a Safe, Reliable Illuminating Oil. It is manufactured by us, and packed only in our Guarantee Patent Cans, expressly for Family Use. It has more body, and an equal quantity will burn longer and give more light than any other oil. It cannot Perfectly Pure—No Mixture nor Chemicals.
E. N. Horsford, late Chemist Prof. Harvard Univ., &c., R. Ogden Doremus, M.D., Prof. Chem., &c., Bellevue Hospital, Medical College, and College of the City of New York, say of the Astral Oil:
"It is remarkably clear and free from disagreeable odor, and burns with a brilliant flame, without offensive smell. A lamp filled with the Oil, and allowed to burn entirely out, does not incrust the wick. The "flashing point" may be fairly stated to be 120° Fah., and the "burning point" not below 148° Fah. The plan adopted for securing the public against adulteration of the oil, by putting it up for sale in Cans of convenient size for family use, and sealing the Cans, to be opened only by the consumer, is to be commended in the strongest terms. This system, faithfully carried out, meets a great public want."
Prices of Pratt's Astral Oil.
Single case, containing 1 Patent Can, 5 gallS., &c. $5 00
Case and Can 1 00
Double case, containing 2 Patent Cans, 10 galls., &c. 10
Case and Cans 1 75
☞ CAUTION.—Purchasers should observe that the seals of the packages have not been tampered with. Full prices will be allowed for packages returned in good order, less the transportation charges.
Sample packages sent on receipt of price.
☞ For sale by Grocers, Druggists, and the Trade generally, and by the OIL HOUSE OF CHARLES PRATT,
(SUCCESSOR TO RAYMOND, PRATT, & CO.),
Established 1770.
Manufacturer of and Dealer in strictly Pure Oils.
No. 108 FULTON ST., New York.
☞ SEND FOR CIRCULAR.

DR. JNO. V. BURTON'S TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.
WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., March 1, 1868.
DR. J. V. BURTON—DEAR SIR: Your ANTIDOTE is entirely capable and harmless. It purifies and enriches the blood, invigorates the nervous system, promotes digestion and strengthens nature, as an excellent tonic and stimulant, enables the weak to throw off the habit, and makes sleep refreshing. Any confirmation you may desire of the above statements, I will cheerfully give. Yours per test, JOHN F. COYLE, Editor of the National Intelligencer, &c., &c., &c.
DR. J. R. ABBOTT, Jersey City, N. J.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
☞ Caution.—Beware of hireling imitations.
[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

A POOR GIRL'S
LETTER. New Song from Perfection . . . . . 30c.
SHAKING HANDS. Laughable Song Made Perfectly. . 30c.
PERCHERE WAITZES. 50c. "Telegram Waltz," 40c.
"Oh the Darkies Do Dance So Gaily," 30c.
KA-BOOZLE-UM (comic song). "DANDY PAT, EXIT 30c.
Violin or Flute Arrangements, 15c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1129 Broadway, N.Y.

THE WILSON SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Cheaper than all others.
AGENTS WANTED. Manufactured by
THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, O.

DRUNKENNESS — C. C. BEERS, M. D., 1130 Broadway, Manhattan, Mass. cures the most helpless cases. Send stamp for evidence.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

Countess Gucioli.
MY RECOLLECTIONS OF LORD BYRON; and Those of Eye-Witnesses of his Life. By the Countess GUCIOLI. Translated from the French by R. H. Jerningham. With Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

Anthony Trollope.
THE PRINCE AND THE IRISH MEMBER. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "He Knew He was Right," "Orley Farm," "Small House at Allington," "Can You Forgive Her?" "Doctor Thorne," &c. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.
HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Beautifully Illustrated. Part I. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Charles Reade.
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, JEALOUSY. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Never too Late to Mend," "It is Never too Late to Mend," &c. Fully Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
HARD CASH. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHARLES READE, Author of "I Love me Little, Love me Long," "Never too Late to Mend," &c. With Illustrations. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

J. D. Baldwin.
PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Great Peoples and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to a still Older Civilization of the Ethiopian or Southern Seaboard. By JOHN D. BALDWIN, Member of the American Oriental Society. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

MARVIN & CO.'S
CHROME IRON SAFES
ARE THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
265 Broadway, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 641.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION LIBRARIES

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION.

THE determined efforts made by the Cubans to conquer their independence by the expulsion of the Spanish army and of the Spanish Governorship have from the first engaged the sympathies of the American people. There is the same justice in the Cuban revolt against Spain that there was in our own revolution of 1776. A colonial dependency has been held in subjection by the mother country, and governed in the interests of the latter rather than in its own. It is true, indeed, that the Spanish Government has tried a conciliatory policy since the revolt broke out. Captain-General LERSUNDI's régime was too Bourbon-like to suit those who had just overthrown the rule of ISABELLA II. DULCE, therefore, took LERSUNDI's place and tried to suppress the revolt by an offer of amnesty. To this the Cubans justly replied that they asked not for mercy but for independence. Their continuance of the rebellion soon caused the parent Government to return to the severer policy which has been carried out for the past few weeks. The offer of amnesty was withdrawn, an order was issued that no prisoners should be taken, but all should be shot; and within the present month between 300 and 400 political prisoners have been sent to the penal station at Fernando Po for no other crime than their devotion to the cause of their country.

CUBAN EXILES MARCHING FROM THE CABANA FORTRESS TO THE BOATS.—[SKETCHED BY OUR CUBAN ARTIST.]

The Island of Fernando Po is situated on the western coast of Africa in the Bight of Biafra, at the extreme end of the Gulf of Guinea. It was discovered by the Portuguese in 1471, and by them ceded to Spain in 1778. The island is 3° 25' north of the equator, and is from 40 to 50 miles long, and from 20 to 30 miles wide. It is one of the most picturesque islands that adorn the sea; it is covered with rank vegetation and with immense forests that reach down to the shore. No large animals are to be found; but birds abound, snakes and lizards are to be found in great numbers, and scorpions and centipedes are not uncommon. The island is inhabited by a very peculiar people called Bubees, about as primitive in their habits as any savages on the globe. A penal station was established here about ten years since. The convicts are employed to make roads, cut trees, work hard in the hot sun, and of course the climate makes short work of them. Malaria causes fever, and fever does the rest. The rains are heavy and continuous, the heat is very great, dysentery and liver-complaints are also common, and the men will be the only people who will be able to live on the island for a long time to come. The great number of graves testify to the great mortality among the whites, and the transportation of these political prisoners to Fernando Po is an outrage against humanity and a disgrace to civilization.

The revolution has already accomplished important results, though it has by no means achieved its main purpose. The emancipation of the slaves by the revolutionists has given their cause more sympathy for itself and more sympathy abroad. The Western Department was the only portion of the island involved in the original revolt, but gradually the whole island has been inflamed. Many outrages, doubtless, have been committed in the name of liberty, but the perpetrators are not recognized or supported by the mass of the revolutionists.

It is impossible to ascertain the true history of the conflicts which have been fought. The lies have not been such in their results as to increase the confidence of the Spaniards is clear from the continual stream of reinforcements sent to them from the mother country. About the 18th of February an army of 4,000 Asturias for the interior, consisting of four steamers and thirteen sail. It was under the command of the Spanish General Lesca, and its object was to raise the siege of Puerto Principe. Its purpose has been accomplished, but, apparently, at great cost of life. Lesca's march through the mountains was continually harassed by the insurgents. A severe battle took place in the Sierra Cubitas, in which Lesca met with a force. It is probable that Lesca suffered the greater loss, but he succeeded in continuing his march. We give an illustration of this conflict on page 253. The defeat of the Bardones was the scene of the battle. The insurgents claim that with 1000 men they repulsed the Spaniards.

Señor Aguilera, whose portrait we give on page 253, is the principal civil leader of the revolutionists, under General Cespedes. For a picture of the Cuban patriots rallying round their flag, it is the son of General Cespedes who is kneeling.

It seems probable that our Government will soon recognize the Cubans. The meeting held at Steinway Hall in this city on the evening of March 25 indicates the strong hold which the Cuban cause has already gained upon the sympathies of our people. Henry Ward Beecher made a very effective speech, and Mr. Paul Du Chaillu, to whom we are indebted for many of the facts presented in this connection, gave a graphic description of Fernando Po, and made an eloquent plea for Cuban independence.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1869.

JAMES HARPER.

James Harper, the senior partner of the publishing house of Harper & Brothers, died on Saturday evening, March 27, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. On the previous Thursday he was driving with his daughter, when the horses were startled by the sudden breaking of the pole of the carriage, and during the vain endeavor to control them, he was thrown, with his daughter, to the pavement. She, fortunately, was little injured; but her father was taken up unconscious and carried to St. Luke's Hospital, where he lay for two days, most tenderly cared for by his family and the hospital surgeons—and, although apparently suffering, he did not recover his consciousness before his death.

On the Monday before, the writer of these lines said to him, as Mr. Harper, in his active fluent manner, left the work-rooms, paused to comment with humorous shrewdness upon public affairs: "Why, Mr. Mayor, you are the youngest man in the buildings." For his bodily vigor and alertness were remarkable. Erect in figure and elastic in movement, with a muscular force which was proverbial, his kind face was familiar to every man and woman and child in the employ of the house; and his kind heart made them all his friends. For fifty years he had been one of the most industrious and prosperous business men, and one of the most conspicuous and honored citizens, of New York. "Time could not wither him, nor custom stale." Courteous, forbearing, urbane in manner; of a remarkable sagacity; of a lofty integrity; of a wide acquaintance with men and affairs; and of a diligence which nothing relaxed, he lived his honorable and unostentatious life; and with every faculty undimmed, with the cheering impression of the whole body unabated, he passed suddenly and forever from human sight.

Only two hours before he drove out on Thursday Mr. Harper had sat to Mr. Rockwood for his photograph, and the result was a striking likeness, which will appear in our issue of next week. For we like to believe that the friends, known and unknown, all over the land, to whom for many years Harper's Weekly has been so constant a visitor, will feel a little kindly interest in one whose name has necessarily become familiar to them, and whose career is so full of encouragement to every honest and diligent young American.

CUBA.

There are two Cuban parties in this country. One wishes that Cuba may get its liberty; the other that we may get Cuban sugar. One is the party of Cuban independence; the other of Cuban annexation. Now an expression of sympathy with a people manfully struggling to throw off a foreign and oppressive yoke is instinctive with every generous man. This country is not hostile to Spain. Indeed, we ought to like that country more than ever, for it has just peacefully disembarrassed itself of a most corrupt and repulsive royal government. But undoubtedly Cuba has been horribly misgoverned. The people were not only taxed without representation, but they were not admitted into the public service. The Spaniard treated Cuba as the old barons used to treat rich Hebrews. It has tortured the island and forced it to foot the bills of the torturer. The result has come in Cuba, which comes in all such histories, when the people will endure oppression no longer, appeals, pleading to their stout hands and hearts, to the sympathy of humanity and, to the favor of God, proceed to try to deliver themselves.

The Cuban revolution is a natural protest against Spanish misrule. The discontent had long been awaiting an opportunity to strike a blow, and the opportunity would have begun at the time of the late revolution in Spain, but that disconcerted it. Yet while the unanimity of the uprising was prevented, it was not altogether repressed, and has since apparently grown in its extent and importance. Now it was natural for Cubans alone to determine whether they would like the new Spanish Government which promised reform, or whether they would not. Likewise, we can not blame the Cubans for insisting upon the same right to establish a government satisfactory to themselves.

But, of course, the Cubans, like the Spaniards, like our fathers, like all men who are justified in revolting, must maintain themselves by their own power. The success of the world demands that no forcible overthrow of a government shall be attempted without a fair prospect of success; for if the mere raising of a standard of revolt by a few malcontents should be enough to secure the official recognition of other and powerful nations there would be endless war, to the great injury of the progress of Liberty. When, however, the power, motive and duration of the contest show that the movement is not a riot but a revolution, and especially where it is the struggle of a population to escape a foreign domination, recognition at the proper moment is a measure of peace and civilization. Every nation, in view of all risks, of the general welfare, and of its own interests, must decide for itself when and how the recognition of belligerency shall be made, and when independence shall be established.

This is what Spain and Holland and France did in our own revolution. This is what England did during our late rebellion and during the revolt of Spanish America in 1823. We complained, and justly, that the circumstances of the recognition showed the conduct of England to be unfriendly during our late war. But that country took the risk, and the consequences still remain to be seen. It is, however, idle to attempt to establish any similarity between the attempt of the Spanish rebels to overthrow the government of their country—against which they did not even prefer one charge of oppression, and exist only for the purpose of perpetuating their oppression of others—and the Cuban revolt against the most acknowledged and flagrant tyranny. The attempt to establish independence and self-government is one that claims the sympathy of lovers of liberty every where; and when the attempt has been so long continued and so successful that the ability of the revolutionists has been fairly demonstrated the United States may fairly recognize Cuban belligerency, and at last Cuban independence.

But the misfortune of Cuba, as we have suggested, is that there is a very loud and active party in this country that wishes Cuban independence not for the sake of Cuba, but of the United States. This party does not very sincerely believe in the capacity of the Cubans to maintain a government, but rather hopes that recognition by the United States will persuade Spain to desist from the effort to recover the island, and that the line of necessity Cuba will fall into our hands. Is that a desirable result? Unquestionably not. Natioñs do not live by sugar alone. In the present situation of this country in regard to debt, harmony, population, immensity of debt, and public morality, to add a million and a half of Spanish creoles and African negroes, with all manner of ignorance and alien sympathy, to our population is to run not to be desired. Cuba would be but the beginning. The rest of the West Indies and the shores of the Gulf would follow. That would not strengthen—it would infinitely weaken this nation. It would not hasten—it would retard Liberty.

In 1823, when England recognized the independence of Spanish America, it was not from sympathy with those colonies nor from regard to any principle. It was merely a stroke in European politics. It was a blow at France and the Holy Alliance. It was to revenge a supposed wrong of England. It was, in Canning's words, "to redress the balance of power disturbed in the East by calling into existence a new world in the West." The conduct of Louis Philippe in the rebellion sprang from no sympathy with any people or principle, but from the instinctive wish of an aristocratic system to see a great, popular government overthrown. If ever there is a Cuban treason, merely that we may seize the revenues that Spain loses, our pretense of regard for the rights of self-government will self-government is become unspeakably ludicrous. Moreover, the question of territorial expansion in this country is not one of money only, but of liberty and of national existence. While, therefore, we do not grudge the expression of our sympathy for a people struggling bravely, as in Crete and Cuba, for self-government, let us not deceive them nor ourselves with falsehood, nor betray them into an expectation of that "material aid" which we do not intend to furnish.

THE ATTACK UPON THE COMMON SCHOOLS.

Last week we spoke of the assault of the New York Tribune upon the public schools. The object of the attack we stated to be not merely the control of the school moneys for the benefit of the Democratic party, but for the benefit of sectarian bodies. The Tribune this week we have to record another and a plainer movement for the same purpose, which should awaken every citizen to the necessity of constant vigilance to save the public school system from its most resolute and most skillful enemy. The hostility of the Romish priesthood to the common schools is proverbial, and their attempt to divert the public money to their sectarian schools is not confined to this State, but is shown in Ohio as well as in New York, and will be always felt wherever the Church and power.

The system of the Romish Church is a strictly "paternal" system. The priests are shepherds; the people are sheep. But sheep are silly and require much care. Sheep unwatched will smell at walls; they will even put their noses over; they will even squeeze through gaps and into pamper and more flowery pastures—silly sheep! Sheep must therefore be strictly guarded by pastors or shepherds, who declare that the pastures beyond the wall are poisonous. Keeps and prisons, and all the horrible things which the Church has done and may grow in them deadly poison, and what keep dogs to persuade sheep who do not believe it.

Upon this sheep theory, therefore, it is essential that the hands of the Church be prevented from nosing and looking and longing beyond the prescribed limits. The Church seeks to make itself, or every moment and in every occupation of the members. Father Hecker, with excellent humor, says that it is slander to say that his Church does not allow liberty. Undoubtedly it does allow liberty—within the Church. It allows the liberty that sheep have under the eye of the shepherd and his dog. It allows liberty just as the Propaganda allows freedom of the press—that is, the freedom of publishing whatever the Propaganda approves. And the Propaganda approves nothing that does not tend to the supreme control of the Romish Mother Church over the mind and conscience of mankind.

Of course such a church is hostile to free common schools in a country that rigorously separates church from state, and which in every way illustrates and stimulates intellectual and moral liberty. But it is untiring for its own purposes and never dismayed, and so we have the extraordinary spectacle of the government in Austria, lately the strong-hold of the Romish priesthood, which controlled the whole system of public education, taking the schools out of priestly control, and of a proposition in the Legislature of New York to support a vast number of schools absolutely controlled by the same priesthood. The Austrian Emperor releases the schools from the priests, a committee of the New York Legislature reports a bill to subject them to the priests. Do New Yorkers propose to submit?

This extraordinary bill is reported, we have been drawn by the priests, and was introduced in the Legislature by Mr. Tweed, a member of the Committee upon Charitable and Religious Societies. It provides that "Whenever there shall be or has been established and maintained in any city of this State, any free school or schools in which not less than 500 children have been or are taught with substantial gratuitousness, it shall be the duty of such city, or of the town of which such city is a part, or of which such city is a whole or a part, to make provisions from year to year for the expenses of such school or schools."

With the passage of such a bill the priesthood would instantly issue peremptory orders to take no child of the Roman Catholic persuasion under any circumstances, be sent to the common schools, but should be forced to attend the priests' schools. Every other sect in the State might do the same, and the contest that would follow could very easily end in the abolition of the whole school system.

It is one of the most subtle and deadly blows ever aimed at the independence of the child and state in this country. Mr. Palmer, the chairman of the Committee, who was absent when the bill was reported favorably, dissented from the report. Mr. Folger objected to its being considered in another committee, and the other Republican members, true to the fundamental party principle of civil and religious liberty, resolved unanimously to oppose the bill. The subject is of the most vital importance. But the danger will be averted by the now threatened predominance of the Republican party. The proposition is a Democratic measure, and should the Democratic party gain the control of the Legislature it would become a law.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

There are complaints among our leading jobbing houses of inactivity, which many suppose comes from a want of confidence on the part of country buyers, and a sense of weakness is thus contributed somewhat inconsistent with the actual situation. The large houses of the South have finished making their early purchases, and entered at large upon the work of distribution, with a firmer hope than usual of earning larger profits and making more certain collections than for several years. The longest time which credit gives to the jobbers by the most conservative houses is ninety days, 3 per cent. off, with the privilege of 5 off at thirty days, 6 off ten days. A few, however, have sold at four months, in consequence of the admonition which is contained in a refusal by the purchaser to avail of the 12 per cent. per annum which might be gained by prompt payment. Although it is a confession of weakness, which strong and sagacious merchants never make, to neglect an early payment when 12 per cent. can be gained, and consequently an imprudence to sell to such customers, the trade will always be affected with both purchasers and sellers on account of credit longer than the safest houses allow. It is an imprudence on both sides even in cases in which there is an honest intention to meet the obligation, as lengthened credits involve higher prices, and it is exceedingly difficult to foretell the changes of the money market under the peculiar circumstances which exist. Gold was rendered tight during the week ending the 27th by the sudden withdrawal from the Bank of New York by a leading bank of a million of specie, which was immediately followed by tightness also in currency.

It is not at all probable that Congress will authorize contraction at this session, and consequently the quantity of money will remain fixed, and prices so far as they are affected by that fact first, but not exclusively, nevertheless exposed to a partial shock in financial affairs from other causes. We say partial, because one of a general character is wholly improbable as long as the debt pyramid for medium remains undiminished. The difficulty to which the country is exposed and which must sooner or later come with considerable force, will be due to our excess of imports over exports, now easily explained by owing to the large sale of our bonds in Europe, and to the more fatal facility with which we borrow upon them in this country than in Europe. Foreign capital, payable on loans at sixty days and constantly renewed. Their renewal will take place until such capital is wanted abroad, but although there are indications of an increase in the rate of interest in London, due to the excess of English imports in December, 1868, to the amount of £6,000,000 over those of December, 1867, and to £12,000,000 over those of November, 1868, the circumstances do not yet exist which call for the displacement of these temporary loans by the withdrawal of funds from this country.

The slow recovery of English activity in trade is, therefore, favorable to present financial ease in this country, and to the aggravation of the severity of the shock which those must feel ultimately who now suspend their prosperity upon credits which must in time be withdrawn. When this withdrawal will take place can not be known, as it may come from some scare easily imparted as well as from the necessity which a renewal of active trade abroad will occasion. All who wish to be sure will not only take care how they embark in new adventures, but will make themselves snug in their financial condition.

The reason why our market is not supplied with Western and Northern merchants is easily explained. The interior is covered with snow to such an unusual extent as to have blocked up the travel on railroads. The storm on Tuesday, March 23, gave in New Hampshire fourteen inches of snow on many tracks, in addition to what was piled breast-high from previous storms on each side of the tracks. Ice still impedes navigation on the Lakes and in Northern canals, and no indications are deemed conclusive that the spring will be late. This, together with the system of credits, keeps at home those who find that the face of nature is not suggestive of summer stocks. Merchants from the central portion of the Union are, however, at hand. Others give their orders in writing, on a system of living from hand to mouth.

The circumstances favorable to considerable activity during a more lengthened season than usual are that raw cotton manifests a full price, giving a large reward to Southern industry for last year's crop, larger indeed than the price of the manufactures from it justifies either there or in Manchester. The planting interest enjoys this advantage, and must be consumers to a corresponding extent. The price of cotton, for middling, was, say, Upland Florida, 28; Mobile, 29; New Orleans, 29¼; Texas, 29¼. The price of cotton goods is adjusted at a lower basis by our cotton, presumably as unsteady in the trade which must be corrected by a fall in cotton or an advance in cloths. But, in any event likely to occur, our Southern staple must be paid for abroad at rates which will continue to impart strength to the Southern country. Cotton goods were marked down from 4 to 4½ cents per yard on the 27th March, a concession due to the condition of the market. It would appear that their manufacture exceeds their consumption.

So far as concerns our Northern crops the situation is but little changed. Mr. H. KAINS JACKSON is again out in the London Times, assuring the English public that as to wheat we may rely "on plenty and cheapness." His estimates are based on the returns made to the Mark Lane Express, in which only thirteen show crops of wheat under an average, and only two hundred returns. The producers of the Boston Daily Advertiser, writing from London on the 10th March, say:

> "The Government find it impossible to secure complete statistics of agricultural crops and live-stock in England, the owners and occupiers of which refuse to give the information required. The duty of collecting these statistics is harassing to the officers, and exposes them to much insult. The British farmer always under the impression that he shall lose something by letting the world know what he is about with his land."

As these returns are voluntarily made on the request of the Board of Trade, it is probable that those retained are withheld because they could not be used to advance the powerful interest which the late drought occasioned. Every interest in England was affected by the dry season, and in no district are any admissions made which give a view of its extent. On the contrary, the press has been uniform in attempts to lower the price of grain, as it has resulted in unusual quantities from foreign people. Even English farmers assisted in this policy, as they had produced only a six months' supply, and are themselves purchasers of all descriptions of food.

Mr. JACKSON attributes the "checkmate" to enterprise to the corn trade very much to "a winter that in its mildness and the extent of its January and February supplies has disarranged the most moderate calculations."

All this can fairly be claimed for the unusually mild January and February is that animals have had superior means for feeding, making to that extent imported supplies unnecessary. But feeding in the winter must subject the pastures, which are to be mowed in July, to nearly a corresponding loss. The system now is in a spring conforming to the mildness of the winter, and an earlier facility than usual for obtaining all that remains of supplies of grain in the northern markets of Europe now shut down on May. But the fewer arrivals of grain lately, as compared with 1867, begin to create anxiety, and prices have somewhat stiffened for No. 2 American red wheat, which is what they chiefly import from this country.

Our views as to the true policy of our farmers remain unchanged. English dealers in grain are carefully watching events which they aim to profit by breaking down our markets for grain till they shall find results—a policy which will be made secure if our productions are pressed to the sea-board. Inconvenience is suffered here from inadequate payments by Western merchants. So far as sales are necessary to meet obligations on the part of the farming interest to them, they should be made; but immediate slaughter in price can be avoided only by holding on to what grain may not be required to meet their accruing debts.

HANNAH TYLER'S LETTER.

We have no other knowledge of HANNAH TYLER than a letter from the Treasury Department which she has recently published. If the statements of the letter are not true, it is one of the cruelest letters that could be written, and should cause her ignominious dismissal. If they are true, there should be a very searching reform in the management of the clerical work in the Treasury Department, and a very sincere vote of thanks to HANNAH TYLER from all honest people.

She says in substance that very many of the women employed in the Department—of course before Mr. BOUTWELL came in—are ignorant, idle, and dissolute. She complains that "leaving the paramours and mistresses of members of Co-egress forced upon us;" and she calls upon Mr. BOUTWELL to put a stop to such and "impotent women." She states that the Departments are "filled with females—crowded, I may say"—who are utterly worthless, but of whom the Secretary can say nil himself because of "influence." She says that Postmaster-General RANDALL, during the last two weeks of his term of office, appointed thirty female clerks; "and for what reason Heaven only knows, since nearly one-fifth of those already employed have been turned away, and even a tax in the office." There were desks for fifty female clerks—the law provides for that number—but Mr. RANDALL was not content with that, but ran the number up to sixty.

HANNAH TYLER'S letter, if it tells the truth, is one of the most forcible practical arguments for a proper system of civil service. No office in the Departments might be defended against the presence of clerks who "have scarcely education enough to tell the day of the week by a counting-house calendar," and who "know-nay, care even not in the office." There were desks for fifty female clerks—the law provides for that number—but Mr. RANDALL was not content with that one hundred and sixty-one

FIRST ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE NEW YORK STATE POULTRY SOCIETY AT THE EMPIRE CITY SKATING RINK, NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 231.]

A BOY'S LOVE.

I.

"WHO IS THAT MAN?" ASKED HARLEY, ABRUPTLY.

"AND so you like West Point?"

"Oh, so much—it is lovely!" and Miss Levering clasped her pretty little diamond-covered hands with an affectation of rapture. "And I like the—what do you call them—dear me, how odd I can not remember! the—the—"

"The parade," suggested Harley Goddard, whose thoughts were generally centred on military matters.

"The parade, of course," she replied, "but I mean the—the—cadets."

"Oh!"

And Harley felt conscious that he had taken the compliment to himself, and was coloring in a very boyish way.

"Yes," continued Miss Levering, "they are splendid; they are so lovely in their uniform, and have such a firm, independent look—"

"Louise, my dear," said her mother, "what are you raving about?"

"Nothing, mamma," replied her daughter, paying no further attention. "Oh, Mr. Harley—I beg pardon—I mean Mr. Harley Goddard"—and she became delightfully confused—"is not the view of the river charming from here?"

They were on the piazza of Rowe's Hotel. It was afternoon, the place was crowded with promenaders, the air was balmy, and the sun was going down behind the hills, leaving the sky radiant with golden light.

Harley made some boyish reply, and the flirtation continued.

"Who is that girl?" asked a lady of a gentleman as they passed the handsome cadet and his companion.

"She is the wealthy Miss Levering, of New York, the protégé of Colonel Houghton, who, on dying, left her a fortune. "She is considered beautiful, but there is something about her I can not admire. Besides—"

The conversation became more confidential.

"Come," said Harley, "will you walk over to the library building? I want to show you the pictures—"

He was in earnest, but Miss Levering thought it was an excuse for a continuation of the flirtation, which, inasmuch as she had only known him three or four days, was advancing in a wild and wonderful manner; so she said, "Yes," and went off without noticing her mother's warning:

"Louise, you had better take your shawl. The evening dew will soon fall."

"Mamma is so stupid," she said, as they descended the steps together and crossed the green sward.

Harley looked surprised, but said nothing, and she rattled on.

"Is not the sunset sublime? Oh, I could gaze at it forever!"

"I think it would hardly consent to that neat arrangement," replied Harley, practically.

She tapped him on the arm with her fan.

"Monster!" she said, giving him a look out of the corners of her eyes, which was intended to mean, "Oh, you dear, delightful fellow!" and which made Harley's heart palpitate strangely.

"Here we are," he said, as they reached the picturesque library building. "Come in; it is not too late to see the pictures." She looked a little surprised at his persisting in what she considered a mere ruse to get her away from under her mother's eyes, but entered.

"I know you will like these grand full-length portraits of Monroe and Jefferson," he continued; "they are by Sully, one of the greatest painters our country has ever produced. He used to come here every summer until lately, but now remains at his home in Philadelphia. Are they not superb specimens of color?"

She murmured "Yes," evidently not understanding or taking interest in the subject.

"These kit-cats are by Sully also," he continued; "this full-length is by Weir—"

"Very nice," she said, "but I like colored photographs better."

Harley was somewhat shocked at her want of taste, and they turned away without any further inspection of the library, and went down the path, past the chapel. Twilight was approaching, and already the full moon made luminous the shady walk.

"Do you know," said Miss Levering, suddenly, "I like you?"

"Do you?" replied Harley, his breath almost taken away.

"Yes—you are not angry, are you?"

"Angry?" he stammered.

"Please don't be angry with me," she pr ad ed, in her childlike way; "I do, say you will?"

"If you will permit?"

"If I will permit? Why, of course I will! And now I want you to do me a fa r."

"Any thing you desire, I—"

"Any thing I desire! Oh, I w splendid! How kind—how good you are! Well—give me one of your military buttons for my clothesbrier."

Out came Harley's knife, and he recklessly chopped a button off and presented it to her.

"Is one enough?" he asked, preparing to sacrifice another.

"Yes, thank you, plenty," she answered, "How pretty it is! It will look well on my

"I want you to be my friend; will you? Oh, say you will?"

"If you will permit?

"If I will permit? Why, of course I will! And now I want you to do me a fa r."

"Any thing you desire, I—"

"Any thing I desire! Oh, I w splendid! How kind—how good you are! Well—give me one of your military buttons for my clothesbrier."

Out came Harley's knife, and he recklessly chopped a button off and presented it to her.

"Is one enough?" he asked, preparing to sacrifice another.

"Yes, thank you, plenty," she answered, "How pretty it is! It will look well on my chêtelaine, I think—don't you? Please tell me frankly; do you think it will look well?"

DOGS AT THE POULTRY EXHIBITION, NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 231.]

She regarded him in an appealing manner, and Harley told her that he thought it would look very well.

"You say that because you know it will please me," she said, plaintively.

He assured her he did not. Whereupon she laughed gayly, and called him a wretch.

"Now," she said, confidentially, "I want you to give me a piece of advice. Will you?"

"With pleasure."

"Really?"

Harley smiled.

"Yes."

"Then—then—don't laugh—please don't laugh at me." This was said with great earnestness.

"I am not laughing," replied Harley, sober as a judge.

"Oh, yes you are," she persisted; "I see it in your eyes—there—there."

And she made a little moue at him, which caused him to burst into a laugh, in which she joined, and it was at least a moment before they could stop.

"You fiend in human form," Miss Levering finally managed to say, "listen. Tell me what color ribbon I shall wear to-morrow night at the hop at Cozzens's."

Harley said, without hesitation, "Pink; you were in the other day, and you looked—"

He paused, he had not the courage to pay her the desired compliment, but she helped him on.

"Did I look well?"

Harley drew a long breath.

"Perfectly well," he exclaimed, with the strongest emphasis.

Miss Levering uttered an hysterical little cry.

"Oh, you naughty creature!" she said; "and do you really like me?"

She took his arm and looked up into his face with a glance that sent the blood dancing through his veins. The sky had deepened into the tender blue of evening, the moon illuminated the pathway with mysterious effulgence, and in the bright light his eyes met hers and remained fixed upon her with fascination.

"Do I like you?" he repeated, with boyish impetuosity. "Yes—I do!"

"Be my friend," she said, her voice trembling while her hand pressed his arm. "I am so lonely, so sad sometimes. No one cares for me—they smile upon me, and then go away and forget me. You will not do that, will you, Harley—I mean Mr. Goddard—you will not do that?"

"No," he replied, unconsciously pressing her hand. "I will be your friend always—for ever!"

"How good you are" she whispered.

He felt that a strong and good hand, he was murmured, "and I—"

"Louise!" said a calm voice.

Mrs. Levering on the arm of a gentleman barred their pathway.

"Mamma!" cried Louise.

"And some one else," said the gentleman.

"Louise—"

"Oh!" exclaimed Miss Levering, "when did you arrive? What a surprise! You wrote you would not be here."

"But I am, you see," said the gentleman, with an air that a lover might glance at Harley. Miss Levering nervously introduced him. They shook hands coldly.

"I suppose you now, Mr. Goddard," said Louise. "Good-night, and many thanks for your kindness."

She extended her hand warmly, took the gentleman's arm, and the party turned toward Hotel, leaving Harley alone in the moonlight filled with conflicting emotions.

II.

HARLEY did not sleep that night. He tossed restlessly hour after hour, thinking over his interview with Miss Levering. "She must like me," he argued—"I am sure she does; while I—I love her!" And the poor boy did not exaggerate. He was fascinated—captivated him. "How beautiful she is!" thought the cadet, "and what a sweet voice!" Then he passed while a third thought him. "She is very wealthy, and I—well, I am not poor—my father is prosperous and—I could support a—a wife!" And Harley, thinking of marriage, was ready—before you have graduated! How fast boys rush on—American boys especially! How bright the future seems to youthful eyes! A storm may come—but at the first glimpse of sunshine the gloomy past is forgotten and Hope smiles once more. Harley felt sure Miss Levering liked him very much—for had she not asked him to be her friend—and had he not accepted the trust—and would he not fulfill it nobly?

He fell asleep at last and dreamed of her—dreamed that she called him "Dear Harley," and told him that she loved him, and awoke with a start just as the reveille sounded.

He thought of nothing but Miss Levering all day, and when on parade she waved her handkerchief to him and smiled, he felt that every one was looking at him and envying him, and that he was the happiest fellow in the world.

As soon as his duties permitted, flushed and impatient, he hurried over to Rowe's. Miss Levering and the gentleman she had the evening before introduced as Mr. Wilton were lounging and talking on the piazza. Harley was somewhat taken aback, but his angel held out her hand graciously, and said, "How well you looked on parade, Mr. Goddard!" To which Mr. Wilton, who had nodded to Harley in a condescending manner not very agreeable to him, added, "Yes, the cadets drill well, and are a fine set of boys."

The sneer was so evident that Harley smiled, and Miss Levering, tapping Mr. Wilton on the arm, called him a monster, and asked him to get her a glass of water. He arose lazily, and departed to obey.

"Who is that man?" asked Harley, abruptly. Miss Levering laughed.

"That man, as you are pleased to call him, is my affianced husband."

Harley drew back slowly, his hands fall to his side, and for a moment he did not move. Miss Levering, in order to give him time to recover, gazed thoughtfully at the river, until at last Harley spoke.

"You are to marry him?" he whispered, in a choked voice.

"Yes."

"Do you love him?"

"Hush! He is here."

She took the glass of water from Mr. Wilton and sipped it leisurely. Harley regarded her stupefied. Every thing seemed in a whirl before him. He rose mechanically.

"Are you going?" asked Miss Levering, lightly.

"Yes," he answered, and with a slight bow turned away and hurried to the barracks. He threw himself on his bed, and lay there for an hour without moving. She was to marry another! No, no, it could not be—it should not be. He would prevent it. He must see her, and have an explanation. When? Now! Already he had left—perhaps she would be there. He would go also.

Night came, clear and beautiful. As Harley entered the ball-room the first object his eyes rested upon was Miss Levering, with pink ribbons in her hair, waltzing with Harley the most beautiful girl in the world, though other people were naughty enough to say she used the slightest possible touch of rouge, and pencilled her eyebrows; but the world will talk. Miss Levering motioned him to come over. She knew she had not been neglected, her vanity was gratified, and she felt magnanimous. Besides, cadets are always in demand among the young ladies at West Point, and Harley was one of the handsomest. Miss Levering liked to be seen dancing with him because it attracted attention, and made the other girls envious. Besides, he was of more than ordinary warmth:

"Mr. Goddard, I haven't forgotten my promise to dance with you, so you may put your name down for the fourth."

Harley took the book. Mr. Wilton was down for the fifth quadrille. With a bitter smile he added his name for the fourth, and sauntered off. He lounged about the room, and then stopped under the awning, watching Miss Levering dancing.

"Why don't you dance, Harley?" asked one of his companions, "there are lots of pretty girls anxious to know you."

"Shall I dance and flirt with some one else and set the others jealous?" he thought. But Harley's nature was too honest to attempt such a thing; so he said, "No, thank you; I have a partner for the fourth dance."

And he waited patiently until the fourth arrived. It proved to be a gallop.

"I thought you danced" said Miss Levering, leaning on his shoulder affectionately as he pioneered her through the whirling crowd.

He did not reply, but as they were near one of the windows, drew her out on the piazza.

"I want to talk with you," he said. "Let us take a short walk."

"We mustn't be gone long," he replied, "or mamma will make a dreadful row. And me my handkerchief to wrap around my neck."

He did so, and for a moment they walked silently along the esplanade.

"Louise!" he said at last.

"Well?"

She was not angry at the familiarity. She rather liked it. She knew that Harley loved her, and thought it would be good fun to keep up the flirtation.

"I love you!" he continued.

"Don't say that," she whispered, at the same time hoping he would go on.

"I must," he replied, firmly. "I can not live without you! Oh Louise, do not break my heart and destroy my peace of mind. Love me!"

"Oh, no, Harley," she murmured, "you are young; for you the world is bright and beautiful. You have had but one love, and though it is a pretty sentiment. "Remember I am always your friend—"

"Your friend!" he cried, fiercely. "I love you too well to see you the wife of another. I am not wealthy, but I have a fair income—do not refuse me! Louise, you shall not be—no! Why must you marry this man?"

"Because I have promised," she answered, hurriedly.

"Promised!" he echoed, bitterly.

"Yes," she said; "I can not go to retract."

They had reached a little summer-house, and she sank gracefully on a seat.

He took her hand and covered it with kisses.

"Must I lose you?" he groaned.

She regarded him with a kind of pity.

"Poor Harley!" she said, softly.

"If you knew how I loved you—!" he almost sobbed in his anguish. "Oh, Louise! Love me! Why did you lead me to suppose that you cared for me?"

She arose and pressed a kiss on his brow.

"Because—I love you," she whispered.

He clasped her passionately in his arms.

"You love me! you love me!" he repeated, delirously.

She let him kiss and embrace her for a moment, because she rather liked being kissed by a handsome young man, and then drew herself from his arms.

"I love you," she said—then came a long pause—"but I can never be your wife."

The words were theatrically delivered; but Miss Levering had practiced the sentence on several victims before, and knew how to produce an effect.

"Never be my wife?" Harley repeated.

She moved so that the moonlight could fall upon her face and make her look seraphic.

"No!" she answered. "No!"

"Why not?"

"Because you are unable to give me the position in the world I seek. Do not be angry, Harley. Let us be friends—warm friends always—but let us forget to-night."

He arose sternly.

"Let us return," was all he said.

She took his arm.

"Harley," she murmured.

"Well?"

"You forgive me?"

He did not answer.

She detached a bow of pink ribbon from her hair, and, it being true to the instincts of a coquette, offered it to him.

"Take this," she said, "and remember that, though I shall marry another, I shall never cease to love you."

It was wicked, heartless, to say this; but it was the truth for all that. In her light, selfish way she cared more for him at that moment than any man she knew.

Still Harley did not speak.

Miss Levering endeavored to weep, but paused, remembering that it would not do to re-enter the ball-room with red eyes.

"Harley," she said, "we must not part in anger."

"No," he exclaimed at last, his better feelings touching his heart; "not in anger, Louise I forgive you."

"Of course you do," she replied, with an effort to recover her gayety. "Now take me back to mamma, or I shall be dreadfully scolded."

She looked at him stealthily as they entered the ball-room. He was so handsome, so noble, that no pain touched her.

"How he loves me!" she thought, and she felt a little sorry for him: but this was by no means her first flirtation, and his anguish did not affect her deeply.

"You will not forget me?" she whispered, as he led her to where her mother was seated. "Think kindly of me, Harley."

She remained making the same speech to several men with whom she had trifled in a like manner,

"I will try," he said, and turned away.

She watched him leave the ball-room, and then with a little shrug of her shoulders turned to Mr. Wilton—he had been looking on with any thing but a pleased expression, and began talking gayly until she had pacified and amused him, and then let him put down his name for the next dance.

III.

THE week passed slowly enough for poor Harley. He bore up bravely like a true soldier, but he went near Miss Levering no more. She was present at parade for the fourth day, and cast on his eye and smile, but he looked resolutely away, with a choking sensation in his throat; and instead of longing to recall Rowe's with the other cadets, remained in the barracks. Poor fellow! He did his best to overcome his love for Louise, but it was useless—he had not too earnestly to recover in a day. His passion for the girl—his first love, honest and pure as that he bore his dead mother—was founded in force. Her image was constantly before him. The bow of pink ribbon she had given him—his handkerchief which she had worn around her neck—he still tortured him beyond measure.

"False-hearted creature!" he muttered, savagely: "she loves me, and yet she sacrifices all for position. Curse her!" Then, with a revulsion of feeling he added, "No—I can not hate her—I love her too deeply for that—too wildly." Poor Harley, poor noble-hearted boy!

A few days after he received a little note, which ran as follows:

"Have you forgotten me, Harley? Why will you not come to me? Have you ceased to care for me? Ah, the heart of man is so prone to transfer its affections easily—but the heart of Woman always remains faithful.

L."

This dramatic epistle had been concocted with the aid of another young lady whom Louise had accomplished had cut her out. "My dear," she had said, at the same time munching a bonbon, "if this don't bring him to my feet, he is—well, I won't say what."

Harley read and re-read this note, kissed it, and believed it yet-passed. "Is she acting heartlessly?" he thought, as he shook his head sadly. Yet love was too strong within him to resist the appeal. He must go to her," he said; and he went. Miss Levering was not in her usual place on the piazza, but as he was about to turn he overtook her heard laughing voices and his name mentioned.

"—hasn't come yet, my love," said a young lady's voice.

"No," replied another voice—that of Louise.

"He is a handsome fellow, but young—very young. I feel as though I could have been making love to me; he adores me. Watch him to-morrow, and see how he looks at me."

"Louise, Louise, should not trifle with the boy," said Mr. Wilton's languid voice.

"I trifle with him?" she echoed. "How absurd. I do not think I will bring me, but I certainly shall not allow him to confiscate any more of my pink ribbons. But then he is only a boy."

"You are able to make the boy, as you call him, very miserable," drawled Mr. Wilton.

Louise laughed.

"Nonsense," she replied; "besides, I adore him, you know."

"As much as you have adored a great many others," suggested Mr. Wilton, at which there was a general laugh.

Harley listened stupefied. His first impulse was to face Miss Levering, and denounce her. But second thoughts convinced him of the folly of such a proceeding, and he turned slowly, like one in a dream, and walked away, scarcely knowing whither. "My God!" he thought, "why do I love her?"

He looked up and found himself near the boundary line beyond which the cadets are not permitted to go, but having a permit in his pocket, he passed the sentry, and went out into the road. He walked on, hardly caring whether until he finally sank wearily on a rock. On one side of the road was a stony and precipitous descent leading down to the river, which glided rapidly along in the sunshine, murmuring against the sloping banks. On the other side of the road were the pleasant woods. Harley surveyed the scene apathetically.

"Would that I were dead!" he groaned. "Would that I were dead. I can not live without her. Oh, Louise—cruel—cruel!"

He buried his face in his hands.

The birds twittered in the trees, and darted through the gentle air. The river went murmuring along. It seemed to say to Harley, "Hush, hush, hush!" but he would not be comforted.

"She lied to me!" he muttered. "She does not love me! Heaven be merciful, or I shall go mad!"

He had not slept or eaten for several days, and was worked up to such a state of excitement that he scarcely knew what he was doing.

"If it had not been for the man she might have cared for me," he cried; "but now—now—she can never be mine—never—never!"

"Hush, hush, hush!" murmured the river—but he did not heed it. He was utterly wretched.

Suddenly he was aroused by the noise of a vehicle rapidly approaching. He looked up. A couple of horses attached to a light carriage were coming down the road, galloping madly. A lady and gentleman, overcome by the peril of their situation, clung to each other. Harley rose, regarded them, and then uttered a wild laugh. The occupants of the carriage were Louise Levering and Mr. Wilton. A horrible, revengeful expression passed over Harley's face. The carriage came nearer—nearer—nearer.

"Stop the horses, for God's sake," called Louise—"I—I—shall faint!"

Harley paused for an instant—the blood rushed to his face.

"I will save you, Louise!" he cried, in a voice of love and agony; "I will save you!"

And he sprang at the horses in a frantic endeavor to stop them. But the maddened animals shook him off and trampled him under foot, killing him instantly.

Louise uttered a shriek of horror. The horses shied and dashed down the rocky descent to the river—an instant after two bodies lay motionless beneath the trampling hoofs—Brown crushed and limp—the girl with her beautiful face dabbled in blood, while above on the road was stretched the poor boy who had loved her only too well.

And the river, sobbing against the mossy banks and over the smooth stones in the shallow places, murmured "Hush, hush, hush!"

THE USE OF A MAGIC-LANTERN

DR. GAYLEN was a widower, whereas Molly Bawn was seventeen; and Larry Darrow, Jun., too rich to care for any thing but the honor of "M. D.," should it ever come), was girlhood's ideal of manhood. He was the reverse of the Doctor. "He was tall; he was dark; he was haughty of mien, and handsome." The Doctor must have been short, florid, and genial. Playing the fiddle might have seemed inconsistent with Larry's haughty mien; but then Apollo could have played the fiddle (if he had had one), and Larry not only had one, but could play it much better than the Doctor. For Dr. Gaylen could only play tunes, while Larry could, upon those magic strings, speak, laugh, wail, sob; and came out wonderfully as ex., a mocking-bird, and a handsaw. The Doctor's bass was fine; but Larry's tenor was operatic. They were both visiting in the neighborhood of Bawn's Court, at the country seat of Morris Bawn, Esq., opposite the mills, in one of the finest suburban features of Philadelphia; but Larry Gaylen was not a Quaker family; whereas Larry was the guest of Bennett Gaddy, Esq., father of the Misses Gaddy, who were the dearest friends that Molly Bawn had in the world. Of an evening Larry Darrows would ride over to call upon Miss Bawn; and, of a morning, Miss Bawn would ride over to see the Misses Gaddy.

There was another guest at the Gaddy villa who was very attentive to Miss Bawn; but from him Larry Darrows derived no uneasiness, as he had been observed to attend to her brother eighteen years before. This gentleman's name was Slipkin. At the Fair Mr. Slipkin was eminently useful. At the very first day he became known among the ladies as "that dear Mr. Slipkin;" he was so obliging! Then he was a person of indefatigable resource; and at every thing in the way of an address insisted upon being made, he, Mr. Slipkin, was the man among men to make it.

On the second evening of the Fair they improvised a concert, the most delightful thing you can imagine! In the course of the entertainment Dr. Gaylen had the opportunity of assuring Miss Bawn, from the very depths of his chest, that "he'd offer her that hand of his, if he could love her less"—which was not likely; but he was much applauded at the close of his self-denying observations.

The little glow of satisfaction, however, which had been imparted to him by the hearty appreciation of his voice and approbation of his sentiments speedily cooled down when, in answer to a highly-pitched request from Larry Darrows for an interview, under more favorable circumstances than those afforded by an uncomfortably crowded concert-room, Miss Molly Bawn responded, unhesitatingly, "Yes, I'll meet thee by moonlight alone;" and the entire audience evinced complete satisfaction with the arrangement.

Hence the Doctor was very reluctant to give his promise to partake in another entertainment of the same nature, as announced by the Rev. Mr. Strode "Strode" (the eloquent rector of St. Faneras), for the ensuing evening; and was only brought to terms by a "Do!" from Miss Molly Bawn.

"But I warn you," said he, "that I shall ask a favor in return.

"Oh, I'll say thing you ask me to, Dr. Gaylen," answered the young lady, glancing at him over her shoulder as she took Larry Darrons's arm.

The Doctor did not feel complimented. That childlike confidence had rather the air of regarding him as a father.

"A lively girl, Sir," said Mr. Slipkin, offering Dr. Gaylen a cigar as they walked homeward together.

"Have you known her long?" asked the Doctor, accepting the donation, but half inclined to be jealous of Mr. Slipkin.

"Ever since she was a baby," replied that gentleman, "I call her almost my mother."

"Did you, indeed!" exclaimed the Doctor. "So did I."

"I admired her mother immensely," said Mr. Slipkin.

"So did I," repeated the Doctor.

"Yes; I don't object mentioning it to you, after all these years. At one time I was quite a beau of hers."

"So was I," said Dr. Gaylen, laughing.

"Well, upon my word!" cried Mr. Slipkin, joyously. "And did she never speak to you of me?"

"Never," answered the Doctor, emphatically.

"She was a great flame of mine, nevertheless. Why, Sir, I positively loved that girl."

"What a coincidence! My dear Sir; so did I."

"Ha, ha! Yes, Sir; I actually asked her to be my wife."

"So did I," the Doctor confessed.

"And she actually refused me."

"So she did me," said the Doctor.

"But she was a charming woman, nevertheless. Still—all's for the best, you know. I was four years her junior."

"All's for the best, no doubt," assented the Doctor. "I was much the same. I had rather a fancy for old girls in my extreme youth; but I've gotten bravely over it."

"So have I," said Mr. Slipkin. "This is Gaddy's gate. There they all are, on the porch. Quite a merry party. Fuyons nous labourier. Eh, Doctor? The girls don't care for old fellows like you and me."

Dr. Gaylen bade him good-night with some precipitation.

The second concert was even a greater success than the first. The Doctor was cheerful up to the very close of the evening, when his spirits evaporated on hearing Larry Darrons again inform Miss Bawn, as an incentive to punctuality, that he had distinctly promised to "share the night-flowers their Queen." As nothing, however, was further from Molly's thoughts than allowing herself to be exhibited in that capacity, the Doctor need not have fallen into such a brown study, nor have jumped out of it with such a burning when the Queen of the night-flowers touched his arm—so might she have touched her uncle's—and reminded him that she was in her debt.

"What was the favor, Dr. Gaylen?"

"I was only going to ask," the Doctor's voice trembled a little, perhaps from fatigue in singing, "whether I might drive over for you and bring you down to the Dissolving Views."

The Fair was to close next night with that exhibition.

The Queen hesitated a moment, and then said, "Certainly;" and then added, "Thank you."

"At seven?"

"Yes; at seven."

And she again took Larry Darrons's arm. For all that, the Doctor went home—avoiding Mr. Slipkin—very thoroughly happy, to dream of a fair landscape flushed with sunset, with a road in the fore-ground, along which a splendid bay was drawing a chaise and span new buggy. He was to drive Miss Bawn to the Dissolving Views. Blissfulness!

But he didn't. That office was performed by Larry Darrons.

It happened thus: Young Mr. Darrons, with whom—for the distance was not great—Miss Molly Bawn had usually preferred walking, went ever to give her the opportunity of declining that preference, and found her all ready and waiting in the parlor.

"Dressed!" he exclaimed.

"Yes," said she, faintly; for she had not told him of her covenant with the Doctor, and knew that there was gall with bitterness in store for him.

"Unusual promptitude! Would you mind explaining?

But explanations were spared to Molly by the entrance of an excited bandmaiden with a summons for the Doctor. The poor people of the neighborhood, among whom he had practiced a little, had conferred that title upon Larry.

"Who is it?"

"Sare, I'll bring him in till ye see him."

And, returning in a few moments, the green daughter of Erin ushered in a ragged, red-faced, panting, sobbing, little urchin, who announced that "the daddy was took very sudden like, an' broken leg."

"Took with a broken leg, is he?" repeated Larry, looking as though he himself were "took very bad" indeed with something that went rapidly against the grain. "Go for Dr. Burton."

"Dr. Burton's away to town."

"Dr. Worster, then."

"Dr. Worster says he's sick and can't come; and, besides, daddy didn't pay him last time; and he had to go somewhere else, and so—that's the reason."

"Well, I can't go," said Larry, looking at the heiress of Bawn's Mills.

"Please, Sir, he was to come right away. Daddy's been since noon, and we couldn't get no help."

"I tell you, my little man, that you must go for some one else. There's Dr. Ashton—he's always ready. Tell your 'daddy' that I had a prior engagement."

"I would go if I were you," said Molly, softly.

"Would you give your own little boy, that little boy has called mi his little companions around him, and has given one thing to one and another to another, and has made a bas for himself in one single, solitary PEACH!!"

Grand climax on the part of Mr. Slipkin, which brings down the house, Dr. Gaylen applauding with the loudest.

"I asked you, children," Mr. Slipkin continues, "to look very hard at that little boy. And why, children? why did I ask you to look very hard at that picture and at that little boy? Because that little boy and picture is a true picture, and that little boy was a real little boy."

Profound sensation.

"And now he's a real man!"

Increased sensation.

"And his name was—"

Breathless suspense.

"You all know him—

Feverish impatience.

"DR. GAYLEN!!"

Thunders of applause, during which the Doctor rushed wild from the building.

Mr. Slipkin, after the exhibition, being sent to look for him, finds him in the deepest shadow on the other side of the way.

"Gaylen!"

"Slipkin! Dear boy, how could you do that? I had forgotten all about it!"

"Never mind. You and I and Jack Stencil were at the 'Inderect Retreat' together; and you remembered it, and painted it. There's a young lady waiting for you—Miss Bawn."

"For me? Is Mr. Darrons"—

"I rather think it's all up there. And, look! She's up there at the window looking for you."

"I'll get my horse," says the Doctor.

The net profits from the Fair were $1000. Unfortunately, the Doctor's neck was the stuff for the steeple blow down; and it cost exactly that sum to put it up again.

Those cases of fracture are sometimes very tedious! Not steeples—but legs and arms. But it was "real good" of Dr. Gaylen—so the Misses Gaddy say—to call all the way from the village to see his poor patient; at first once a week; then, as he got better, twice; as he continued to improve, every other day; and, ultimately, every day.

At last the Doctor's patient is well enough to hobble to his cottage-door and bid the Doctor good-by. In the distance is the Rev. Mr. Strode Westcott, with a new fifty-dollar bill in his pocket, which he is about to put in his buggy. He is in a close carriage. He is not alone. A lady is with him; a very fair lady, who looks all the better for being there, and all the prettier for blushing.

As the carriage rolls down the hill this lady, looking into a little basket, says:

"There's just one peach left, Charley; will you have it?"

But the Doctor—there being nobody in that shady road to catch him doing it—kisses her cheek and does not earn much about peaches.

EXHIBITION OF THE NEW YORK POULTRY SOCIETY.

THE object of this Society is "the improvement and more thorough dissemination of the breeding of poultry and other small animals;" which is to be effected by the gathering of reliable and practical information and experience, and the holding of fairs, and the distribution of awards." The first annual exhibition of the Society began on the 22d and was continued until the 27th of March, at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, on Long Island, a distance between Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth streets, New York city. This building is admirably adapted for the purposes of such a fair, being 170 feet wide and 350 feet in length. It was filled on all sides, in the centre, and in the several commodious basement-rooms, and the air was resonant with the crowing of roosters, the cackling of hens, the quacking of ducks, and the barking and whining of dogs. The Rink appeared to have been suddenly transformed into a gigantic barn-yard. A correspondent of the New York Herald thus describes the scene:

Immediately on entering one perceived a circular array of coops containing numerous specimens of the different varieties of French chickens, all imported—the Houdan, the Crevecœur, the Mallein—all reported—the Houdan, the representatives of their species, of which a number were on exhibition, of a very large and some of which, at the Paris exhibition in 1867, with the Houdan, carried off the first prize—unwieldy. They are themselves an excellent table bird. And in this locality, especially, for all other species of nondescript fowl are but poor dishes for the table. Distributed throughout the hall are numerous other species. There are the silver-gray Dorkings; a trio of brown Leghorns, with immense combs, quite a curiosity even to look at; buff and dark Brahmas; Nankin bantams; Cochins of immense size, good layers and setters; the large Cochins; a trio of buff Cochins that took the premium at the late fair at Birmingham, England, only last fall; white Dorkings; black Java, an extremely good table and layer variety; Japanese frizzled chickens, making a very "outlandish" appearance with their wide-spread plumage, and said to be very good layers; gold and silver penciled Hamburgs. There are also fowls for ornament, such as peacocks and bean, completely white pea-fowls from England, gold and silver pheasants, and many other varieties. Of game fowls there is a very great number of various breeds exhibited, as the Duckwing game; the Earl Derby game bantams, from the Earl's own breeding yard; gold and Sebright game bantams. One set of these, all imported, is the smallest size, one to particular weighing under fifteen and a half ounces. Of ducks, geese, pigeons, even carrier pigeons, every variety can here be seen. Especially in the "duck line" there are some very fine imported birds, among them the Aylesbury, the Rouen, the white Muscovy and greater Muscovy duck, the common Pekin duck, the great Cayuga duck, the common duck, and the wild duck. Saturday from 1 o'clock, during which a band of well-trained musicians discourse, and another trio of Sultans, the immediate descendants of a pair presented by the Sultan of Turkey, to the Society, will be probably to be appreciated bird, to Queen Victoria, and probably to the Emperor Napoleon, from one of his castles, outside the Sultan's own poultry-yard. And then there are dogs and cats and big-and-little and a varied display of the animals of household use.

One of the most interesting features of the exhibition was the collection of dogs of various breeds, of which we give a representation on page 229.

LEGEND IN ALSACE.

KNOW'ST thou, Gretchen, how it happens
That the dear ones die?
God walks daily in His garden
While the sun shines high:
In that garden there are roses
Beautiful and bright,
And He gazes round delighted
With the lovely sight:
If He marks one gayly blooming,
Than the rest more fair,
He will pause and look upon it,
Full of tender care:
And the heavenly rose He gathers
In His bosom lies—
But on earth are tears and sorrow,
For a dear one dies!

RUMORS OF THE DAY.

MAJOR H——, State Agent of the ——— Insurance Company, visited Rockford for the purpose of apprehending a defaulter, and, being inquired of an old Irish friend, whose name of course was "Mac," as to the character and habits of the applicant. The reply was: "It is good, and I hope you will appoint him, for he is not only a worthy man himself, but he has three sisters, and every mother's son of them is an orphan."

LITTLE Johnny was being catechised by his brother, who asked him what he was made of. Johnny replied, "You, and me, and papa, are made of dust, and mamma and sister are made of mud, I s'pose."

An old miser, who was exceedingly parsimonious, being ill, was obliged reluctantly to consult a physician.

"What shall I do with my head?" asked the man. "I am so afraid it seems to see double."

The doctor wrote a prescription, and retired saying:

"When you see double you will find relief if you count your money."

HERE'S a little specimen of keen repartee which came off in a public school the other day:

YOUNG GENT. "I'm going to give the teacher a piece of my mind."

YOUNG LADY. "I wouldn't, if I were you; your mind he has got all the wants, and you haven't any to spare."

Young gent subsides into ordinary proportions.

A good old lady sat down in the store of a friend, one day, close to a large and very clear mirror which reflected her face. She saw herself in the looking-glass but thought it was somebody else, and in a few moments went to the mirror, lady cried and to her "Who is that old lady who was sitting alongside of me?"

An Englishman and his family were gazing into the window of a picture store. The following was overheard:

LITTLE GIRL. "Ma, mamma! is that a bear?"

MOTHER. "No, my child, that is a bowl."

FATHER. "No, my child, my daughter, that is neither a bear nor a bowl, but it is a beagle, the bewildern of this liberated country!"

NOTES ON ALASKA.

The annexation of Alaska to the United States will not probably increase the pole tax.

When the gold fever was over into a fur country he probably stopped in Alaska.

The Yankee has a new route for the return of spring. When the routes begin to run they say it's route matter.

The territory is well designated variety. There is a winter-de-frozze all around it.

Alaska is a place for orators. Even the whales spout.

Education is very general. The whales go in schools.

The hunters do not always stop to read their letters when they find a whale mail.

The north pole has never been seen; it is not certainly known that it exists.

Those who go there are protected from the cold, although they go in a fur skins.

A lady dressed in the latest style was recently observed in our streets endeavoring to walk perfectly upright. She succeeded in a good deal, we suppose.

CUT YOUR COAT ACCORDING TO THE CLOTH

Goodness knows! I'm very willing
To regard this caution—well!
Vain 'tis this to be instilling
When I've got no cloth to cut!

Some are lucky: birth provides them
With their coats already made:
Such their tailors' bills are paid.

Others, true, have cloth to cut;
Of the making of their coats;
But they get the cloth from mother—
No harm ere their lot denotes.

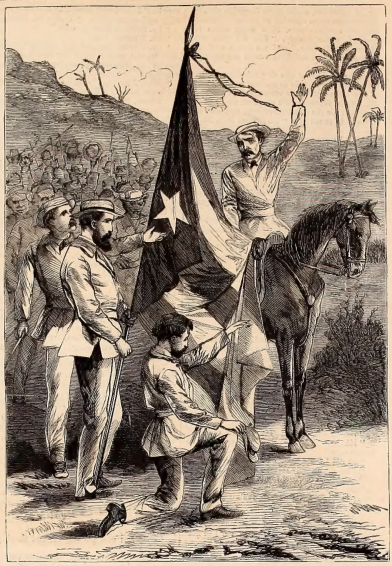
Others have much toil and racket,
For both cloth and making buy;
Scarce enough for e'en a jacket—
Yet that serves them in no way.

But, alas, for me, though clever
In the "cutter's" complex art,
For myself I labor never—
Is it strange I've lost all heart?

In a strange these words impel me
To give way to bitter wrath!
How to cut my coat pray tell me—
But when I have got the cloth!

At a recent lecture Professor X. stated that Saturn had a ring six thousand miles broad. "Why," said Hans Zimmerman overheard to exclaim, "what for a dinger he must have!"

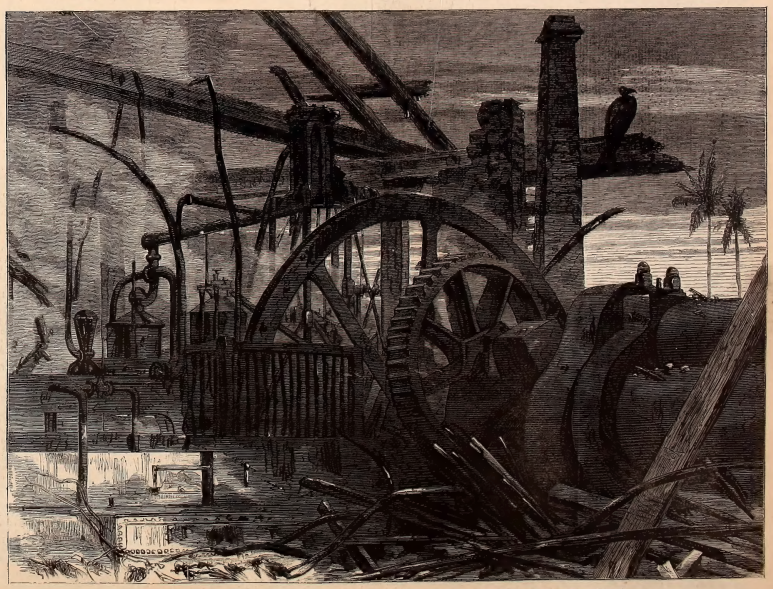
SEÑOR AGUILERA, CIVIL LEADER OF THE CUBAN REVOLUTIONISTS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]



CUBAN PATRIOTS RALLYING ROUND THEIR FLAG

SCENE ON THE HOUSE-TOPS OF HAVANA DURING THE EMBARKATION OF THE EXILES.—SKETCHED BY OUR CUBAN ARTIST.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION—BATTLE IN THE DEFILE OF THE PARDONES.—SKETCHED BY A CUBAN STAFF-OFFICER.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]



CUBAN REVOLUTION—RUINS OF A SUGAR-MILL.—SKETCHED BY A STAFF-OFFICER.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER XIV.

HARTOP.

MAD, the little dog, used to bark furiously at strangers in general, and regarded both Carry and Mr. Turner in that light. So, when, two days after the last conversation, Rebecca was told that there was a gentleman to see her, Mab barked all the way down stairs, but on getting to the sitting-room door began to whine and scratch joyously, so that Rebecca thought it was Mr. Morley.

But it was not, it was only the magnificent young sailor, Hartop. She was sorry that he had come; and, without perceiving her cold reserved air, he came frankly and joyously up to her, and took her hand.

"I could not get to you a moment before; I have been unloading all the day long, ever since we were in port till to-day. My uncle, Mr. Hagbut, suggested to me that it would be only kind if I were to come and tell you about those two."

Her father's words came on her with a shock. This, then, was the man selected by Mr. Hagbut as the one most likely to make mischief between her and her father. The man of all others the most dangerous.

"Yet how could he have known that?" It was indeed a puzzle, if it were not an accident. All this went through her mind so quickly that she did not keep him waiting for his answer. She said, promptly, "What two?"

"Why Mr. Morley and Hetty, to be sure," he replied, wondering.

"Then there is a Hetty?" said Rebecca, with animation.

"There was three days ago," he said, laughing; "and I think you will find a young person of her appearance, and claiming her name, walking modestly with her father in the Bootjes of Rotterdam this afternoon."

"She is a good sailor, I dare say," said Rebecca.

"It would be a queer thing for her if she wasn't," said Hartop, with another look of wonder. "But I didn't come here to talk about her; I should talk all the afternoon if I begun about her. Do allow me to assure you that of all the young gentlemen, little birds that sing in the tropic sea, she is the prettiest and most innocent: and of all the brave hearts which beat truest and most steady in the worst gale that ever blew, hers is the truest and steadiest. They will set you laughing now, but don't believe them."

"Why should they set me against her?" asked Rebecca.

"She broke through rules, you know," said he, seriously. "If she and I had been what we are now, I should most likely have been against it. But that is afterward. We won't talk of her; you shall judge her for yourself. Now I want to ask you to walk with me. Do come. It is the only time I can show you."

"I will go and ask my father," she said, and so left him.

Mr. Turner was sitting alone in his bedroom, brooding in his chair, and hearing some one coming, caught up his Bible and bent his head over it: it was made potent to Rebecca by seeing that he held it upside down.

"Father," she said, quietly, as soon as she had shut the door, "the young man you warned me of has come from Mr. Hagbut; and I have come to ask your leave to go out to walk with him for an hour or two."

"No" cried Mr. Turner, shutting up his Bible. "Why, this is as good as a play. Tell me all about it. Who is he?"

"He is young Hartop, a sailor; Mr. Hagbut's nephew."

"Hagbut knows something against him, then, or—nay, let us condemn no man—he has calculated on us by sending a nephew to your room carrying a sailor; that is it. Now, my girl, let us have it all out: there is more to come. I have not watched you for nothing all my life."

"You remember that Mr. Hagbut denied that Mr. Morley had a daughter."

"Certainly."

"Well, he has such a daughter, and her name is Hetty; and this young man is engaged to be married to her. And he describes her as the most perfect being ever seen. I don't know how I know it, but I do know this—if any thing were to come between this splendid Hetty and himself he would be a lost man."

"Then you have a theory of her being disreputable, and of Hagbut's keeping her in the background to make a quarrel on the score of want of confidence between him and Morley fall to the ground. I was under the impression that if there were such a girl, Hagbut would advise Morley to keep her in the back-ground until you were well committed to him, and then reveal her disreputable existence by means of one of those savory old-world letters—vessels, I mean. But this theory falls to the ground now, if she is what the young man says she is. She can not have done any thing."

"She has done something, though, and something rather strong. Her own father hinted it to me, and he ever denied lover-conferring. I don't want to know what it is, but the young man who is to marry her hoped just now that the good ladies, whom you so well describe as savory catamarans, would not prejudice me against her. He says she has broken through rules."

"I wish I could," said poor Mr. Turner; "but I am too old. Go on, Rebecca, we have had less than half at present. You have never got together evidence yet, my good girl, and so you can't tell by a witness's eyes whether the story is all told."

Rebecca laughed, and, for the first time in her life, sat down by her father's knee, and leaned her head against it.

"You are right," she went on. "Do you remember that you said—well, if there was any young man, with whom I was in danger, who was disagreeable to you, that Hagbut would bring him against me. He has done so."

"Is there danger with this young man, then? Where could you have seen him?"

"In my room. Here, here, in the presence of Mr. Morley. And there was danger about him. And I want to go out a-walking with him. And you are going to let me."

"Then there is no danger now?"

"Not a bit," said Rebecca. "He has blown all my fancies to the winds in ten minutes by his clear manly frankness, just as I created them in ten minutes for myself. No danger at all."

"That is well," said Mr. Turner, noticing that, now his hand was very near his daughter's beautiful hair, there was a strong pleasure in passing his hand through it. "But have you ever been indiscreet about this young man; to Carry, for instance?"

"I could not tell Carry what I had never confessed to myself," said Rebecca. "Yet it would seem as if the man had second-sight."

"Carry possibly gave him some hint."

"But she could not have done so, father. She never heard of him in her life."

"Then I will tell you what it is, my child. It is only a question of preserrarff, which is now called Jesuitism; as if a real Jesuit would have made such a risk. He sent him here on a chance of overcoming your prejudices himself possible to make the most likely hash of matters, and pick his own interest out—that is all, but he has done it. Have you any thing else, anything more than that."

"No," said Rebecca, "and, indeed, there was nothing more, for Hagbut was quite as much in the dark as I was."

"Well, he has failed, said Mr. Turner. "Where is the young man? Let us see him."

Rebecca, without another word, went and the young man had been waiting down stairs above half an hour; and they went to see him.

The young man, subdued by the gravity in hearty and stature, accustomed to bully all sailors and natives in every part of the globe, was terribly frightened at this "old Bailey" business. He and Jack Hord (of Wilmington, U. S., the New York merchant's family, lately enriched, call themselves Howard) had been, in fact, detected alone kept the boat free from the swarm of monkey-like Portuguese, nearly two hundred strong, gesticulating and shouting below, while the rest of their comrades were half-persuading, half-carrying the unwilling young man, Cornelius Kelly, back to the boat. Cornelius not being in the least drunk, but having been induced to go by being called a coward, to which he could only answer by howling, "Mono! Mono!" That had been a very dangerous disturbance, as dangerous a one as Rebecca had ever seen in these peaceful times. Also this young man had been in other rows of a different kind. His strong limbs and his commanding presence had brought him into trouble before now. While he was in the service of a small house, in a seven steamer of the West coast of South America, he, noticing the barometer and the weather generally, had given orders to get up steam and put to sea; which he managed to do, still on board, and his dreading a gale. There was no gale, only an earthquake, which he proved clearly that the ship would have been thrown on the beach if he had not given these orders; but the captain got him dismissed. Also this young man Hartop had been in all kinds of trouble at Rotterdam, and had never yet shown himself afraid of any one. When his carefulness and devotion he was as bold and as free before the court as any other man. His only old lawyer frightened him to death. For a guilty man is frightened of nothing, and a sailor hates and dreads one. I think a real sailor fears nothing but a lawyer. What must a guilty sailor feel?

And Hartop was a deeply guilty man. To the people he loved and trusted more than any in the world, as Mr. Morley and Mr. Hagbut had confided the fact that he was going to ask Rebecca to be his wife, if things looked in any way promising; and he had at first begun by telling them never to confide the fact to any human being. The poor girl must not be put in a false position again. A young girl's position, in all its loneliness and happiness, did not know how much her future father-in-law had said to Rebecca, and was tender of the poor young man's confidence and that old Turner was a Turk—with a large dose of vanity mixed with the distinction was committed—who knew nothing about the arrangement. And also this Turk was a lawyer, a creature worse than any Turk. So the young man, treading on molten iron, bowed down, terrified, before Mr. Turner.

Mr. Turner could not have known this, but he might have guessed it possible. He was happy, as far as he could be, but the chance of bullying a young sailor was too good to lose. He did not reassure that young man at all.

"How do you do, Sir?" My daughter informs me that you wish to take her out for a walk."

"If it met your views, Sir," said young Hartop.

"The question is, whether it meets my daughter's views?" said Mr. Turner grimly. "Our neighbors are censorious. But if she wants to go, she can."

"I do want to go, Pa," she said.

"Then get your bonnet on," he added, and followed her.

"Rebecca," he said to her, following her into her room, "there is no harm in that lad, my child. That lad is in love, and not with you."

"I know that," said Rebecca, cheerfully.

"Then look here," said her father; "don't cross-question him about this daughter of Morley's, this Hetty. It is not fair on him. If she has been a fool, he won't care much to tell you about it. Are you quite safe, old girl?"

"Quite safe, pa," said Rebecca. And somehow they kissed one another. And Rebecca said, "Pa, dear, why are we not always like this?"

And he said, "Let us try to be."

And so ended the incipient romance of the young sailor Hartop. At least as regards Rebecca.

CHAPTER XV.

REBECCA'S VOYAGE WITH HIM, AND WHAT THEY SAW, AND WHAT SHE SAW WHEN THEY CAME HOME.

THIS was the occasion of Rebecca's first voyage. And she took her voyage in the sole company of the young man whom she had considered to be dangerous to the peace of mind. And it is singular that he was not now—more than the brooding engendered by the house and by the rain were to make it—longer dangerous at all; but that she wanted to talk about Hetty, but did not do so because he did not; and that he did not talk about Hetty because he thought her a dangerous subject. For Hetty had broken rules. He talked about the sea, and about the wild free lands that lay on the Australian coast. He asked her if she were a good sailor, and she answered that she supposed she was no worse than another, and repeated her question. "Was Hetty a good sailor?" and he repeated his previous mysterious answer, "It would be a queer thing, surely if she were not."

The wind was free and fresh from the south, and the little steamer went fast and busy from wharf to wharf down the river. Under the bright sun, and the nimble pure air, and the changing of the scene, Rebecca grew happy, and showed her happiness by thoughtful silence.

"Are you comfortable, Miss Turner?" said Hartop.

"I am more than comfortable. I am perfectly happy. I can not tell why, but it is so. I was wondering what I owe to bring me here. I have never seen any thing like this before in my life. This is most wonderful and most beautiful."

"It is as good as carrying the northeast trade over the line to bear you up," said Hartop, "only more lively. Now, if you could go to some place where we could see which way the wind was going."

Then to Hartop carried her to the front of the little vessel, and set her there. And she said, "Would you be so good as not to talk to me. I am so happy that I want to think. Would you kindly smoke yours now, and let me sit in silence?"

Hartop sat on the deck at her feet to leeward and smoked. The little throbbing boat carried them both past the wharves and the city toward the sea; and the sun in a fashmere shawl threw a figure-head. From time to time she said to him, "Are you tired?" and he said, "No. We are very happy. Why should he be tired?"

"Because you are not talking to any body, so pray," said Hartop, "don't wish to talk; and I am afraid that I am bad company."

"You are very good and comfortable company," said Rebecca. "The worst mate of all is a sulky mate, and the best worst is a lively mate. I took you out for pleasure, not for jawing. Are you comfortable when you spoke?"

"I was at the island of St. Benedict, in the Atlantic. The island where all things go right for evermore," said Rebecca. "Where were you?"

"I don't know that island," said Hartop. "For my part I like the thing in a thing in a thing under Tenerife, and thinking how Hetty got on in that short-chopping North Sea. Break your sides, you know, and the fragment up in the window above the level of your eye, and you get Teneriffe. But for, you can't dream what Teneriffe is like. I was Pantan d'Anvers. And still less the approach to the Australian shore. No man knows what that is till he has seen it. Have you ever see the west front of Wells cathedral?"

"No," said she.

"Because it is like Madeira, on the Atlantic side," said Hartop. "But what can you know about islands? You have never seen any."

Rebecca had not.

"Islands are like cathedrals. Have you ever seen a cathedral?"

Only St. Paul's, it seemed, with a distant view of Westminster.

"Mr. Morley told us you had seen nothing," said this young man. "Now, islands and cathedrals are one and the same thing. They are the cathedrals of the great sea, and Almighty Almighty built them with his own kind hands. The cathedrals above were built by the saints; the cathedrals below were built by God Almighty's own hands. Think of that, Miss Rebecca. And what is the object of a cathedral? Peace. I have been with all creeds, and I should ask for peace, and I tell them all that after the long wandering sea you get peace on an island. I wish you could go to an island—as long together."

Rebecca was too far in dream-land to ask him what he meant by "us four." The river grew yet and yet more busy, and at last the tall masts in the pool came in sight, the nimble little steamer stopped, and Hartop aroused her by saying, "Will you go back now, or where will you go?"

"Take me on toward the sea, and let me be still," she said. And in a few minutes the dockfrons Hartop had her on board a boat bound for Gravesend, and she throbbed along on their strange voyage once more.

As the ships grew larger and larger her eyes seemed to expand. Hartop looked on her with that strange reverential superstition which the highest class of sailor has toward a beautiful woman. The old sailors' fancy is that a ship in full sail, a field of corn, and a beautiful woman are the three finest things in nature; and the reason they will give you for this is, that all of these three things shadow out the hope of increase. For my own part, I know many less beautiful representations; but that sense of it which relates to the beautiful woman was very much in bold Hartop's soul that day, as he sat looking stealthily at her, in the light of his future mother-in-law, thinking that she was really after all worthy of even Mr. Morley; and, moreover, turning over the wonderful fact that she had never seen Hetty in her life. She spoke at last.

"Are those the real ships that go down into the great deep sea?"

"Yes," he said, eagerly. "There they are. Miss Turner, ready for any thing, from Canaroons to Sydney. See that long-bodied, lowlying screw there. Very sister"—he succeeded in saying—"ship that Hetty was wrecked in two years ago."

"Has Hetty been shipwrecked, then?" said Rebecca.

Hartop looked at her wonderingly for an instant, but thought, "She knows nothing. It is for Hetty to tell her."

"Yes, she has been wrecked three times now. That last time was the time when the Queen wrote to her and sent her the Bible. I have often laughed when I told her that I would never sail in the same ship with her."

"Wrecked three times!" said Rebecca, half-awakened. "Was Mr. Morley ever wrecked with his daughter?"

"Not likely," said Hartop. "The Lord don't cast his best tools aside like that. It is easy enough, Miss Turner, for a game and plucky girl like Hetty to stand on a pitching and hurrying deck, with the crest sea hurling around her, in hope of the boat's keep a score of women from going quite mad, by singing of hymns to them, and by telling them of Christ who walked on the waters, as Hetty did; why, this is a thing any woman could do. You could do it if you gave your mind to it. Het did that, and Het is a brick. But she didn't do this. No, no, no man to do this. Mr. Morley went alone into the rowdiest drinking-house in the Nevada track in the old times of the gold-finding. Hetty's father had warned him that he was a dead man if he went, for to refuse drink in that house meant death. Mr. Morley went in. Taylor himself was then the grog-shop, was challenged to drink, and then cast the liquor on the ground, and before he could get at it the grog-shop had given them a piece of his mind. Taylor said that he would have done it. What do you think of that, for instance?"

"I am all abroad," said Rebecca. "It would seem that Hetty is brave, but that Mr. Morley is braver."

"There is no man alive like Mr. Morley," said Hartop, "I don't know what fear is."

"Let us talk about them, then," said Rebecca, "and leave Mr. Morley to take care of himself."

So he talked about them—about where they sailed to, how strangely they escaped and plunged in their agony at sea, for all they were so still and so peaceful now. This time had come from sliding on slowly and silently among towering steamers, the one beside her was fresh from the palmfringed jaws of the Pacific. So he sat in the gentle loyalty and talked to her, she speaking seldom, but sitting wrapped in herself: he never living of her father and sitting near her. Little did she dream of the tie which bound him so closely to her; little did she know what sacred and deeply-felt love being she was to him: how he and the two others had talked about her hour by hour: how deeply important she was to three men, and to whom she had never been seen, one whom she had seen but twice, and a third she had scarcely seen half a dozen times. These kind souls had been preparing a home for her in their hearts, and she knew not of it.

It was about how he left her, very late, they having come from Woolwich by railway, at her father's door, that she appreciated how utterly she had lost herself. "I fear he will scold me," she thought, "and our new-made confidence will suffer"; but the maid only heard that he was busy, and Mr. Morley locked up in his own room. Somehow the company of this most excellent and most admirable Carry did not seem in any way to suit her mood, and she left her to herself, gathering in the moon all day; she took off her hat, and catching up her little dog walked slowly along the road.

When she was nearly opposite her father's room-door she put down her little dog and took off her hat, fearing her hair had been in accident. Mab immediately began to run round and round, barking, after her tail.

The room-door suddenly aroused Mr. Turner, for coming out quickly and closing the door behind him, he found himself face to face, under the light in the passage, with a beautiful and noble-looking woman, draped nearly from head to foot in a Cashmere shawl, with part of her hair fallen down—a woman who looked very quiet, still, and calm, and whom he recognized, to his own astonishment, as his own daughter Rebecca.

He had never realized her before. He had never truly trusted her before. There was something now in the calm, strong, gentle face which made him see an ally, an ally worth all the world. Mr. Turner had been something else before he had been converted, it seemed; for the first real word of confidence he ever uttered to his daughter smelled very strongly of the evil odor of the Orient.

"Where the devil have you been all this time?"

"I have been down among the ships with Hetty's lover, Tom Hartop," she said. "I am very sorry, father; but I was so happy—"

"Hang Tom Hartop," said Mr. Turner, in a whisper. "Come in here, and hold your tongue. I want your help, child; take up your dog and nurse it—it will be an excuse for not talking."

"Hetty is brave, but Morley is braver," was what she thought. "Let me see what I can do." So she took up Mab, settled her and passed in, to find two men in her father's room, whom she had never seen before.

The first to be up rested on was a gallant-looking young gentleman, Lord Ducetoy. She had seen a specimen of his class before, had been with one all day, indeed; so her eyes turned to the other who was a man the like of which she had never seen before, and which, I hope, we shall never see again.

A noble-looking old gentleman. In his dress, his hands, in his complexion, there was Gentleman written in a very strong hand. Yet sunk in a heap on a chair, with limp limbs, bowed head, and an amazing, whipped-hound look in his handsome face. She had never seen such a fine gentleman before: and she had never seen such a hopeless look of humiliation pleading woe. Mr. Spicer she swept on Sunday, or Jim Akin the coster-monger, looked grander than he.

"My dear child," said Mr. Turner, as he brought in Rebecca. "Lord Ducetoy, Sir Gorhambury Townsend."

"You have brought in the young lady to put a stop to this conversation, I suppose?" said Sir Gorhambury.

"That is the case exactly," said Mr. Turner. But Lord Ducetoy and Sir Gorhambury, both heated, continued it.

"I never harmed you, Ducetoy. That protest from the bank only came from one of the morally directors. Why should you serve me this?"

"Because, uncle, as I have told you before, I do not choose to have my plate, jewels, and bonds should go in the bankruptcy."

"And as I have told you before, the mere deposits of family plate are unable as yet to stop through. If the chattels and papers so long left in our hands were now deposited again, it would give rise to a run upon others where we want confidence, and pull us through."

"Uncle, the utmost I will do will be to pay in £500, and not another penny piece more."

"I have never, I swear solemnly," said Sir Gorhambury, "done any thing to injure any human being. I worked hard at that bank, and we sold it for £200,000. Since then I have been living as a country squire. By my connection with it, I have retrieved deposits from Christian widows and orphans. It is not I only that am ruined, for my estates will not one half stand the claims that will be made against me alone—house myself (God knows, I wish I were alone with God in one now), but all those widows and orphans are to sink into poverty through their trust in me. I profess, and I ruin widows and orphans, all because your father refuses to put certain papers and jewels which would pull us through. And my poor son. Oh, my poor son! And so you will stand out against me, you might? The mere fact of your moving them to another banker's is ruin to us."

"I tell you, uncle, that I will not remove my account."

"Your account. Our only assets are your mortgages. Those papers you have moved them to another banker's. Where are they then?" said the old man, with his first flush of fire. Turner answered:

"Sir Gorhambury, the papers to which you allude are in a place which renders it unlikely that they will ever be used in a criminal court against any one. I am sorry to close the conversation in this way, but consider it closed."

Sir Gorhambury made no one word, but rose firmly and calmly, and walked toward the door. Lord Ducetoy said, "Good-night, uncle," but the old man went on unheeding. Mr. Turner was going to escort him to the door, when he suddenly found himself confronted by his daughter, with a candle in her hand, who boldly and firmly put her hand upon his chest and pushed him back. Saying, in a whisper,

"That is a broken man; he wants a woman with him." Turner bowed his head reverentially, and went with him. Lord Ducetoy went down stairs with Rebecca, holding the light.

"You have lost your money, Sir, have you not?" she said.

He answered, "Yes."

"A good many people who come here have lost their money," she said, bluntly. "I wish I had lost mine; all the trouble I ever had in my life has been through the money my father is going to leave me when he dies, which will be the bitterest day of my life. Keep up your spirits, and laugh about it."

"Yes, and laugh after seventy, Madam," said the poor man; yet she fancied that he walked out into the dim dark night more cheerfully for what she had said.

CHAPTER XVI.

A CONFIDENCE OF THREE.

When she came back Lord Ducetoy was walking up and down, and saying:

"It would have been perfectly monstrous for me to do what he proposed. I might have ruined myself, and gone to Canada again to help him; but to help an unlimited company?—no. You will continue your trust, for friendship's sake. Ah, here is my cousin. Cousin, if you were engaged to the finest girl in the whole world—who, I am happy to say, has not ten pounds—you would scarcely put a considerable part of your property into hands of a lunatic, my uncle."

"As I never was engaged to the finest girl in the world," said Rebecca; "and as I have no uncle, I can not answer the question, Lord Ducetoy. But it is tempus—time, and I am very hungry; for I have spent most of the day among the ships down the river, in company with a very handsome young sailor; a man I am getting more and more fond of every time I see him—a young man who will be fairly in a position to marry after his next voyage."

If Lord Ducetoy had lived only in England he might have mistaken her. But he had been in the Western World, and knew what pure and true gallantry may exist between man and woman, with the most entire freedom of innocent speech. Mr. Turner's brow grew dark when she said this. Lord Ducetoy laughed, and said, "Why you are bridemaid, then; and who is the bride?"

"Hetty Morley is the bride," said Rebecca, "and supper, with her eyes wide open; but what she is I leave you to conceive. I was done something extraordinary; has pulled down the plate of the Bridgewater Canal, or some such thing. But I want to speak about the old man whom I was out. Be tender with him, you two. I mean by Lord, and Lady Ducetoy."

"I believe me we will, Miss Turner," said Lord Ducetoy. "Believe me that we mean nothing else. He will never want for any thing he has been accustomed to till the day of his death. Tell my cousin that."

"Why don't you tell me cousin?" said Rebecca.

"Your mother was my first cousin," said he.

And soon after that she went away; but her father told her she was right. Lord Ducetoy said, when she had gone away,

"What a splendid creature! How have I escaped her!"

But mentioning your cousinship, my lord. In our case our family connection with yours has not been such as to make a girl understanding of it, or her instincts have to d her. And instead of hurking back to th traditions of your order, of which she has a supreme contempt, she has cast herself into utter Radicalism, which has given me great trouble in the Conservative section. The girl don't know a duchess from a dustman's wife.

"Well, I ge t the same way of thinking in the prairies, and the honest young fellow."

"Yes, there is no Radical like a young Whig," said Turner, with a smile.

"I shall got it all knocked out of me as I grow up, then," said Lord Ducetoy

"Darling!" he said Turner suddenly and keenly, some old gleam of Puritan democracy flashing out irrepressibly. "In your case the natural process will be very rapid. Every word you say is said with a view to excuse your order, to excuse its mere existence."

"We are in the way of attacking our property, you see," said the youth, "you democrats are always holding that over us; that is what makes Tory. It is odd that I, who have also been made so much money by the mere rising and sinking of our family property, should be a Radical. But I am a Radical in Canada, and land in the United States; and, if you don't know it, I will tell you that society in New England is much pleasanter than it was find in this cockneyfied England."

Mr. Turner opposed with arguments. This young lord was mad. At that time. He would not be considered quite so mad now. The idea of a man of high position and intelligence, craving for the rest and peace of pure democracy was horrifying to him. His religion was tolerably demonstrative certainly; but he had never reduced it to practice.

There was one thing he knew, however, and practiced too, which he had got from his religion —mercy.

Rebecca was waiting for him in his bedroom, and she began:

"What is the matter about that old gentleman?"

"I kept you up to tell you," he answered. "He and his brother sold their bank to a company, and retired on their property, leaving their accumulated profits in the bank as capital for the limited company; and his brother has died without any difficulty, and the old man has left his eldest son in the bank, and both brothers agree to keep things square, have forged names. They have forged papers to each other's names. They got the forged papers in the house, and they know it. And I want to spare the old one if I can; but the juncture one having died, the juncture here, and he has set men on—for burglary, no less. If those papers were to go out of my hands and get into the possession of the old man, those two men, father and son, would go to Portland. If I were to remove the jewelry to another banker's it would be known that a change was made, and the old man would be forbid to use the smash sooner. And so it is all here, and you know it. Thirty thousand pounds are under that bed. So keep your eye on that poor dog awake. Give me a kiss and go to bed now."

THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE sketches of the Mont Cenis Tunnel, given in a recent number of this journal, were intended to illustrate the great engineering triumph of the New Overland Route between England and India—the Italian line, which shortens the seavoyage to Bombay so greatly, compared with the Marseilles route, as to effect a valuable saving of time. We now present some illustrations of the Ship Canal across the Isthmus of Suez, from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, which bids fair to supersede the port of Alexandria for the Indian mail traffic, and to open a new way for the speediest direct navigation between Europe and all parts of Asia.

The Suez Canal project is not entirely a modern one. According to HERODOTUS, the Egyptian KING NECHO, about 650 B.C., built a canal from the Nile to Suez, 100 miles long, and wide enough for two galleys. When NAPOLEON was in Egypt, in 1798, he requested his chief civil engineer, M. LEPÈRE, to survey and report upon the practicability of a canal between the two seas. The only result of this was to give rise to a blunder which prevailed for a considerable time—the notion that there was a difference of 32½ feet between the level of the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. But in 1846–47 a tripartite international commission was set at work, studying the relative levels and tidal amplitudes of the two seas and the Nile. In this commission Mr. ROBERT STEPHENSON represented England, FRANCESCO NEGRELLI, Austria, and the CHEVALIER NEGRELLI acted for Austria. The result showed that the difference in the levels of the two seas was very trifling.

M. FERDINAND DE LESSEPS, son of the French Vice-Consul in the time of MOHAMMED ALI, was intimately acquainted with SAID PACHA, the late Viceroy of Egypt. M. DE LESSEPS is one of those men whose practical perception of the conditions of a great enterprise, with indomitable energy and perseverance to accomplish it, sooner or later conquer every obstacle. He suggested to SAID PACHA, in 1854, the scheme of the Maritime Canal from sea to sea. The Pacha (who had not then assumed the title of Viceroy) took it up with alacrity; M. LESSEPS came to Paris and London for the means. He formed a company, named the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Maritime de Suez, which was to undertake the works.

The canal, with its ports at each end, when finished, was to be the property of the company for ninety-nine years, after which it would belong to the Egyptian Government. Meantime that Government was to receive annually 15 per cent. of the traffic earnings. The tolls charged for passage were also to be equal for ships of all nations. The company was to take all the land wanted for the construction of the canal, and to have the power for building free of cost. These conditions of the original agreement are still in force: but some other conditions, relating to the supply of labor, to the forced service of 20,000 fellahs, or Egyptian peasants, ordinarily bound to the service of feudal tribute, on the Viceroy's estates, have since been altered; the company has also been deprived of the right of selling at a profit the lands ceded to it and the Fresh-Water Canal, from Suez to Ismailia, and thence to Zagazig, which runs parallel with the intended Maritime Canal for half its length, has been sold by the company to the Viceroy. The share capital of the company is eight millions sterling, divided into four millions sterling have been raised on debentures, and nearly four millions paid by the Viceroy as indemnity for the non-fulfillment of certain above-mentioned, and for the resumption of the lands and Fresh-Water Canal.

The Maritime Canal is to extend from the newly constructed artificial harbor of Port Said, on the Pelusian coast of the Mediterranean, to the port of Suez, at the head of the Red Sea. The length of the canal is not quite a hundred miles. Its depth throughout is to be 26 feet; its general width is to be 246 feet at the base and 328 feet at the top of the banks, except in some portions of the line where it has to be cut through high ground. Its width is here reduced to 190 feet at the upper part. There will be no locks on the canal, which is, in fact, to be able to steam through, or be towed through, from sea to sea in about sixteen hours. On leaving Port Said the canal enters Lake Menzaleh, through which the channel runs for twenty-nine miles. The waters of this lake are shallow, and the bottom is composed of mud. Leaving Lake Menzaleh at Kantara, a station on the desert route between Egypt and Syria, the course of the canal for a short distance through low sandhills. It then enters Lake Ballah, traverses it for a distance of eight miles, and then enters a deep cutting extending from El Ferdane to Lake Timsah. Near El Guir, four miles south of El Ferdane, the deepest cutting throughout the line had to be excavated to a depth of from 60 feet to 70 feet. The characteristics of the first half of the Maritime Canal are that about thirty-four miles of its course lie through lakes; the remainder through elevated plateaux. The second half of the channel, from Ismailia to the Red Sea, divides into two portions: in the first the canal skirts the eastern shore of Lake Timsah, and enters the country of Goshen and Serapeum; in the second it passes through the Bitter Lakes for twenty-four miles, goes through the last cutting at Chalouf, and enters the Red Sea a mile to the southeast of Suez.

On emerging from the Serapeum cutting the canal takes a northerly course through the Bitter Lakes. A large number of workmen are here employed; but when the water is admitted into these basins, the services of labor will be needed to carry the canal through these twenty-four miles. These lakes will eventually be filled mostly from the Mediterranean. A channel with temporary locks will be constructed through these lakes. The canal then, passing out of the southern extremity of the lesser Bitter Lake, enters the last cutting at Chalouf.

On October 15, 1866, about 92,938,606 cubic yards to be excavated and dredged, there remained 29,775,850 cubic yards to complete the undertaking. 30 powerful steam-engines of the dredging-machines insures the completion of the canal by the time promised—that is, by October 15, 1869. The largest labor is employed where the working level is above the reach of the dredges. The Lake Timsah is now transformed into a Mediterranean lake, nine miles in circumference. The water required to fill it was about 90,000,000 cubic yards. The Maritime Canal is actually said to be opened from Port Said to Ismailia. The Fresh-Water Canal is open from Ismailia to Suez. A small vessel can thus already pass from sea to sea.

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL ON A VELOCIPEDE.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON is in the daily habit of walking half an hour every morning in the reserved portion of the gardens attached to the palace of the Tuileries. He is usually attended by General FLEURY, his aid-de-camp. The PRINCE IMPERIAL, with one of his play-fellows, a son of Dr. CONNEAU, a boy rather older, is frequently permitted to accompany his father. These young gentlemen have lately found a new amusement in the use of the fashionable bicycle, or two-wheeled velocipede, which the Prince has already learned to manage with tolerable ease and precision. Our sketch on page 236 represents a scene which is commonly witnessed in the precincts of the imperial abode. The young prince takes the lead, of course, and delights his father with the display of his precocious skill. Dr. CONNEAU's son is rather behindhand in the favorite accomplishment of the hour, unless it be that he is more cautious than his elder pupil. The bicycle looks rather dangerous; but an attendant follows, who will catch either of the boys in case of a tumble.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

LAST week the city possessed some grand attractions—for ladies, the "Spring Opening," in which the fickle goddess Fashion displayed to eager eyes the novelties she has been able to devise for gentlemen (who of course never waste their thoughts on such frivolities), and for the rest of a cast of the bill, at the "Fowl Fair," or, more exactly, the first annual Fall Exhibition of the New York State Society. Which exhibition was the finest may be a matter of opinion; but that the latter was the more popular than they were in comparatively restricted quarters, the Empire Skating Rink having been fitted up for their accommodation—while the Academy crowded themselves along Broadway and many other streets as well.

In number and variety, however, the birds could by no means compete with the bonnets. These last things —the bonnets, not the birds, though plenty of birds were sacrificed to the bonnets—are, if possible, smaller than ever. Of course they must continue so while the present style of coiffure remains in vogue. Ladies wear their hair low, and we should have said—in such an expanded fashion that there is really no room on its head for any thing larger than a bit of ribbon or lace, or a few flowers. In fact some of the prettiest bonnets are composed wholly of buds and blossoms, those who cultivate flowers might have a fresh bonnet every day, if they choose—a tasteful bouquet placed over the head, and tied at the back with a bow of ribbon, fastened with a white rose or a bunch of moss is modest while it lasts, is a great deal prettier. The "Bird's-Nest" has had an entire bird's-nest in the crown, covered with a humming-bird, or a flock of grass, fone, feathers, or almost any thing will make a bonnet which is called by that name. The fault is in excess in proportion as it diminishes in size!

The contribution in aid of the great Musical Peace Festival now amounts to about $94,000. The opening rehearsal occurred last week, and more sought admission to the gallery than could be accommodated. All applicants were expected to register their names and to pay for seats on the enrollment evening. Nearly eight hundred were enrolled the first evening, and it is said that the effect of the chorus was both capable and enthusiastic.

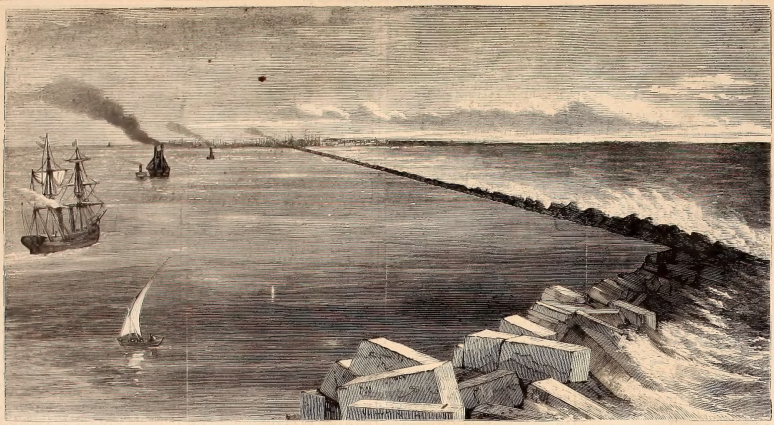
"Sorosis"—the origin i New York Society—has celebrated its first anniversary. During the year there have been nineteen regular club meetings, most of these having been held at Delmonico's. At intervals between the regular meetings there have been informal gatherings for social intercourse at the houses of members. According to the report of the Society it now has eighty-three members in "good and regular standing." The anniversary, which having contrived to thrive for a twelvemonth, those who were doubtful of its success will now "revise their opinion of women."

Successful robberies have been going on at the Mercantile Library for several weeks past. A thousand thousand dollars' worth of valuable books have been stolen. The thieves have been discovered, and have made a full confession of his modus operandi. Being a subscriber he obtained permission to take books in his reading-room, and after their perusal would coolly put them under his arm and walk away. The volumes were of the most valuable ones, and readily disposed of them to different dealers. The responsible officers of the Library will be likely to be more on their guard hereafter.

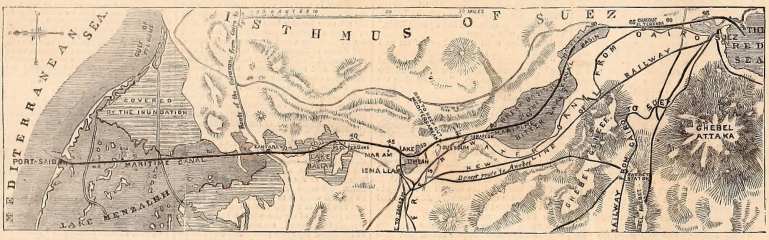
An earthquake is apprehended in Oregon, as the latest report is that three volcanic mountains—Hood, Jefferson, and Three Brothers—are sending forth volumes of smoke.

It appears to be highly dangerous for ladies while shopping to take up an article in their hands for the purpose of examining it with another in the shop. A respectable lady was recently arrested, and committed to the Tombs for shoplifting, under the above. A case on a show-case attracted her attention, and seeing another case at the end of the show-case, she started forward it with the first one in h r hand, for the purpose of comparing the two together. Before reaching the spot a clerk appeared around the counter, and in a rude manner said, "I know you; you are one of these shoplifters." Such an accusation astonished the lady, and she was dragged off like a common felon. It was not until the next day that her friends discovered her distressing situation, and she was released. It is well for ladies to be cautious how they expose themselves to such a quick-handed justice.

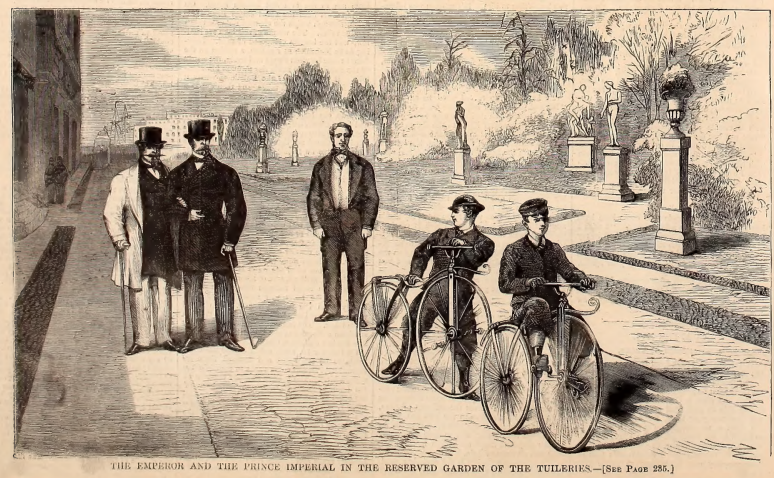
A large and enthusiastic meeting in favor of Cuban Independence was held last week at Steinway Hall. In the course of some interesting remarks Rev. Henry Ward Beecher said that if Cuba ought to be governed by any other power than herself, she had better learned—what God did not mean that any body should learn—how to govern a foreign people that should be governed themselves. M. Paul du Chaillu are able to govern themselves. M. Paul du Chaillu gave some account of the Spanish penal settlement of Fernando Po, where political prisoners have been sent to languish and to die. Fernando Po is an island situated on the western coast of Africa, in the Gulf of Guinea. Though picturesque and beautiful, the climate of the place is terrible. The deaths by malaria cases fever from which few unacustomed to the climate recover. The heat is intense, and the rains are heavy and continuous.



THE ISTHMUS OF SUEZ MARITIME CANAL.—BREAKWATER AT PORT SAID, AND MEDITERRANEAN ENTRANCE TO THE CANAL.—[SEE PAGE 235.]



PLAN OF THE MARITIME CANAL, WITH THE SMALL FRESH-WATER CANAL.



THE EMPEROR AND THE PRINCE IMPERIAL IN THE RESERVED GARDEN OF THE TUILERIES.—[SEE PAGE 235.]

THE OUTCAST FROM THE CONVENT.—[See Page 238.]

AN OUTCAST.

See Illustration on page 237.

I.

Workers in veins of the eternal granite,
Far in deep quarries, void of light and air—
Rocks that appear coeval with the planet—
Have found, they tell us, living reptiles there.

II.

When the rude axe a sudden fissure splinters,
When the keen sunshine cuts him like a knife,
How must a sleeper of a thousand winters
Shudder to feel again the pulse of life!

III.

Reptiles are dull: but woman's heart is tender;
Tribes are torture to her warm white breast.
Ay, and her nature pitifully rend her,
Having for torture far too keen a zest.

IV.

Let the poor sun, a foolish feeble dweller
In sordid convert, from the world afar!
Cruel her fate when harshly they expel her—
Driving her forth beneath an evil star.

V.

What is she fit for, in a world so busy,
Where men the strongest often slip and fall?
Well may her brain become perplexed and dizzy,
Leaving behind the convent's guardian wall.

VI.

No part has she with merry-hearted maidens
Gayly advancing through the gates of life,
Fresh from the hand of the prodigalitous Eadence,
Each soon to know what 'tis to be a wife.

VII.

No part has she in all that love and duty
Which are the crown of happy matrimony:
Hers may not be the faithful mother's beauty:
Hapless her fate—unwedded and unwon'd.

VIII.

Where can she any safe retreat discover?
Where can she hide her sorrow and despair?
Earth will not cradle the gross grave above her
In the dark coffin? She may find it there.

GOOD TEETH.

CIVILIZATION makes sad work with our teeth. Savages are rarely troubled with a defect or an ache in their dental apparatus. It is not hot drinks which destroy them principally, but warm food so much as acids, too concentrated in vinegar, pickles, etc., which acts directly upon the bone in their composition, and thus crumbles down.

The foundation for sound, firm, white teeth, must be laid in early life, by introducing food that contains the elements which the teeth must have or they will be imperfectly formed, feeble in structure, and fall early into decay. A tender flour were never bolted, but eaten with the bran, as we find it partially in the Graham bread, then the system would be abundantly provided with the phosphate of lime, the essential ingredient in the formation of the teeth.

Butter contains a good proportion of the phosphate of lime, and hence those who consume much of it from their earliest years will supply by keeping their teeth in sound condition. Children are usually lovers of bread and butter, especially if they are habitually fed on white flour bread. In that way they obtain something for their teeth, but by no means enough. The coarser the food, especially bread, the better for young people. The soundest teeth belong to persons who have not been reared on delicacies. Poor teeth become frequent, simply because the ancestral stock was deprived, either by a perverted taste or the habit of feasting on rich concentrated diet, of the phosphate of lime which should be stored in the coverings of grain used for food, and in some kinds of fruits which carnivorous animals live. We can not have sound teeth unless the stomach has the right materials for their manufacture.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

NEARLY six years ago I ordered one of your Sewing Machines, and since then I have done with it, not only all the ordinary family sewing, but also all our millinery and mantua making, besides frequently encroaching upon the tailor's peculiar province; and this for a family of eight adults. Several of them were grown, engaged in business or professional life. I have wrought on various kinds of material, from fine cambric and silk to heavy beaver cloth and morocco, and have two bed-quilts, every stitch in which, piecing, quilting, and sewing, was done on your machine. When I purchased I was a perfect novice, never having worked on any kind of a machine. The agent was most civil, and made me work it myself. It is as completely under my control as the needle in my hand, and has never needed any repairs. Only two needles have been broken, and No. 2 needle did all the sewing, coarse and fine, for ten years. It is indeed our "household pet." It has paid for itself more than once in the sewing bills which it has saved.

ROXBURY, Ohio. MRS. M. A. GAGE.

MILLIONS OF TEETH

Owe their beauty and purity, and millions of breaths their fragrance, to the Bark of the Soap-Tree, from the mountains of Chili, which forms one of the important ingredients of SOZODONT, the most wholesome and delicious dentifrice in the world. The Bark of the Chilian Soap-Tree is used by the natives to clean the most delicate silks, and is noted throughout South America for its preservative properties.—[Com.]

FOR CRAPPED HANDS AND FACE.—COLGATE & CO.'S GLYCERINE SOAP is especially recommended. Sold by all druggists and dealers in fancy goods.—[Com.]

BROTHERHOOD & CO.'S LIBRARY, 129 East 17th Street. 12,000 volumes, English, French, and German. All the English and American new books and periodicals.

WALTHAM WATCHES are the best and the cheapest.—N. MATSON & CO., Chicago.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per Box. Mailed for 60c. Sold by druggists. B. G. WELLS, 571 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$3000 A YEAR—How to make it. See PHONOGRAPHIC GRATUITY VOCAL. A. J. GRAHAM, 369 Broadway, N. Y. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.—A Complete Library of Modern Music for Voice and Piano-forte: CHOPIN'S WALTZES, complete.....60c.
BEAUTIFUL BALLROOM AND BAND MUSIC.....50c.
BEETHOVEN'S 48 ORIGINAL WALTZES.....50c.
COMPLETE OPERAS FOR PIANO, each.....50c.
Mailed on receipt of price. CATALOGUES FREE.
BOOSEY & CO., 564 Broadway, N. Y.

Away with Cosmetics!

Abandon all washes, emulsions, and lotions for complexion. They are always either sour or deleterious. Remove the cause of spots, pimples, morphew, and other external disfigurements of an eruptive type by removing the inward cause with a few doses of STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS, which at once tone the stomach, and disinfect the vital fluid. They are the finest combination of an invigorant and an antiseptic that the world ever knew.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS.

1 Package, 12 Powders, $1. Packages, 72 Powders, $5. Mailed Free.
HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N. Y.

BLACK WALNUT PANELLED RACKS for Parlors, Bedrooms, Stores, &c. Holder Hooks and Fancy Articles. Sent by Express on receipt of price, $2 50. W. C. WEEKS, 3 Astor Place, N. Y.

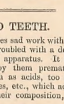
HITCHCOCK'S
HALF-DIME MUSIC.

Printed on heavy music-paper, 4 pages, colored title. Music and Words. Price 5 cts. each; the whole 54 pieces for $2 70. NOW READY:

Nos. 54. Five O'Clock in the Morning.
55. Three Times on the Boots.
52. Pretty Bird.
51. Why Wandering here?
50. Call Me thine Own.
49. Le Sueur de Mon Pere.
48. Woodside Waltz and Polka.
47. Home, Sweet Home. (Instrumental.)
46. Perichole's Letter.
45. The Mountain Maid.
44. St. Nicholas Galop.
43. Velocipede Galop.
42. Gaus D'Arcus Duet.
41. Gems from Opera.
40. Belles of Broadway.
39. Flying Trapeze.
38. Power of Love. (Instrumental.)
37. Susan Jane.
36. I will not Ask to Press that Cheek.
35. The Holy Wreath.
34. The Life-Boat.
33. Light of the World. (Sacred.)
32. Beautiful Bells.
31. Ition Galop.
30. Olympic Schottische.
29. Up in a Balloon.
28. There's a Charm in Spring.
27. See the Conquering Hero Comes!
26. Take Back the Heart.
25. The Happy Days.
24. Still I'll Love Thee.
23. Waltzing Down at Long Branch.
22. Riding down Broadway.
21. She might Have Sold your Fancy.
20. Arm-in-Arm. (Polka Mazurka.)
19. The Rose of Love.
18. Silver Chimes.
17. The Light Brave Click.
16. His Love Shines over All. (Sacred.)
15. Maggie's Secret.
14. Little Maggie May.
13. The Darling's Whistle.
12. Come Hither, my Baby, my Darling.
11. Genevieve Waltz.
10. Skating Rink Polka.
9. Champagne Galop.
8. Praise of Tears.
7. I really don't Think I shall Marry.
6. Good-bye, Sweetheart, Good-bye.
5. Not for Money.
4. Blue Eyes.
3. We'll Never Bide a Wee.
2. Won't you Tell me why, Robin?
1. Cupid's Letter.

The above can be had at the music, book, and periodical stores, or by enclosing the price, 5 cts. each, to the publisher, HITCHCOCK, 25 Beekman street, rapidly following. Agents wanted. BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 29 Spring St., New York (under St. Nicholas Hotel).

ALASKA DIAMONDS.



The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the real diamond, and stands the acid test. Discovered by the eminent chemist, Prof. Booth, Mint Assayer of gold, and sold by us at our statioth of the cost of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

LOOK AT OUR PRICE-LIST.

Ladies' Solitaire Finger-Rings, $8 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Drops, $5, $6, $10.
Cluster Finger-Rings, $8, $10, $12; Cluster Ear-Drops, $6, $12, $16.
Gents' Solitaire Pins, $5, $6, $8, $10, and $15.
Gents' Solitaire Pins, $5, $8, $8, $10, $15, $20.
Cluster Pins, $10 and $12; with tail, $10; Cross Pins, $8, $10, and $15; Studs, per set, $5, $8, $10.

We do not misrepresent our goods, but offer a rare chance to the public to purchase fine jewelry.

Orders less than $5 should be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods sent free. Exceeding that amount sent by express, C.O.D., customers paying all express charges. A Large Discount to the Trade. THE ALASKA DIAMOND JEWELRY COMPANY, 179 Broadway, N. Y.

The following letters are a proof that our goods are what we represent them to be, and we are receiving them daily:

MESSRS. STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO.—Gentlemen: Send, via Express, C.O.D., one Solitaire Ring, price $10; one Set Ear-Drops, Cluster, $12; one Gentleman's Cluster Ring, $16. The Pin sent was a good article. If the articles ordered are as good, I can open a good trade for your goods in this market. Respectfully yours, E. PRATT READ. WEAVERSVILLE, CAL., Dec. 4, 1868.

MESSRS. STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO.—Gents: The Cluster Pin you sent me is received. In reply, I enclose you P. O. Order to the amount of $12, for which please send me one pair Ladies' Cluster Ear-Drops to match Breast-Pin, and oblige yours truly, J. MCPHERSON NASHVILLE, TENN., Nov. 14, 1868.

MESSRS. STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO.—Gents: Your Pin of 0. K. received, and is a good article. With a single large stone resemble a diamond as much as this one. I have been offered $400 for this Pin. Of course I would not sell, but I mention it to show. Please answer this. Yours, etc., J. B. NEWHALL, Agent.

INDISPENSABLE.

HOW TO WRITE, HOW TO TALK, HOW TO BEHAVE, and HOW TO DO BUSINESS. One vol., 12mo, 500 pages.

HOW TO READ CHARACTER. A New Illustrated Hand-Book of Phrenology and Physiognomy, for Students and Examiners, with a Chart for recording the size of the different Organs of the Brain, by the delineation of Character, with upward of 170 Engravings. Price, in Muslin, $1 50; Paper, $1.

All Works on Phonography, Hydropathy, Anatomy, Physiology, Medicine, and the Natural Sciences generally. Agents wanted. Please address

S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE PROVIDENCE TOOL CO., 305 Broadway, New York, offer at first hands their Patent Adjustable Spring Chandeliers, also PEABODY BREECH-LOADING FIRE-ARMS, for Infantry, Cavalry, and Sportsmen. They are unequaled for strength, simplicity, accuracy of fire, and elegance of finish. Descriptive pamphlets and Price-Lists furnished by H. S. NEWHALL, Agent.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

Prices from $16 to $22.

From the Scientific American of Nov. 14, 1868:

"The color of this metal closely resembles that of fine karat gold, is more grateful to the eye than the finest brilliant," &c., &c.

When desired, these Watches will be sent from our office, and permission of express agent to examine, on payment of freight charges.

Also, Aluminium gold and metal sent free upon application. An inspection of my goods earnestly solicited.

JOSEPH D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
64 Nassau Street, New York.

For sale by all respectable dealers.

AGENTS can make from $10 to $20 per day by selling the following articles: The Magnetic Pocket-Time-keeper and Compass, price $1. Universal Needle Threader, 50 cts.: Wheeler's Prepared Solder, 50 cts.; Fountain Pen, 15 cts.; Indelible Pencil, 50 cts.; Pocket Repeating Match, $1; Mixed Photographs, $5 per 100. Circulars free on receipt of 3d stamp. Address WALTER HOLT, 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

THAT "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER"

Still Waves. See the April Number just out—the Long Cherished Favorite, Filled with Wit, Humor, Fun, and Real Common Sense. Eight Large Pages, filled to the brim with Original Stories, Poetry, Puzzles, Sketches, and other Valuable Matter. See the New Swindler Fully Exposed. It will save you many a dollar. A sure cure for the "blues" is the "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER." A large 48-column paper (ledger size), and costs only 75 cts. for a whole year; or, if you have a subscription agreement on a higher cost, paid, the Elegant Parlor Engraving (usual price $5) entitled "Peace and Plenty," Remember, for only 75 cts. you can get this Splendid Engraving, size 18 by 24 inches, and the paper for a whole year. 1000 new subscribers every week. It's no humbug, nor new thing—established for 15 years. Don't be deceived. It has already the largest circulation in New England, out of Boston. Only think, the Elegant Engraving and paper a whole year for only 75 cts. And here's another item. Just to get it into a family, we'll send it to every one subscribing who is not perfectly satisfied, we will refund the money. Now is the time—75 cts. for a whole year. Buy it at any newsman's. Specimens mailed for only 6 cts. Address STAR-SPANGLED BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 BROADWAY, N. Y., will dispose of PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES CASH, during this month, or will rent, or take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid. The same to-day, and next week, at 481 Broadway.

THE COMICAL ADVENTURES OF MR. TOODLES

will be sent free upon receipt of order addressed to BOX 2976, New York Post-Office.

LET US HAVE PEACE.

THE Memo to be performed at the GRAND NATIONAL PEACE JUBILEE to be held in Boston, June, 1869. Comprising 16 Choruses from various Oratorios and Sacred Music. Published and Sold for Sale. Price 50 cents. Sent postpaid on receipt of price. OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington St., Boston, Philadelphia. CHARLES H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

A WATCH for $1. THE MAGNETIC TIME-KEEPER AND COMPASS. Ordinary Watch size. Warranted for two years. Satisfaction guaranteed. C. A. PAT & CO., Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for the only steel engraving of Gen. Grant and his family, published. Also their photographs, cabinet size. Address GODDSEED & CO., 81 Park Row, New York.

THOMAS R. AGNEW,

ESTABLISHED 1836,

260 Greenwich St., corner Murray, New York,

IS OFFERING CHEAP,

FOR CASH:

COFFEES.—Green, Roasted, and Ground; all grades to suit the palate and the pocket of the million; 10c., 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., 40c.; Mocha, 50c.

TEAS.—Every body should know who they buy tea of, as all we can state is that we are wholesale. Mr. Agnew spent three years in China, and knows exactly what teas we want and does not fill damaging goods of any kind; consequently every pound of tea sold is warranted as represented, or the money returned.

MOLASSES.—Mr. Agnew has his agent in New Orleans, and receives his molasses in ships that he chooses of the crop.

RICE.—Mr. Agnew has a house in South Carolina, who ship him the best head rice in market.

FLOUR is received direct from the mills, Genesee, Indiana, and St. Louis, and is warranted. Mr. Agnew, $7 to $14 per barrel.

GROCERIES.—Every thing desired in families, hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, steamships and sailing vessels is sold by Mr. Agnew, who is, we may, working 16, 18, and 20 hours every day for the last quarter of a century. He is a steam-cook in addition to the old fossilized grocers, who have been brought up in a soap-fat bucket, or an iackass bray'rs, and now begin to flap their wings when gray-headed. In a word, Agnew at the head of the mess, as Dexter is of the cart-horse when trotting. He is the man for the people—quick at lightning's rate, and very like it.

LYNS' PATENT HAIR-CRIMPERS.—Every lady should have them. For sale at Variety Stores. Made only by E. LYNS, 1301 Marshall St., Philadelphia.

London and Paris Fashion Books.

World of Fashion, or Le Monde Elegant.
Ross Brown, or Les Roses Brunes.
Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine.
Young Ladies' Journal.

All published monthly, and issued about the 15th of each month, and contain Splendid Colored Plates and Fashions, several months in advance of the first article. Supplied by all News Agents.

CLUBS.—Any 3 for $5; any 7 for $10. THOMAS SMART, Publisher, 27 Frankfort St., New York. Sole Agent in U. S. for Foreign Periodicals.

SPECIMEN COPIES, 25 CENTS.

WANTED—AGENTS—to sell the American Knitting Machine, Price $25. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit 30,000 stitches per minute. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

THE TANITE EMERY WHEEL Cuts fast, does not glaze, is cool, free from grit, and durable. For circulars, address THE TANITE CO., Stroudsburg, Pa.

HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE, Claverack, N. Y. A Classical and Scientific School for Boys and Young Men. Opens April 5, 1869. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal.

Holloway's Pills renovate and invigorate the system. If those who have a tendency to disease destroy their health. Sufferers, be not deceived.—this remedy is your only hope. Sold by all respectable druggists.

$245 A MONTH. TO AGENTS. 49 New and useful articles. Address H. ROWLAND & CO., 149 Nassau St., New York. Mention this paper.

FOWLER'S RELIABLE ADDING MACHINE.—Saves time and mental labor. Price $8. Book-keepers get it. Sent by mail. 27 Park Row, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just Published:

Genio C. Scott.
FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GENIO C. SCOTT. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

Charles Lever.
THE DALTONS; OR NOBLESSE. By CHAS. LEVER, Author of "The Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly," "Barrington," "Martins (Terrage in the Tuscany," "Charles O'Malley," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

Countess Marcolini.
MY RECOLLECTIONS OF LORD BYRON; and Those of Eye-Witnesses of his Life. By the Countess MARCOLINI. Translated from the German by E. H. Jerningham. With Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

Anthony Trollope.
CHRISTMAS STORIES. By the IRISH MEMBER. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "He Knew He was Right," "Orley Farm," "Rachel Ray," "Can You Forgive Her?" "Doctor at Allington," "Can You Forgive Her?" "Doctor Thorne," &c. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, 50 cts.; Cloth, $1 75.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Beautifully Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Charles Reade.
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, JEALOUSY. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Never too Late to Mend," "It is Never too Late," "Love me Little, Love me Long," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HARD CASH. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Love me Little, Love me Long," "It is Never too Late to Mend," &c. With Illustrations. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

J. D. Baldwin.
FIRE-HISTORIC NATIONS; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Arts, Usages and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to a still Older Civilization of the Rhinthonian Period in America. By JOHN D. BALDWIN, Member of the American Oriental Society. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.
SERMONS BY HENRY WARD BEECHER, Pyramouth Church, Brooklyn. Reported Verbatim and Unpublished Discourses, and Revised by their Author. In Two Volumes. 8vo. With Steel Portrait by Halpin. Cloth, $5 00.

William Hepworth Dixon.
HER MAJESTY'S TOWER. Historic Studies in the Tower of London. With Frontispiece Plan of the Tower. 12mo, Cloth, 69 cents.

The Author of "Rachel's Secret."
NATURE'S NOBLEMAN. A Novel. By the Author of "Rachel's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend for the use of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 50c., 60c., 70c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c.; best, $1 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c.; best, $1 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 60c., 70c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), 60c., 70c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER JAPAN, 60c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

POUGHKEEPSIE, MICH., August 26, 1868.

To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York:

GENTS: The people here will not let me stope. They say I have formed the road, and they will not let me send another order for them. So here you have it, in the shape of seventh order since July 4th. Let it be fast, making five hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-four cents. I have sent you over a hundred. Hoping this will be as good as former packages, I remain Yours, &c., JOHN W. HAWKINS.

10 lbs. Uncol'd Japan, Mrs. Kempton . . . at $1 . . . $10 00
6 " Imperial . . . . . " . . . at 1 25 . . . 6 25
6 " Young Hyson . A. L. Cummings, at 1 25 . . . 6 25
3 " Imperial . . . . . Elisa Stephens . at 1 25 . . . 2 50
4 " Gunpowder . . . . J. L. Chapman . at 1 25 . . . 4 25
2 " Gunpowder . . . . G. A. Watrous . at 1 50 . . . 3 00
4 " Imperial . . . . . F. Taylor . . . at 1 25 . . . 4 25
4 " Young Hyson . J. Hopkins . . . at 1 25 . . . 5 00
1 " Coffee . . . . . " . . . at 60 . . . 60
6 " Gunpowder . . . John Stephens . at 1 50 . . . 9 00
4 " Young Hyson . Wm. H. Dorsey . at 1 25 . . . 5 00
1 " do. . . . . H. Malone . . . at 1 25 . . . 1 25
1 " do. . . . . O. Newcomb . . . at 1 25 . . . 1 25
1 " do. . . . . Noah Campbell . at 1 25 . . . 0 00
1 " Gunpowder . . . Judge Miller . . at 1 50 . . . 1 50
4 " do. . . . . A. Gale . . . . . at 1 00 . . . 4 00
2 " Imperial . . . . . Mrs. Bird . . . . at 1 25 . . . 2 50
$74 35

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money Order, as we desire to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees to the small one third (besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in the city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should know how to be careful to write our name in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in the above advertisement. We have had many orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

Direct all Post Orders and Drafts made payable to "THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

No excuse now for Papers and Magazines lying about loose all the year.

CONANT'S IMPROVED PERIODICAL COVERS,

for HARPER'S WEEKLY or BAZAR, sent by mail for $1 35. They bind the numbers firmly every week.

Address A. CONANT, 80 Beekman St., N. Y.
——"A good thing."—New York Tribune.——
MAGAZINE SIZE, 25 CENTS. SEMI-MONTHLY SIZE, $1 00.

$6. WATCHES. $12.

The famous Oroide Hunting-Case Watch, Patent Detached Lever, Jewelled, $12; same, Stem Winder, $15; same, Lepine Movement, $17. Ladies' Hunting-Case, solid silver, jewelled with 15-carat gold, Lever movement, $30. English Duplex, $20. Celebrated American Levers, $20 and $30. The above warranted. A handsome silver-plated, open-face watch, English Movements, $6. Goods sent C. O. D. Address all orders

WILLSON & CO., Importers, 142 Fulton St., N. Y.

HUNTING and TRAPPING.—Instructions with diagrams and directions for making trap, also How to Train Animals, including many amusing and wonderful tricks! In No. 13 and 14 of HARPER'S JOURNAL, of newsdealers; or, on trial, Three Months free by mail for 25c. Jesse Haney & Co., 119 Nassau St., N. Y.

$100 to $250 PER MONTH GUARANTEED. Sure pay. Salaries paid weekly. Agents wanted every where to sell our WHITE WIRE CLOTHES LINES. Full particulars free. Address the GIRARD WIRE MILLS, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for them or their contents, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

$15 $20.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE).

39 NASSAU STREET.

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliant purity of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges: retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Genuine Watches have Fahnestock Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in neatness, style, of finish, durability, and time, to a dollar gold Watch. Each Watch is put in a neat case for $5 ex of extra fine polish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $3 to $20. JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Odd Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our published prices. Our regular customers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers can be requested not to remit money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Address, and remember that our only office is at

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

WOMAN and HER NEEDS.

Subject by the law of nature to many physical afflictions from which man is exempt, woman is peculiarly entitled to the best efforts of medical science in her behalf. For a majority of the ailments to which her sex is exclusively liable, are warmly recommended on the authority of wives, mothers, and nurses, who have tested their genial tonic and regulating properties, and "know whereof they speak;" and also with the sanction of able physicians, who have long considered the preparation in their female patients, in obstinate cases of functional derangement, with the happiest results. Almost all the complicated ailments of a special character are associated with mental gloom and despondency, and the gentle and lasting exhilarating effects of this wholesome medicine are equally as important as the removal of the complex nature. As a remedy for the hysteria and mental hallucinations which sometimes mark both the earlier and the latter crisis in the life of woman, it has no equal in the repertory of the healing art; and as a means of relieving the nausea and other unpleasant symptoms of the female monthly, it is equally efficacious. Nursing mothers also find it an admirable lavigorant. It is highly satisfactory that a preparation can be obtained for the remedial range so many of the complaints common to both sexes should prove so eminently beneficial to the weaker one.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

Early Rose Potato.

ONE lb. EARLY ROSE sent by mail postpaid, $1 00. 4 lbs. EARLY ROSE, sent by mail, postpaid, $3 00. Best Spring Wheat in the world: the earliest and most productive; a wonderful yielding Oats—white and black—weighing 45 pounds to the bushel; Spring Barley; Grass seeds; Rowle's Improved Hoe, the great Feed Cutter. Send for the EXPERIMENTAL FARM JOURNAL—sent out all summer; send in this and every month! $1 50 per year. Subscribe if you want to make your Farm pay. Address

GEO. A. DEITZ, CHAMBERSBURG, PA.

THE LANGHAM HOTEL, London.

JAMES M. SANDERSON, Manager,
formerly of New York.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE.

First-class and fully licensed. AGENTS WANTED. For terms, address CHICOPEE S. M. CO., Boston, Mass.

"HUNTING AND TRAPPING."—An old Trapper writes: "I have several already, by the use of your book, caught more game in one month than I usually caught in the whole season. Every man, boy, hunter, and trapper should have it. I have already one of the HICKS GUIDES, Revised and Enlarged. New Secrets added. The 37th edition of 8,000 copies NOW READY. Twenty New Taming Secrets added (3 cost $5 each). The Sporting Guide and Trapper's Companion tells how to hunt and trap ALL animals from a mink to bear; tells how to color furs and skins. New Secrets added. The secret recipes for BAITS which cost $50 any where else. Tells how to hunt, fish; has beautiful illustrations, &c. A NEW BOOK, well printed on tinted paper. Price (not $1, but only) 25 cents; 6 for $1. Mailed free. Sold by all dealers. Single copies by mail to sell it. Send for one. Worth $10 to any farmer, hunter, or boy. Only 25 "pearls" (cents).

HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

PAPER SEWING MACHINE

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity. Patented.

A most important invention, combining simplicity, Noiseless in operation; sews with double or single thread; makes the Double Lock Stitch with extraordinary rapidity.

Machine beautiful and firm; a perfect machine."—New York Tribune.

"The paper sewing machine it is invaluable; for the Housekeeper it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Lady's Book.

"It is seen a complete success. It is simple, and may be easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"Beautiful as a flower."—Leslie's Gazette of Fashions.

Any infringement on, or offer for sale machines similar to this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the largest scale. Single Machines sent by express to any part of the country per Express, packed in a box with printed instructions, complete, for $15 00 net price, Feb. 1, 1869. Agents wanted every where. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free. Single Machine sent for examination.

APEX SEWING MACHINE CO.,
205 Broadway, New York.

TO THE WORKING CLASS!—I am now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at their homes, the whole of the time, or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Fifty cents to $5 per evening is easily earned by persons of either sex, and the profits are large. Many have made as much. Great inducements are offered those who will devote their whole time to the business. All who read this notice may see this notice may send me their address, and test for themselves the matter. I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, &c., sent free. Sample worth $5 mail for 10 cents. Address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Me.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Size of Press, 4½ by 6½ inches, $3; 7 by 11 inches, $20. Send for a circular to LOWE PRESS CO., 20 Water Street, Boston, Mass.

Sabbath-School Superintendents

Should send 35 cents for a specimen copy of the latest and best Music Book for Sabbath-Schools, by J. F. NELSON, ALTON, ILL.

SIGNET RING.

A choice collection (168 pages) of the most beautiful Hymns and Tunes, arranged as solos, duets, trios, and choruses, all but a few of which are entirely original to by this work. Published by LYON & HEALY, Chicago, Ill., and 18 Adams Street, Chicago.

DO IT NOW.—Don't delay, but send 25 cents at once and receive MAPLE LEAVES until the end of 1869. It is the cheapest, the best, and the most popular Monthly published. Specimen copies sent on receipt of 10 cents.

O. A. ROORBACH, No. 102 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS for 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, " " 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, " " 4 00
HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for One Year.....10 00
Any two for $7 00.

Postage for either of the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE subscribers at $4 00 each. The Volumes of MAGAZINE for 1869, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 52 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, in advance, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 52 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription commences. Specify the Order of Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the owner.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changes, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $125; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line: Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line: Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

GENUINE OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO.

FACTORY at GENEVA, Switzerland.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fine Swiss Movements	$15 00.
" " " Patent Levers	20 00.
Gentlemen's Fac-Simile Waltham Patent Levers	20 00.
" " Ditto, Chronometer Balance	25 00.
GENUINE WALTHAM PATENT LEVERS	30 00.
" " Ditto, Chronometer Balance	35 00.

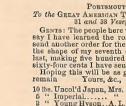
All of our Watches are Hunting Cases—Plain, Engine-Turned, and Elaborately Engraved. Warranted Perfect Time-keepers, and to retain the color of 18-carat Gold, representing Fine Gold Watches worth from $150 to $250 each. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Chains, Latest Styles, $6, $8, $7, and $10 each. Sent by Express, C.O.D. - Customers must pay all express charges, and allowed to examine what they order, previous to paying, on receipt of express charges both ways.

ONLY OFFICE IN THE UNITED STATES,

No. 78 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK.

JOHN FOGGAN, Price's Oroide Gold Watch Co., No. 78 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT
BRACED WEB SAW.
PATENT GROUND.



This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by THE LIVINGSTON MFG. CO., 50 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

100 YARDS of SHEETING
For a Club of 100 in our great
ONE DOLLAR SALE
If all returned. A little extra exertion secures it. Send for circular with new commission rates, before sending your clubs elsewhere. One trial will convince you that our terms can not be excelled, and the quality of our goods unequaled by any other house in the line of business.

S. C. THOMPSON,
161 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

By subscribing to the MUSICAL INDEPENDENT, a large quarto monthly musical magazine, you receive Sheet Music to the value of $20 WORTH OF MUSIC FOR $2.
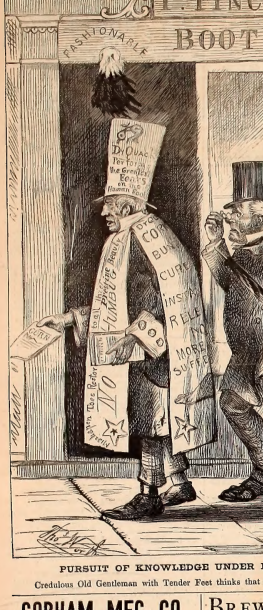
Each number contains, in addition to the usual amount of interesting reading, 24 to 28 pages worth of the choicest Songs, Duets, and Quartettes (with Piano, Organ, or Melodeon Accompaniment), by beautiful selections of Solo Pieces for Piano, Organ, or Melodeon, such as Marches, Polkas, Variations, Mazurkas, Operatic Selections, &c. First six numbers now ready. Price, $2 per year. Specimen copies sent for 25 cents each, by the Publishers,
LYON & HEALY,
Clark and Washington Streets, Chicago.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE
Novelty Iron Works,
Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.
Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

VELOCIPEDE WHEELS,
MANUFACTURED BY
S. N. BROWN & CO.,
DAYTON, OHIO.
They also make a prime article of Spokes and Hubs for light Carriage and Buggy Wheels. Send for Price-list.

$10 A DAY to agents selling SILVERS' PATENT CLOTHES BRUSH. Everybody says "I must get its success." CLEGG & CO., 38 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

$3000 Salary. { U.S. PIANO CO., N.Y.



Credulous Old Gentleman with Tender Feet thinks that his Millennium has come.

GORHAM MFG. CO.
Sterling Silver Ware,
AND
Fine Electro-Plated Ware,
of the following trade-marks:

Trade-Mark for Silver. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate.

MANUFACTURED BY THE
GORHAM MANUFACTURING CO.,
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Orders received from the Trade only, but those goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

THE GORHAM WARE may be obtained of ADAMS, CHANDLER, & CO.
No. 240 JOHN STREET, NEW YORK.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

An Invaluable Counterfeit.—The water of the Seltzer Spring, nature's salubrious cathartic and restorative, is perfectly simulated in TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT. To have it within reach is the same thing as living within a stone's throw of the living, leaping Seltzer Spring. The dyspeptic and the bilious, the nervous and the feeble, are invited to try this specific for their ailments, which is equal in every essential to the Spa itself.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

BLUNT & CO., 179 Water St., N. Y.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.
First Quality only. AT VERY LOW PRICES.
PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

KALDENBERG & SON, Manufacture of Meerschaum Pipes and Holders, with Monograms, Portraits, &c. Wholesale and Retail. Repairing in all its Branches. Send for Drawings and Price-List. Box 6734. Stores: 33 Wall St., & 61 Nassau St., corner John St. Received a Prize at the Paris Exposition, 1867.

BREWSTER & Co.
(OF BROOME ST.),
5th Ave., cor. 14th St.
Fine Carriages,
in all the fashionable varieties, exclusively of their own build, including
THE WELL-KNOWN
"BREWSTER WAGON,"
of which they are sole manufacturers.
Having fixed prices and but one quality, orders by mail will be as favorably executed as if given in person.
AGENTS FOR
CALLOW'S LONDON WHIPS.

For Tandem, Four-in-Hand, Phaeton, and Wagon driving; elegant in style, and superior to all others in quality.
Forwarded safely by Express to all parts of the country
☞ Correspondence invited. ☜

DR. JNO. V. BURTON'S TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.
WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO. It entirely expunges the narcotic poison from the system, purifies the blood, invigorates the nervous system, and restores the whole physical economy to its original tone and vigor. It counteracts the craving for liquor, allays nervousness, makes sleep refreshing, and establishes robust health. Scores and scores of testimonials given away. Price Fifty cents per box, post free. An interesting treatise on the personal effects of tobacco, with numerous testimonials, references, etc., sent free. Address DR. JNO. V. BURTON,
Box 4,000, New York City, N. Y.
FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.
☞ Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations. [Trademark & Copyrighted.]

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.
A practical work, just published, containing 100 Designs, Plans, and Details to Working Scale of Country, Suburban, and Village Houses, with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE Twelve Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. 150 Designs, $1 50, postpaid. GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York. Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

LARGEST—BEST—CHEAPEST!
MOORE'S RURAL NEW-YORKER.
THE GREAT CONTINENTAL
RURAL, LITERARY, AND FAMILY WEEKLY.

THIS FAMOUS WEEKLY WAS vastly Enlarged, Improved, and Beautified in January last, and is now not only the Largest, Best, and Cheapest Paper of its Class in the World! It is now, concededly, the BEST WEEKLY IN AMERICA!
THE RURAL is published on a Mammoth Sheet, comprising SIXTEEN LARGE DOUBLE QUARTO PAGES, of Five Columns each!—making it the largest Illustrated Paper in America! It presents superior style, and arranged with taste in Departments treating upon Agriculture, Horticulture, Rural Architecture, Sheep Husbandry, Grazing, Breeding, Dairy Farming, Poultry, Bees, Literature, Education, Science and Art, New Inventions, Domestic Economy, News, Commerce, The Markets, &c.,

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS, TALES, ESSAYS, SKETCHES, POETRY, MUSIC, REVIEWS, EDITORIALS, &C.

THE RURAL has a Continental Circulation, and is a welcome visitor to tens of thousands of Homes in both Town and Country from Canada to California. It is admired for the Ability, Variety, Taste, and Usefulness of its Contents, as well as for the correctness and beauty of its Typography and Illustrations. Examine a Number, and you will see

WHY IT IS THE BEST.

THE RURAL employs the BEST TALENT in the land. It has Seven Editors, and numerous Special Contributors and Correspondents—the East, West, North, and South being represented in its ample pages. Ably Edited, Finely Illustrated, Neatly Printed, and Adapted to the Wide Country, it is the paper for YOU, Your Family and Friends. In the words of an exchange, "THE RURAL is the most elegantly printed, ably edited, widely circulated, and heartily welcomed paper as a whole, which now finds its way among the people."

☞ A New Quarter begins with April, and hence now is a good time to subscribe. All who cultivate Fruits, Flowers, and Vegetables, &c., on a small scale (in city, village, or suburb), need the RURAL, while Farmers, Planters, Stock Breeders, Wool Growers, Dairymen, Poultry Fanciers, &c., will find it invaluable.

TERMS:—SINGLE COPY, $3 a year; FIVE COPIES, $14; Seven for $19; Ten for $25, &c. Now is the Time to Subscribe and Form Clubs! Liberal Inducements to Local Club Agents. Specimens, Show-Bills, &c., sent to Agents free. Or, Money Orders, Drafts, and Registered Letters at our risk.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWSDEALERS.
Price, Five Cents.

☞ SPECIMENS, postpaid, ten cents.
Address D. D. T. MOORE,
41 PARK ROW, N. Y.

VELOCIPEDES.
Various Styles and Prices. Latest Patterns.
Discount to the Trade. Shipped to order.
SEND FOR CIRCULARS.
SMITH, MORSE, & CO., 608 Broadway, N. Y.
Also, VAULTIPEDES,
A NEW THING.

OOC
The Highest Cash Prices
PAID FOR
OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;
OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;
OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are written full;
and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Old Public Private Libraries, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Offices, &c.
JOHN C. STOCKWELL,
55 Ann street, N. Y.

STEM-WINDING
Waltham Watches.
These watches are of the well-known 3-plate style, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy. The manufacture of watches of this fine quality is not even attempted in this country except at Waltham.
For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

CEDAR CAMPHOR
FOR MOTHS. THEODORE S. HARRIS, Boston
All druggists sell it—$1 00; $1 60; 20c.

ELGIN WATCHES.
CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing our watches, or watches purporting to be of our make, of parties who advertise to send them "C.O.D." We have no connection with such persons, and do not furnish our goods in any house for that purpose. The excellence and good repute of the real Elgin Watches have caused several Foreign and American Watch Companies to make spurious imitations with the same or similar trademarks as ours. Avoid all parties who advertise to send goods "C.O.D." no matter whom. To get the real Elgin Watches purchase only of dealers in your vicinity or elsewhere whom you know to be honorable.
THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,
ELGIN, ILLINOIS.
Business Office, Nos. 189 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

£150,000,000
Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commenced 1695. Fee to search for any name, $5. Gen & Co., 8 Frince of Wales Road, London, England.

GENUINE WALTHAM WATCHES,
IN SOLID GOLD AND SILVER CASES ONLY,
AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.
Silver Hunting Watches $18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases . . . $80
Gold Hunting Watches, Ladies' Size $60
Every Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Company. We will send them Watches by Express to any place, with bill to collect on delivery, and grant the purchaser the privilege to open the package and examine the Watch before paying, and say Watch that does not give satisfaction may be exchanged or the money will be refunded. Every one is requested to write for our Descriptive Price-List, which explains the different kinds with prices of each.
Please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly.
Address in full,
HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N. Y.

FURNITURE.
WARREN WARD & CO.,
Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St. (corner of Crosby.)
Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.
ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL
Universally recognized by the Faculty as
INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR
to every other kind,
and the unequalled remedy for
Consumption, General Debility,
and the Wasting Diseases of Children.
DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA, in IMPERIAL HALF-PINT BOTTLES only, with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with his Trade-Mark.
Sold by Druggists.
ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.
SOLE ACCREDITED AGENTS IN AMERICA,
EDW'D GREEY & Co., 38, Vesey St., New York.
Sold by all Druggists, at $1 50 per Bottle.
☞ Beware of fictitious imitations.

WANTED—AGENTS
—$75 to $200 per month, every where, to sell a new and useful invention to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO.
CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical chesp machine manufactured.

POLLAK & SON, Manufacturers of Meerschaum Pipes. Stores: 403 Broadway, next Broome, & 37 John St., middle of block. Pipes and Holders sent to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 3646.

A POOR GIRL'S
LETTER. New Song from Perlchole.....25c.
STARTLING CAPTIVE INDIAN MAID. Perlchole. 40c.
PERICHOLE WALTZES, 50c. "Telegram Waltz," 40c.
NOT YOU FOR GOLIGO, 25c. "On the Beach Galop," 25c.
KAY-BOODLE-UM (comic song), "DADDY PAY, each 30c.
Violin or Flute Accompaniments, 10c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1120 Broadway, N. Y.

PRINCE & COS. ORGANS
AND MELODEONS,
481 BROADWAY, NOW IN USE.
BUFFALO, N. Y. CHICAGO, ILL

THE WILSON SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Cheaper than all others. AGENTS WANTED. Manufactured by THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, O.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have Just Ready: FISHING
IN AMERICAN WATERS.
By GENIO C. SCOTT,
With 170 Illustrations.
CROWN 8VO, CLOTH, $3 50.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

MARVIN & CO.'s
CHROME IRON SAFES
ARE THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
265 Broadway N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

PRICE TEN CENTS IT WAS

VOL. XIII.—No. 642.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

JAMES HARPER.

THE grandfather of JAMES HARPER was an Englishman, and one of the earliest American Methodists. He came to this country about 1740, and his son JOHN, born in 1766, settled as a farmer at Newtown, upon Long Island. He married ELIZABETH ROLLYER, a woman of vigorous and superior character, of a cheerful piety and kindly humor, and their oldest child, JAMES, was born in Newtown on the 12th of April, 1795. The town is now one of the populous suburbs of the city, but at that time it was still a secluded country village; and JAMES, with his younger brothers, remained quietly at home, going to the district school and working upon his father's farm.

The influence of his home confirmed his naturally sturdy and honest character; and at the age of sixteen he and his brother JOHN were apprenticed to different printers in New York—two boys beginning active life with no capital but sound principle and honest purpose. JAMES was a lad of great personal strength, which was confirmed by his regular and correct habits. THURLOW WEED was a fellow-workman. The friendship then begun lasted through life, and a full-length photograph of his old companion in trade hung over the mantel in the dining-room of Mr. HARPER'S house when he left it for the last time. JAMES was soon the most noted pressman in the city, and it is a tradition that if he disliked a fellow-pressman, and wished to be rid of him, he outworked him, and so compelled him to retire.

The habits of his rural home followed him to the city. In an age when every body drank ardent spirits freely he was strictly temperate, and the cold-water disciple justified his faith by his works. With the cheerful constancy of the fathers of his Church he quietly resisted the temptations of the city, and opened a prayer-meeting in the house of an old colored woman in Ann Street, and joined the John Street Methodist Church. Meanwhile to their simple and thrifty method of life JAMES and his brother added work out of hours, so that when their apprenticeship was ended they had a little money saved. Their capital now was sound principle, honest purpose, a trade of which they were masters, and some hundreds of dollars increased from their father's means; and with this capital, in a small printing-office in Dover Street, they began the business which has expanded through half a century into that of HARPER & BROTHERS.

At first the young men printed books to order, doing a part of the composing and press-work with their own hands. In August, 1817, they delivered two thousand copies of SENECA'S "Morals"—the first book they printed—to EVERT DUYCKINCK, a noted bookseller of that day; in December twenty-five hundred copies of MAIR'S "Introduction to Latin," and in April, 1818, five hundred copies of LOCKE'S "Essay upon the Human Understanding," upon which the imprint of J. & J. HARPER as publishers first appeared. They proceeded with characteristic care. When contemplating the publication of a book, especially if a reprint, they sent to the leading houses in the trade to ascertain the number of copies each would take; and so, slowly and steadily feeling their way, intent only upon good work well done, improving every opportunity with prompt sagacity, their business rapidly extended, and the firm of J. & J. HARPER was soon the most eminent publishing house in the country. Perhaps the most famous work that bears the imprint of J. & J. HARPER is the series known as "Harper's Family Library"—a collection familiar to every American reader during the last thirty years. The volumes were of convenient form, and the Library included standard and attractive works of every kind—such as MILMAN'S "History of the Jews," SOUTHEY'S "Life of Nelson," GALT'S "Life of Byron," SCOTT'S "Demonology and Witchcraft," CUNNINGHAM'S "Lives of the Poniters," BREWSTER'S "Life of Sir Isaac Newton," MRS. JAMESON'S "Female Sovereigns," LANDER'S "African Travels," and many more.

Two younger brothers, JOSEPH WESLEY and FLETCHER, were apprenticed to the firm, and when admitted as partners, the style was changed to HARPER & BROTHERS, and in 1825 the house was established at numbers 81 and 82 Cliff Street, upon a part of the site which their buildings now occupy. It was then the largest printing house in the city, employing fifty persons and ten hand-presses. Cliff Street was a narrow street just back of Pearl, in what is called the Swamp, the seat of the leather trade. But it was familiar to almost all American authors. When they went there and stopped at the HARPERS' they found a small and very plain office, in which there was little room for idlers, and a brisk and incessant industry was every where apparent. They met a frank, courteous, cheerful statement, and decision. It was strictly a place of business, and of business which had so increased that on the 10th of December, 1853, it occupied 9 large contiguous buildings full of steam machinery of every kind, with stores of plates and books—buildings alive with workmen, humming with industry, the monument of the skill and integrity and constant devotion to their business and to each other of the four brothers—when a workman threw a piece of lighted paper into what appeared to be a trough of water, but which was really camphene, and in a few hours the buildings were a mass of smoking rubbish, and almost without insurance.

The loss was about a million of dollars; but JAMES and his brothers were immediately sheltered at SHEFFIELD'S paper warehouse, at the corner of Beekman and Gold streets, and were actively engaged in renewing their business. Presses were employed in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. Nothing was forgotten. The next monthly issue of the Magazine had been made ready, and it was reproduced at the earliest moment. One regular contributor then in Chicago received the first news of the fire by a brief telegram: "Copy destroyed. Send fresh copy immediately." Before the ruins were cleared away the plans of the new buildings were ready, and the buildings themselves were rapidly finished, covering half an acre of ground. They are all of iron and brick and cement, seven stories high, towering into the air upon Franklin Square, not far from the East River, as if hoping to look across to the quiet old country homestead at Newtown.

Of course the development and organization of such a business were due not to one brother alone, but to the co-operation of all. But this is not the place to enlarge upon a fraternal friendship as extraordinary as its outward results are remarkable. The business was to JAMES, as to the others, the great and central interest; but prosperity could not relax his steady character. He did not forget his early faith, nor the counsels and the habits of his Long Island home. He remained strictly a "Temperance man," and his marvelous physical vigor is ascribed by the Temperance advocates as that of a cold-water man. He was long an official member of John Street Church, and when he left his house in Rose Street, and went to live in the upper part of the city, he joined the congregation of St. Paul's Church, in the Fourth Avenue. But with all his fidelity to his ancestral faith he cherished the largest charity, and by much experience of the world had learned to agree with the favorite apostle James, that pure religion and undefiled is to visit the fatherless and widows, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. Thus with all his conviction and devotion, there was nothing hard or fanatical in his feeling or conduct, and he held the pleasantest personal relations with men of every faith. Few men indulged in so little harsh criticism of others, and he condemned censure or disapprobation by humorous indirection rather than by open accusation. "We must not be too hard," he was fond of saying, "it is so difficult to know all the circumstances. If you should insult, for instance, that the use of tobacco is a sin, and not a duty, I'll tell you what was a Whig during the days of that party, and a natural conservative. But in politics he showed the same moderation and toleration. "Don't try to drive men too roughly; my dear Sir, it is so much easier to draw than to push!" He took no conspicuous active part in politics, however. In 1844, when he was elected Mayor of the city. He was constantly asked to serve in Congress and in other public stations; but he steadily declined, saying, with a sly smile, that he preferred to stick to the business that he understood.

JAMES HARPER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD, 839 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.]

To that business his heart and life were given. Of late years its active care had naturally fallen into the hands of his younger associates; but he never relaxed his interest and devotion. "While I was dressing," said a much younger neighbor, "I used to hear Mayor Harper running from his house to go down town, and felt ashamed of myself." Early at the office, he opened and looked over the letters, and during the hours of the morning he passed from one room to another, his shrewd eye seeing every thing and measuring men and work, correcting and jesting as he went. But out of those shrewd eyes looked a kind and gentle heart. He knew by name the men and women and children employed in the various parts of the great buildings, interested himself in their family stories, and often won a confidence that never betrayed. His daily walking, which were ample, were thus intelligent and effective, and poor men as well as women bent to kiss his calm unchanged face as he lay in his coffin.

To the last day of his conscious life James Harper was as erect of figure and as buoyant of spirit as a boy. His interest in public affairs, which was that of a sagacious spectator, was undiminished. But one of the best known and highly honored citizens of the city, whose marvelous growth had coincided with that of his own fortunes, but his life never lost its early simplicity and regularity. For some time his family had observed, with the daily indigestion of every home, he no longer prayed to be delivered from sudden death, and upon being asked why, answered, plaintively, "The Lord knows best." On Thursday, the 25th of March, he came to the office in his usual health. For the last time his cheerful face and stalwart form were seen in all the rooms as he moved rapidly about. Then going up town he sat for the photograph from which this engraving is printed; and, when he drove out as usual with his daughter. A brother publisher in the city, upon horseback, passed him near the Central Park, and remembers that his daughter who was riding with him, "How well Mr. Harper looks!" Soon afterward, the pole of the carriage suddenly broke, and the horses, although docile and well-trained, were frightened and ran. At once they were beyond the control even of Mr. James's strong hand, and he and his daughter were presently thrown violently to the pavement. She happily escaped serious injury, and was carried home. Her father was taken insensible to St. Luke's Hospital, where, without regaining consciousness, he died on the next Saturday evening, at a quarter past seven, surrounded by his family, excepting his wife, who had been long an invalid.

The expression of the public sorrow and respect was general and sincere, and the funeral in the church of the Ascension was a touching demonstration of the regard in which he was held by the city in which he had lived his modest and useful and honorable life. But among all the public and private tributes to his memory the one that he would most have valued was that of those engaged in every department of his business, who knew him most familiarly in his daily duty, and who, at a meeting at which Mr. Henry J. Raymond, for forty-seven years associated with the business of Harper & Brothers, presided, after appropriate remarks, passed these resolutions:

Whereas, In the sudden and unexpected death of Mr. James Harper, we, the employes of the firm of which the deceased was for more than half a century the senior partner, have cause, through our long association with him and our knowledge of his generous character, his forbearing and kindly nature, for more than usual regret; we deem it proper that we should put on record the high respect in which we held him; therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of Mr. James Harper society has lost an ornament, the community an upright and honored citizen, his immediate family a devoted husband and father, and his employes a considerate, kindly, and honorable employer. While we, in common with our fellow-citizens at large, have extreme regret for his loss to the community, we have beyond that a deeper sorrow growing out of our personal acquaintance with him, and the remembrance of his genial presence and the kindly sympathy and encouragement with which he always lightened our labors. On account of that evident sympathy and good-will toward us which was so characteristic of him, our recollections of him are especially endeared.

Resolved, That to his immediate family, and to the surviving brothers of the firm, we tender our thorough, heart-felt sympathy for their irreparable loss, hoping that their sorrow will be assuaged by the remembrance that his was a fully completed and honored life.

The funeral was on Tuesday, the 30th of March, and only the next morning James Harper was laid tenderly by those who loved him best in his grave at Greenwood Cemetery.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Saturday, April 17, 1869.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE PARTY.

There were those who hoped that the President, who had been elected by the people, as they said, would discard the politicians and rely upon the country. What do such words mean? Who is the country, and what are the people? They are the Republican and Democratic parties. There is not a vast reserved multitude of "people" independent of parties. The people are divided into the great party organizations; and to suppose that the President would endeavor to find some one who was in sympathy with neither, was to expect that he would be guilty of unutterable folly.

There were those, for instance, who hoped that Mr. Charles Francis Adams would be made Secretary of State. The columns of this paper are the witness of the appreciation of Mr. Adams's ability and service. But Mr. Adams has chosen to withdraw from the Republican party. Upon the eve of an election which involved the essential question whether the late rebels should control the Government Mr. Adams preferred to express no opinion. Now at such a time for a man like Mr. Adams not to speak was to express himself a thousandfold more loudly than if he had shouted. The people of the country, who felt in every fibre that the war was a conflict of ideas, and therefore was so threatening as the presence of Wade Hampton and his party in the Government, elected General Grant. Mr. Adams showed no sign of feeling that opinion. He was, unreferentially, under the circumstances, with his father's assent, had been coquetting with Wade Hampton, and was now coquetting with Wade Hampton's party for Governor of Massachusetts. If General Grant's first act had been the nomination of Mr. Adams as Secretary of State, he would have disgusted the party that elected him, and opened a struggle like that from which that party has just victoriously emerged.

The government of this country is a party government. When a President is elected, he as the representative of principles and a policy which are approved by a considerable majority of the people, who are the source of power. Those people, therefore, have a right to demand that those principles and that policy, and, as in the absence of a proper civil service system the control of the Executive Administration is essential to the effective organization of his party, they will expect that the head of the Administration will be intrusted to honest and capable men, who are also of the party. It is a man believed that the maintenance of that party is essential to the highest public welfare, knowing the necessity of thorough party organization to that result, he will properly take every honorable means to strengthen and complete that organization.

Now politician is a very elastic term. Burke and Wilkes, Hancock and Frederal, were all politicians. They were all prominent interest in politics and in party organizations. The reproach of many of the best American citizens has always been that they are not politicians. If the word has come to have an offensive significance, it is because those who should have kept it pure have avoided their duty. They have allowed it to become synonymous with rascal. But it has still a higher meaning, which every honest man will remember, and every patriotic man will remember always. An American who plumes himself upon not being a politician, in the sense of not being interested in politics, is as wise as the captain of a ship who should take pride in knowing nothing of navigation.

It is plain enough that the independence which General Grant showed in himself was not of party, but an independence of choice within the party. Undoubtedly his cabinet as first named was a disappointment; but it was strictly a Republican cabinet, and none might have been named the disappointment was inevitable. The disappointment will continue, and for the same reason; namely, that the friends of every applicant who fails will complain. If any man, however, will reflect how impossible it is, under our present system, that the Chief Executive can personally know the character of those whom he must nominate, and upon the reckless manner in which candidates are recommended, he will be very charitable in his judgment of the nominating power. The President may hold his subordinates responsible, but the subordinates also must act not upon knowledge but upon representation. It is, indeed, the people themselves who are primarily responsible for the character and capacity of men in office, for the Senators must also rely upon representations. Let no Republican, therefore, who has recommended any applicant from good-nature, or from any reason but persuasion of fitness, presume to cavil at the Executive action.

AN UNSETTLING SETTLEMENT.

It is desirable that all laws should be as intelligible as words will permit, and it is therefore a serious defect in the bill reported by the Conference Committee upon the Tenure-of-office law that each side claimed the victory, and Mr. Trumbull made one statement to the Senate, and General Butler precisely the reverse statement to the House. General Butler then appealed to that intolerable nuisance—the previous question, and the consequence is another confused and unsatisfactory law. As we write, the President has neither signed nor vetoed it. But, although it is in the nature of an ostensible concession to his views, we can not help hoping that in the interest of clear and precise legislation he may veto it.

The point has been plain from the beginning of the long debate. The substantial question is, shall the President remove at pleasure? The discussion has been inevitably, but illogically, mingled with the question of personal confidence in General Grant, which is simply a question of purity of administration. The Constitution does not decide it, and when the point was presented in the early Congress, it was decided against the Senate by a tie vote. Mr. Webster was of opinion that practice had interpreted the Constitution upon the subject; but this is a matter of interpretation which may be always challenged.

Mr. Grimes, who is a repealer, said that he wanted to give President Grant the same chance which every other President had enjoyed. But he did not stay to suggest why the law was passed. The reason of the passage of the law was, that experience proved that it might be dangerous to the country that the President should enjoy that chance. It is no answer to say that President Grant could be trusted and therefore the law ought to be repealed. So Mr. Stewart could be trusted as Secretary of the Treasury; but was Mr. Grimes ready to repeal the law that forbade appointment into the Treasury Department? Laws are not made upon personal but upon general considerations. The weakness or the crimes of individuals, indeed, may furnish the occasion for a law, but that is all. The justification of the Tenure bill was not the conduct of Andrew Johnson, but the peculiar and perilous relation of Congress with the Executive. If, as General Butler says, the Tenure bill was levied at Andrew Johnson alone, and was passed upon no general considerations what-ever, then it ought to be repealed. But if Johnson's conduct was merely the revelation of a danger to which public attention had not been previously called, then the repeal should not be carried until the public danger is demonstrated not to exist. Now the debate which led to the passage of the law did not proceed upon Andrew Johnson's delinquencies, but upon general and constitutional considerations.

Mr. Davis of New York, of whose remarks we have seen but a brief report, said that the Senate could not be a party to any responsibility for the retention of improper persons. Without demanding whether it is practicable to hold the President to any power responsibility, it may be asked whether the Senate can be held to any responsibility for improper appointments? An unfit officer is the fault of the Senate quite as much as of the Executive; and to suppose that the Senate would insist upon retaining a dishonest or incompetent officer is to assert that it would consent to the overthrow of the constitution to be questioned? If we recur to the Constitution we must agree that it does not mean to authorize the Executive arbitrarily to make a clean sweep of the officers to whose appointment the Senate has just consented. Still there was no defense against such unconstitutional action. Senators engaged in precisely that performance. The attention of Congress and the country was called to it—and the Tenure bill was framed.

The Senate has by no means the unchecked Executive that he is sometimes alleged to be. He is not solely responsible for the execution of the laws, but only for that an unintermediated authority of appointment. He must be satisfied with such officers as the Senate approves. The Senate can not, indeed, fill the offices without his participation, but neither can he fill them without the approval of the Senate. Presumptively, therefore, the responsibility is divided. Then the extent of the division must be determined by experience and grave reflection. But the obscure bill which has been passed by Congress, so far as it can be interpreted, authorizes the President to suspend merely, and then subjects even his nominating power to the will of the Senate. The President, it says, may suspend until the end of the next session of Congress; but if during that session the Senate refuses to confirm a nomination to the place he may make another. But how if the Senate does not refuse, and does not confirm? The suspension lasts to the end of the session, and the Senate has not acted. Is the office then vacant, or is the suspended officer restored? We defy any body to determine from the bill. General Butler says loudly, that of course the office is vacant. But General Butler is not the bill.

It is simply unpardonable that a law so important should be so obscure. It was not a question of skillful overreaching between the Senate and the House, but of the highest public welfare. If the House had had the patience to insist upon understanding what it was doing, and the resolution to teach General Butler that the interest of the country and not his wish was to determine the matter, this absurd result would have been avoided. It is a settlement that settles nothing, and that will return to plague those who contrived at it.

COTTON CULTIVATION IN INDIA.

The Cotton Supply Association, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Cotton Spinners' Association of Manchester, which together represent the combined cotton-producing and manufacturing interests of England, appeared before the Duke of Argyle, at the India Office in London, on the 12th of March, to urge upon the British East India Company the adoption of more active measures for increasing the supply of cotton from India. They conceded that they were now "in fact off the raw material"—a condition which, coming from such sources, will be deemed by this country conclusive as to the true state of that much mooted and hitherto doubtful question. "For eight years," said Mr. Cheetham, "the cotton manufacture had not been supplied with six days' work per week."

The deputation complained that, while in India there were sixteen millions of acres under cotton cultivation, no more cotton was produced than from two hundred acres in the United States. What the deputation wanted in India was better canal and railway communication, improved means of irrigation, and model farms for the use in India of American cotton and the use of more manure, which it seems was used for burning instead of being applied to the land.

The question what policy should be pursued opens a matter of vast interest to us and to England. The East India Company is older than our government. It was a commercial-interest monopoly in 1698, in the reign of William III. It became entitled to territorial possessions in 1767, and subsequently to territorial revenues. Its military powers were constantly enlarged by successive conquests and additional legislation, until they embraced the complete government of a vast empire. The company, which consists of about 1800 proprietors, is controlled as to its laws and regulations by a council of fifteen, seven elected by the Court of Directors and eight by the Crown. Its authority to be persons who had either resided in India or served under its government. The Crown may remove any officer of the Company at any time.

The Company abandoned its property, territorial and commercial, to Great Britain, on a satisfactory accounting and to its profit, and the payment of certain dividends, and now exists as a great engine of State, invested with the control and government of a country annexed to the British Crown.

The means are ample for acceding to the requests of the Lancashire associations; but whether it is prudent to do so, as to rely upon the cultivation of cotton in the United States, is the question which must in time be solved.

Although the cotton-plant is indigenous to Hindostan and other of the East India possessions, its cultivation is attended with serious difficulties. Instead of the long staple fibre and the refreshing rains which fall as they are required in our cotton district, Hindostan has a regular rainy season, is visited with severe monsoons, and is troubled with a pest of insects that the most oppressing to those engaged in agricultural industry. It is so severe as to render the cultivation almost impossible. From these causes, in great part, arise the complaint of the Manchester associations that the cultivation of 16,000,000 acres in cotton gives only the product which in the United States is raised on 2,000,000.

The cultivation of the cotton-plant resembles more nearly that of the tree than any vegetation than any other. The process of preparation, planting, plowing, hoeing, picking, cleaning, and baling, requires increased labor distributed over the surface of the soil, to the advantage which can be derived from the most favorable natural causes. The heat, assisted with frequent rains, necessary to bring the plant to perfection, and the degree of frost necessary to destroy the plant—which otherwise would need to be grubbed out, or would be perpetual and incurable—exist in the United States in due proportions. In tropical India the plant is not after maturity destroyed by frost; on the contrary, heavy labor is necessary to accomplish its destruction along with the weeds which are protected by the same mildness of climate. Great cracks and fissures in the earth are produced in India by the extraordinary heat, which renders irrigation difficult—an aid to cultivation which, even in more favored climates, is expensive and troublesome. If irrigation were necessary in any part of our cotton region the portion condemned to this necessity could not well compete with those portions which are naturally and abundantly supplied. It is undoubtedly good policy to provide by artificial means to supply crops with water during portions of the season—a feature which is too much neglected—but that is a very different matter from what is required in India.

The effort to play off India against the United States, which, with respect to cotton, has been the policy of England for many years, will, after no heavy expense, piled up into a permanent debt, the fruit also of many wars, and of the unnatural attempt to coerce an enormous population to pursue a policy adapted wholly to foreign interests.

The report of ordinary revenue and expenditure of the Government of India for the year 1868 shows a net surplus of £240,000; but it appears, however, that, including the charges for what is called remunerative public works in the expenditure, a deficiency of £2,801,244 is found, which is £1,800,000 greater than the estimate in March, 1868, made by the Government of India, which difference is supposed to have been caused by advances to SHERE ALI, by disbursements on account of the drought, and payments to the East India Irrigation Company, some of which will be repaid.

The DUKE OF ARGYLE, it seems, is quite willing to go on with further and large expenditure to gratify the Manchester manufacturers. He would give what he calls the great cotton district of Charwar by a line of railway. Charwar lies in or near the province of Candeish, south of the Nerbudda Mountains. The Duke says that finding there was sufficient "information in the office to warrant him in concluding that there was a strong prima facie case for the extension of the work," a survey was determined upon, and the gentleman appointed to carry out the survey was then on his way to India. Another road, between Bombay and Western China, was proposed, but, added the Duke, Sir JOHN LAWRENCE opposed it because "the dangerous character of the native tribes, and the rough nature of the country itself, would involve our explorers in very serious difficulties, that would bring about another Abyssinian expedition."

The "lack of the raw material" of which the several Manchester associations complain is due in great part to the fact that America is afraid of over-production in India, and the natives of India are afraid of over-production in the United States. It is very certain that with all the disadvantages of climate and population which prevail in India, and the great distance from the English market, the India cultivator, oppressed with a distant and hostile government, can not compete successfully with the cotton-producing region in the United States, which, if undisturbed by this competition, would produce all that England requires.

The time referred to by MR. CREEHAM, the President of the Cotton Supply Association, as being that in which "the cotton manufacture had not been supplied with six days' work per week," is that which has intervened since the commencement of the war in this country. Anterior to the war no such contingency was made, and although the United States was the great source of supply to England for raw cotton, it was constantly furnished as a low price. Competition between producers in this country made combinations impossible. Upon this law England may still rely, but as long as she creates the impression here that she can, and will, seriously affect the world's production, the price of cotton will be adjusted to the apparent risk. At Preston, in England, the trade is in great confusion. Wages have been cut down from five to ten per cent.; workmen had struck, and mills had stopped. The anomaly of a complaint of the want of the raw material, and inability to manufacture profitably what is on hand exists.

From the beginning of our existence as a nation the policy of England toward us has been short-sighted, and in many respects unfriendly. She is now reaping the fruits of her errors. Her statesmen ought to have perceived that our country so forced as ours by Providence would offer large inducements for immigration from over-peopled lands. But instead of turning a friendly eye toward us she has aided in the development of less favored regions. Her surplus population and wealth have been buried in India, in Australia, in Canada, and scattered in smaller settlements. They remain in no part of the world a force capable of aiding the home government; on the contrary, she will find that these settlements as they get ripe will drop off from the parent stem, remaining attached only so long as may be necessary to develop maturity. India will be no exception to this rule. The largest portion of the earth has been neglected until now, when it would appear that her paupers are being thrown upon us as a relief from the dreadful drought with which she has lately been visited. Ireland and Germany have sent their populations to the United States, and to-day, instead of the conservative influence which English emigration might have produced over our institutions, capable of being reflected upon hers, our country is afflicted with elements of a disturbing character which would be wielded against England if they were not steadily controlled.

The jealousy and want of friendly spirit with here hitherto weakened England are still operating in the efforts of the cotton and mercantile associations in Manchester to prop up an unnatural policy in India. The eminent orator who in the last change which has come over the fortunes of England by extending the franchise—for the first time—occupies a seat in the Cabinet, can in no better way serve his country and ours than by proving to the English that nothing better can now be done, late though it be, than to abandon India to her fate, and, advancing by the above course, rely mainly for raw material and food on the productions of the United States.

The judgment of imprisonment for life passed upon FENIAN HARRISON the crime of murder inflicted under the forms of law and the most terrible maladministration of his office of Governor-General of India, by the Lord Chief Justice, secret torture, violence to women, extermination by fire and sword, desolation and famine inflicted upon thousands—these were his instrumentalities. "I was resolved," said he of one of the best Rajahs, "to draw from his guilt the means of relieving the Company's necessities."

EDMUND BURKE declared that the system constituted by Providence specially to present to the English nation the great enormity of HASTINGS's wickedness and crimes, but that nation has acquitted him. Impartial history also adjudges that the tribunal which protected HASTINGS from punishment was corrupted by the desire to share in the wealth of India.

In tracing the decline of England many will agree that its commencement was due to the assertion of the principle by the House of Commons that the control of the Executive in this decision, that power shall be enjoyed in defiance of what is right and just—a path which must be retraced before England can stand upon her ancient ground.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.

WE are very sorry to be compelled by the letter of MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. of March 27, 1869, to recur to the subject of their withholding a box of electrotypes for Sir LAURENCE KELLY'S "Cast up by the Sea," which they knew to be intended for MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS.

MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. state that for reasons satisfactory to them they determined upon some "reprisal" against MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, and resolved to publish "Cast up by the Sea," which MR. HARPER had announced; "we being under the impression," say MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., "that they had purchased the work from MR. MACMILLAN & Co. the 1st of January (not in December as we stated) a box was delivered to them from London, in which they found "ten electrotypes with MACMILLAN & Co.'s name on the box, and by the Sea.' Thinking it probable that some break had occurred in the arrangement between MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS and MACMILLAN & Co., we waited a reasonable time expecting to hear from London about these electrotypes." On the 13th of January MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. wrote to MR. MACMILLAN & Co. for an explanation. Their letter was answered on the 30th of January, and on the 13th of February MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. advised MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS.

To end the whole matter, we publish the following extract and letters:

Extract from a letter from Alexander Macmillan to Mr. Lippincott, October 28, 1868.

"About the BAKER, which is nearly ready, MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS have had the sheets for some advantageous, and we accepted, and the sheets are now printing off, the casts of the blocks."

From Messrs. Macmillan & Co. to Messrs. Harper & Brothers.

LONDON, March 8, 1869.

DEAR SIRS,—The readiest explanation of the unfortunate delay with regard to the electrotypes of Sir S. BAKER'S book will be found in the letter of our printer, of which we inclose a copy.

MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT were aware that we had arranged with you about the book, having been so informed by us in a letter dated October 28.

We are, Dear Sirs, &c.,
(Sgd.) MACMILLAN & CO.

(Inclosed in the above.)
PHILLIPS, SON, & NEALE, PRINTERS, STREET HILL, E. C.,
LONDON, March 5, 1868.

GENTLEMEN,—In answer to your letter respecting the electros of "Cast up by the Sea," the following is the particulars:

The casts were ordered by you to be forwarded to MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, and they were made, packed, and dispatched on the 3d December; but, by the carelessness of our packer, the case was directed to MESSRS. LIPPINCOTT & CO., instead of to MESSRS. HARPER.

We can offer no excuse for his error, your directions being most clear.

We are, Gentlemen,
Your obedient servants,
(Sgd.) E. CLAY, SONS, & TAYLOR.

Having been distinctly informed, as the preceding extract shows, that a satisfactory arrangement had been concluded with MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS for sheets and cuts, MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO. now say that they were "under the impression" that there was such an arrangement; notwithstanding which they waited for six weeks, during which they issued their work from the press, before informing MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS that they had received electrotypes which they had been informed two months before were intended for them.

Our object in alluding to the subject is merely to help MESSRS. J. B. LIPPINCOTT "to place ourselves [themselves] right before the public," which they declare to have been their purpose in their first letter to the London Athenæum. As that purpose seems now to be fully accomplished we shall not again refer to the subject.

MR. MOTLEY.

OUR friend and neighbor, the Sun, in warmly urging the claims of MR. GREELEY to the English mission, is employed by its eager friendship for that gentleman into a singular injustice toward MR. MOTLEY, when it says: "MR. J. CARROLL HARRISON, nominally of Indiana, but American by birth, but a European by residence and association."

Now the truth is, that as there is no more conspicuous an there is no more genuine American than MR. MOTLEY. He has devoted his life to historical study and composition, and every page of his works glows with his ardent and profound sympathy with the American principle, and with American institutions. At the beginning of the rebellion MR. MOTLEY was an honored guest in England; but he devoted himself with all his eloquence and ability, and with even a passionate patriotism, to correct the British misapprehension, and to withstand the British prejudice in regard to this country. And, not content with a private protest, he published an admirable and well-remembered pamphlet upon "The Causes of the American Civil War," in which he stated, with unanswerable force, the historical and natural argument for the Union; and when, on our excellent friend will remember, WAS at the time when MR. GREELEY was saying, "If the cotton States unitedly and earnestly wish to withdraw peacefully from the Union, we think they should and would be allowed to do so."

When MCCRACKEN went down—dropping from the clouds—upon the foreign reporters, reporting of them what he chose, and MR. SEWARD wrote his unworthy letter, MR. MOTLEY immediately replied in a tone that should have shamed MR. SEWARD, as it commended the historian more closely to every American heart. During the last Presidential campaign MR. MOTLEY'S speech in Boston was not merely a masterly argument, but an argument conceived in the best national spirit, while his address, a few weeks afterward, before the New York Historical Society, upon "Historic Progress and American Democracy," was a swift and searching survey of the development of the great principle in defiance to which, in the last words, the America stands upon the firm and toward which other nations are slowly making their way through revolutions or without them.

MR. MOTLEY is a positive, almost aggressive American in every fibre; and should he be sent to England as Minister of this country, the public may be assured that he would bring to his duties not only an ample acquaintance with public law, and a sensitive regard to the national honor, but he would be the most representative of what is best and most characteristic in American faith and character.

BEAUTIFUL.

THAT pleasant paper, the New York World, says, in one of its recent numbers, that it would be glad to get rid of all journals which aim to discuss public questions upon their merits." In a parallel column of the same Number it discloses its idea of such a discussion in the following paragraph:

"The pretended Governor of Louisiana has signed the mixed-school bill. This is a measure of 'peace.' The little wool-heads are to be pigged in along with taxes cure, and the white man foots the bill."

This forcibly illustrates another truth expressed in the same Number. "It is not our practice to discuss public questions in a narrow spirit which sees nothing in them beyond their bearing upon the success of the politics of the hour." Oh no! said MR. Weller. Oh, certainly not!

A CASE OF JUGGLERY.

In a curious old book, written by Abrahama Sancta Clara, born 1642, died 1709, and entitled, "Something for Every One," is mentioned a juggling trick which, incomprehensible as it seems to us, was, it seems, perfectly practised in those days. One person in particular, Hiesio Mario Fredo, a Maltese, who practised it in perfection, is thus described:

"He would have a vessel brought full of tepid water, and fifteen or twenty glasses, which were large at top, and he would then rinse his mouth out to show that he had nothing between his teeth. When he had swallowed some glasses full he would spurt out a liquid like red wine; then would follow brandy, rose-water, orange-water, white wine, and the like, which things were all to be known by their taste. It was observed, however, that he always began with the red wine. Sometimes he swallowed twenty glasses of water, and spurted it out again like a jet d'eau." Colonel Richardson Cassell Strafreye, whose scholars were all the like sort of jugglers, to be put in prison, and threatened to hang him unless he proved his art to be natural, and not connected with magic. This the Maltese did in great accuracy, and was then liberated, to earn his living as before."

With the description a wood-cut is given, in which the performer is represented standing upright, with his head thrown back, while from his mouth a jet of water is seen to play. There could have been nothing displeasing in the exhibition.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 29:

In the Senate, joint resolutions of the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and South Carolina ratifying the Fifteenth Amendment were submitted.—A message was received announcing the unanimous action of the House in the Senate's action on the Tenure-of-Office bill. Senator THURMAN moved that the Senate insist, and made a long argument on the constitutionality of the original act. Senator MORTON argued in favor of repeal. The motion to insist was agreed to.

In the House, MR. BINGHAM offered a resolution, which was adopted, reciting that on March 3, 1869, a law against the Executive, called the Administration, bonds to the amount of $2,000,000 were, by order of President Johnson, prepared for issue, and $1,000,000 of them were issued to the Central Pacific Railroad of California, in contempt of the already existing restriction of certain sections of that railroad, and that alleged bonds were also being wrongfully and illegally approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The resolution authorized a clause to immediately investigate the charges.

March 30:

In the House, a message was received from the Senate announcing that a Committee of Conference had been appointed on the Tenure-of-Office bill. The House refused to recede from its action, and voted 106 to 40. A Committee of Conference was appointed.

March 31:

In the Senate, the report of the Conference Committee on the Tenure-of-Office bill was submitted and agreed to 42 to 5. The bill reported repeals the third and second sections of the act of the Tenure-of-Office Act of March 2, 1867. The first section of the Senate amendment to be left untouched; the second section amended so as to read as follows:

"That during any recess of the Senate the President is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to suspend any officer appointed as aforesaid by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, except Judges of the United States Courts, until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed at the pleasure and discretion of the President or another to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the interim, and such person shall perform and shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the officer suspended, and shall, during the time he performs his duties, be entitled to the salary or compensation of such officer, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended; and if at the time the duty of the President shall be to act after the commencement of every session of the Senate and before the same shall have advised and consented to or before the same shall have advised and consented to fill all vacancies that exist by reason of the recess, he shall forthwith make a nomination to such vacancy, not to be filled, to nominate persons to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, or whether temporarily filled or not, and so in the case of all vacancies occurring if the office is one requiring such session, shall refuse to advise and consent to the appointment of any person in place of another, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate some suitable person to fill such vacancy until the end of the Senate for said office."

In the House, the report of the Conference Committee on the Tenure-of-Office bill was adopted, 103 to 69.

April 1:

In the House, the bill to organize a provisional government in Mississippi was postponed, 101 to 69.

April 2:

In the Senate, the Indian Appropriation bill was passed with an amendment providing for the appointment of a board of ten commissioners, to be selected for their intelligence and philanthropy, to examine and audit the accounts of the appropriations for Indian purposes; the commissioners to have joint control with the Interior Department in the direction of the President.

In the House, a bill was passed authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to extend its Northern Pacific Railroad from Portland, Oregon, to Puget Sound, and to connect the same by branch, and to be entitled to any subsidies, moneys, or lands that may be granted to such lands as may be included in the right of way.

April 3:

In the House, the Miscellaneous Deficiency Bill was passed.

NEWS ITEMS.

Congress had determined to adjourn on the 10th.

General Joseph Hooker has been confirmed by the Senate as Surveyor of the Port of New Orleans.

General A. S. Webb succeeds Sheridan in Richmond on the 3d, succeeding General Stoneman. Among his last orders were one reinstating Governor Pierpont. General Canby is soon to relieve General Webb.

The Secretary of the Treasury on the 29th shows the total amount, less cash in the Treasury to be $2,398,196,611. Leaving the public debt at that time about $2,592,039.

FOREIGN NEWS.

SPAIN.

MARSHAL PRIM asks for 50,000 men for the army. The government has a majority in the Constituent Cortes. Constitution in regard to royalty establishes a hereditary monarchy, the King to be crowned during life.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Twenty-eight persons were killed outright by an explosion at the Abercarn Colliery, in Lancashire, on the 16th.

The Royal Commission of the British Parliament, appointed to inquire into the laws of naturalization, recommend that naturalization papers be revoked as alienating British subjects from their allegiance to England. They also recommend the repeal and total abolition of the disabilities of aliens to hold landed property.

Ireland drinks less whisky than Scotland, though her population is twice as large. The Irish Board shows that while the latter country drank in 1868, 18,196,421 gallons, the Irish drank but 8,718,316 gallons. England at the same time consuming more than both together—over 30,000,000 of gallons.

Late advices from Cape Town, Africa, four hundred miles east of country in South-eastern Africa, four hundred miles long, and from fifteen to one hundred miles in the interior broad. Several times over, occasioning great destruction of property. Several earthquakes perished in the flames.

At a recent trial in Montauban, France, it was proved that eight wretched women with the most perverted through a long series of years with the most inhuman crimes. They were tried and convicted of the crimes of infanticide and of pouring abortion; in the latter case, some as agents, some as principals. One woman, the central figure of the group, Delpech, was proved to have murdered no less than nine infants, one her own daughter's illegitimate child, and finally, one her own daughter's illegitimate child, and under the circumstances of the most inconceivable and fiendish brutality.

THE REV. FREDERICK D. HUNTINGTON, D.D.

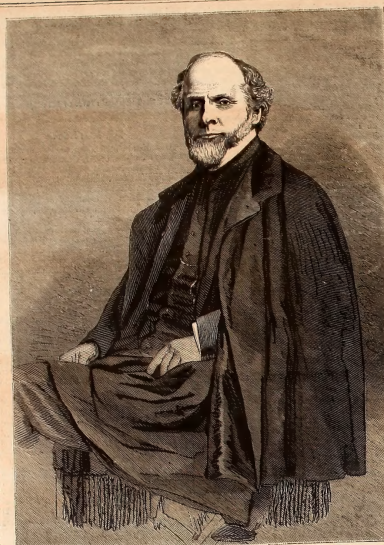
THE consecration of the Rev. F. D. HUNTINGTON as Bishop of the diocese of Central New York in the Protestant Episcopal Church takes place on the 8th instant, at Emmanuel Church, Boston. The presiding Bishop, Dr. SMITH, of Kentucky, acts on that occasion as the consecrator.

There is no divine connected with the American Episcopal Church who is better known or more widely appreciated than Rev. F. D. HUNTINGTON. He was born in Hadley, Massachusetts, May 28, 1819, and is, therefore, now nearly fifty years of age. He was graduated at Amherst in 1839, and studied three years in the divinity school of Cambridge. In 1842 he was ordained pastor of the South Congregational Church, in Boston, which he left in September, 1855, when he was inaugurated as Plummer professor of Christian morals at Harvard College, Cambridge, becoming at the same time preacher to the University. Dr. HUNTINGTON found, as many other sincere and profound thinkers have found, that narrowness of views was not confined to those professing evangelical beliefs; he also discovered that pretensions to a superior liberality frequently covered a deep-seated uncharitableness and a supercilious conceit. There is a stage in the career of every man whose intellect has been aroused and brought to bear with its full force upon religious doctrine when none of the channels of ordinary life seems to him to be free and untrammeled; he becomes, therefore, for a season an innovator. If he does not completely isolate himself from his fellows he revolts against the usages which they have established.

Thus those who knew best the stuff of which Dr. HUNTINGTON was made were not surprised to learn that he was an "innovator" even at Cambridge. He established a religious service of his own, which may be termed an "eclectic" service, since it was formed from those in use in the principal branches of the Christian Church.

This era in Dr. HUNTINGTON'S life soon closed. Those who have been so fortunate as to read his writings from 1856 to 1860 will easily mark the transition from the period of unsettled and baffled search after some impracticable system which should correct all errors and harmonize all truths, to that in which the search was abandoned, when the intellect partially yielded its higher grounds, and descended to the common levels of life, where its efforts, though less grand and more circumscribed, were yet more practical and more subservient to the ends of Christianity.

It is now several years since Dr. HUNTINGTON united himself to the American Episcopal Church. His efforts in the new career which he then commenced have been fully appreciated, and have been abundantly rewarded by their successful results.



REV. FREDERICK D. HUNTINGTON, D.D., BISHOP OF CENTRAL NEW YORK.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY MARSHALL, BOSTON.]

CUBAN LADIES IN COUNCIL.

THE Cuban residents of New York city are numerous, and they have, especially the ladies, exhibited the greatest enthusism in furnishing moral encouragement and material aid to the efforts being made by Cuban patriots for the independence of their native isle.

It was in the room represented in our illustration on this page that the late meeting in Steinway Hall was provided for; and there also have originated the concerts and other enterprises undertaken in this city in behalf of the Cuban cause.

THE "NIAGARA OF THE WEST."

THE Great West is still to a considerable extent unexplored; and its beauties and sublime scenery, now comparatively unknown, will in a few years attract the attention of thousands of sight-seers, tourists, and earth-wanderers, who, tired at the oft-looked-at scenery of Italy and Switzland, will seek the wonderful and sublime in nature now hidden in the Rocky Mountains, or yet to be developed in Central Africa.

In our illustration on page 248 we have a view of the "Niagara of the West," the great Snake River or Shoshone Falls, the savage grandeur and wild sublimity of which are almost indescribable. Snake River, or the Lewis Fork of the Columbia, winding its way in a northwesterly direction, suddenly reaches and dashes over a fall of thirty feet, its volume being broken into half a dozen streams by dark rocks rising out of its flood. A little farther on, divided into three streams, it bounds down a wall of rock some sixty feet in depth; while still a little farther on, its waters suddenly narrowed to about four hundred feet, the whole river leaps in one unbroken body down a precipice of two hundred and ten feet. The ever-rising mist, with its changing prismatic hues; the wild leap of the mad river down into the abyss beneath; the frowning and jutting rocks of black and gray, which cast their shadows over the sluggish, leaden-looking water, that seems exhausted after its desperate leap; the dark look of the towering banks which rise a thousand feet above the river; and the deafening roar which ever meets the ear, combine to form a picture of Nature's power, sublimity, and grandeur, before which man can only stand awe-struck, filled with reverence and admiration. These Falls are four miles from the crossing of Rock Creek, on the coach-road between Salt Lake City and Boise, the capital of Idaho.

THE PRESIDENT'S STABLE.

FORTUNATELY our President is a man of equable temperament. His practical good sense easily overcomes many of the difficulties of his position. He wisely distinguishes between what he ought to do, and what he is asked or advised to do. Thus he escapes many of the harassing circumstances which hastened the death of TAYLOR and of HARRISON. While the organs of the Opposition daily represent him as enmeshed in the entanglements of his office, his friends see him free, untrammeled, and refusing to be trammeled by self-seeking politicians. Even thus the labors devolving upon him are many and severe; but they are cheerfully borne.

CUBAN LADIES IN COUNCIL AT THE HOUSE OF SENORA R. HOURRITINER, NEW YORK CITY.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

THE STABLE OF THE WHITE HOUSE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY L. E. WALKER.]

It is an inexpressible relief to our President that he is domestic in his habits and tastes, that he takes unusual pleasure in the midst of his children, in the care of the grounds about the White House, and in his horses.

Our illustration on this page of the stable of the White House shows the principal horses in President GRANT'S possession. "Egypt" and "Cincinnati," shown in the centre, are the pride of the stable. Below this cut we give another, showing "Red" and "Billy Botton" carrying the children to school. "Reb" was captured in the Vicksburg campaign and presented to FREDERICK GRANT, the President's eldest son. "Billy Button" belongs to the era of peace.

BOOK-MOTHS.

THERE are some houses so circumstanced in regard to dampness that they seem to conduce to the multiplication of insects to an extraordinary degree. Thus, some places are infested with cockroaches, especially if there are water-pipes leading extensively through the premises. Others are beset with armies of small red ants, so minute that they creep through the narrowest chink into drawers, trunks, and closets, in search of whatever answers their purpose for food, but especially are they always on the qui vive for sweets. Literary people are occasionally annoyed by the depredations of minute insects which feed luxuriously on their fine books, manuscripts, and pamphlets. They are popularly known as book-moths. They appear to be in search of the paste, glue, and sizing which are used by the binders. However old and dry the books may be, if the room in which they are kept, or the cases in which they are arranged, are slightly damp, it softens the old glue or size by imbibition, just the condition required by the invaders. In gnawing it from the paper surface into which it originally penetrated, they also destroy the texture of the leaves, so that costly works are quite ruined. There is no better remedy than placing the books at once in a dry room where the moisture evaporates; and if the sunlight acts upon the windows daily, so much the better. The moths disappear when the paste becomes too hard for them. Or rather their activity is suspended, to be revived on again removing the books into a damp apartment. Russian binding is so offensive to them that they can not attack books in Russia leather book-binding.

"REB" AND "BILLY BUTTON" CARRYING THE PRESIDENT'S CHILDREN TO SCHOOL.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER XVII.

A WEDDING.

As the little story runs on, we must come again to Mr. Hagbut's office.

Was this actually Carry? Yes, it was actually Carry. Rebecca had helped to dress her, but Rebecca could throw her, when she was ready, into the room in her modest bride's dress. She was so pretty and so bright that Rebecca scarcely knew her sister.

Rebecca was by no means acting as bridesmaid: far from it. In the first place, her father had warned against bridesmaids altogether; and in the course of a somewhat peppery conversation with Rebecca had said that she herself considered that her relations with the bridegroom had been, had much better stay away herself. But Rebecca, getting more and more sure of her position with her father every day, had declined to stay away.

"Not see old Carry married!" she said; "I am sure I would not miss it for all the world. She has been a dear, good, loving sister to me, and has borne more petulance from me than I ever have from any."

"Then you don't feel any spite against her or him?" said Mr. Turner.

"Law, pa, what nonsense!" said Rebecca.

Although there were no real bridesmaids, at the solemn moment young ladies were, as Harriet Morley (or, for that matter, Hetty) would have said, "sold off" to act in that capacity. They were Rebecca Soper's school, and they were as copiously as any bridemaids at St. George's, Hanover Square. Carry did not feel at all as if she wanted to cry; but she thought it was the proper thing to do, and cried hard.

The neighbors came in and chattered and giggled—Mrs. Russel and Miss Soper among them. After they had come in and saluted the bride Miss Soper drove her sharp elbow into Mrs. Russel's side, and said:

"Is he coming?

"Who?" said Mrs. Russel.

"Morley."

"I don't know," said Mrs. Russel. "Don't shove like that; you've broke two of my ribs, I do believe."

"Where's she?" said Miss Soper.

"Who?" said Mrs. Russel.

"Rebecca."

"I don't know," said Mrs. Russel. "She will hardly have the face to show, I should think. I wish you would get out of that trick of running your elbow into another person's ribs when you ask a question. I'm black and blue—No. Why, that's her, with his gain the wall?"

It was he, Mrs. Russel. That grand beauty, with her cheek on her hand and her elbow on her knee, who sat alone, with her great speculative eyes, seeing beyond you and the crowd behind you, was Rebecca. And as she sat there that morning, all alone, dressed in dove-colored silk and pearls, there was scarcely a handsomer woman in all the room. Training, from nature to costume. Your eye was not trained for beauty; you could not see it.

Miss Soper could, to a certain extent. In her business of schoolmistress she had had so much beauty put under her eye that she knew it when she saw it. Russel's definition of beauty would have limited itself to "a fresh complexion." Miss Soper had a dim idea of generalizing from fact. Jewelers' clerks get a knowledge of what is the prevailing taste in jewelry. An old picture-dealer's clerk will tell you what will sell, and what will not. So Soper, in her way, knew a pretty girl when she saw one, though in her office of drudge she disliked receiving them. But she knew more. She was well-connected in the trade, and she knew houses who would take an article which was seldom offered to her, and which often, in her way of doing things, gave her great trouble—a very handsome girl. So looking at Rebecca, she said:

"She is wonderfully handsome."

"Do you think so, my dear?" said Mrs. Russel. "I don't see it."

"No one ever supposed so," said Miss Soper.

"Don't shove again, dear; pray don't," said Mrs. Russel.

"I forget," said Mrs. Russel.

As it seemed that Miss Soper had forgotten also, she resumed the discussion at another point.

"Shall we go and speak to her?" said Miss Soper.

"My dear soul," said the really good Russel, "I think we ought. The poor child is pining over Mr. Hagbut; it would be only kind."

Was she, Mrs. Russel? No, she was away from you all, with the sounds of the great sea. While she had been sitting there in her dove-colored silk all alone she had watched your figures till she had tired of them, and had gone to sea once or twice. You were quite out of her thought. She did not want to be naughty, but she could. Why did not you leave her alone?

She could be handsome enough; and she had the most intense dislike for these two ladies. If you had told her that Mrs. Russel was only a fair-pretender, gossiping with the world, and given the bed from under her to release the son she had scolded out of doors, she would have laughed at you. If you had told her that intolerable woman, Miss Soper, was in her way a heroine, and had shaved all her life to keep a ruined family together, and was always training virtuous women, had done more good than was ever likely to fall to the share of our poor Rebecca, she would have laughed at you again. Their formulas had been rendered hateful to her, and she hated them through their formulas, which had plagued her. She was a very naughty girl, and they made her naughtier.

She was sounding some dim wild cape in a gale of wind, and there were two with her whom she knew and one who always stood perversely behind her. And the one who stood behind her kept saying like a cuckoo, "Not yet. Not yet." And again like a blackbird, "Not till you're fit. Not till you're fit." And she suddenly approach to her her deadly enemies, the Russel and the Soper. What reader would trust her temper under such circumstances?

She rose and gave them a sweeping courtesy, and, may I say it, the devil entered into her. It was only a very little one.

"Are you quite well, Miss Turner?" said the fat Russel.

"I am quite well, thank you," said Rebecca. "I had a holiday lately. It has done me much good."

"Indeed! another?" said the Soper, alluding to the terrible escapade to Ramsgate.

"Yes," said Rebecca, looking at her with a look which the Soper had never seen in any of her school-girl's faces, "Another. A young gentleman took me sea, came and took me out for a holiday, and he took me on the river all the way to Gravesend. And we were together all day."

"Who went with you, my dear?" said Mrs. Russel.

"He did," said Rebecca.

"No one else?"

"What did we want with any one else? He was very handsome and clever, and in a third would have been one too many. I should like you to be introduced to that young gentleman, Miss Soper. His hair is beautiful. Little curls all over his head. He sat at my feet the most of the time, and if I had had a pair of scissors I believe I should have popped off a few."

The allied powers retreated. Says Russel, "That girl will go to the bad."

"No she won't," said Soper in her ear. "She is just the very one of all others who won't. She is not in my line—I don't have that article in my establishment; but I have enough to know that."

Rebecca said to herself, "I am the only way to treat you people. If kings and princes would not make outrageous pretensions, democracy could die: at least so says so. Ha! you two! Carry shall not leave you."

She sat perfectly still after this, in her old attitude, quite unseen, knowing that they would come to her. The chairs being all arranged compactly, for the Philistines did not know exactly whether they ought to sit or stand, Mr. Hagbut father made no sign. "Those two" were quickly sitting beside her. She was determined to amuse herself, and in utter recklessness she replied, without raising her chin from her hand,

"Where is Hetty?"

"She is at home," said Mr. Morley.

"What is she doing?" said Rebecca, without moving.

"She is not doing any thing to-day," said young Hartrop. "She is getting the duds together. Change of ship, you know."

"Now, Jack," said Mr. Morley. "Mind your promise."

Rebecca, from young Hartrop's silence, thought that Morley must have been speaking to her. Putting her hand and looking up in his face she saw that his eyebrows were raised, and that the corners of his mouth were drawn down. She remembered he looked more handsome than any man she had ever seen. But she had noticed that before.

The next day's wedding and wedding you go to, when you have looked at the bridegroom long enough, look at the bride's father. If it is a well arranged marriage you will see a look of triumph in the eyes of both. This was not a well arranged wedding, for our poor Rebecca, whom I hope you have forgiven, had thrown away by her wild conduct. Mr. Hagbut had changed rather than alter his mind; there was a cloud over it by his mere presence. Mr. Turner, man of the world, knew this, and did not show to advantage; he was haggard and worn, and had his head.

He had been into the room and out again. She had scarcely noticed him at first, but when he came in a second time, she watched his bowed head and rose to her feet.

I know a young lady of such strange and radiant beauty, that I and my companion always know, when we go to a country gathering, in one instant, whether she is there or not. Rebecca's beauty was not so great as that lady's I will allow; yet when she rose from her bench Harriet and Mr. Morley her presence was felt. The babble which was going on in the room while the bridegroom died into whispers—into silence—as she came softly forward and kissed her father.

"Give me your blessing, father."

Turner raised his head as she bent here.

"The Lord of Miriam and of Joel bless them, my daughter. " Smite as Joel, then sing as Miriam. Thou art blessed, oh my daughter!"

And so he kissed her, and she went back and sat between Hartrop and Mr. Morley again.

"He has forgiven her," whispered Mrs. Russel.

"Hold your tongue," said Miss Soper. "There is something that I can understand about this, and so I don't suppose you can."

"Keep close to me you two," said Rebecca, in a whisper, "I am frightened. Don't leave me you two."

"Are you ill?" said Hartop, also in a whisper.

"No, I am never ill. But these people frighten me. This house is frightful, and the lane is frightful. I can not know what this house is. There is poison in it. My father can not give me his blessing without frightening me. And Carry says she saw Hetty's blood at the foot of the stairs," she added, wildly and hurriedly. "Why should he talk of Joel?"

"I wish Hetty was here," said Hartop, in a low voice.

"Quiet, my child, quiet!" said Mr. Morley, laying his hand on her arm; "talk of something else. What shall we talk of?"

"The sea," said Rebecca, herself in an instant; "I want to know about the sea, or about Hetty Morley."

"There is no such person," said Hartop, turning and looking into Rebecca's face.

"No such person!" said Rebecca, aghast. "Is she drowned?"

"Not a bit of it," said Hartop, bringing his face close to hers; "Hetty is alive, but she is not Hetty Morley. She and I were married by Mr. Morley yesterday morning."

Her dull horror of the old house and the quaint company was overcome by this pretty piece of news. It was something so bright, so human, so—well, so romantic, that a great smile spread over her face, as she said,

"No."

"Fact, I assure you. Yesterday morning. You were not in the way, but I saw you were getting low." And, indeed, the tact of this young sailor was very great, for Rebecca was quite roused again by the news.

"You provoking people. I want to see Hetty, and you will tell me nothing of her."

"It wouldn't do to," said Hartop; "they wouldn't stand it."

"But what is she like?" asked Rebecca.

"What is she like?" said the bridegroom. "Why, she is like her father: that's about what she is like. And we're soon blue," he growled.

Rebecca turned on Mr. Morley. "She is like you?"

"Put younger, and I know, and more good looking," said Mr. Morley, with a bow.

And Rebecca had just settled emphatically in her mind that Hetty was very handsome, when enter the bridegroom.

"Why, that is never him," said Rebecca, suddenly.

It was, though. A man at his best—and a man generally makes the best of himself when he is going to be married—is a very different thing from a man at his worst. Rebecca and Hartop had only known him at his worst, and even Morley, knowing him better than they did, was surprised. "That fat, pale-faced man," he thought, "has actually more vitality than I have. Carry will just suit him." And it had been what he has been, I could not have shown such a presence."

A man, we must remember, with sufficient physique for the first or second life-guards, who has spent his life in talking religionism to foolish and sentimental women, is very likely to become fat, ill-dressed, and untidy. But put that man on his mettle. Get him rejected by a beautiful girl, and then bridegroom to another girl, and I fancy you will find some of the old Adam in him. There was a considerable load of the Adam in Hagbut that day; so much that he looked a rather noble person.

Rebecca leaned back in wonder, and said aloud that she knew that no one could hear but Mr. Morley and Hartop, and she did not "mind them," "I could not have believed it. Why the man is handsome, and good looking."

"Is there any reason why he should not look noble?" said Mr. Morley, quietly. "My dear child, that rose has been made good in this day than ever you will have the chance of doing, even if you had the power or the will. His formulas displeased you, they were purely scripture, and move the dead bones of the middle class into life. His formulas displease you; that very vulgarity is the key-note of his power among the vulgar, who would dislike and possibly resent the minimizations of a less pronounced Christianity. I do not understand their ways of thought, and you would continually keep their inferiority before their eyes, by living in a dialect more refined than their own. I pray God that when I die I may claim to have done as much good as Hagbut has."

"Yes!" said Rebecca, thinking.

"Yes, indeed," said Morley. "There are those who say that God sent men as Hagbut, vulgarize religion. It is not true, or at best only half true. They find a vulgarized religion among vulgar people, and they preach it as honestly and as nobly as this man has; and he raises his people by doing so."

"How can he raise them by being vulgar?" asked Rebecca.

"He raises them, in spite of all his vulgarity, to the level of Christianity: and at that point both he and they cease to be vulgar. I dare say that the Covenanters ate with their knives, but they could die like the finest gentleman of the lot. While there are vulgar people you must have vulgar priests. I, being a gentleman myself, know that well. That man Hagbut, whose ways of speech and of action are an offense to me, has brought more souls to Christ than ever I shall bring with my twopenny refinements. He comes of their own class, and their language is his. Their language is foreign to me, and I can not imitate it. And that lower middle class is the very one which wants rousing and exciting. The great use of the dissenting clergymen is to rouse that class, and to arouse them. Hagbut can do it. I can not. I am a useless man compared to him."

"Yet you can bring sailors to chapel, Sir," said Hartop, quietly.

"Ah, yes, I can do that," said Mr. Morley, with a sudden illumination. "Yes, boy, I can do that. That was a good thing for you to say. Yes! yes! they come again and again. It is not utterly nothing to keep us in the faith their mothers taught them through all temptations. You must come down and hear me preach some day," Miss Turner. See, the bride is moving. We must go."

So they went. And Hagbut married Carry; and the Hagbut episode in her little life came to an end.

CHAPTER XVIII

CONFIDENCES.

And Carry was gone, and Rebecca had to undertake her duties.

"I shall make a fine mess of it at first, pa," she said to her father on the first day. "For I have been most diligently idle all my life. But I will do the best I can. I can't scold and worry, but I will keep the meals in order for all that. You sha'n't want any thing, my dear."

"You will do well enough if you care to do it," said Mr. Turner. "I don't want scolding or worrying; I have lost my faith in it. That is what made the mischief between your mother and me."

"Well, dear pa, that is all over and gone. We shall be happy together, you know."

"I don't know. You may be happy, for you have hope before you—the hope of my death. I am a broken man. I wish I was dead."

"Don't say so, don't wish why, father," said Rebecca, with a heavy heart and a light tongue; "that sometime you will. There any man in our employment more honored than you are? As for the money I am to have at your death, I wish you would leave it to Carry, and then you would not suspect my love."

"You are a foolish girl."

"I think you are a very foolish man," said Rebecca, stoutly; "that prospective money has been the greatest plague of my life; I wish it was in the deep Atlantic. That—that—Hagbut would have left me alone if it had not been for that money."

"You are too good for him," said Turner.

"Child, have you ever thought of any one else?"

"As a husband?"

"Yes; as a husband."

"Certainly," said Rebecca; "for a whole week I thought I should have liked very much to marry young Hartrop. He is all very well for you to laugh, pa, but you wouldn't like it yourself."

"Come here," said Mr. Turner. And Rebecca came and sat at his feet.

"I have been a hard father to you, my child, and I do not wonder at it. I have not been true. But I seem to have it. God is very good. He is not what I want to make him out, is He?"

Rebecca answered her father by raising his hand and putting it to her lips.

"My poor, loving child. I am a broken man; but I will do my duty to the very last. I am not to be trusted. This responsibility about Hetty's property is killing me. Had I known that I should have found my trust, kindest friend in you; but it is so. You will stay by me to the end?"

"To the death, father;" she did not want him to get excited, and so she said no more.

"You are a better man than I am, child, and I wander to-night. But, believe me, that Morley's God is the true God—is the true God—and you and Hetty will find it so. Where is the letter?"

"She is here, father," said Rebecca, putting Mab on his lap.

"Poor little beast; bonny little beast. Bark for us, little one. Defend us. My dear Rebecca, the God who made this little thing was not Hagbut's God, but Morley's God."

"There is one—but one God, father," said Rebecca. And she said it because she did not know what to say.

"Yes, but they make two or three. See, girl? Will you promise me one thing?"

"I will do as you tell me," said Rebecca; "if you will be always as you are now."

"Promise me that you will never join the established church after I am dead."

Rebecca sat silent for a long time. At last she said:

"I don't think that I could promise as much as that, father. I think it extremely improbable, but I will not pledge myself. I tell you honestly that if I were to quit our connection I should go either to the Moravians or to the Primitive Methodists."

"They are not a very high sect, my child," said Mr. Turner.

"I don't care a very high sect," said Rebecca; "that is just where it is."

CHAPTER XIX.

DARKER HOURS STILL.

DELL was the old house, dullar, alas! than ever it was, for there was not even old Carry now; and Mr. Turner, left alone in the house with the favorite daughter of his dead wife, began to mope and brood over that miserable old business. It was evident also to Rebecca that his mind was not by any means what it had been.

She was free to go where she would now, but she never went far out of the lane, except a few times as far as Putney Bridge. She used to slip across sometimes to see Mrs. Spicer or Mrs. Atkin, in quiet neighborly way, and hear their gossip, give them books, and other little things, doing them high honor. It would have been an evil time for any man who insulted her while Mr. Spicer or Atkin were near.

Those two worthies were the very picture of comfort and contentment every Sunday morning, each in his shirt-sleeves and a long pipe in his mouth, as Rebecca took her father to chapel; but one morning she missed them, and thought they had gone for an expedition somewhere. "It is very little pleasure they get," she thought. "We ought not to begrudge it to them." But when they got inside the chapel who should be sitting near the door but Spicer and Atkin in their best clothes! Rebecca flushed up with real pleasure, and when service was over, she made her father stop while she spoke to them.

"I am glad to see you here."

"Yes, Miss," replied Atkin. "It looked so nice seeing you and the gent your going every Sunday that we thought we'd go. That's about the size of it, Miss."

"I hope you like it."

"Yes, Miss, we likes it well enough," said Jim Atkin, "but we don't make much fist on it at first."

"Ah! you won't find it strange long," said Rebecca. And so they parted.

Her father walked home with her, and they went home under the dull gray sky, if she had asked these men to come to chapel; and she had said, "No, that she had never entertained the idea of," she said, "I am very glad of that. Whatever you do, don't undertake the responsibility of forcing religion on other people. Let them find it out for themselves—" He was going on to say a great deal more, as it seemed to Rebecca from the tone of his voice; but she checked him suddenly.

It was dull, miserable, dripping, motionless weather, and she sat day after day utterly alone while her father was away on business—more than save for her little dog. She tried hard to be very good, and, as is usually the case when a person tries, she succeeded. She had often said, in a vague way, that she would like to be married in Limehouse.

Many things in the housekeeping were great puzzles to her, and she used to take them patiently, and lay them as the feet of her beloved old nurse, Jeffreys, in Leader Street, Soho. But it was rather a long way there, so she saw but little of those excellent souls at present.

One day there came a letter which made her cry; it was from Mr. Morley. Jack Hartop and Hetty were off to sea, and Hetty was so hard at work, shifting into her new ship, that it would be quite impossible for her, or Jack either, to get to Waltham Green. He added, as soon as they were gone, he would very likely come and see her himself. She cried a good deal over this letter, but it was not in a meagre sort of fashion. That nightmare, Mr. Hagbut, being removed from his position of possible husband, she rather liked him otherwise, and was at peace now with all the world; and the Limehouse people had done her much good; and she was in one way and another very far from the blues a lot of times. She cried because she had wanted to see Hetty; and she told her father so, frankly, that night, which asked her why they were not read.

"Why do you want to see her?" he asked.

"I don't know. I am sure she is nice."

"Why?"

"Because those two are so fond of her, and those two are the nicest people I know."

"Miss Hetty Morley," said Mr. Turner, "chose to disgrace herself and ruin her father's connection by a stupid and rebellious course of action. As Mrs. Hartop she is coming on. If you walked the earth round you would not find, in the dissenting connection, that such sentimental idiots as Hartop, his daughter, and Jack Hartop."

"What has Hetty done, pa?"

"Degraded herself; dropped into a low sphere of life, and dragged her fool of a father down with her. Morley may choose to tell you in his own good time—for he is as obstinate as a pig—what she has done; but he chooses to keep the secret, and I won't pump him."

"But you like Mr. Morley, pa?"

"Yes. He is a good and a noble man, a pure Christian, and a real gentleman; but he will have to answer to God for his indulgence to that girl."

"But you would listen to him on spiritual matters?"

"Yes, to no man sooner. But he has been a fool in a worldly point of view, by allowing that girl to do as she has done."

And this was all she could get out of her father. And the great mystery about Hetty was no nearer solution than ever.

This was probably the most weary time she had ever had; for even if Carry had been there she had lost the heart to scold her, and so her sole amusement was gone. She had her cats, and was still kind to them, though her little dog Mab had supplanted them in her affections. She told Mab every thing now; and Mab seemed to understand. She could have told her father every thing, but there was a reason.

At one time, not long ago, she had believed that there would have been perfect accord between herself and her father. It was not to be. The overwhelming sense of responsibility with regard to Lord Avebury's papers were too much for his mind, and it became clouded; and in its clouding there came on a phase of religious doubt, which may be laughed at by dogmatizers, but which in practice, in reality, was, to Rebecca at least, horrible.

If he would have broken out into unbelief and sheer blasphemy at once, she could have stood it better. But he got dreadful silent fits, ending in sharp-pointed declarations, after many days of solitary, silent argument with himself. He would sit perfectly silent, with his hands occasionally wandering over over the desk, and Rebecca would be nearly drove the silently sewing Rebecca opposite him out of her mind; and, at last, when the poor, anguished girl could bear it and say nobly at her duty, was nearly out of her mind through sheer nervousness, he would say, suddenly and sharply—

"If one actually regains consciousness after the dissolution of the body, and if one finds that the whole scheme has been a mistake from beginning to end. How then? One will regret that one had not been a profligate; a man who takes such pleasure as he can find, and descends his bills on the future state."

And so on. Which has nothing to do with the further than this. Also horrible and intolerable to Rebecca. It frightened her. She had rebelled against a certain close form of nonconformist Christianity, which is narrow, cold, and in her eyes worthless, because it wanted the one element of sentiment there. There had been in her the stout nonconformist Morley, who had shown her a form of dissent as beautiful and as spiritual as the highest of the Church formulas of Romanism, though wanting in the ceremonials, seems which, as the daughter of a Papist mother, she loved in her heart. Then, in a moment, her father cutting the ground from under her feet, just as she was feeling for it. Do profoundly humanity, that he had arrived on her father unutterable things. Which did not mend matters much for poor Rebecca—which in fact made them rather worse than they were before, for now she was thinking of now.

In the foolish old days, before one thought, many of us used to read the accounts of the prize-fights in Bell's Life; and one used to read that Bob So-and-so "was waited on by a powerful friend." Now I claim for Rebecca that she was a better "g'ution for punishment" than any knuckle-headed, prize-fighting second who ever made a brute of himself in the prize ring.

Punishment enough she got in these days. Her father failing and failing, and before her eyes. No society; and as it seemed to her no hope. The responsibility of the enormous amount of valuable but-boring papers which had been thrown on her own shoulders, for her father was at no one, save in his determination to hold by them. So that Rebecca, after reading for hours a dull, mulish obstinacy; a determination to act honestly as circumstances should direct. And all the time her father was full of his "g'ulgar moods; excusing her of idleness, and making his case good to her about her dead mother. Punishment enough, poor child! But she took it bravely and nobly.

"Pa," she said, one night, "I don't gird at me!"

His face had been fixed before, but it relaxed now.

"Have I been girding at you, Rebecca?"

"Yes, pa. Don't, please."

"I won't, dear. I didn't mean to. Tell me when I gird at you, and I will leave off."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

It is estimated that New York City annually pays the enormous sum of $6,500,000 for the luxury of lice. We say luxury, though its use come to be regarded as a necessity in the world. Whether it is easy to prove to apprehend a strictly of this commodity, for no statement has been made. The number of tobacco in the various ice-houses—not less than 800,000 tons. During the last year seven new houses have been consolidated in the Washington Ice Company, which now has twelve houses with a capacity of 200,000 tons. Consolidated are eighteen houses; and though there are some smaller companies the ice business will chiefly be in the hands of these two companies.

The Sanitary Superintendent reports that small-pox and typhus fever, which have been prevalent in the city of Brooklyn, have now nearly ceased. The Board of Health and the public are greatly indebted to the physicians of New York for their hearty and prompt reporting of such diseases as require the attention of sanitary officers. A diligent inspection of the sick duty by a medical attendant in the Thirteenth Ward last December resulted in the spread of small-pox to three houses and eight persons in opposite blocks, and to a neighboring city. The records of the Board of Health show that more than one medical physician has proved a public benefactor by his prompt efforts to secure the arrest of contagious diseases. Such attentions is especially needful in regard to typhus and typhoid fever and, more than all, much remains to be done to prevent the spread of scarlatina than is generally supposed.

A London clergyman advertises that he will "lend" his weekly sermons for half a crown apiece, or four for ten shillings, warranted "original, earnest, and evangelical."

Wonderful new stories have been a feature of many of the country newspapers for the last two months. And it is a very serious fact that now, in April, the inhabitants of many settlers are still cut off by the snow-bound. Very likely, also, it may be true—as is reported—that on the 6th day of last December a couple of monkeys went to roost on the lower rail of a fence in a certain town in New York State. During the night they were covered with about six feet of snow, and presumed, of course, to be lost. Singular to relate, however, a thaw unmoved them, and they came out on the 9th of January, alive and hungry, having been buried just one month.

On the 1st of April a man passing through Chatham Street picked up a wallet out of his pocket with his handkerchief. He did not discover his loss until after he had walked more than a couple of blocks. He then retraced his steps, and, strange to say, found it quietly reposing on the sidewalk. Every body passed and stepped it a hook, and had been afraid to pick up a pocket book which really contained two hundred and fifty dollars. Surely an April-Fool Day.

Philadelphia has been the scene of another horrible tragedy. A Mr. Beaumont, who has hitherto been a respected citizen, leading an exemplary life, recently murdered in a most horrible manner his wife and children, and then committed suicide. The details of the crime are fearful; and it is relief to learn that insanity was hereditary in the family of the murderer, and to believe the deed was done in some raving paroxysm.

Mad dogs are still reported in various quarters, and the newspapers give many cases of hydrophobia. As the warmer weather comes on every body will feel very shy of meeting stray dogs in the streets; and it is to be hoped that they will be "few and far between."

Some inquiries have been made respecting a "remedy" for hydrophobia, given in these columns a few weeks ago. We mentioned the name of the paper from which it was taken, and can give no further information about it. In general, in any serious disease, remedies should be administered under the immediate advice of a physician, who will have the knowledge and skill to give such special directions as each case requires.

An amusing scene recently occurred in one of the Police Courts in this city. Making all due allowance for exaggerated statements, the story is about as follows: The officer of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals arrested the owner of a bear, charging him with cruelty because he led the animal by a ring in the nose. Both man and bear were brought before the Justice. During the hearing of the case the bear formed an idea of what was going on, received to defend himself. He sat down on his hind-legs, took up the desk, and placing the legal papers upon the rail, looked straight at the Justice, and listened attentively as if curious to see counsel. The Justice said he must hold the man for the session. The bear bowed. The attorney who appeared for the owner said the animal loved its master. The bear licked his hand. The Justice said gruff bail. Your Brute paid it, and to soften his heart by going through an impromptu performance. Another report of the case is, that the bear came into the courtroom smiling, recognized the District-Attorney immediately as the champion of injured people, shook hands with him, sat down on a chair, listened to the affidavit, signed it, kissed the book, thanked the attorney for the courtesy, addressing him as "my learned friend," and meeting a newly-looking reporter on his way out, shook him a warm hand.

The following is related of Dr. Scudder: On his return from India, after a long absence, he was standing on the deck in the manner with his young son, when he heard a man using loud and profane language. "Stop," said the Doctor, solemnly and sweaver, "this boy, my son, was born and brought up in a heathen country, and has never heard an oath; but in all his life he never heard a man blaspheme his Maker until now." The man colored, hurried out an apology, and looked not a little ashamed of himself.

In writing of the recent monthly meeting of the "Boston Radical Club," a "special correspondent" of one of our evening papers takes the liberty of remarking, that while "Quakers are not without brains, it never occurs to them to take such things to parties; while in Boston the people actually go about with their brains done up in brown paper parcels, and are ready to give them away to any passer-by who may be in need of them!"

A movement has been initiated to have the Reading-Room of the Astor Library opened on the Sabbath and on Sundays. This arrangement, it is believed by many thoughtful persons, will prove a blessing to a large class of young men, who, when released from their usual engagements, have no wholesome place of resort, but are crowded together in lodging-houses, and to whom the attractive of pleasant, comfortable rooms would be a blessing from many temptations.

We learn from a newspaper published in the region of Lakes Mempremagog and Winnipiseogee, in the State of New Hampshire, that Moosehead, Maine, are superior to those of either Lake Wreleybooback or Moosehead, in the State of Maine. Chumbiagungamunga were very fine, but they all got choked to death in trying to bite each other's tails. How sad!

According to an exchange a lady one hundred years old was lately supremacy dead in Pennsylvania. When she gets to be a hundred years old, I hope she will get amusement to coin new words as well as to ease her self to new fortunes.

A report comes from Sing Sing prison of the severe punishment of a convict who had only been a few days in the institution. He was ordered to work; but not moving as fast as his keeper wished, he was taken to the dungeon. There, for seven days, he was only released from punishment until he was well or until his doctor ceased. He refused nothing to labor, showered him until he could hardly stand, and then beating him with a rope, ordered him in a cell, where he was left to sink and removed to the hospital, dying at the latter place. He was 22 years of age, and a native of Germany. He had every friend in prison being a convict, who wept like a child when the facts came to his knowledge. The keeper has been removed.

Several Freshmen at Yale were lately suspended for neglecting their recitations, and committing certain outrages which have long been a disgrace to the college. The Freshmen have in an understood way continenced them. Now, to their credit, the Freshmen have resolved to use all their influence as a class to suppress all such disturbances during the Freshmen and Sophomore year, and have signed a pledge to that effect. It is certainly high time that manly students in all colleges should demean themselves like gentlemen and scholars.

Several Freshmen at Yale were lately suspended for neglecting their recitations, and committing certain outrages which have long been a disgrace to the college. The Freshmen have in an understood way continenced them. Now, to their credit, the Freshmen have resolved to use all their influence as a class to suppress all such disturbances during the Freshmen and Sophomore year, and have signed a pledge to that effect. It is certainly high time that manly students in all colleges should demean themselves like gentlemen and scholars.

Perhaps the largest of building in the world—at least the largest—is that which is erected over a certain portion of the Pacific Railroad, to protect the track from the heavy falls of snow which are to be expected during the winter months. It is 22 miles in length, 16 feet in width, and 16 feet in height. It is put up in the most substantial manner, all the timber used being of the best quality to be obtained. The sides are inclined, and calculated for the fact that heavy pressures through the interstices between the boards, the whole affair would be like a huge trap-door. More than 40,000,000 feet of lumber have been used in its construction. It covers an area of more than 18,000,000 square feet, or nearly forty-four acres. With the exception of a few miles this structure has proved a very complete protection during the severe snow-storms of the past season.

A man in Texas has married his mother! that is to say his father's wife; or more exactly, his father married the lady about twenty-five years ago, but from some extraordinary circumstances the couple separated immediately after the ceremony, and never lived together. The lady resumed her maiden name; the gentleman married again. A son by this second marriage joined the Confederate Army during the war. Afterward, while in Texas, the young man met his father's former wife, and, notwithstanding considerable difference of age, an acquaintance began which resulted in marriage. Of course, neither of them knew at the time of the nominal relation they sustained to each other.

Wm. Yonge, the popular barrister, devoted a large portion of the proceeds of her most successful novel—"The Heir of Redclyffe"—to fitting out a Missionary vessel for the use of Dr. Selwyn, who was then the Bishop of New Zealand; she also gave $10,000, the profits of her "Daisy Chain," to the building of a Missionary college in Auckland, New Zealand.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A "FOG" SIGNAL—The Last Glass.

"PARTY PROCESSIONS"—Going down to supper.

PRIDE.

Pride went forth one snowy day,
Burst upon a drift of hay.
Of lady's head with nothing on it,
Save three wisps to make a bonnet.

With the wind a little lace
Blew about her neck and face.

Pride returned to her abode,
A parcel's only child fell ill.
Cough and croup and sore throat and rain
Rendered every effort vain.

Wearing leaves in wintry weather
Killed both Pride and child together.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.—There is this difference between a horse-race and a boat-race: The best horse very often is ahead at the first turn, and will pull out; whereas the best boat wins through the same means.

THOUGHTFUL HOSPITALITY.—Entertaining an idea.

A RING WITH AN END.—A herring.

HOW TO KISS.

First, grasp with hand of maid,
And hug her tight to thee;
Then roll her eye, "I'll go away—
Do—don't you—let me be!"

Then, oh, what bliss! but more miss
So good a chance as that!
Then make a dash, as quick as flash,
And—Harriet, hold my hat!!!

Two Irishmen were one day engaged in roofing a house, when one of them fell down and broke his leg. The other hastened to him, and inquired, whether he was hurt very much. "Oh, Mickey," replied Mickey, "not dead, but spackless!"

VARIOUS FANCIES ON WEDDINGS.

A Wooden Wedding—Marrying a blockhead.
A Golden Wedding—Marrying for money.
A Crystal Wedding—Marrying a glass of wine.
A Tin Wedding—Marrying a milkmaid.
A Paper Wedding—Marrying a writer.
A Silver Wedding—Marrying an old maid of sixty.
A Brass Wedding—Marrying a blacksmith.
A Linen Wedding—Marrying a laundress.

A QUESTION.

They say the King of Burmah's liked
With fifty wives to soothe his rest:
If fairness ever the King should pain,
Would the King ever again?

AN EVIL DEED—A forged will.

A negro had a severe attack of rheumatism which finally settled in his foot. He bathed it, he rubbed it and swathed it, but all to no purpose. Finally, tearing away the bandage, he stuck it out, and, with a stake of the fence, he exclaimed: "Look here, devil Seller, sake away. I shan't do suffin more for you, for chile can stan' it so long as you kin, so dar!"

"JANE," said a wag, "it's all over town?" "What's all over town?" "Why, that I've dropped.

"BOARDING ROUND."

A COUNTRY SCHOOLMASTER'S DIARY.

Monday.—Went to board with Mr. B——'s; had a baked pudder for dinner—stewed cranberries and cheese. Pudder appearances to have been one of the first settlers of Vermont, made a settlin' in pudder and the pilgrim's breast. Supper—cold pudder and pumpkin; went to bed and dreamed of having another piece of pudder and cheese.

Tuesday.—Cold pudder for breakfast, swamp tea and sculp nut cake—the latter some consolation. Dinner—some kind of a stew, with pudder in it. Supper—pudder—the other leg, etc., cold; dreamed I was a snowbird, and got on my back and could not get over again.

Wednesday.—Cold pudder for breakfast; could eat nothing. Dinner—wings, etc., of the pudder warmed up; did not relish. Supper—pudder for four hours should be left for supper. Supper—not Johnny-cakes, felt like a cannibal.

Thursday.—Cold pudder again; much discouraged at the sight of pudder. Went to B——'s to visiting for dinner and supper.

Friday.—Pudder first shroud. Dinner at Mr. B——'s; cold pudder and hot potatoes—the latter good; ate potatoes and pudder. Supper—stewed cranberries, pudder and no potatoes, bread heavy and dry.

Saturday.—Cold pudder and hot Johnny-cake; did very well. Dinner—cold pudder again; Johnny-cake; did very well. Had a long visit with the old week, grew alarmed; had a talk with Mr. B., and concluded I had boarded 'round enough.

ANTIQUE RHYMES.

"There was a crow sat on a stone;
He flew away—and there was none."

"There was a man that ran a race:
When he run fast—he run apace."

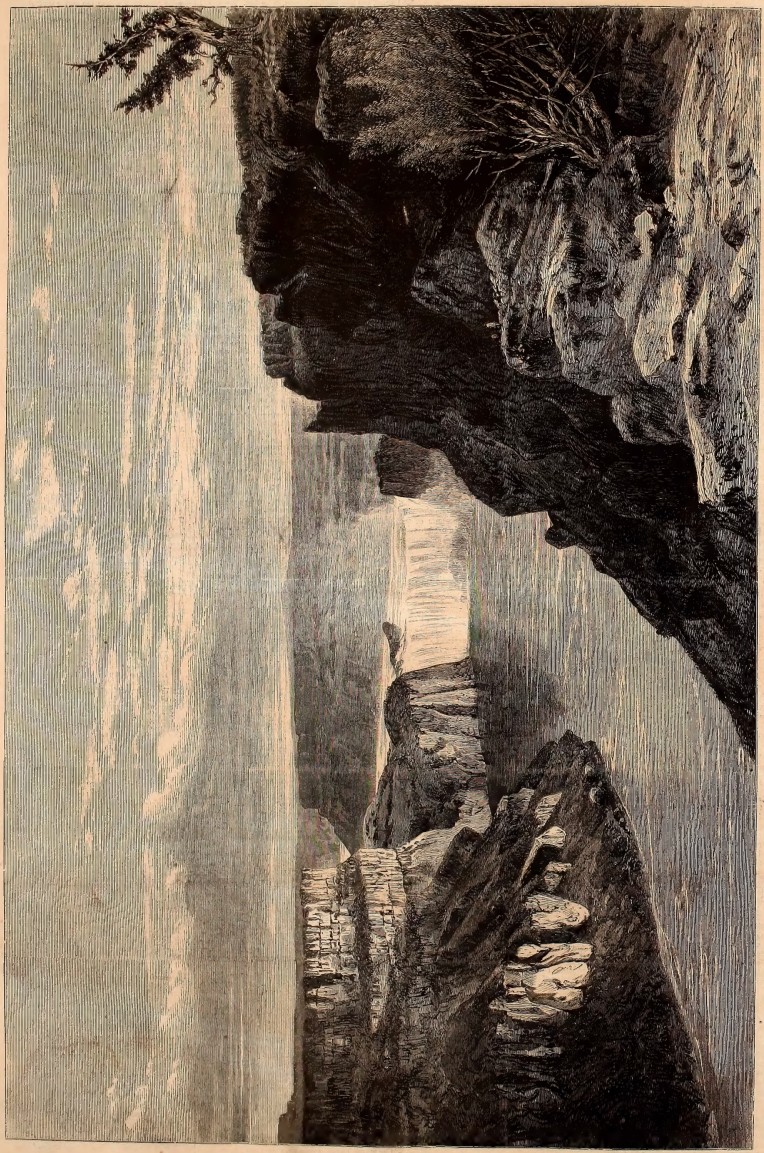
"There was a maid that ate an apple;
When she ate two—she ate a couple."

"There was an ape sat on a tree;
When he fell down—then he sat on it."

"There was a fleet that went to Spain:
When it returned—it came again."

MODERN.

There was a man who sowed a plat
With Norway oats—well, what of that?



"THE NIAGARA OF THE WEST."—GREAT SHOSHONE FALLS.—Photographed by Savage & Ottinger, Salt Lake City.—[See Page 244.]

MARRIED.
TWO VIEWS OF AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.
SINGLE.

THE BROWN LADY.

A BRIGHT day in May; the sun shining, as it is wont to shine, upon Paris more constantly than we growling islanders are willing to believe. Nowhere every where; in the streets and on the boulevards; pouring into gay gardens full of people scessed of a highly-cultivated facility for amusing themselves; gently insinuating itself between cartains of silk and lace; showing off to quisite inimitable advantages the treasures of architecture and sculpture with which the wealth and the genius of ages have endowed the chosen city of the modern arts—the grand metropolis of Pleasure. Nowhere is the sunshine more splendid than in the noble Rue de Rivoli, and it lights no prettier scene than the interior of a handsome room in a fine hotel, whose tenants are two persons, a man and woman—beautiful birds and noble bipeds. The windows open on the street, a wide balcony filled with flowers intervening, and the thousand sounds which tell of the life of the grand world of the gayest city of the pair, who seem to like the stir and the sunshine; for the young lady is standing just within the half-drawn curtain, which hides her from view, and the young man is standing beside her, with an arm, against which she leans comfortably, round her slender waist.

"Tout le monde s'amuse. Yes, it does indeed; and if it didn't now, and didn't here, it must be a very stupid people, and not at all worth belonging to. Just look, Burnham; there goes a carriage full of your compatriotes; and, though they look glorious, there's a slight expression of being rather surprised and just a little ashamed of themselves about them. Ah!—and the man, or modified her piquante head with quaint gravity "it is never thoroughly learned after one is grown up, you are educated in it."

"In what, Adeline?"

"In the art of amusing ourselves, of course. We find it in our very prayers. Tell me, Burnham: when you were taught to read, what were the first sentences you learned?"

"I really can not remember, but I fancy the usual thing—'This is a cat; a dog has a tail; Tom is a bad boy'; there or thereabouts, I should say."

"Yes, yes, I know the same horrible well-ing-books—your décolant examples of instruction primaire. Now the first reading-lesson I ever learned in my life, and the first rhyme, was:

'J'ai un gâteau!
Qu'il est bon!
Mes amis tous,
Bonjour-son-nous!'

Simple you will admit, and easy, and expressive. Not burdensome to the memory, and inculcating moral sentiments, such as sharing a cake when you have one, and calling on your friends to be polite. Now that's just the difference between us, you see; you are taught that 'Tom is a bad boy,' and you think it means all the 'Toms' of your acquaintance, and you had better have nothing to say to them; while we—oh, how well I remember how we used to sing the praises of the imaginary cake in chorus, and dance round like this!" And the young lady, Lord Burnham found himself skillfully twirled out of his passive attitude and spun round on the floor, after which achievement her laughing three-horned face sat in a chair, and laughed one of the most melodious laughs ever uttered by a Frenchwoman.

"Adeline, I believe your own you to so absurd!" said the bridegroom, who was sufficiently British of demeanor to think it necessary to protest, but for whom the wild spirits and child-profits of the pretty French girl he had married a month before had a fascination which not the sternest monitor would have counseled him to resist.

"It isn't absurd!" she replied; "to be serious, to be dull, to be gloomy, to parler raison on such a day as this, is to be absurd—and Anglais! These now, I declare you are vexed! Your mine de zéphon—and you promised you wouldn't, Burnham!"

"Indeed I am not vexed; indeed I have not the spleen, I assure you. Only, child, with some what needless earnestness, as the bride's sparkling brown eyes might have told him; "but you amuse me and you interest me, and I really want to talk to you seriously, you know, before we start for home."

"Indeed!" said Lady Burnham, rising from her seat and approaching her husband with an expression in which a little apprehension mingled with girlish glee. "Then let us go to the library; the day is too beautiful; I can't talk or listen seriously here."

She rang the bell as she spoke. It was promptly answered by her footman.

"Send my maid here, and let the carriage come round as quickly as possible."

In a few minutes Lady Burnham, attired in a marvelous combination of silk, lace, embroidered muslin, and prismatic ribbons, was seated in an open carriage of the newest and most elegant construction, on her bridegroom by her side, was being whirled by her English-built thoroughbreds, the admiration and the envy of the Parisian beau monde, and the Bois de Boulogne.

The drive was prolonged until the dusk, and they returned to their hotel only in time to dress for dinner. And, as they sat down to their dining-rooms, Lord Burnham said, with a smile:

"Concess!"

"Could be," she replied, "provided you don't make me stay there a day longer than you actually must."

When Lord Burnham was out of his wife's sight, and beyond the influence of her sweet voice and her sunny smile, he began to look rather serious, and after a while his expression became gravely meditative. He paced his room from end to end, his face still retaining its troubled expression, until he suddenly exclaimed, half aloud, "I will write to Madeleine; she will befriend her;" and with this resolution tranquillity came back to him.

Lady Burnham, on the contrary, laughed outright when she was alone, and said to herself,

"If he loved me less, and had more of the odious English morgue, I might feel afraid; but, as it is, je ne nogue d'elles."

A tall, elegant, supple figure, perfect in symmetry, full of vigorous health and activity, but losing itself to her present attitude of luxurious repose so though it were the most suited to it of all; shoulders worthy of Venus de Milo, sloping under the influence of his own dream of Cleopatra; hands and feet such as marble never imaged, for their soft pure warmth and lightness are the privileges only of flesh and blood. The head was perfectly shaped, but not small; and in its expression there was intellect as well as the face, which wore the expression of extreme youth, rare in the case of brunettes, of which order of beauty this young lady was a perfect specimen, was refined and delicate, and chiefly remarkable for the velvet softness of the large dark brown eyes, the long lashes, which exactly matched the chestnut hair in color, and the beauty of the mouth. Rarely has a French woman been a mouth. As she sat with her head forward and her face downcast, the beautiful scarlet under-lip drooped a little and showed the whole row of small, white, pearly teeth covered, except when a magical smile caused the fruit-like lips and the milk-like teeth to be at once displayed and concealed, in a fashion which blended exquisite beauty of feature and expression. Her face was perfectly oval in shape, and the most determined and devoted advocate of blonde loveliness would not have denied that Lady Burnham was beautiful.

There was this peculiarity about her, that though her beauty was not "English," her manners were "English." A young lady, ensuite, carefully trained after the approved method, would not have been emancipated, in the early days of her married life, from a certain over-propriety, hitherto enforced by a whole code of petty prescriptions and restrictions, or she would be over-conscious of them, and consequently much at variance with good taste. She might have been awkward, she might have been impressible, but she could not have exhibited the hurry graceful self-possession, the perfect individuality and feminine dignity, combined with sweetness and unstrained joy in the enjoyment of simple gayety, which made this young Frenchwoman so attractive, and so unlike her fair compatriots on their emergence from the joyous, unrestrained phase of existence into that of the jeune femme.

The father of Adeline de Beaucour was a man of rank, who possessed little but that rank and shan of his good blood, and held his political aspirations and successes in higher estimation than his purse. He had lived much at foreign embassies, influential life before the world, was a man of much mark, and of intimate knowledge of the machinations and criminals of the second Empire, and loved only two human beings in the world—himself and his daughter Adeline. His wife died in the third year of their marriage, and he had never thought of replacing her. He did not trouble himself to do so, because he felt it was too much esprire in his ways of thinking for that; and the wealth with which his daughter would be endowed would enable her to choose for herself by carrying out an idea which was a novelty indeed, for it was no other than that, when the proper time should arrive for her to marry, having taken care that she should have no ineligible associates—would permit Adeline to marry the man of her choice, without any of those interventions, and relegating her fate altogether from the region of wise and advantageous bargains, which proceed by the help of friends and educated under his own surveillance; and, intending her to choose her own lot, in so far as a young girl's choice, he had taken care to let her just views of life and human nature, content to guide her by skill, quiet and controlling her will by approximation, not by force.

Walter Vaux Burnham was the only son of a rich English merchant, who had left him, at his decease, a considerable fortune, which, with a great inheritance in the future; a handsome face and quality and reputation, held in estimation by M. d'Auvigny, had made him a welcome receiver in certain exclusive French cliques. Walter Burnham was a young man who retained upon his inclinations, which had happily never been opposed, and very much beloved; and now, found himself in love to a degree which he had never felt the phrase with Adeline de Beaucour, he did not allow the idea that his father and mother would approve of his marriage for him to dismiss him in the least. They did not like it, even when they had had it satisfactorily explained to them, that she was well-born and wealthy—for being a foreigner was "such a very dreadful thing;" and there was dear little Lady Lucy Granville, who was one of Walter Burnham's lady mother had always intended to have as a daughter-in-law, if something better did not turn up. But Walter Burnham was "in love," and when he was not actively displeased, which indeed was his general condition of mind; happily indifferent to any thing which did not affect his chief interests in life—his stud and his field sports, his yacht, his club, quiet, and it was easier and more politic for him to let his father and his wife who was present, and could make him acutely uncomfortable, assign for him, who was absent, and could only grumble from a distance. Burnham knew that in the time to come Adeline must find out the truth. When that time should come they would be so completely united that any thing which did not vex him would scarcely vex her; and besides, who could doubt that his beautiful amiable young wife would soon win the admiration and affection of his family.

The chief residence of the Earl of Marlesdale, Burnham Castle—situate in the heart of a beautiful midland county, in a park famous for its timber, was a stately seignorial dwelling, of irregular but imposing architecture, built of deep-red brick, which showed warmly amidst the profuse green of the noble trees, faced with white cut stone, and abounding in turrets, chimneys, and windows of quaint devices, the latter glowing with color, and superb in blazonry—was the princes-ideal of a country residence. Terraces, vases, "wildernesses," ornamental water, strutting peacocks, statuesque, fountains of Italian workmanship, and every thing Italian style—charmingly contrasting and combining with the good old-fashioned garden and rosery in the near neighborhood of the house, which the Earl's good taste had preserved intact amidst all the improvements of a scientific age—were to be seen at Burnham. Those who wanting to render the place a charming subject for a delicate engraving, illustrative of the "stately homes of England," could not go home to which to introduce a young, handsome, well-born, well-bred, well-dowered bride. As a feature of local interest, as a show-place, though there were some quite first-class lions of historical magnitude in the vicinity, Burnham was perfect; it had even the highly-desirable, if not indispensable, given to recommend it. The last item in its treasures was more prized by the neighbors and the sight-seers than by the noble occupants of the castle. It was indeed generally understood that the domestic peculiarities reported to the ghost, in which, though not a romantic or imaginative person in general, she was said firmly to believe.

Lord and Lady Burnham were coming home. The Earl of Marlesdale, although really very glad to see his son at home again, and by no means disinclined to the marriage he had made, was not particularly excited about the event, and put in pursuance of his usual predilection for a quiet life, remained in his own apartments, and left the women to do all the watching and waiting and guessing, all the gushing and welcoming and criticism that might be in order. The women, in the Earl irreverently termed in his thoughts the Countess of Marlesdale and the Ladies Blanche and Madeleine Vaux, were in the Countess's morning-room, which opened on the terrace, and back of the three was, in her respective fashion, occupied with the coming event.

"I think I hear the carriage, mamma," said Lady Madeleine, without turning her head, or ceasing the light touches with which she was regarding the long averture of elms.

"Very likely," said Lady Marlesdale: "they were much after the time already. Not that I expected punctuality."

"Oh, mamma," rejoined Madeleine, "it wasn't an English thing who said punctuality was the pos-lilence of princes! I'm right, I'm sentioned, eagerly; I hear it come! I shall turn round in the hall.—Won't you come, Blanche?"

"Thank you," replied that young lady, with perfect indifference; "I shall wait until they are announced."

Madeleine ran with a light step along the terrace—from the windows of which every one was now distinctly visible—to the grand entrance. In a few minutes the travelers had arrived, had alighted, the bridegroom was at its height, and Lady Marlesdale and her elder daughter had fully recognized the mistake they had made in concluding that Walter Burnham had said very little about the appearance and manners of his son's bride there was nothing favorable to be said. Lady Marlesdale was dazzled and delighted; Lady Blanche was surprised, and in spite of herself pleased. The effect on the Countess of her daughter-in-law's charming grace, fascination, and perfect ease of manner—in which there was not a touch of insolence or want of deference, not a single thing which she at the end of that time, a temporary residence in London having been obtained for Lord and Lady Burnham, they left the Castle for town. Lady Marlesdale followed them in a few days, accompanied by Lady Madeleine Raby, who was to remain with her brother and his wife, while her mother and sister sojourned at Burnham, too glad of the opportunity to avoid "the festivities of a London season," as Lady Blanche called them—when explaining her intentions, which he cordially approved—to the Rev. Josiah Streeter. Lady Marlesdale went through the ceremony of "presenting" her son's wife with all proper solemnity; and in the afternoon of that day, when Lady Burnham's beauty had been a general theme of conversation, and Burnham's luck had been pretty commented upon, Lord Dale Madeleine Raby solved a question which had occurred to her several times.

The dinner-party had just returned from St. James's Palace, and were sipping tea in the rather dingy dining-room of the temporary residence, when Lord Burnham joined them. He was delighted with his wife's beauty, and pleased with her dress. She was standing with her train thrown over her arm, and had just put down her cup and taken up her bouquet; Madeleine was looking at her earnestly.

"Let your bouquet alone, Adeline," said Lord Burnham, "and let me see you just as you were when you passed her Majesty."

She looked at him willing, with her graceful head held up, shook out the rich folds of her white-satin train, and threw them back with a movement of her head which slightly raised the skirt of her dress, and showed her foot in its high-heeled satin shoe.

"That's it, Madeleine! Madeleine; "now I know what it is that has always puzzled me; now I know why Adeline is so like—" "Now let me, Burnham?—(take care, mamma; your tea will be all over your petticoat in a minute). —She is the very image of the Brown Lady!"

II.

The London season was over, and the seaside season in England, and the gambling and flirtation season in continental Europe, had also closed. The stately old country-houses were assembling their inmates for Christmas; the weather was seasonable—i. e., very delightful for rich people with every sort of appliance for warmth and indoor luxury at command, and productive of intense suffering to the poor who heeded all these things—and you'll not find them in poetry or romance—but the heir and his wife were passing the Christmas holidays.

It was the beginning of Christmas week: the snow, which had been falling lightly for some days, was frozen, and the weather had reached a point of "seasonableness" which promised summer amusements, except to such hardy individuals as professed a taste for the noble art of skating. Burnham Castle had its full complement of Christmas guests, and they were sometimes a little heavy in hand, and gave the Countess some trouble in their management—except which she sustained nevertheless with indefatigable courage, for the sake of her pride and her son.

A portentously long morning had been beguiled by a visit to the picture-gallery, of which Lady Burnham had become the honorary, if not the knowledge of art, but she had an unlearned taste for pictures, and she had taken some pains to make herself acquainted with the value though not extensive collection at Burnham Castle. Lady Madeleine's remark upon her likeness to the portrait known as that of "the French countess" but unmentioned in the catalogue pretentiously inscribed on vellum and kept in the library had not escaped her at the time; and she had afterward asked her sister-in-law who the "French countess" was, and whether there was any family remarkable in her story, purposing to inspect the portrait on her return to Burnham, and see what the thought of the supposed likeness. Madeleine's reply she took an early opportunity of inspecting the portrait in question. She recognized the likeness at once; it was no fancy of Lady Madeleine's or Burnham's; and Burnham recognized it also. But while Adeline was pleased and flattered, for the beauty of the French countess was very striking, her husband's indifference piqued and provoked Lady Burnham.

"I do think," she said, "you have a touch of your mother's notions on this point, and would be delighted if I could be proved like any of those pretty dolls of Anglish-women, with their flaxen blue eyes and their silly simpers."

"Indeed you mistake me," said Lord Burnham, earnestly. "The only woman as beautiful as you—if indeed she was that, and I doubt it—who ever belonged to our family was the handsome Countess, who are strikingly like, and brought disgrace and shame with her. Adeline, and there has been little of them in the history of the Burnhams. You can understand now, my darling, why we do not much like the mention of the French countess, and why my mother, in particular, dislikes it.

"Tell me the story," said Adeline, imperiously; "it sit down here, and tell it to me at once. I want to hear it; I must hear it."

She looked so beautiful, so engaging, so delightful, in her playful, imperious mood, as she lighted, in her pique sparkling, partly with curiosity and partly with scorn, that he could not resist. All his own reluctance, and the reluctance of his mother, were forgotten in the impulse he felt to give pleasure to his young wife, and he said:

"I will not tell you the story myself, Adeline, because I should only spoil it; but I promise you shall hear it, well told, on Christmas-eve, with all the effect due to a ghost-story."

"A ghost-story! Is there a ghost, then, attached to the picture, as well as the coincidence of my likeness to it?"

"There is," said Burnham, rather seriously, "and Crawford is the only person here who can tell the story. So you shall hear it on Christmas-eve, just at the witching hour. My mother has a horror of its being told, but it will never know."

Lady Burnham thanked her husband with a sparkling smile. There was the slightest touch of mischief in it, but he did not perceive that, and she protested he had given her a fresh interest in the old house.

At a little after eleven o'clock on Christmas-eve, when the guests were all merry-hearted, the ghost-story was to be told. Burnham Castle was haunted. Lady Marlesdale was dead, intelligence of her death had reached England, and her husband had sent word that he was dying slowly of four, they said, and the French countess "walked in the picture-gallery every night. Being questioned by the guests, Lord Marlesdale, with much hesitation and evident suffering, acknowledged that he had seen the phantom of his wife three times, on each occasion at the same place and under similar circumstances. The stir caused by these stories was the greater because Charles Raby had gone to London some time before, and his wife was much alarmed and distressed at her solitude, being then expecting the birth of her first child.

"Upon Charles Raby's return to Burnham he found his brother, Lord Marlesdale, at the point of death, and Adeline installed in the ghost. But he, too, was destined to view the apparition of the "Brown Lady." One night as he grew restless, he fancied he heard a faint sound rustling, like the trailing of a dress upon a matted floor. His momentary doze was dispelled by the sound. His consciousness that it was some one near; he opened his eyes, and saw the Brown Lady—as her distinctive appellation was—a couple of feet removed from him, her head held up, her brown hair falling on her shoulders, two red roses in the right hand, and the left hand train held back by the left. He looked at her, and she looked at him with the beautiful brown eyes he had so loved and known, and his heart beat as if it would choke him, and his limbs grew heavy and cold. As he looked she glided away, and was lost in the dim distance behind the heavy velvet curtains of the bed. Terror held him motionless for a little, and then, when it released him, he started up and rang the bell violently. There was nothing there. Then apprehension and pity for his wife kept him quiet, hence thirst seized him, and he drank a cup of the large cup of spiced wine which, according to the fashion of the time, had been set ready for him. The draught soothed him strangely; he began to feel a curious numbness, and then came nothingness; but he solemnly declared afterward that, during the yet remaining hours of his senses, he heard a low, short laugh.

"With the morning horror and anguish came to Burnham that his brother Charles Raby was found in frightful agony, succeeded by paroxysms of delirium, and the physicians—not easily to be had in Devonshire, with the slow haste of those days—were puzzled by the case, as our wise men might be now. It ended very like Lord Marlesdale's; they said it all events it was hopeless, and in that they were right. Charles Raby died on the following night, and was laid by the side of his brother in the vault where his wife, the story I have now told you. His son was born upon the day of the funeral, and succeeded Lord Dale Madeleine Raby in three months. He was a splendid fellow in his time, and the first earl.

"When Charles Raby's death gave the bewildered household leisure to attend to any thing, some strange discoveries were made. The valise which had accompanied him to and fro, and brought to Burnham by Lord Marlesdale's brother was empty. Gems and other valuables had been abstracted from the jewel-case in Lord Marlesdale's apartments, and the long-disused rooms of the French countess had evidently been ransacked: boxes, drawers, and cabinets had been opened. When full search had been made indoors, they proceeded to inquiries without, and ascertained that a tall, handsome man of distinctly-foreign appearance had appeared in the neighborhood of Burnham, accompanied by a servant in livery, and had put up at his pensioner three fine horses, of which one carried the baggage. Their arrival had been simultaneous with the journey of Charles Raby to Burnham, and they had taken their departure at daybreak on the morning after his return, long before any intelligence of the trouble at the castle had penetrated to the village. No suspicion attached to them, no effort was made to trace their route; the murders of Charles Raby's widow declares that these two men took a twelve-oared boat from Southampton, and that in the night they were sailed in the ship was wrecked in the Channel, and many of the dead bodies washed ashore. One of these was disinterred to be identified as a woman unknown in male attire; and though it never was identified, and the woman and child on whom the valuables and the mysterious letter had been bestowed had devolved were too weak and too timid to investigate the matter which concerned them so nearly, at the cost of exposing their personages in France, the widow never had any doubt but that the drowned woman was Lady Marlesdale."

Adeline looked serious and perplexed.

"So it was not a ghost after all: only a living woman, who robbed and murdered?" she said. "Then, do people still believe in the ghost? Why do they say she walks in the picture-gallery every year at Christmas-time? And why, may I ask, Captain Crawford, is this story supposed to be your special property?"

"I will answer your ladyship categorically," said Captain Crawford. "People believe in the ghost because, in the first place, they have heard the story, and not its explanation; and in the second, because they prefer to believe in it. They say the ghost walks in the picture-gallery at Christmas-time because it is pleasant and exciting to say so, and quite the correct thing for a country house. But they believe it too. I venture to say you would find it difficult to persuade any of the party assembled in this house to-night to go into the picture-gallery alone after dark, especially on Twelfth-night. Finally, the story is mine because the first earl's mother was also my mother's ancestress, and some of her papers are still in the possession of my family."

"Thank you, Captain Crawford; you have thoroughly satisfied my curiosity."

"And tired her out," said Lord Burnham, screwing up from the hearth-rug. "Come and have a cigar."

Left by herself, Lady Burnham sat in the same attitude by the boudoir fire. But her face was thoughtful, and her eyes were bent on the red-hot cavern formed by the glowing coals.

"How strange!" she was thinking; "I might have known all this if papa had ever thought our old family history worth looking into. I wonder what our version of it is; brutal ill-usage on the part of the *sans gêne*ric, no doubt, and spiritual devotion to the fallen fortunes of the daughter of Henri Quatre. Marcelline de Beaucour, Comtesse de Senaart—how very, very old! It would never do to tell Lady Marlesdale know that I have a good right to resemble the portrait of the French countess. Shall I tell Burnham? No: he will not; he would spoil the fun. How much amused he will be! And Captain Crawford—how delightful if he is persuaded into believing in the ghost!"

* * *

The party assembled at Burnham for the celebration of the great old festival of Christmas might was unusually numerous and lively. It included many young people—for whom the attractions of dancing to the yule-log, snap-dragon, and blindman's-buff were provided—the staying company in the house, and some officers friends of Sir Cecil Beaton and Captain Crawford, who had brought it well worth their while to run up from Portsmouth for a few days.

In the smoking-room on the night before Twelfth-day, Lord Burnham being absent, Captain Crawford told the story of the French lady over a mono, and with great success. The officers from Portsmouth were quite pleased, and almost excited, by the story, which, to the young gentlemen, who imagined himself an authority on beauty and style, and who believed, in his honest and unsophisticated way, in nothing, not even the "match" of the Brown Lady herself, could possibly resist him, proposed an adjournment en masse to the picture-gallery forthwith. But Captain Crawford opposed this proceeding, on the grounds that the house was all quiet for the night, and that the ghost had a right to turn out in the picture-gallery. With the majority of the little party this argument succeeded, and the session was adjourned; but Tommy Toxteth was not to be persuaded.

"Bother the gas!" said the youth; "come along, Crawford, let the others stay here—they've seen the picture, and I haven't; I have been through the gallery at all hours. Let's never been through the gallery at all hours. Let's take a candle apiece and go—the Brown Lady will look all the more ghastly, of ghostly, in the dim light."

"By Jove! you're developing, Tommy," said Sir Cecil Morse; "you're actually displaying imagination! What next?"

"Don't bother, returned the lieutenant; "come along."

Captain Crawford enjoyed, and deserved, the reputation of a very good-natured sort of fellow, and he rose, though rather lazily, to comply with Tommy Toxteth's request. They took their way to the staircase, at the foot of which one door of the picture-gallery was situated. The gallery was a handsome room but a dim light in the large, empty space, and Tommy Toxteth declared he already felt "creepy," when Captain Crawford opened the door, and they entered the gallery—just in time to see a woman's figure vanish at the opposite end. The lieutenant started violently, and tumbled up against Captain Crawford, who, not so much disconcerted, but still not completely unmoved, caught him by the arm, and said:

"Take care; you'll drop the candle."

"Bother the candle!" returned Tommy; "did you see that?"

"I saw a woman, certainly—one of the servants, I suppose."

"Do you?" Why do you speak in a whisper, then? And why does any servant be in the house wear a brown dress and red roses?"

"Are you certain of that? The gallery is long, and the light is dim."

"I am perfectly certain, and I have remarkably good sight."

Tommy Toxteth leaned most unceremoniously against one of the pictures as he spoke, and rubbed his evening-dressed shoulders against the white-satin knee of a Raby of the time of George II. Captain Crawford looked at him blankly.

"I say," said Tommy, "we shall get precious by chuffed if we let out that, having come to look at the portrait, we have seen the ghost. Come and let's have a peep at the picture, at all events."

Without speaking, Crawford advanced to the portrait, and the two men held the lights they carried so as to show it to the best advantage.

The picture looked even more lifelike in the feeble light than in the brightness of the gas jets. The proud, beautiful face; the dark curls; the bright and speaking eyes; the graceful figure, which seemed coming forward to meet the gazers—all had a striking, an overpowering effect, which told on the young lieutenant, though he did his best to throw it off. They looked at the picture for some time, but in silence, and then they turned away from it and left the gallery, they still did not speak, until they had reached the first landing on the main.

"All a fancy of ours, of course," said Crawford; "either a mere imagination, or a clever house-maid, who chooses the unfrequented gallery for a rendezvous with her footman lover."

"Why did we not see the footman lover, then?" asked the lieutenant, with more presence of mind than was habitual to him; "and how do you explain the dress?"

"You must have imagined the dress," said Captain Crawford.

"And you the footman," returned the lieutenant.

More time than they had supposed had elapsed while the two had been absent, and they found the smoking-room forsaken by all but Sir Cecil Morse and Mr. Netterville, a middle-aged individual of no particular persuasion or profession, who was an inveterate smoker, and liked his cigar in company.

"What ails you both?" asked Sir Cecil. "Any one would think you had seen a ghost!"

"I am not sure that we have not," said Tommy Toxteth, "and the ghost too."

"What!" said Sir Cecil, with an incredulous grin, "the Brown Lady herself?"

"Yes, the Brown Lady herself."

"Nonsense," said Sir Cecil; "why, if thought you did not believe in it, Craw?"

"So I thought myself until to-night," said Crawford; "and I am not quite sure that I do believe in it now; but, on the other hand, I'm not quite sure that I don't."

Mr. Netterville and Sir Cecil insisted on an explanation, which the others gave; and the surprise caused by the story was all they could have wished, had they been telling it for effect. Mr. Netterville suggested that the truth might be tested by watching for the ghost on another night.

"Unless the Brown Lady is very much altered for the better," he said, laughing, "she is not likely to miss a chance of being seen."

"And let me tell you," said Tommy Toxteth, with a dismal attempt at a joke, "to see even the ghost of such a woman as the Brown Lady is not to be sneezed at."

"Suppose we all watch for the Brown Lady to-morrow night," said Sir Cecil; "it's Twelfth-night, the time she is said to appear quite regularly. If she does, we'll agree not to be in the least frightened; and if she does not, we set down Craw and Tommy for a pair of poltroons."

"Agreed," said Mr. Netterville; and he then added, reflectively, "what a shrewd assistant thing for a family it must be to have an hereditary ghost! If I had one, which I have not—the Nettervilles are not important enough for that—I should have had a shot at it long ago."

"A shot at it!" exclaimed Crawford—"a shot at a ghost!"

"Certainly," replied Mr. Netterville; "if such things exist, why not learn all there is to be learned about them? It is a popular belief, quite as profound as belief in the existence of ghosts, that if you see one, and fire at it with a bullet—I am not sure whether the bullet must be silver, but I think not—it will never appear again; a cheap and simple remedy for intrusive spirits."

The conversation among the gentlemen was not much more prolonged; but before they finally parted for the night they determined on a plan of action which should solve their own half-admitted doubts, and be a curious experiment in ghost-lore.

* * * * * * *

There was only one drawback to the success of the party at Burnham Castle on the following day—the absence of Lord Burnham. He was unavoidably detained at the country town on business. He was the most assiduously attentive of husbands, as all agreed; and each of the young ladies secretly hoped, when the time came for the fulfilment of her destiny, she might find a parti so eligible in all respects. Lady Burnham announced at breakfast that she had had a letter from her husband, full of apologies and regret. At luncheon she mentioned that she had received a telegram confirming the impossibility of Lord Burnham's reaching the castle in time for dinner; and while the latter gorgeous solemnity was in progress, a second telegram was handed to her, which she read aloud.

The message was: "It is barely possible I may catch the last train. Do not expect me before to-morrow. Do not send to the station."

"It's the only time, I can say with a clear conscience, I ever wished Lord Burnham no remove away," said Lady Burnham to Zelie, when; the dinner being over, and the party assembled, for the entertainment was proper to the evening, in the saloon, she contrived to escape to her own rooms for a short interval, hoped for by no notion of joining the servants, and there's no fear of her ladyship sitting up?"

"Not the least fear, my lady. Mrs. Parker despises all the servants except Samuel; and if she could have kept him from watching for the ghost with the rest she would have told of the servants to her ladyship; but she couldn't persuade him."

"And the gentlemen are quite determined? There is no danger of their giving it up?"

"Not the least, my lady. It's all settled with Mr. Mills."

"I must go back, lest I might be missed. Everything is ready?"

"Every thing."

Zelie threw open the door of Lady Burnham's dressing-room, which was brilliantly lighted.

She looked in, laughed, gave a satisfied nod of her sunny brown head, and ran lightly down stairs.

The evening were gayly away. The mimic sovereignty awarded when the Twelfth-night cake was cut and apportioned was fully enjoyed; the carpet-dance was lively, if not very long; for Twelfth-day fell on Saturday, and the rules were strict at Burnham Castle. At half past eleven "good-nights" were exchanged; the ladies retired, and the majority of the gentlemen sought the smoking-room.

* * * * * * *

The numerous clocks in the house and offices had struck twelve, and an apparent but deceitful quiet reigned in the castle, when Captain Crawford, Mr. Netterville, Sir Cecil Morse, and Tommy Toxteth, attended by Mr. Mills, and followed on tip-toe by a few of the other male guests at Burnham, took their way to the central hall. A number of servants, silent and motionless, were assembled there. The order of proceeding had been so carefully settled beforehand that there was nothing to be talked about, and the strictest silence prevailed—silence which permitted the hurried breathing of the women to be audible. The three doors which communicated with the picture-gallery had been left ajar, and the gallery was dimly lighted by a few gas jets, turned down to not much above the point of extinction.

Captain Crawford and Tommy Toxteth passed into the library by a door opening into the middle of the hall, and took up a position behind that which communicated with the picture-gallery. Sir Cecil Morse and Mr. Netterville passed into the great dining-room by a similar door on the other side of the hall, and took up a position behind that which communicated with the picture-gallery. The other gentlemen, with all the servants standing close behind them, placed themselves at the central door, which led from the hall into the picture-gallery, and was opened to its full extent, its two battants laid back against the wall.

These operations had been performed without the aid of any other light than that which the dimly-burning gas in the gallery afforded, and the scene was an impressive one.

"The moment I don't hear," said one of the servants in the lowest possible tone to the "serious" footman.

"Be still," whispered Samuel, "she will be here directly. She can't get away until her ladyship is undressed."

He had barely spoken when a light figure crossed the dim hall with a noiseless step, and a touch on the sleeve of the "serious" footman's coat made him aware of Zelie's presence.

"Is your pistol ready?" whispered Crawford to Tommy Toxteth, as he took him gently by the shoulders and placed him in the narrow opening of the door on the left. "Face that way, and never run away."

"Which way is she said to come?" asked the lieutenant, in a less heroic tone than he could have wished.

"No one knows, as we already told you; so there's an equal chance for both."

An almost frantically-similar dialogue had taken place in the great dining-room, where Sir Cecil Morse and Mr. Netterville were posted. Mr. Netterville faced the door on the right, at the end of the gallery, the staircase immediately outside which communicated with the right wing of the building, containing the Countess's apartments.

"It is settled that we give the ghost till one; isn't it?" said Mr. Netterville. "Quite long enough, I think; the servants might be persuaded they had seen a dozen by that time."

"Hush!" said Sir Cecil; "don't whisper. If any of the ladies are up they might think it was thieves."

Dead silence. Waiting. Something like genuine awe among the servants. Something not altogether like incredulity among the gentlemen. Perfect stillness among all. The women's cold hands grasp the men's, and they stand very close together, and have strange lumps in their throats, and shivers through their limbs; and there is not one of them but knows if she tried to speak she could not do it. A quarter past twelve. Dead silence. Waiting. Then the sudden, horrible howling of a dog, which makes the women start and catch their breath, and some of them feel that if they were not afraid of the gentlemen, who are watching intently, and whom, such is the power of their caste, they dare not, even for terror's potent sake, disturb, they would run away, if indeed their limbs would carry them; but, if they should not, then it would be a relief to drop down where they stand.

Dead silence. Waiting.

But there was a slight noise which, if every ear were not painfully strained in one direction, might have been heard. From Lady Burnham's boudoir a glass-door opened on a light iron stair leading to the flower-garden, which in the summer had formed a pretty colosseum at Burnham. The slight noise above-mentioned was caused by the unlocking of this hardly-curtained door, and the entrance into the warmed and lighted room of no unauthorized intruder, but of Lord Burnham. He had caught the last train at the last minute, and had walked over from the station, guided by the cold, wintry moonlight, and taking a well-known short cut which brought him to the flower-garden. He looked across it, saw the lights in his wife's rooms, and decided on letting himself in by the side-door, and enjoying her delight and surprise. She was still up, he knew, for he saw a shadow passing back and forward once or twice as he crossed the garden. He opened the door, pushed the curtain aside, and looked eagerly into the room. Adeline was not there. He locked the glass-door, and went into the dressing-room, which was in great confusion but empty; then into her bedroom, with the same result.

"She hasn't come up," he thought; "they are in the saloon. I wish she had been here; I don't want to go down stairs"; and he went irresolutely into the corridor. No lights, no servants about. He took a wax-light from Adeline's dressing-table, and went quickly toward the saloon, which was empty. "They must be at supper in the dining-room," he thought. Then he crossed the saloon with a hasty step, and went out. And the door which opened on a corridor communicating with the staircase of the right wing. The wax-light in his hand burned dimly, and flickered as the draught from the closing door caught it, but the light sufficed to show Lord Burnham that he was not alone. From the far end of the corridor into the centre of which he had emerged, something came toward him, something which chilled his blood and made his heart stand still—something in human shape which yet was not human, which was the form of a beautiful woman and yet was no woman. An awful phantom, with a shadowy face, as of a woman with brown bright eyes and rich brown hair, heaped up from the high brow, and falling on bare polished shoulders, majestic yet terrible, for the luminous form had the semblance of substance, and yet had it not, and sight of it had the dread and agony of death without peace, or sanctity, or any thing but fear. The phantom came toward him, moving, but not as living beings walk; the movement was not a movement of the limbs, but was an onward sweep as of the wind. The awful presence was clothed in phantom garments of rich, trailing brown satin, the train was held up by one hand, and a foot shone beneath the skirt, a motionless foot which yet was borne along, and on which diamonds gleamed. In the other hand were two rich red roses; and when the awful thing had passed by the cowering human wretch who shrunk against the wall, it turned and, with the hand which held the two red roses uplifted again as by a sweeping wind, waved to him to follow it. The light had dropped from his hand and was quenched, but he needed no light to do that terrible bidding. From the awful presence came something that was not light, but yet which banished darkness, which forbade the blessedness of seeing it no more. On went the phantom, down the wide flat stairs, the satin train sweeping noiselessly over the crimson carpet, on, on, to the right-hand door of the picture-gallery, on which the eyes of Sir Cecil Morse and Mr. Netterville were intently fixed.

Dead silence. Waiting. Half past twelve.

There is the slightest possible movement of the left-hand door of the picture-gallery, there is the lowest whisper breathed into Crawford's ear—

"My God! There it is!"

And the Brown Lady glides through the doorway—her hand up, her brown hair falling on her neck, her satin train held back with that queenly gesture of the hand, the two rich red roses nestling against the lustrous folds of her dress, the raised skirt showing the beautiful foot with the glittering diamond buckle. In another second Captain Crawford has wrenched the pistol from Tommy Toxteth's hand, and with a loud cry of "Lady Burnham, stop! for God's sake, stop!" has caught the Brown Lady in his arms; but within the same instant a shot rings sharply through the gallery, and a heavy fall is heard outside the opposite door.

* * * * * * *

They laid the young man's lifeless body on the floor, where his wretched wife had hung herself; and, at her earnest prayer, permitted her to search for the wound, which Mr. Netterville frantically accused himself of having inflicted. But there was no wound, and the bullet which had been fired at the ghost was found on the carpet, six feet within the door whose threshold the dead man had not crossed. He was quite dead. She knew it; she needed no one to tell her, or to tell her why. For as she—daring, impious fool, as she should for evermore know herself to be—came in through the door to play her ghastly part, she had seen the phantom—seen the horrible presence which she had dared to mock—trifling with fearful mysteries into which none may look without deadly sin—and knew in another instant that it had slain her husband.

Every one has seen the ghost. The Brown Lady was a ten-thousandfold terrible truth to the house of Raby now.

Assisted in the wild confusion, the utter bewilderment of horror and despair, the helpless movement, the clamor just hushing itself irrelevantly within the immediate neighborhood of the dead, the frantic misery of the parents, the grief of the friends, the sheer fright of the servants—Adeline was quiet, and calm. She sat still upon the floor, her burden on her knees, her arms clasped round it, and her head bent over the still, white face. The medical aid, which they knew too well could not avail, was sent for, and to all entreaties she was deaf.

"When the doctor comes, he shall touch him; no one till then; leave me alone till then."

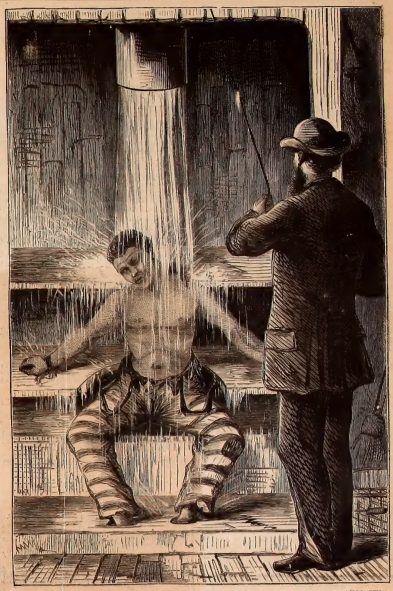
They almost forgave her appalled, as she gathered up the shining satin train, and flung it like a sheet over her head. It fell around her figure, and her over the dead man; and as she sat there, though her senses remained to her, Adeline Burnham's heart died.

* * * * * * *

In the picture-gallery at Burnham Castle there is an empty space where the portrait of the French countess hung; but a deeper and more tragical interest is attached to the Brown Lady, and the neighborhood has stronger faith than ever in the Burnham ghost.

THE APPARITION.

DON N. M. RIVERO, PRESIDENT OF THE SPANISH CORTES.



PUNISHMENT OF CONVICTS—TORTURE AND DEATH BY THE SHOWER-BATH AT SING SING.

DON N. M. RIVERO,

PRESIDENT OF THE SPANISH CORTES.

NICOLAS MARIA RIVERO, the President of the Spanish Cortes, is a little over fifty years of age. At the beginning of his educational career he determined to adopt the profession of medicine. But his views changed and he devoted himself to law, and became one of the most distinguished advocates in Madrid. He entered upon political life in 1847, when he was nominated a deputy, and in this position he leaned toward the ranks of the liberal opposition. The events of 1848 confirmed this predilection, and with the assistance of his democratic compatriots he established the journal La Discussion. The persecutions which he underwent under the ministry of Marshal NARVAEZ caused him to abandon this enterprise. He was one of the most ardent promoters of the revolution of 1854, and was a vice-president of the Revolutionary Committee. He rendered important services to his country by his eloquence and his energy, and especially by the zeal with which he sought to harmonize contending factions and to promote tranquility and general security. As Alcalde of Madrid he acquired the affections of all his fellow-citizens.

The choice of M. RIVERO as President of the Spanish Cortes at this important crisis is a remarkable and well-deserved token of the esteem in which he is held by the best citizens of his country.

PUNISHMENT OF CONVICTS.

IT has been made a question whether our States' prisons ought not to be made reformatory in their discipline as well as penal. Certainly the recent developments at Sing Sing show that our prison discipline itself sadly needs reform. Scarcely has the excitement which attended the late attempted revolt of the convicts died away before we hear of a succession of horrors. One prisoner is murdered by another, and the punishment of one of the convicts by a shower-bath results in his death. In regard to the latter case, to which our illustration on page 253 especially refers, it is stated that the victim was a young man suffering under disease of the heart. He was in the habit of the physician of the institution exempted him from labor. Certainly those who inflicted upon him the penalty of a showering under these circumstances were guilty of brutal conduct. It is charged that convicts at this prison are condemned to work when they are on the verge of death.

HEROIC ACTION OF MISS IDA LEWIS—RESCUE OF TWO DROWNING SOLDIERS IN NEWPORT HARBOR.—[SEE PAGE 254.]

It is hardly possible that those whose duty it is to visit our prisons as inspectors can reach these grievous errors in discipline. They do not see them. They are feasted by the Warden, take a hasty glance at the convicts, and depart no wiser than when they came.

Is there no remedy for this evil? Two things, certainly, it seems to us may be secured. A Keeper may be appointed on account of their fitness for the position. They ought to be missionaries in the largest sense of the term. At least, they need not be brutes who delight in witnessing tortures needlessly inflicted. Then, again, the whole system ought to be altered. The question of prison reform is one which has been agitated for a long time. "The nearest approach to a solution of the great problem," says the New York Times, "has been reached in Ireland, where a system of graduated punishments, rewards and privileges has been devised and years practiced with the most encouraging effects. This method, we are informed, is now sought to be introduced into the prisons of this country. Its adoption is urged upon the Legislature of this State by the Prison Association of New York, a society which has been twenty-four years in existence, and through the agency of which many marked improvements in the conduct of the police and treatment of criminals have been effected."

If some such system be adopted, and the keeper be judiciously selected, two important steps will have been taken in the way of a much needed reform.

THE MODERN GRACE DARLING.

THE illustration given on page 253 represents one of the most daring and heroic actions of this or any other age. The same item in the newspapers tells the story, but gives no details beyond the brief statement that Miss IDA LEWIS, rowing in a scull from the light-house kept by her father in Newport Harbor, rescued two soldiers from drowning. Unlike GRACE DARLING, she was alone; not even the father was present to support and assist her in her humane mission. The bravery which she manifested is an ornament to womanhood as well as to Christianity.

We learn that, since the event which we have illustrated, Miss LEWIS has rescued two other persons from drowning. It is said that she has saved in this way quite a number of lives. She is only 23 years old. Her father is keeper of the Lime Rock Light-house, near Fort Adams, but, being an invalid, the duties of his office have devolved principally upon his wife and this brave daughter. The latter takes daily trips, whatever the weather, to Newport—one and a half miles from the light-house—and we may readily believe her when she claims that she can row a boat faster than any man in Newport.

THE CITY ASLEEP.

STILL as the sea serene and deep,
When all the winds are laid,
The city sleeps so still, its sleep
Maketh the soul afraid.

Over the living waters see,
The heavenly mysteries go,
The dim moon glides hushfully
Through stars like flakes of snow.

In dusky silver here and there
The fallen moon-rays gleam;
Hark! a dull stir is in the air,
Like the stir of one in dream.

Through all the hushed waters crep
Deep thrills of strange unrest,
Like washings of the windless deep
When it is peaceful.

A little while and breath will go
And hush the flood no more;
The dawn will break—the wind will blow,
The waves will roar.

Each day with sounds of strife and death
The waters rise, and call
Each midnight, conquered by God's breath,
To their dead sea they fall.

Out of his heart the fountains flow,
The brook, the running river;
He marks them strangely come and go,
Forever and forever.

And darker, deeper, one by one,
After a weary quest
They from the light and moon and sun
Flow back into his breast.

Love hold my hand! Be of good cheer!
For His would be the guilt,
If out of all the waters here
One little drop were spilt.

Think while the city sleeps so dumb
Neath staring eyes that yearn,
Out of His veins each drop hath come,
And thither must return.

MUSIC FOR THE MILLION.

HITCHCOCK, of No. 86 Spring Street, New York, has conferred a vast benefit upon the family circle, and society at large, all over the country, by originating and introducing a plan through which choice music may be placed in the hands of the great million, at a price so small that all can enjoy the luxury. We may be said to be a musical nation. Every house, almost, has a piano, and not only instrumental, but vocal music is a part of our system of mental culture. Good music, at a cheap cost, is what is necessary, and HITCHCOCK has hit upon the experiment which has turned out a splendid success. His issues embrace choral, operatic, ballad, patriotic, and the whole of melody, neatly gotten up, beautifully printed in numbers, at five cents each. He has already arranged a series of sixty numbers, the cost of which, at three cents each, is about one-fifth the price of sheet music. HITCHCOCK has struck a chord which will reverberate all over the Union.—[Dog Book.]

THE MYSTERY SOLVED.

CREMETS being unable to discover the ingredients in fragrant SOZODONT, which removes all stains from the teeth and imparts such a peculiar ruinous to the gums, the public are hereby informed that it is a preparation from the Bark of the Quillaya Saponaria, or Soap-Tree of Chili, imported for the first time this season by the special purpose. Such is the purifying and innocuous effect of this rare botanical agent that it removes tartar and discoloration from the fugitive fabrics without injuring a single thread. —[Com.]

FRAGRANT AND PLEASING.

COLGATE & CO.'S TOILET SOAPS are widely known. Fragrant and pleasing. They have a softening influence on the skin.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

BROTHERHEAD & CO.'S LIBRARY, 199 East 17th Street—10,000 volumes. Books, Periodicals, and German. All the English and American new books and periodicals.

WALTHAM WATCHES are the best and the cheapest.—N. MATSON & CO., Chicago.

DEPEPSIA TASTELESS cures Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per bottle. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 571 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A NEWSPAPER CHALLENGE.

OFFICE OF THE EVENING NEWS, April 3, 1869.

Believing that the Evening News has now the largest circulation of any daily paper—morning or evening—published in the United States, I make the following propositions:

1st. That The Evening News circulates daily more copies than the New York Herald.

2d.—That The Evening News circulates more copies than TWICE THE COMBINED CIRCULATION OF ALL the other papers published in this city.

Terms—That The Evening News has a larger circulation than any other daily paper published in the United States.

I agree to give $1000 to any charitable institution that will deposit a like sum for the contingency I am willing to be incorrect; $5000 if two of them are proved to be incorrect; $10000 if three of them are proved to be incorrect; provided the proprietors of the newspaper interested in the challenge agree to forfeit the same amount in case the above statements are decided in favor of the Evening News. I am willing to make the proprietor of some first-class newspaper, and if the two should not agree, they can name a third.

BENJAMIN WOOD.

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.—A Complete Library of Modern Music for Voice and Piano-forte: CROUCH'S VALSES, CROUCH'S POLKAS.....50c.
EIGHTEEN BARITONE AND BASS SONGS.....50c.
EIGHTEEN SONGS BY CLARIBEL.....50c.
COMPLETE OVERTURE FOR PIANO, each.....50c.
Mailed on receipt of price. CATALOGUE FREE.
BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

Why be Disfigured

With ulcers, erysipelas, sores, pimples, boils, or any superficial eruption, when the vitalized blood that produces them can be cleansed and vitalized by taking Dr. HOFFMAN'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS. The medicinal virtues of this invaluable combination increases the vital force of the system, and the sulphur resolves the venous in the circulation into a fluid which is expelled by the pores in insensible perspiration. In all cases of cutaneous visceral diseases, the pores are in a torpid condition, and the system vitiates these vessels and they rapidly discharge the accumulating humors which the action of the sulphur has eliminated from the blood. This is the philosophy of the many cures of external disease effected by these POWDERS.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS.

1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 6 Packages, $5; Powders, 50c. each.

HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N. Y.

A POOR GIRL'S

LETTER. New Song from Peticolas.....30c.
STANDARD AND CAPTIVE INDIAN MARCH. Peticolas 40c.
PEDDLER'S CARTOON, 50c. WHITE WINGS, 50c.
NOT FOR JOE Gabay, 30c. "On the Beach Galop," 30c.
HA-HA-HOO (comic song). "Hang on the Line," each 30c.
Violin or Flute Arrangements, 15c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1125 Broadway, N.Y.

TO SMOKERS!—Send 25 and get a POCKET SAMPLE of COLGATE & CO.'S FINE CUT, post free, by mail. Your cigars will cost less than our cost each. Agents clear $5 to $25 per day. State, County, and Town Rights for sale. Send stamp for circular. AMERICAN CIGAR MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass.

TO PICTURE DEALERS—22x28 Walnut and Gilt Frames always on hand, of our own make. Best quality, lowest price! ALSO GILT MOULDING by the yard. WHITING BROS., 67 West 15th St., New York.

MOTHERS! Give your Children SWEET QUININE!

FREEMAN & BURR, CLOTHIERS,

Always have in Stock, Ready for Immediate Wear,

SUITS For all Occasions, ONE PRICE TO ALL.

OVERCOATS For all Ages, FURNISHING GOODS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION. ONE PRICE TO ALL.

BOYS' SUITS For all Ages.

Our Stock of Goods in the piece,—Cloths, Cassimeres, Coatings, Vestings, &c.,—is of unparalleled extent and variety. Orders for Garments to measure executed within a few hours. Gentlemen in all parts of the Country are ordering their Clothing direct from us, with entire satisfaction. Perfect Fitting guaranteed in all cases.

Our New Rules for Self-Measurement.

Rules for Measurement, Price List and Samples of Goods mailed free on application.

FREEMAN & BURR'S WAREHOUSES, 124 & 126 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK.

HITCHCOCK'S
HALF-DIME MUSIC.
Printed on heavy music-paper, 4 pages, colored titles. Music and Words. Price 5 cts. each; the whole 60 mailed for 50 cts. Now READY:
Nos. 60. Meet Me in the Lane, Love.
59. Mabel Waltz.
58. The Smile of Memory.
57. Sweet Heart.
56. Boot Black's Song.
55. Lady Mine.
54. Five O'Clock in the Morning.
53. Those Tassels on the Boots.
52. Pretty Bird.
51. Why Wandering here?
50. Call Me thine Own.
49. Le Petit Tambour.
48. Woodside Waltz and Polka.
47. Home, Sweet Home. (Instrumental.)
46. Perichole's Letter.
45. The Mowers' Song.
44. St. Nicholas Golop.
43. Vivienne Johnny.
42. Gens D'Armes Duet.
41. Genie from Home.
40. Belles of Broadway.
39. Flying Dutchman.
38. Power of Love. (Instrumental.)
37. Susan's Beaux.
36. I will not Ask to Press that Cheek.
35. The Boy's Song.
34. The List-Song.
33. Will you Wed me? (Last Scene.)
32. Beautiful Bells.
31. Lion Galop.
30. Olympic Schottische.
29. Up in a Balloon.
28. There's a Charm in Spring.
27. See the Conquering Hero Comes!
26. Take Back the Heart.
25. The Parson's Bride.
24. Still I'll Love Thee.
23. Wilhelm at the Long Branch.
22. Riding down Broadway.
21. She might have Sat your Fancy.
20. Arm-in-Arm. (Polka Mazurka.)
19. The Rosary Song.
18. Silver Chimes.
17. The Old Cottage Clock.
16. His Love Shines over All. (Sacred.)
15. Maggie's Secret.
14. Little Maggie May.
13. The Danish Whistle.
12. Come hither, my Baby, my Darling.
11. Greenback Galop.
10. Skating Rink Polka.
9. Champagne Charley.
8. Praise of Tears.
7. I really don't Think I shall Marry
6. Good-bye, Sweetheart, Good-bye.
5. Not for Long.
4. Blue Eyes.
3. We'd better Bide a Wee.
2. Won't you Tell me why, Robin?
1. Captain Jinks.

The above can be had at the music, book, and periodical stores, or by enclosing the price, 5 cts. each, to the publisher, HITCHCOCK, 86 Spring Street. All regular fellows Agents wanted. BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher, 86 Spring St., New York (Successor to Nichols Hotel).

FINE WATCHES AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

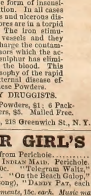
SOLID GOLD
HUNTING-CASE LADIES' WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jeweled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, Lasting Accuracy, Handsome and Elegant, $22.
FINE SILVER
GENEVA HUNTING-CASES, Lever Movement, First Quality, $14; Extra Quality, $16.
Engraved Movement, Ruby Jewels, Sweep Seconds, Silver Hunting-Case, $18.
AMERICAN MOVEMENT
2-oz. Silver Cases, $16; Full Jeweled, $16.
SOLID GOLD
GENEVA HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jeweled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, $45; Extra Quality, $48; and Watches of every description, always on hand. Watches to be paid for after they have been received and examined. Any Watch found not to be as represented, or exchanged if not giving perfect satisfaction. Full Descriptive Price-Lists sent free.

S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
52 & 54 JOHN ST., NEW YORK.

$245 A MONTH. To AGENTS. 49 New and useful articles. Address JOHN J. HOWARD & CO., Alfred, Me.

$10 A DAY to agents selling SILVERS' PATENT ELASTIC BRACES. Sample by mail, 25c. Pocket-book size, 15c. CLEGG & CO., 58 Cortlandt St., N.Y.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.
Prices from $16 to $22.



From the Scientific American of April 11, 1868.

"The color of this metal closely resembles that of 18-carat gold, is more grateful to the eye, and its texture brilliant," &c., &c.

When desired, these Watches will be sent to any express office, and permission of examination granted upon payment of freight charges.

Description of goods and prices upon application. An inspection of my goods earnestly solicited.

H. WILLIAMSON VUILLEMIN,
44 Nassau Street, New York.
For sale by all respectable Dealers.

THOMAS R. AGNEW,
ESTABLISHED 1836.
260 Greenwich St., corner Murray, New York,
IS OFFERING CHEAP,
FOR CASH:

COFFEES.—Green, Roasted, and Ground; all grades to suit the palate and the pocket, of the million; 18c., 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., 40c., 45c., 50c.

TEAS.—Every body should know who they buy teas of, as all who sell cannot and will not watchmakers. Mr. Agnew spent three years in China, and knows exactly what teas are, and does not deal in damaged goods of any kind; consequently every pound of tea sold is warranted to representation, or the money returned.

MOLASSES.—Mr. Agnew has his agent in New Orleans, an expert in the business, who ships him the choicest of the crop.

RICE.—Mr. Agnew has a house in South Carolina, who ship him the best head rice in market.

FLOUR is received direct from the mills. Genesee, Indiana, and Western. The best brands at $6 per bbl., $7 to $14 per barrel.

GROCERIES.—Every thing desired in families, hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, steamships and sailing vessels is sold by Mr. Agnew, who is a live man, working 16, 18, and 20 hours every day for the last quarter of a century. He is a steam-worker compared with the old fossilized grocers, who have been brought up in a soap-fat barrel, or a hickery for others, and now begin to flap their wings when gray-headed. In a word, Agnew is the beau ideal of the trade as Dexter is of the cart-horse, when trotting. He is the man for the people, and no lightning and punctual as time.

SALESMEN wanted by a Manufacturing Co., to travel and sell by sample a new line of goods. Salaries permanent; wages good. H. H. RICHARDS & CO., 413 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

WALNUT MOULDINGS!—Choice lot of Walnut Mouldings, suitable for picture frames, for sale low. UNION FRAMING CO., 67 West 19th St., N.Y.

GILT MOULDINGS!—Trade supplied with B. GIT & Imitation Gilt Mouldings. UNION FRAMING CO., 67 West 19th St., New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

Genio C. Scott.
FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GENIO C. SCOTT. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

Charles Lever.
THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S. By CHAS. LEVER, Author of "The Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly," "Barrington," "Martins of Cro' Martin," "Charles O'Malley," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

Countess Guiccioli.
MY RECOLLECTIONS OF LORD BYRON; and Those of Eye-Witnesses of his Life. By the Countess GUICCIOLI. Illustrated by Tony J. Harrington. With Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

Anthony Trollope.
PHINEAS FINN, THE IRISH MEMBER. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "He knew He was Right," "Orley Farm," "Small House at Allington," "Can You Forgive Her?" "Doctor Thorne," &c. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 75.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Beautifully Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Charles Reade.
GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, JEALOUSY. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Never too Late to Mend," "Love Me Little, Love Me Long," &c. Fully Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARD CASH. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Love me Little, Love me Long," "Never too Late to Mend," &c. With Illustrations. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

J. D. Baldwin.
PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Great Peoples and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to the Origin or Civilization of the Ethiopians or Cushites of Arabia. By JOHN D. BALDWIN, A.M., Member of the American Oriental Society. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.
SERMONS BY HENRY WARD BEECHER, Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. Selected from Published and Unpublished Discourses, and Revised by their Author. In Two Volumes. 12mo, 8vo. With Steel Portrait by Halpin. Cloth, $5 00.

William Heyworth Dixon.
HER MAJESTY'S TOWER. Historic Studies in the Tower of London. With Prospective Plan of the Tower. 12mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

Thomas Boreas.
PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK: Its History, Condition, and Statistics. An Official Report to the Board of Education. By THOMAS BOREAS, Clerk of the Board. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1.25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

Samples sent free.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who are using quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

PATENT COFFEE-ROASTER AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (uncroasted), 25c., 30c., 33c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

PORTSMOUTH, MICH., August 26, 1868.

To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York.

GENTS: The people here will not let me alone. They say I have formed the club, and that I have got to send another order for them. So here you have it, in the shape of my second order since the 4th of May last, making five hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-four cents. I have sent you a check for that.

Hoping this will be as good as former packages, I remain Yours, &c., JOHN W. HAWKINS.

10 lbs. Uncol'd Japan, Mrs. Kempton... at $1 00...$10 00
6 " Imperial, " " ... " 1 25... 7 50
5 " Young Hyson, A. L. Cummings, at 1 25... 6 25
5 " Imperial, " Silas Hopkins " 1 25... 6 25
4 " Coffee, " L. Chapman, at ... 40... 1 60
4 " Gunpowder, " O. A. Watrous, at 1 50... 6 00
4 " Imperial, " J. Taylor, " 1 25... 5 00
4 " Young Hyson, " J. Hopkins, " 1 25... 5 00
4 " Coffee, " ... 30... 1 50
6 " Gunpowder, " John Stephenson, at 1 50... 9 00
6 " Young Hyson, " Wm. H. Dorsty, at 1 25... 7 50
1 " do. do. " H. Malone " 1 25... 1 25
1 " do. do. " N. Newcomb, " 1 25... 1 25
1 " do. do. " Noah Campbell, at 1 25... 1 25
1 " Gunpowder, " Judge Miller, " 1 50... 1 50
1 " do. " A. Gale, " 1 50... 1 50
3 " Imperial, " Mrs. Bird, " 1 25... 3 80
$74 35

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars may better send a Post-Office Order or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but what is liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Tea-Room-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a Store does not keep Teas for sale, by clubbing together, can have the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the Express charge) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in the city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising or issue circulars, it is important that our friends and doing business will be careful to write our address in full, and should be sure the number of our Post-Office Box is also to put on the envelopment. This will prevent their letters from being misdirected, and the handing of bogus circulars.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

THE PROVIDENCE TOOL CO.,
268 Broadway, New York,
offer at first hands their Heavy Hardware and Ship Chandlery, also PEABODY'S PATENT LOADING FIRE-ARMS, for Infantry, Cavalry, and Sportsmen. They are unequaled for strength, rapidity of loading, certainty of fire, and elegance of appearance. Descriptive pamphlets and Price-Lists furnished by H. B. NEWHALL, Agent.

No excuse now for Papers and Magazines lying about the house all the year.

CONANT'S IMPROVED PERIODICAL COVERS,

for HARPER'S WEEKLY or BAZAR, sent by mail for $1 25. They bind the numbers firmly every week.

Address H. CONANT, 29 Nassau St., N. Y.

"A good thing."—New York Tribune.

MAGAZINE SIZE, 50 CENTS. SHEET-MUSIC SIZE, $1 00.

THE COMICAL ADVENTURES OF MR. TOODLES

will be sent free upon receipt of order addressed to BOX 9976, New York Post-Office.

$3000 Salary. Address { U. S. PIANO CO., N. Y

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15 HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless ones sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability; and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting Cases, beautifully engraved by hand. The $15 W atches are equal in appearance, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $300. Chains of every style, from $2 to $6.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Gold Pens and Medallion Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our published prices. Our regular customers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to remit money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office, with privilege to open and examine. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only office is

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

THE

PUREST and SAFEST

The efficacy of

HOSTETTER'S

Celebrated Stomach Bitters

as a specific for rectifying the enfeebled body and clearing the bewildered mind has been tested on a proverb. In the United States, where this marvelous tonic has borne down all opposition and eclipsed all rivalry, the demand for it has annually increased in a heavier and heavier ratio for years, until at last the popular sales of that preparation have left those of all other stomachic combined. Eminent members of the medical profession, and hospital surgeons under the medical profession, and hospital surgeons under the medical profession, have candidly admitted that the pharmopeia of the faculty contains no prescription that produces one-half the benefits in dyspepsia, general debility, and nervous diseases, as

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS.

To use the language of a venerable physician of New York, "Dr. Hostetter has proved a stimulant and the safest tonic we have." But the uses of the great vegetable antidote are much more comprehensive than could be would imply. As a PREPARATORY ANTIDOTE to epidemic disease, a genial stimulant, a protector against unhealthy vigor, an appetizer, a stomachic, and a remedy for nervous debility, no medicinal preparation has ever attained the reputation of HOSTETTER'S BITTERS. It is the

Household Tonic of

The American People, and in all human probability will be so for centuries to come. The magnates of Science recognize its merits—and it is regularly saluted by the physicians of the masses, is proved by its vast and ever-increasing sales.

INDISPENSABLE.

HOW TO WRITE, HOW TO TALK, HOW TO BEHAVE, and HOW TO SPEAK IN PUBLIC. Indispensable for young men. One vol., 600 pages, $2 50.

HOW TO READ CHARACTER. A New Illustrated Hand-Book of Phrenology and Physiology, for Students and Examiners, with a Chart for recording the sizes of the different Organs of the Brain, in the delineation of Character, with upward of 170 Engravings. Price, in Muslin, $1 25; in Paper, $1 00.

All Works on Phonography, Hydropathy, Anatomy, Physiology, Medicine, and the Natural Sciences generally. Agents wanted. Please call or send for circulars.

S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

THE LANGHAM HOTEL, London.

JAMES M. SANDERSON, Manager,
formerly of New York.

GENUINE OROIDE GOLD WATCH CO., Geneva, Switzerland,

Manufacture, on strictly scientific principles, the Genuine Oroide Gold, which is identical in color with gold, and is the most rare and costly description of Watches. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Hunting Cases. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Open Faces. Ladies' and Gentlemen's Fine Jewelled Watches. Splendid Assortment of Chains. Stem-Winding Patent Levers. Best Escapements. Railroad Chronometers. Railroad Conductors, Engineers, Expressmen—Our Watches are thoroughly demonstrated the equal of any in the market for accuracy, and unlike our competitors, we guarantee them for strength, durability, accuracy, and quality of case unsurpassed by any. Our prices are unavoidably low. Don't send orders to parties who ask more; pay for Watches before you see them. CLUBS FOR SIX WATCHES will RECEIVE AN EXTRA WATCH FREE. The universal demand for our specialties have induced unprincipled persons to counterfeit our inimitable Watch with worthless metal watches that destroy the reputation of our Oroide Gold Watches.

JOHN FOGGAN, President Oroide Gold Watch Co.

Only Office in the United States No. 78 Nassau Street, New York.

THE COLLINS METAL WATCH CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE).

$15 $20. 39 NASSAU ST.

Alaska Diamonds.

The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the best diamonds mounted in our own factory, in solitaire diamond or cluster style, from $5 to $50, and sold by us at one fourth their cost. Ladies' and gentlemen's wishing to wear the real thing can not be deceived in these goods, as they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Look at our Price-List.

Ladies' Solitaire Finger-Rings, $5 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Rings, $5, $6, and $10; Cluster Finger-Rings, $8, $10, $12; Cluster Ear-Drops, $12, $15, $20; Cluster Scarf-Pin, $10, $15, $20, and $25 each; Cross Sets, $10, $15, $20.

Gents' Solitaire Pins, $3, $5, $8, $10, $15, $20; Gents' Solitaire Rings, $5, $8, $10, $15, $20; Gents' Cluster Pins, $10, $12 each.

Cluster Pins, $10 and $15; with tail, $10; Cross Pins, $6, $10, and $15; Studs, per set, $5, $6, $10.

We do not sell these goods from our factory, located in a city which has a world-wide reputation for its fine jewelry.

Orders less than $5 should be accompanied with the Cash, or Express charges will be added to the price. Exceeding that amount sent by express, C.O.D., subject to examination. A Large Discount to the Trade. TRY US. Address

STANLEY, WHITPLE, & CO., Providence, R.I.

Early Rose Potato.

ONE lb. EARLY ROSE sent by mail, postpaid, for $1.
4 lbs. EARLY ROSE, sent by mail, postpaid, for $3.
Best Spring Wheat in the world; the earliest and finest Sweet Corn; wonderful yielding Oats—white and black; prolific Potato to the bushel; Spring Barley; Grass Seeds; Field Seeds, &c. Send for the great Feed Cutter. Send for the EXPERIMENTAL FARM JOURNAL for 1869, a richly colored Map, issued in this edition for $1 50 per year. Subscribe, if you want to make your Farm pay. Address

GEO. A. DEITZ, CHAMBERSBURG, PA.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 BROADWAY, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of first-class makers, in this establishment, at PRICES FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take from $5 to $10 monthly until paid. The same is let, and rent money applied if purchased.

London and Paris Fashion Books.

World of Fashion, or Lo Monde Elegant.
Beau Monde, or Les Modes Parisiennes.
English and French Domestic Magazine.
Young Ladies' Journal.

All published monthly, arriving here about the 15th of each month. Single Specimens, $1 each. Splendid Colored Plates and Patterns, executed in Paris by the first artists. Supplied by BOOK AGENTS.

WILLMER & ROGERS, 47 Nassau St., N.Y.
General Agents for Foreign Periodicals.
SEND FOR PRICE-LIST.

WANTED—AGENTS—to sell the American Lock Stitch Machine. Price $18. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit a pair of stockings in a minute. Liberal inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE & CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—I am now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at their homes, the whole of the time, or for the spare moments. Business new, light, and profitable. Fifty cents to $5 per evening is easily earned by persons of either sex, and the boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. Great inducements are offered those who will devote their whole time to the business; and, that every person who reads this notice may send me their address and test the business for themselves, I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, etc., sent free. Sample sent by mail for 10 cents. Address H. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Me.

WHOEVER

WILL act as Agent, either lady or gentleman, can in each in or all of the cities of Augusta, Ga., Memphis, Tenn., Nashville, Tenn., Louisville, Ky., Cincinnati, Ohio, Chicago, Ill., and Milwaukee, Wis., and other cities, as Commission in our

GREAT SEWING MACHINE SALE,

Comprising over 800 different articles. Send for Catalogue. PARKER & CO.,
98 and 100 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

POTATO BAKER.—Housekeepers want it. Size on Stove like a Pot. Saves time and fuel. Agents Wanted. Address DEWEY & CO., Rochester, N.Y.

AGENTS WANTED for the only steel engraving of GEN. GRANT and his family, published with their approval. Sheffield Steel Engraving Co.,
GOODSPEED & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

100 YARDS OF SHEETING

For a Club of 100 in our great

ONE DOLLAR SALE,

If all returned. A little extra exertion secures it. Send for circulars with new commission rates, before sending your orders elsewhere. Our Dollar Sale ensures you that our terms to agents are not excelled, and the quality of our goods supplied by our Dollar house in our line of business

S. C. THOMPSON & CO.,
186 Federal Street, Boston, Mass.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE.

First-class, and fully licensed. AGENTS WANTED. Price $50. Address CHICOPEE M. CO., Chicopee, Mass.

25 CENTS. Send it for a Package of those MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS. Library of Love, a vols., for 50 cents. Agents wanted. The Lottery, $1 00. W. C. WEMYSS, 3 Astor Place, N.Y.

THE DOLLAR SUN.

CHARLES A. DANA'S PAPER.

The cheapest and best paper published out of New York journals. Every body likes it. Three editions. Daily, Semi-Weekly, and Weekly. Only $6, $3, and $1 a year. Full reports of markets, agriculture, literature, and the arts. Original and selected story in every Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A splendid paper for the whole family. Try it for a year. Specimen, with premium list, free.

R. W. REDFIELD, Publisher of Sun, New York.

A NAMATEUR OFFERS FOR SALE.—Fifty Seeds, 25 cents; dozen roots, post free, for 25 cents; fifty Hollyhocks, 25 cents; fifty Geraniums for 25 cents. These are all distinct and beautiful. Twelve Dahlias for 25 cents. All obtained European prizes, and are warranted to give satisfaction. Any of the highest quality, as none are grown but such as have obtained first-class prizes. Address A. H. ROUSE, 207 Broadway, N.Y.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT, rubbed vigorously into the Throat, Chest and Throat, will cure in a single night Coughs, Colds, and Catarrh; for the last, rub it freely over forehead and temples. It never fails to cure.

LYON'S PATENT HAIR-CRIMPERS.—Every lady should have them. For sale at Variety Stores. Made only by E. Lyon, 1891 Marshall St., Philadelphia.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or two of them for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is free to all subscribers in the United States or Canada. The Magazine to costs a year, payable quarterly, semi-yearly, or quarterly in advance, at the office where received. Postage to the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with the subscription price of the MAGAZINE, or Five Cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be furnished with back numbers from which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription expires. It is necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. The Numbers for June and December of every Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is to commence with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the first Number issued after a specified date, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the latter be lost or stolen, they will not be renewed without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be distinctly written. Names of the Post-Office to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $250; Half Page, $125. Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

TROUBLES OF A MEMBER OF CONGRESS.

"I am run down by office-seekers from my district. They pile in on me at my boarding-house. I have been sleeping every night on my bedroom floor. They follow me about and chase me down. They have smoked all my cigars and drank up all my whisky, and now they are getting out of money and want to borrow. There is one, a woman, worse than all the rest. She wants the best post-office I have. This woman torments my life out; and yet if I give her the office I won't dare go home. She follows me up like Satan. I can't eat, I can't sleep, I can't put on a clean shirt, she pops in on me so unexpectedly."

Trade-Mark for Sterling. Trade-Mark for Silver. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate. GORHAM MFG CO

GORHAM MFG. CO.,

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Sterling Silver Ware,

AND

Nickel Silver-Plated Ware,

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

THE GORHAM WARE may be obtained of ADAMS, CHANDLER, & CO., No. 20 JOHN STREET, New York.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

"Their Name is Legion." Dyspepsia is the parent of more evils than flew out of Pandora's box. Biliousness, sour stomach, headache, constipation, nervous debility, catarrh, and indescribable misery are among its terrible offspring. Give them all the coup de grace with TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, which innovates and regulates the bowels, tones the stomach and system, and is a sure remedy for indigestion and all its concomitants.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Dr. JNO. V. BURTON'S

TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO in entirely vegetable and harmless. Directions and antidote for thirty days, $1; two months, $2. Thousands have used it and in every instance have been entirely relieved. Its action is certain and speedy. Tobacco will become loathsome, and a single dose will destroy the appetite. Numerous testimonials from those who have been cured. Price Fifty cents per box, post-paid. An interesting treatise on the various effects of tobacco, with full testimonials, voluntary, etc., sent free. Address as above.

DR. J. V. BURTON, Jersey City, N. J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.

[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

BUNT & CO., 179 Water St., N. Y.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.

First Quality only. AT VERY LOW PRICES. PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

PRINCE & COS. ORGANS AND MELODEONS. 43,000, now in use. BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

£150,000,000

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1860. Fee to search for any name, $2. Gow & Co., 8 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

THE MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.,

199 BROADWAY,

Invite attention to a valuable patented improvement in

Silver-Plated Spoons and Forks, by which those parts most subject to wear receive an extra coat of Silver three times the usual thickness, viz., on the back of the handle, heel of the bowl, and points of forks, spoons, &c.

This process adds three times to the durability of goods so plated, at an additional expense of only twenty per cent. above our Standard plate. All Spoons and Forks stamped "1847, ROGERS BROS. XII.," and with our trade-mark, are plated as above.

We also wish to call attention to the New Patent which is warranted more durable than any heretofore offered, and is pronounced by Dr. S. Dana Hayes, State Assayer of Massachusetts, and other eminent medical authorities, to be "perfectly free from any thing poisonous or injurious, and to preserve water pure," which is not the case with Ice-Pitchers not porcelain lined.

PORCELAIN-LINED ICE-PITCHER,

We are also introducing a valuable novelty for a Baking Dish, which is Porcelain Lined and fire-proof, with an elegant silver-plated Receiver, to be used when ready for the table, which will retain the heat at least twice as long as ordinary dishes.

Our facilities for producing fine plated ware are unsurpassed, having the largest manufactories of their kind in the world, and employing the most experienced workmen to be found either in this country or Europe, we are enabled to offer the most complete assortment of

ELECTRO-PLATED NICKEL SILVER

AND

WHITE METAL

Table and Communion Ware, of every description, to be found in this country.

The above goods are for sale, and guaranteed, by the principal dealers in Silver-Plated Ware, and to the trade only by the

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.,

199 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

AND AT THE MANUFACTORIES,

WEST MERIDEN, CONN.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, Plans, and Details to Working Scale of Cottages, Villas, and Village Houses with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE Twelve Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

150 Designs, $1 50, postpaid. GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York. Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

THE WILSON SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stronger than all others. AGENTS WANTED. Manufactured by THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, O.

BREWSTER & Co.

(OF BROOME ST.),

5th Ave., cor. 14th St.

Fine Carriages,

in all the fashionable varieties, exclusively of their own build, including

THE WELL-KNOWN

"BREWSTER WAGON,"

of which they are sole manufacturers.

Having fixed prices and but one quality, orders by mail will be as favorably executed as if given in person.

AGENTS FOR

CALLOWS' LONDON WHIPS.

For Tandem, Four-in-Hand, Phaeton, and Wagon driving; elegant in style, and superior to all others in quality.

Forwarded safely by Express to all parts of the country.

☞ Correspondence invited. ☜

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.

Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

POLLAK & SON, Manufs'rs of Meerschaum goods. Stores: 495 Broadway, near Broome, & 97 John St., middle of block. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5846.

OLD PAPER

We guarantee to pay more than any other house in the city for Old Books, Newspapers, Pamphlets, Magazines, Manuscripts and all Kinds of Waste Paper.

MANAHAN & MILLAR,

Wholesale Paper Warehouse,

10 Spruce St., N. Y.

WANTED AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the LITTLE GIANT IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $100 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $100 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.; Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

CAUTION.—Agents not to be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

GENUINE WALTHAM WATCHES,

IN SOLID GOLD AND SILVER CASES ONLY,

AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Silver Hunting Watches $18
Gold Hunting Watches, 18 carat Cases $60
Gold Hunting Watches, Ladies' Size $70

Every Watch warranted by special certificate from the American Watch Company. We will send these Watches by Express to any place, with bill to collect on delivery, and give the purchaser the privilege to open the package and examine the Watch before paying, and any Watch that does not give satisfaction may be exchanged or the money will be refunded. Every one is requested to write for our Descriptive Price-List, which explains the different kinds with prices of each.

Please state that you saw this in Harper's Weekly. Address in full,

HOWARD & CO., No. 619 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.

Something New.

Blake's Patent Dollar Chair Springs make a Rocking Chair out of any chair. Will last a lifetime. They never get out of order. Agents can make $25 per day. Send for Circulars with full information. Buy of us, as we are the only parties that make a steel spring. Beware of cheap iron ones that others are making. Price reduced to Agents.

G. R. GOODWIN, Sole Proprietor and Manufacturer, 612 Broadway, N.Y.

Waltham Watches.

3 Plate 16 & 20 Sizes.

3 Plate 16 & 20 Sizes.

These watches are by far the best made in this country, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

DE JONGH'S LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL

Universally recognized by the Faculty as

INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR

to every other kind,

and the most valuable remedy for Consumption, General Debility, and the Wasting Diseases of Children.

DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA in IMPERIAL Half-Pints only, sealed with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with his Trade-Mark.

SOLE CONSIGNEES,

ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.

SOLE ACCREDITED AGENTS IN AMERICA,

EDW'D GREEY & Co., 38, Vesey St., New York.

Sold by all Druggists, at $1.50 per Bottle.

☞ Beware of felonious imitations.

O-C

The Highest Cash Prices

PAID FOR

OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;

OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;

OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are ruled on both sides;

and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Folio and Publishing Houses, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Offices, &c.

JOHN G. STOCKWELL,

23 Ann street, N. Y.

ELGIN WATCHES.

CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing our watches, unless they procure one to be of our make, of parties who advertise to send them "C.O.D." We have no connection with such houses, and do not furnish our goods to any house for that purpose. The excellence and reputation of the real ELGIN WATCHES have caused several Foreign and American Watch Companies to make INFERIOR IMITATIONS with the same or similar trademarks as ours. Avoid all parties who advertise to send our goods "C.O.D.," no matter where. To get the real ELGIN WATCHES purchase only of dealers in your vicinity or elsewhere whom you know to be honorable.

THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,

ELGIN, ILLINOIS.

Business Office, Nos. 199 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

GOLD RINGS, 50 CENTS.

Genuine Oroide Gold is same color, wears equal, and can not be distinguished from fine gold. Our Oroide Rings are exact imitations of costly solid gold ones. Light Plain Rings, 50c.; Heavy Plain, 75c.; Very Heavy Plain, rich and handsome, $1. Rich Heavy Chased, $1. Fine Solitaire Diamond, $1 50. Gent's Rich Heavy Seal, $1 50. Sent by mail. Send price, slip-of-paper size; state whether Lady's or Gent's. Address

ANDREWS & CO., Thompsonville, Conn.

DRUNKENNESS—C. D. PEKE, M. D., Physician to the Inebriate Home, cures the most helpless cases. Send stamp for evidence.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 643.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE BIBLE WOMAN.—DRAWN BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 238.]

THE BIBLE WOMAN.

ABOUT eight years ago the "Female Auxiliary Bible Society of New York," feeling that they were called upon to do something more than to merely act as collectors for the American Bible Society, resolved to employ "Bible Women" whose mission it should be to go from house to house carrying with them the Bible, reading it where they could gain permission, and, by interesting themselves in the temporal wants of the poor, show that they were thus putting in practice the precepts of the Book.

The success of this mission were successful from the outset, and in 1865 twenty-six women were engaged in this labor in different parts of the city. At the annual meeting of the Society, held on the 8th of April, it was reported that $10,069 had been during the past year appropriated to the support of Bible Women. The work is well organized, each district having its lady superintendent to whom the ladies under her charge make monthly reports.

The Episcopal City Missions, the Methodist City Missions, the Children's Aid Society, the Missions at the Five Points and in the Fourth Ward, and the various missions and industrial schools all employ women as visitors among the poor, who are doing a work similar to that of the missionaries and Bible Women. Then there are many kinds of work which no such agency can of these good women to search out and relieve special cases in their behalf. Probable in all, there are not less than two hundred women engaged in these works of love and mercy. Their support is secured through voluntary contributions, chiefly among the ladies in the churches. The salary generally ranges from $20 to $30 per month. The temporal aid furnished is likewise raised by voluntary contributions.

The illustration on our first page shows one of these Bible Women engaged in her Christian work. It has been drawn by Mother Cabrini that Protestant Churches have nothing to show corresponding to the work of their "Sister of Charity." In reply we can point to our Bible Women. They go about their work unostentatiously; they are distinguished by no peculiar dress or singular habit of life; but they effectually relieve the wants of the poor and of the sick, and place within the reach of all the necessities the gift of the Gospel. It is a mission which, on account of its practical success, commends itself to all our Christian citizens.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1869.

THE DANISH TREATY.

THE letters of "Dixon" to the Boston Daily Advertiser and the pamphlet of Mr. J. Parker show plainly that the history of the St. Thomas treaty has not been in the least understood. Indeed it has been generally treated with the same kind of contemptuous disregard as the treaty of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON. The popular theory in regard to Mr. JOHNSON was that he had fraternized with Mr. LAIRD, and therefore nothing that he should do in the Alabama matter was worth attention. In like manner territorial extension was considered Mr. SEWARD'S monomania, and the smile that greeted the announcement of his proposal for St. Thomas widened into a laugh when the unlucky earthquake visited the island. So, besides, an opinion, which we share, that the most pressing duty of this country at this time is certainly not that of obtaining tropic domain, not have we seen one tolerable argument in support of the proposition to acquire Cuba or St. Domingo. In both cases the main argument seems to be that the people can govern themselves, and that they ought therefore to come and help govern the United States.

But the question of St. Thomas is hardly one of territorial expansion. The treaty embraces two islands, St. Thomas and St. John, each about twelve miles long by three broad, and each containing about the same number of inhabitants. The two islands have together about the population of Staten Island, and their combined area is not much larger than that of Staten Island. They have each good and safely defensible harbors, and the object of their acquisition is to have a convenient coaling station, of which during the rebellion we nearly felt the need. But, however desirable such a station may be, the treaty involved the payment of money, and in the present condition of affairs we shall acquire the richest and most profitable of the West India islands without spending a present penny—whatever the ultimate cost may be—and therefore the general inquiry is, why should we pay for two little sterile heaps of rocks?

To this question Denmark opposes the counter question—Is not your honor engaged? And that is indeed a serious question. Upon a fair review of all the facts, and careful conversation with those most interested and familiar with the subject, it seems to us tolerably clear that Denmark has acted throughout under a natural misapprehension, and has consequently taken steps that would leave her in a most humiliating position if the treaty should not be ratified. It is an acknowledged maxim of international law, that the acts of a fully-empowered ambassador bind the sovereign who instructs him, except in extraordinary circumstances, as where he has manifestly dealt in bad faith or has seriously injured his country by his negotiation. But the difficulty in treating with this country is that the sovereign does not instruct and is not consulted until the treaty is negotiated. This is an anomaly which is very difficult to understand—indeed, is almost impossible to understand—with a Secretary of State like Mr. SEWARD, who seemed always, like Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON, to consider Congress an impertinence.

When Mr. SEWARD arrived in Copenhagen Denmark he was in accord with the dominant party. A man familiar as General HASSLÖF was with the operations of our Government would naturally and properly suppose that Mr. SEWARD'S proposition would be ratified by the party majority. When the treaty was signed Mr. SEWARD was the guest of Count HOLSTEIN, the dominant party. That, however, could not be understood in Denmark. Denmark could only see the authorized representative of a government comparing his credentials and treating with full powers; and it could expect nothing but that the work of such a representative would be ratified except for some reason. Denmark had not wished to sell, and when its government decided that under the circumstances it was best to do so, looking at international law as not our own powers, it could not expect to believe that what was so ardently urged by our representative was strongly desired by the people.

Still it is a wholly inadmissible principle that the President and the Secretary of State can at their pleasure secretly commit the honor of this country in any treaty whatever. If the doctrine were to be tolerated, they might annex immense territories and an alien population at an enormous expense, and the Congress, is merely to say that the President and his Secretary are not the sovereign power. But the custom of the Senate has been usually to ratify a treaty concluded by the Executive promptly or to state the reasons of its refusal. If, now, it rejects the St. Thomas treaty for satisfactory reasons, Denmark can not complain. But if the treaty be rejected merely, without a reason, intelligent Danes can hardly retain that opinion of the honor of the United States which we should wish all honest people everywhere to hold. If the Senate thought it expedient to ratify with the utmost haste the treaty for the purchase of the icy deserts of Alaska, it is not easy to understand what good reason it can have for refusing to buy a convenient and essential coaling-station in the Gulf.

It is undoubtedly because of other nations to understand that in our system the Senate represents the sovereignty in a treaty. But the question still urges, why has this treaty been negotiated conformably to custom, and why all our precedents under such circumstances so strongly show the certainty of ratification that if friendly power takes one that can not be retraced, ought we to fold our arms and say "we don't choose to ratify, and we don't choose to give any reason for it"? Can we not ask us any thing about it?" There can be but one answer. Let the Senate ratify the treaty or give a reason for rejecting it.

MR. SWEENY AND EDUCATION.

Two or three weeks since, in speaking of Mr. SWEENY'S new school bill for the city of New York, we stated that Mr. HITCHMAN warmly supported it. Mr. HITCHMAN, in his place in the Assembly, denounced our statement as wholly unfounded, and declared that he should support the bill or not as his judgment might approve. A few days afterward we observed that Mr. HITCHMAN was one of the warmest friends of the bill before the Committee—and our readers were probably as little surprised as we were. Mr. BUTLER, who also supported the bill, is Mr. SWEENY'S bill, and, upon being corrected by Mr. RICHMOND, who said that he had introduced it, Mr. BUTLER replied—as reported, and as universally believed—"Well, that is no consequence, there is no use in mincing matters. It's SWEENY'S bill. He drew it up, and I've had a talk with him about it."

Thus it seems that Mr. SWEENY is dissatisfied with the present school system in the city of New York—a system which the Boston Committee in effect declared to be immeasurably superior to their own—which the Rev. JAMES FRASER, a special British Commissioner sent out by the Government to report upon our schools and our public schools, reported to be the best he had seen, and which one of the Republican City School Commissioners, Mr. WARREN, publicly stated to be a non-partisan system. Mr. SWEENY, by a gentleman who is perhaps no higher authority upon the subject of education than those we have named, is, however, dissatisfied. He wishes to make it still more perfect—and he proposes to do it by establishing a party commission of seven commissioners and five Republicans, to be appointed by that congressional agency of political morality, Mr. MAYOR OAKEY HALL. The name of Mr. HALL, indeed, has been before this occasion sometimes circularly associated with that of Mr. SWEENY and of Mr. TWEED. They are all of them known to be devoted to the highest interests of education and of the public welfare in general—and it must not be supposed, therefore, that the facts that they are the Tammany managers, and that there are three millions of dollars of school money in the city also to be managed, have any influence upon their striking zeal in the cause of education.

It is true that no necessity for a change has been shown; that there is no guarantee in the bill that any alleged evils can be remedied by it; that even a representation of nominal Republicans in the Board is not necessarily secured; and that it puts out of office, for no cause mentioned in the bill, certain men duly elected for a specified term. But in Mr. SWEENY'S judgment the interests of education and of an economical administration of the schools rest in the Republican party, unless he and his friend Mr. MAYOR HALL and a select Tammany circle have the control of the school system, and especially of the school moneys. And since there may not be even an unkind suspicion that any party or personal consideration actuate him and his friends, he provides that two Republicans votes shall be required to any important decision. Now as it is well known that there are no venal Republicans in the city, and that two Republican votes could never, under any circumstances, be brought in a School Board appointed by the impeccable Mayor HALL, it is manifest that his profound interest in the great cause of education has induced Mr. SWEENY to propose a reform of the city school system which will vest the control in the Republican party, which all who know Mr. SWEENY will at once see is most highly probable, as he has long been devoted to the supremacy of that party.

The public view rises almost to certainty when we consider Mr. Commissioner WARREN'S statement, who said that he was Chairman of the committee which went to Albany, and while there was told that the new bill was solely for the benefit of the Republican party; that the committee which reported it was composed of five Republicans and two Democrats, and that if passed it would be by the votes of a Republican Legislature. That a bill drawn by Mr. PETER B. SWEENY to abolish the present public school system of the city of New York—a bill which gives the control of three millions of dollars to a Board appointed by Mr. SWEENY'S friend Mayor HALL, and which requires only two Republican votes for any serious expenditure, should be adopted by a Republican Legislature, and be warmly supported by the Tribune, which knows that we are upon the eve of the Millennium. Indeed, the lion reposing with the lamb is not a more pleasing picture of harmonious action than the Tribune helping Mr. SWEENY, Mr. TWEED, and Mr. HALL to obtain control of the city school money for the purpose of greater purity and economy in the management of the schools.

THE DEMAND FOR FOOD IN ENGLAND.

WHENEVER a period of uneasiness arrives as to the inadequateness of the supply of food in England, for a population of over thirty millions, Irving, as old accounts agree, from "hand to mouth," there is always a writer of recognized authority to address the people there with a view to calm their fears and keep down the price of grain which is particularly abroad. The real audience addressed is the grain-producing class in all countries, who are expected to suppose that powerful interests do not influence those great organizations of the largest purchasing and consuming interest. Mr. CAIRD appeared before the Statistical Society in London with the statement that the difference between what he called the good harvest of 1868 and the bad harvest of 1867 he believed to be equal to four months, or one-third of the total consumption of the year. Stated that, on the present scale of importation, there was no doubt of abundant supplies at even lower prices. "These," he said, "are the facts which, whether all or almost exactly in correspondence with the difference in the yield of the two harvests."

The steamer which brought out Mr. CAIRD'S statement of the crop of 1868 prescribed the following evidence of the actual state of things among many agricultural proprietors:

"At Ripon, on Friday, a farmer named WARDROP, of Mossley, was fined forty shillings amounting to £20 for cruelly ill-treating twenty sheep, in not providing them with sufficient food. One of the defendant's flock had actually died from want; and on an officer of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals visiting the farm recently, he found twenty poor creatures in a field which was quite bare of grass, and also destitute of provender, excepting what appeared to be the burned bottom of a stack of hay. At York, on Saturday, HENRY ALLEYNE BRAND, farmer, of Copmanthorpe, was fined £7 5s. for a similar offence. In this case thirteen sheep and eighteen lambs had been discovered in a most pitiable state of starvation."

The Vice-President of the Physical and Mathematical Section read a paper at their recent meeting relating to the great drought of last summer and autumn, in which he says: "Rain fell upon 188 days in 1868, exactly the same number as in 1867, but somewhat differently distributed. During the first and last quarters of 1868 rain fell upon more days than in 1867—34 days in excess in 1868. In the two middle quarters rain fell in 34 days less than in 1867, a rather curious coincidence. Up to and including April, there was no marked deficiency of rain; but during the months of May, June, July, August, and September the fall was always below the average;" and he thus concludes: "There appears to have been no year during the last 75 years possessing the extremely dry period experienced from May to September, inclusive, of the year 1868."

The opinion of Mr. CAIRD, that the harvest of 1868 was superior to that of 1867, is wholly erroneous. Winter-wheat upon heavy soils was carried to perfection by the rains of the early part of August, which were copious; but the drought, which commenced in that month, destroyed much spring-wheat, and the crops of all descriptions on light soils. The winter-wheat was helped through by reason of having firmly and deeply rooted, due to fall planting; but the spring crops, not having this advantage, felt the drought. There were no root-crops, no pasture till October, a deficiency in the wheat crop, owing to the loss of spring-wheat, and an enormous deficiency in all other crops. The Mark Lane Express of 15th March says: "The corn trade has still been heavy; but, with nearly five or six months before us, there must yet be an enormous consumption before harvest, to which present stocks and prospective shipments seem unequal."

On Tuesday following Mr. CAIRD presented his statements to the Statistical Society, and the Mark Lane Express changes its tone. It says in its subsequent issue that nothing can now relieve the market but the refusal of farmers to sell, or the stoppage of foreign imports. "It seems very improbable," it adds, "that both should happen together, but if they should a temporary embarrassment would be certain. There is nothing yet in the aspect of the crops to cause much disquietude. General reports are not so favorable as last year, the evident surplus on last year's crop of wheat both in America and Europe, these countries, from a monetary pressure, are likely to send on fair shipments."

The chief evil resulting from the short crop of 1868 has been met in England in various ways. More live animals have been killed since July of last year, when the pastures began to give out, than at any former period. The food they would have eaten was supplied to the people, who also had an unusual amount of poor meat. The copious rains of the latter part of 1868, and the remarkably open winter, furnished pasture for cattle and sheep; but a diminished crop in 1869, and a smaller amount than usual of animal food, must be the consequence of winter feeding and of the excessive slaughter of animals. The effects of the drought must therefore be felt till the harvest of 1869, however bountiful may be that of 1869, so far as grain is concerned.

The prices of this year ought not to have fallen as they have, inasmuch as the drought lapped over upon the continent of Europe, touching some of the states—Spain, and parts of Russia, for instance—with great severity. But the pernicious misrepresentation of the wants of England, and the belief, widely spread, that her wheat crop was larger than usual—which was true only of Ireland—has on strong minds induced shippers in all markets to submit to the decline which England commanded.

The critical time for England is that which will intervene between this and the next harvest, which will probably not generally commence until about the middle of August. Last year, owing to the drought, it commenced in the middle of July, but it was conceded to be a month too early; and if it occur sooner than usual, a correspondingly deficient crop of corn will be the consequence of it. To provide for this period, not only, but all descriptions of food, will be necessary, and it will be the safe policy, on the part of such of farmers as are free from debt, to hold their crops.

Mr. CAIRD expects that in the face of the short season through which he has prevailed in England for the last seventy-five years, the producers and sellers of grain in every country will take his statement to be accurate, that England is now better supplied with food than she was during the year preceding the recent harvest, although at the commencement of the harvest of 1868 there was nothing left of the harvest of 1867. It had been totally consumed.

The market reports in all localities in England agree in stating that millers will buy grain only for immediate wants, the produce of wheat had been fed in unusual quantities to carry cattle through the winter; that much grain had been damaged in the extensive winter rains—the quantity which fell in December last had never in any one month been exceeded—and that stocks of domestic wheat of good quality were nearly out in the market. The true reliance is, "from a monetary pressure," sufficient to open to them the "evident surplus on last year's crop of wheat both in America and Europe."

Parts of Europe are still able to spare food of a surplus of grain. Russia is extending with great rapidity her railroad communications, and will undoubtedly be able to open new food-producing countries to the markets of the world; but the drought from which Russia suffered must soon require her entire production. Spain imports food. The French order opening her ports to grain free of tonnage duty could not have been a more idle menace to Prussia. Hindostan has been suffering from famine, but recent copious rains are relied upon to furnish food. But as the harvest of 1868 in all countries has been largely consumed, and in those which suffered from drought must be closely consumed, the intervening period to the harvest of 1869 is likely to be one of anxiety and activity.

The power of England to obtain what there is in all grain and food producing regions, by creating the impression that there is a surplus on which all may call, and by means of "monetary pressure," should not be overlooked. No market is exempt from her great influence. Her agents are "here, there, and every where," and they know full well that when Mr. CAIRD speaks the whole English people accept his utterances as being propounded to maintain their deepest interests. The theory now set up that plenty will be obtained at reduced prices will be acted upon very generally in England, although the thin carcasses of sheep and cattle, and the necessity of inflicting punishment on their owners for cruelty, express the pretence at home. This theory can be met by none except it be our substantial farmers, who can avoid reduced prices only by holding their grain firmly—a policy which maintains the real interest of the whole country.

IN THE CITY HALL PARK.

IT is not only in the characters and careers of the representatives whom the great city sends to Albany and to Washington that the New Yorker finds cause of pride and joy. Can he loiter in the Park—the city's peculiar Park—the City Hall Park—without humbly acknowledging that he, too, is a New Yorker? Our greatest blessings, intimates the poet, are often nearest to us and most disregarded. But who can disregard the City Hall Park? Amongst those enameled lawns, those trim and picturesque parterres, those shadowy, secluded avenues, the weary citizen throws off his heavy load of care, and amidst the serenity of nature that even TILDEN might envy, refreshes his soul with the moral beauty which is suggested by the noble temples that rise among the leaves.

There, for example, is the great City Hall itself, in which civic honesty and severe justice delight to dwell. It is the temple of the municipality where, as is natural and becoming in a republic, the most intelligent, and virtuous, and simple, and frugal of the citizens assemble to provide for the common welfare. In hapless countries, upon which bloated despotisms still sit like horrid nightmares, how often are not reckless waste, and shameful ignorance, and abominable corruption associated with the administration! But here are purity, and sagacity, and economy. Their modest footsteps gently resound through this syrian temple of the city hidden in its Park. Their benignant influence is every where within the sound of urban bells.

In which of these stately chambers did a WOOD stand erect in all men's eyes, untouched by evil suspicion? In which did a GUYSTIL, patriot and sage, mingle philosophy and spirit? In which did a HOFFMAN frown upon the least suspicion of corruption? In which does a HALL illustrate in what heights consistency, self-respect, and political morality may conduct modest integrity? And where in those spacious chambers, if here at all it be, does RAYMOND whiten the judicial ermine and MCVEA indefinitely decree justice? Pacing the silent walks of this ample pleasure-ground, and gazing upon the temple with which these shining names are so closely associated, the New Yorker does not feel his heart thrill with jubilant pride as, turning to the victim of some wretched Ring or other miserable combine, he waves his emphatic hand and exclaims: "These are my jewels! Here is the republic vindicated!"

But if the minion of despotism still hesitates, let the proud son of Columbia lead him gently to the rear of the temple, and present to him that fresh monument of England's social simplicity, the New Court-House. Conceived in the spirit that has made the City Hall itself of so sweet a memory, it is already a proverb of austere economy, and of prudent devotion to the public weal. In the erection of this fair pile no stone was spotted with suspicion, no swindling Legislature stained contracts and bonds. Designers, builders, workmen of every kind, official and non-official personages concerned, were all gladly impoverished for the glory of the city. Upon that magnificent edifice, located to New York justice, the proud citizen may gaze, and again shaking his finger at the cowering minion at his side, inform him that no man made illicit gain from that great work; and that it is another beautiful memorial of republican thrift, sense, taste, and honesty. Indeed, he may add all the cardinal virtues, and they will as aptly serve as the qualities he will have mentioned. "That is another of my jewels," let him say, once more; "here also is the simple grandeur of our system vindicated!"

Yes, whoever wanders in that pleasant Park —or pays the little tax for a street pavement, or an improvement against which the neighborhood foolishly protests—or stimulates his appetite in the spacious, savory, accessible markets —or strays along the streets where the crowd thickens nor dust blows—or calls a coach and scarce believes that such cleanliness of vehicle and such winning courtesy of driver can be hired for the trifle that he must force upon the bashful charioteer—or observes the massive and enduring and convenient piers—whoever meditates these comforts, and then reflects upon the light burden of the tax that supplies them all for himself and his happy fellows, will surely snap his fingers at the bloated despotisms, and pity the unfortunates who are not citizens of New York.

THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS.

THE President is very regardless of the feelings of those who have gleefully enlarged upon his differences with the Legislative branch of the Government. He will not gratify them with even the semblance of a quarrel with Congress. On Wednesday of last week he sent a message recommending action in regard to the reconstruction of Virginia and Mississippi. On Thursday the House passed a bill in accordance with his suggestions, and sent it to the Senate. On Friday the Senate amended it, passed it, and sent it to the House. The House received it, concurred in the amendments, passed it, and sent it to the President for his signature. Here was the best conceivable opportunity for a neat quarrel. That intense jealousy, that latent distrust of the President, of which we have heard so much, might have been expected to show itself forcibly. But as they do not exist, they did not appear. Even General BUTLER, who is supposed to remember his hostilities against Andrew JOHNSON, was foremost in promoting the President's suggestions. The last important act of Congress was an expression of the utmost confidence in President GRANT.

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION.

DESPITE the resolution of Mr. BANKS the President and Secretary of State are undoubtedly much too sensible to permit any interference upon our part with the Cuban revolution. The Government will maintain a strict neutrality between the contestants, although doubtless members of the Government may share the sympathy which so many Americans feel for the resolution of the Cubans to obtain their independence. Whatever the result of the struggle, a worse government than that of Spain in Cuba can not be established. But it is clearly not the business of the United States to overthrow it and to establish a republic in its place.

Meanwhile the situation is very vague. The reports of battles gradually fade into uncertain rumors, and there are the most absurdly contradictory stories of the progress of the disturbance. The Times quotes one worthy person, an Englishman, we believe, who had apparently been sauntering through the island on horseback, and was astonished to learn, after he arrived at the sea-coast, that a formidable revolution was in progress. On the other hand, we have lately heard of the formal recognition of foreign diplomatists assert that in his judgment Cuba was virtually lost to Spain. The only very positive fact is that the first occasional seizure of foreigners supposed to be in complicity with the revolution, or the execution of some hapless insurgent taken in arms.

There must, however, be something very much more definite in the Cuban movement before any strong appeal can be made to the Government of the United States to recognize the independence of the island. However warm may be our sympathy with those who are endeavoring to establish a separate government, we can not forget that our own nation has many and complex, and that something more is necessary to a recognition of independence than a declaration of the principle of a revolutionary standard. In 1823, when the United States acknowledged the Spanish American Colonies as independent, President ADAMS spoke of them as "nations de facto" that have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on full evidence acknowledged." These words are calm and well-chosen, and describe exactly the method by which a government ought always to proceed upon such occasions.

The Cuban agent in Washington is apparently acting with great discretion. He has as yet made no public appearance in general. Doubtless he is conscious that he has as yet no grounds whatever upon which he can request action. The Cubans have no port, and they can not expect us to acknowledge any maritime belligerent rights. To do that would be to countenance such conduct as England countenanced in the Alabama. We shall protect our citizens, of course, and to this end the naval force in the Gulf may naturally be increased. The island must continue to be the centre of great interest, and indeed there can be little doubt that if the certain of uncertainty should suddenly rise and clearly declare the Cubans heroically grappling in chery battle with the Spaniards, fighting and falling as the Cretans fought and fell at Canea, there would be such an expression of sympathy from this country as would go far toward settling the question.

THE MARKET AT ALBANY.

THE bill giving the control of the chief streets in New York to a collection of unknown persons or their assigns, which, as we write, is being crammed and thrust through the Legislature, is the greatest outrage yet perpetrated at Albany. Should it become a law, this Legislature can not escape the worst name of any that has ever assembled. There is, indeed, a Republican majority, and it will be ready and glad, in this sense, the worst Legislature was Republican. But we remind our readers elsewhere of what every body here understands, that the work is done by the insistance of a few Republicans only, while the great body are arrayed against the iniquities. Thus in the Senate, when it was proposed that instead of giving gratis to unknown persons this enormous franchise in a manner which the Legislature could never change, it should be publicly disposed of for the benefit of the city, of the fifteen Democratic Senators only three voted no, while of the seventeen Republicans nine voted yes, and two were absent.

The city sends, with one or two exceptions, Democratic Representatives and Senators to the Legislature; and all schemes like this of the Broadway Railroad bill receive, with few exceptions, their united support. Recently, in the Assembly, when the question was taken upon a special bill for the benefit of the measure named that they wanted a few more votes, and before the result was announced one of them, a Democrat, passed along the seats and whispered to a few members, each of whom instantly rose and changed his vote. We name no names and we make no charges, but we have no doubt whatever that each of those votes was bought in the open Legislature, like a joint of meat in the market.

Take the facts in regard to this Broadway bill. It gives to certain persons, or their assigns, that is, to an unnamed company, the right to lay railroad tracks through the principal streets in New York, and to carry passengers for so many years, and it gives this most profitable privilege for nothing. Mr. ALEXANDER T. STEWART offered to pay two millions of dollars for the franchise, and to bind himself to carry passengers for three cents each. The proposition was not even entertained. The Legislature refuses to take the money offered for the immunity of a family-faced road, and insists upon taxing the people who use the street-cars a hundred and thirty-three per cent. more for their conveyance than is necessary. And this is done by leaders of the party which is always denouncing the Republican party as wastefully extravagant.

These are the things that bring popular government into contempt; and they are not offenses for which the Republicans as a party are responsible. The party is disposed to govern well upon the equal ruggedness and morality of both parties, we commend the party character of such votes to their attention.

NOTES.

PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH has made the deposit of his library in the Cornell University a gift, and certainly it is one of the most magnificent and valuable that the institution has received. The Professor about three thousand, carefully collected by an eminent historical scholar; and many of them are bound with that richness and solidity in which a lover of books, like other lovers, delights to clothe his darlings. Happily, also, the Professor supplies the chief want of the Cornell Library, which, with the AMERICAN collection of the, Boor for philology and the Agassiz Museum, the library is fully selected by President WHITE in Europe was yet weak in the department of literature and history. It is among the highest praises of the young University that its spirit is so generous and its promise so fair as to persuade a scholar like GOLDWIN SMITH to make it almost the arrest of personal sacrifices—the parting with such a library during his life.

MR. HUNT'S picture also sends from France the magnificent work of the French Government upon the Exposition in thirteen volumes; and one of the ROSWELL P. SHELEY, sends from Rome the noble engraved folios of CANINA; while Mr. MCGRAW, of Ithaca, gives fifty thousand dollars for another building.

A PETITION has been circulating, addressed to the President and Board of Directors of the Mercantile Library, asking that the rooms may be opened on the Sunday afternoon between noon and evening. The Library is especially designed for young men who must spend all their leisure days other than in their rooms. They will not pass the whole of Sunday in church, and to open the Library is to invite them from their haunts of dissipation. The young men are idle on a holiday, and every person temptation is peculiarly alluring at such a time. Shall they not have the opportunity at least of finding an elevating and attractive resort in the quiet of the Library?

THERE are many Travelers' Insurance Companies of which few persons know any thing. But the Travelers' Insurance Company of Hartford, whose advertisement is elsewhere in this paper, and among whose directors we observe the name of the new Governor of Connecticut, MARSHALL JEWELL, is both prompt and responsible. The late Judge HALSEY has held a policy in this Company, which was most punctually paid.

A LOVER'S WISH.

I FAIN would be the fern-leaves deep,
Where, when the day begins to die,
My sweet lies lulled in grateful sleep,
While Love alone keeps sentry nigh.

I fain would be the Zephyr's breath
That o'er her cheek is wont to play,
The buds, that beak to flower beneath
Where'er her fairy footsteps stray.

I fain would be the streams that bear
Her floated body in their flow,
And ripple round her clustering hair,
And warm with each beam of snow.

The clinging robes that close embrace
Her warm limbs glowing from the bath,
The glass that mirrors every grace,
And charm her lavish beauty bath.

I fain would hold her heart entranced
By some voluptuous vision a spell;
Then I would have my fairy dreamland,
And make that dream the truth foretell.

The cruel fates bid my wish aspire,
And soar to this too dazzling height,
For I would be, with vain desire,
All things wherein she takes delight.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

April 5.

In the House, the charges against Richard Busteed, late Judge of the United States District for Alabama, were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

April 6.

In the Senate, the bill providing for the taking of the Ninth Census of the United States in 1870 was passed. In the House the Mexican Indemnity Commission a capitation tax on OPIUM, etc., was repealed.—Two millions of dollars were appropriated to enable the President to maintain peace among the Indians.

April 7.

In the Senate, a Message was received from the President, transmitting the Constitution of a bill appropriating a day for the holding of elections in Virginia and Mississippi, when the new Constitutions of those States shall be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection. The President suggested that a separate vote should be taken on certain clauses in these Constitutions.

In the House, a bill appropriating $200,000 for the improvement of rivers, was passed. A Message was received from the President similar to that transmitted to the Senate.

April 8.

In the Senate, the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the President's Message, reported a resolution declaring that the effect of the resolution of the Message should be postponed until December next.—The amendment to the bill on the Ninth Census was passed.

In the House, the President's Message was referred to the Reconstruction Committee. General Butler, from the same Committee, reported a bill providing the submission of the Constitutions of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas to a vote of the people of those States, and authorizing them to elect State officers and members of Congress.—It was adopted by eight amendments, by a very full vote—the division being 135 to 46.—The Senate amendments to the Judiciary System bill were mainly adopted.

April 9.

In the Senate, the House bill relative to the admission of the States of Mississippi, Virginia, and Texas to Representation in Congress, and the Constitutions of those States, as adopted by the Constitutional Conventions, with the oath prescribed by the people, Mr. Morton offered an additional section, providing that the Legislature of those States shall ratify the Fifteenth Amendment before the States shall be admitted to representation in Congress. The bill as amended was debated at considerable length, after which it was passed by 39 to 20, nays 20. On the question of the discussion the bill was passed—yeas 44, nays 6.

In the House, Mr. Stevens reported that Mr. White and by Tobacco bill were non-concurred in, and a Conference Committee asked for.—Mr. Stevens, Mr. Kellogg, and Starkweather, Representatives who elect Conference Committee on the Senate bill to facilitate the payment of soldiers' bounties to those who have been wounded.—The Senate amendment to the Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas Reconstruction bill was taken up, and after a brief debate.

April 10.

In the Senate, the Amendatory Tax bill was passed.

In the House, the bill to restore General Howard was now passed.—A resolution was agreed to to-day expressing sympathy with the Cubans in their patriotic efforts to secure independence and to establish a Republican form of government.

AT 12 P. M. both Houses adjourned sine die.

ITEMS.

George S. Twitchell, who was to have been hanged at Philadelphia on the 30th, was, on the morning of that day found dead in his cell, having committed suicide.

The Town Council of Chicago have been moving in the matter of a grand procession to be had on the opening of the Pacific Railroad. It is proposed to invite the President of the United States, Vice-President, the Governors of California, Oregon, Nevada, etc., the leading officials of the Atlantic, Pacific and Pacific slopes, and other leading officials to a grand procession. The inhabitants of the City being tendered to all the guests on this occasion.

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Commons on the 9th Mr. Bruce, the Home Secretary, in answer to a question, said that the Ministry was preparing a bill in accordance with the suggestions of the Royal Commission on the Naturalization of British subjects who swore allegiance to other governments.

Mr. Lowe has reduced the estimates of his predecessor in office upward of £2,000,000 sterling, the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year being £68,000,000. The estimated revenue is £71,000,000. The total expenses of the Abyssinian war were £9,000,000 sterling.

CUBA.

Two political prisoners were garroted at Havana on the 9th in presence of 4,000 spectators and members. Great excitement prevailed, and seditious cries were uttered by the crowd. The volunteers were commanding the prisoners fired twenty shots in the crowd, killing six men, and wounding others.

The Spanish Government is about to send a naval commission to New York to purchase monitors for service in the Cuban waters.

ITEMS.

Don Ferdinand of Portugal has positively declined to accept the Spanish Crown.

The Exposition to the French Corps Legislatif will commence on the 26th of May.

The Pope's Jubilee was celebrated in Rome on the 11th with great magnificence.

CONCORD AND LEXINGTON.

For nearly a century revolution has been the order of the day in Europe and America. But in those April days the thoughts of Americans naturally recur to those first days of the Revolution, in the spring of 1775, before the Declaration of Independence had yet been made. In an important sense April 19, 1775, was the birthday of our Republic. In connection with the anniversary of this event we give on this page a sketch of the skirmish at Lexington, copied from a print published a short time after the conflict occurred; also a view of the old battle monument at Concord.

Standing to-day

"Beneath the shadow of the elm, where, ninety years ago, Old Concord's rustic heroes met to face a foreign foe," the beholder, if he be at all fanciful, may imagine that ever since the memorable morning when it struck the first blow for liberty, the town has been having a prolonged nap, a century sleep between the hills, with nothing to disturb it save an occasional remembrancer of its own fame. It looks so quaint and quiet, with its rows of incurious and demure houses, from which no amount of "fixing up," no painting, shingling, or clapboarding can take away the characteristic repose and sobriety; its ancient trees that have guarded the street corners, or marshaled themselves on the Common for years; its lazy little stores, that have earned more moss than money; and its sober river, traveling through the meadows in staid fashion, that one feels somehow made at home by it, and becomes conscious of a mysterious content and comfort imparted by its very air. It is the place America has kept to remember herself by—a spot the world has forgotten to shiver; or, perhaps, it has been left to itself so long it has forgotten how to alter. No additions to its numbers or extent will ever change it: nothing but factories, or perhaps a multiplication of railroads, things that would produce discomfort in Eden, can rub it of its aristocratic and dignified leisure; and because it has had the privilege of standing still, it happens that its present aspect does not contradict its past.

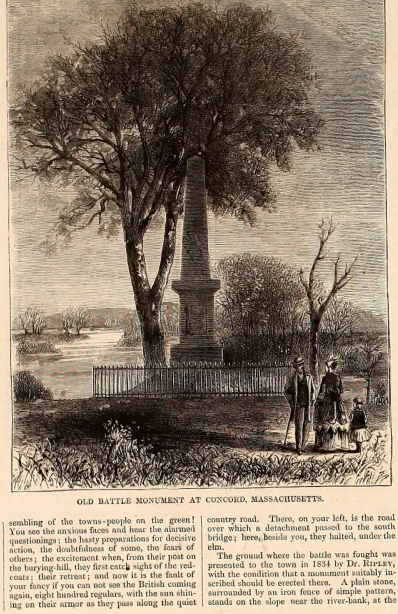
Station yourself, in the gray of a spring morning, in the centre of the Common, so early that only the rattle of a market-wagon, or the step of a laborer will, now and then, reproach you for your meditation; in the place of the white church standing on the southwest side of the inclosure, erect a smaller building, yellowish, with porches on the front and sides; cut away the maples and set elm button-woods around the old hakehouse that still stands on the corner, near by; remove the hotel, the town-house, and the new Soldiers' Monument, as audacious interlopers; set the court-house a little northwest of its present location, close up the road that runs to the new bridge, and remodel the comfortable dwelling-houses to suit your need; where the hotel stands was Dr. MINOT'S house, next, the county house, and, farther on, Mrs. BETTY HARTSHORN'S stood, next, the court-house; back of you, and a little to the right, is the road leading to the old battle-ground. How easily you may imagine you hear again the peal of bells, and see the hurried assembling of the towns-people on the green! You see the anxious faces and hear the alarmed questionings; the hasty preparations for decisive action, the doubtfulness of some, the fears of others; the excitement when, from their post on the burying-hill, they first catch sight of the red-coats: their retreat; and now it is the fault of your fancy if you can not see the British coming again, eight hundred regulars, with the sun shining on their armor as they pass along the quiet country road. There, on your left, is the road over which a detachment passed to the south bridge; here, beside you, they halted, under the elm.



OLD BATTLE MONUMENT AT CONCORD, MASSACHUSETTS.

The ground where the battle was fought was presented to the town in 1834 by Dr. RIPLEY, with the condition that a monument suitably inscribed should be erected there. A plain stone, surrounded by an iron fence of simple pattern, stands on the slope near the river-bank, at the end of a double line of pines. It is inscribed thus:

HERE,
On the 19th of April, 1775, was made the first forcible resistance to BRITISH AGGRESSION.
On the opposite bank stood the American militia.
Here stood the invading army;
and on this spot the first of the enemy fell in the WAR OF THE REVOLUTION, which gave Independence to these United States.
Firmness to God, and in the love of Freedom,
This Monument was erected,
A.D. 1836.

The parsonage stands close by, with an avenue of aged trees before it. Its study windows are still shaded by the lilacs that saw the fight, and if report speaks truly, it has the bullet-holes in its walls that were made on that day. A house standing opposite, which is owned by Mr. REYES, has also a bullet-mark upon it to remember the time by; and an enormous willow-tree which stands before it grew from a stick or sapling that was hastily thrust into the ground by a British soldier. Fancy is a quick work-woman: let her reconstruct the bridge that was removed in 1793 and show you the road that, turning at right angles around the parsonage grounds, led down to it: on the other side of the river the road turned and ran parallel with it, past Colonel JONAS BUTTRICK'S and some other farm-houses, one of which is still standing. Here the band of Americans that had been drawn up on the high land west of Colonel BUTTRICK'S, and seeing the smoke of burning houses in the town, had resolved to march thither to defend their families or die in the attempt, were met by the British. Here, with a moderation and discretion their sons may well be proud of, they reserved their fire until two of their own number had fallen. It is believed that the Americans behaved throughout with forbearance and bravery.

So Concord is consecrated ground; sacred to the living and the dead who have made men richer in dreams, hopes, and aspirations. South of the town lies Walden, a bit of God's language that has been partially interpreted to men by THOREAU. The interpreter is dead, and there is no one that will fill his place. He lies in the Concord Cemetery, on a pine-shaded hill, and his grave is marked by a stone, firm and unpretending as his life. His brother in fame lies near by, beneath a mound that is quite overgrown with myrtle. The simple name "HAWTHORNE" is written on the tablet at his head. It seems fitting that these two should lie here together—the one whose life was refined and etherealized until it became too rare a thing for the world, and the one who lived apart and kept his deeds and thoughts purer than other men's dreams—that the flowers should bloom alike above their graves.

Mr. EMERSON'S house is quite effectually protected from the public gaze. It is completely shut in on the northwestern side by a wall of pines; a road, branching off from the highway, runs before it; on the side of the road and opposite the house is another thicket of pines. It is rarely pretty and retired, with a sunny green on one side and quite an extensive garden back. Perhaps by the association of thought this character of the owner has been given to the dwelling.

BATTLE OF LEXINGTON, APRIL 19, 1775.

RAIN SONG.

Is the rain sad? Ah, no!
Not the dear April rain,
The sweet, white rain:
These are glad tears that flow,
Not tears of pain.

Through the blue heavens take
The clouds their bird-swift way,
Their white, pure way:
The clouds that part and break
In diamond spray.

The clouds that die in showers
Rise of the rainbow give,
Its beauty give,
That in its dyes the flowers
May brightly live.

Faint odors of the Spring,
The subtle breath of fields,
Of grass in fields,
Scents that to mosses cling,
The sweet rain yields.

The song of its delight
To the warm noon it sings,
Tenderly sings,
And to the quiet night
Its music brings.

All happy things rejoice
In the bright April rain,
The freshening rain,
Exulting that its voice
Is heard again.

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER XX.

OTHELLO, MOOR OF VENICE.

AT last Mr. Morley came. Surely no brown, handsome face, no quiet hazel eyes, no very slightly grizzled head of curling hair was ever more welcome in a Christian house than were his.

It was in the dreary middle of the day when he came, and Rebecca, who was kneading dough (and making an awful mess of it) uttered a joyful exclamation when she saw him. I think that I have mentioned before that in social matters this odd young lady was rather radical. She certainly behaved on this occasion in a way which would have horrified the better conducted sister Carry. She ran up the stairs and opened the door herself with her hands, nay, with her finely-modeled bare arms all over flour, and she said: "Come in. I thought you must be dead. Tell me about those two."

"Go and wash your hands, and come and talk to me in the parlor," said Mr. Morley, quietly, and Rebecca slid away and did as he told her.

"Now," she said, when she was seated by him on the sofa, "tell me all about Jack and Hetty."

"That will depend on your account of your behavior," said Mr. Morley. "How have you been behaving?"

"I have been as good as gold."

"Then I shall not tell you one word," said Mr. Morley; "you are in a vainglorious and self-seeking frame of mind, and I will mortify you by not telling you one single word."

"Well, then, I have been very naughty."

"One of your propositions must be false, and so I shall certainly tell you nothing now."

"Then you are a most disagreeable man, and I hate you—no I don't—don't mind me. I love you very much, Mr. Morley. Only come sometimes and tell me what to do, for really and truly I don't know."

"You have been well brought up, and you ought to know for yourself. At least I mean to leave you to find out. How is your father?"

Rebecca remained perfectly silent, with her chin in her hand for a long time, and Morley sat looking at her steadily, although she did not know it. She sat so long thus that he repeated his question, I very much fear to catch the light in her eye. Rebecca turned to him quickly for one instant, and he had his will. She gave him one kindly glance, and saying, "Wait a little," resumed the old attitude of thought—that of Michael Angelo's Lorenzo de Medici.

Morley waited for her in silence and in patience. "Here," he said to himself, "is a woman who will actually think before she speaks. Here is also a woman who can act, who has acted, on large, deliberate conversation, careless of present consequences. Are there two Hettys in the world?" He sat and watched her, wondering what she would come.

He had a long time to wait before it came, for she did not open her mouth until she had made up her mind. And then she told him every thing, decisively, and straightforwardly, as one man tells a whole matter to another man who is his friend.

She moved closer to him on the sofa where they sat, so that the two beautiful faces were not very far apart, and so that her eyes could look straight up into his. And there and then she told him every thing.

Her wasted, rebellious, furious youth; her secret hankering after popery—the religion of her mother, he must mind—as promising some sort of rest to her furious heart; the questioning effect that the gentle Primitive Methodists had had on her always; her rage and hatred against Hagbut because he wanted to marry her; the real reason of her will escapade to Rumsgate; her love for her father; her love for Carry; her love for her little dog; her love for Mr. Spicer and Jim Atkin; her love for Jack Hattrop; for Hetty, whom she had never seen, and her love for him—Morley. "I assure you, Mr. Morley that I believe I am a most affectionate person, if I had a fair chance. But people are so cross. I'd get fond of old Russel and old Soper if they would only be civil."

RAIN SONG.—"IS THE RAIN SAD? AH, NO! NOT THE DEAR APRIL RAIN."

Mr. Morley said, "Quite so."

Then she went on, resuming the Lorenzo de Medici attitude again, and leaving herself and her experience, told him in a plain, business-like manner, the whole story of her father, and her troubles from beginning to end. "For," she said, "you have got kind, trust-worthy eyes, like Mab's, and if one wants to keep out of Bedlam, one must tell some one. And so she told him all about the fearful responsibility her father had undertaken, pointed out to him that her father's action was nearly illegal, being done without the consent of trustees, of whom Sir Gorham Philpott was one.

Here Mr. Morley interrupted her for a moment. "Was Lord Ducetoy married?"

"No; and he would not get married for a month or so, until affairs were in some way square. He was to be married to Miss Egerton of Delamere."

Mr. Morley was satisfied at once, and begged her to proceed.

She went on at once, eagerly, not catching the drift of Morley's last inquiry; for he was so surprised at Turner's singular and chivalrous behavior, that it had entered into his, not generally a suspicious mind, that Turner wished Lord Ducetoy to marry Rebecca. Rebecca, I say, went on, and told him of the clouding of her father's mind; of his religious doubts; of his strange midnight wanderings up and down the house; of the awful responsibility which he weighed on her with regard to him. She told him all; and then, turning her face to his again, asked for his advice.

"It is easily given, Rebecca," he said; "go on as you are going now. Do your duty to him as you are doing it now, and you will not fail. You have a clear sharp brain, use it; and you will do well."

"But I have done nothing," said Rebecca.

"What could you do?" said Morley.

Rebecca's chin went in her hand again directly; and after a time she said:

"I don't see, speaking honestly, that I could have done any more than I have. The time for action has not come. And then I am such a fool, you know."

"Are you?"

"They all say so."

"Well, then, of course it is true. About this business, taken as a whole, you can do nothing more than you have done. It is one of those matters on which one can not decide. Your father is behaving splendidly; but if his religion goes from him in the struggle, your father will die. I will talk to him. You are a good girl; indeed, I always thought you were, do you know," and Morley laughed.

"That is very fine," said Rebecca; "but at the same time one would like a little practical advice."

"I'll manage matters for you, my child," said Morley. "I'll shift no responsibility of your shoulders on to mine, but I will make things easier for you. You do your little duty, and you will come to no harm."

"Then you don't think me such a very naughty girl?"

"Well, well! you are behaving well now."

"Am I naughtier than Hetty?"

"You leave Hetty alone; Hetty is no business of yours."

"But Hetty was naughty. What did she do, Mr. Morley?"

"She was exceedingly naughty, and I was very nearly being angry with her; that is what she did."

"Am I never to see Hetty?"

"What on earth do you want to see her for?"

"I don't know," said Rebecca. "I think I should like her. There can not be much harm about her, or Jack Hartop would not love her as he does. He says that she has been wrecked three times, and that the Queen wrote her a letter. Why was she shipwrecked?"

"Because she shipped on board ships which happened to be wrecked."

"Hum!" said Rebecca. "But why did the Queen write to her?"

"Because she did her duty, as you are doing yours now."

"But tell me more," said Rebecca, eagerly. "Let me know something of her; for I love her, and I can't tell why. What did she do that the Queen should have written to her. Tell me."

Dangerous work this. Two noble and enthusiastic souls, sitting close to one another, and telling of great and noble deeds. As for Morley, he had made up his mind long before. He was determined to marry Rebecca, and Rebecca and Hetty knew it. As for Rebecca, she brought her fate on herself. If she had desired her freedom she should not have sat on the sofa beside a very attractive dissenting minister, and have forced him to tell the tale of his daughter's heroism. All that happened to her was her own fault. But they will do it. Searching among rare old books the other day, I came across a very scarce play called Othello, or the Moor of Venice. In that play the Moor actually wins his Venetian beauty by telling travelers' marvelations of the Sir John Mandeville type. Morley did not do this; he only told the plain truth about his daughter. But the telling of chivalrous adventures is a very successful way of courting. At least, the man Shakspeare thought so.

"I have no objection to tell you what Hetty did on that occasion," said Mr. Morley. "I may show you what a woman may be worth under certain circumstances. She had been up and down the North Devon coast so often that she could tell every headland in the darkest night. Well, one night, working up from Hayle against a slow eastering wind and a heavy ebb tide, the wind shifted against the sun, and came from nor'-west a hurricane. The skipper put her head for Cardiff, but that Bride is the most thundering—I beg a thousand pardons; you must remember that I live among sailors."

"You did not say any thing?" said Rebecca.

"Well, I was very near doing it," said Morley. "My dear, that Bride is the most thundering idiot of a ship you ever saw. With even the N.W. sea she shipped enough water on board to put out her fires, and there she lay entirely without deck ports to let the water away, trusting to her scuppers, which were choked with deck lumber, close to a lee-shore, with the seas getting up from the Atlantic, nothing between you and Charleston, South Carolina, and the skipper utterly uncertain as to where he was. Do you understand this, my dear Rebecca?"

"Not a bit," she said. "You and Hetty must teach me."

"We will," said Morley. "My dear Hetty, finding her cabins flooded and the ship nearly water-logged, with fires out, and stokers and firemen on deck, naturally came on deck herself, barehanded, with all her glorious beauty, wild in the storm; you know Hetty's beauty—no, by-the-by, you don't—but it is greater than your own, child. And in the terror of the tempest she asked the skipper where they were.

"And the skipper said, 'I think we have searoom, Miss Morley; we are off the Bideford River, and we may get anchorage and ride it out. Can you see to leeward? Is it not so?'

"But Hetty never answered one word. She peered to leeward through the fury of the tempest, and she came back to him with the message of death quite quietly.

"'My dear Captain Jeffries, you are not off the Bideford River at all. Look there over the starboard bow. That black well is Baggy Point. Think; can it be any thing else?'

"And the skipper put his hat on the deck and trampled on it.

"But Hetty said, 'I will go and get my women ready for death, for with this ebb tide we shall be on Morte Stone in ten minutes. Alas! I wish this was untrue.' And the skipper said, 'Is there nothing to be done?' And Hetty said, 'Yes. Make sail on her and put her ashore at Wellacombe.' 'With rising tide?' said the skipper. 'It is better than Morte Stone,' said Hetty.

"And he did it, my dear Rebecca. He made sail on her and put her on the helm up. And she burst heavily on shore, with the rising tide behind her, and the rapidly accumulating sea following her, and getting more furious each moment.

"It was a dim, dark winter's night, my dear, and there was no help to be had. One by one the sailors leaped into the long surf, and some were drowned and some escaped. Hetty got her women into the forecastle, for the ship had gone stem on, and at last no one was left but the women and the skipper.

"The skipper was doubtful about the ship lasting out the ebb; but Hetty pointed out to him that she, although a beast, was strongly built, and the women under her care also pointed out the fact that in three hours they would walk on shore. And as she was telling them this the ship, by the rising of the tide, lifted broadside on, with a sickening, thumping lurch, and the sea, which hitherto had only been bursting over the poop, burst in rising and over the whole ship.

"And all the women, young and old, huddled round my beautiful daughter, crying to her to save them. And she, believing that the end had actually come, quieted them by prayer."

A pause.

"You say they were saved. Oh yes! they were saved. The tide rose and the women walked ashore the next morning and went to Ilfracombe. But the Queen wrote to Hetty, and that is what you were doing."

Dangerous talk this, or the rare play of Othello errs.

Mr. Morley came very often indeed now, and his gentle, kindly ministrations had some good effect on Rebecca. Especially as the time drew him with him the he had devoted his life to what he thought was right, and that he had failed in it, was only in searching after a nearly impossible excellence. This was in the main true, and it comforted Turner exceedingly. The effect of Turner was not so satisfactory as Mr. Morley could have desired. He suddenly developed a vainglorious habit of talking about his wife by the hour, to Rebecca in particular, on his virtuous and blameless life; would compare his life to the lives of all the other men he knew, very much to his own advantage. In fact, the poor man's brain was upset by anxiety, and he had got into that frame of thought which consists in persistently stating one's case against destiny, preparatory to one's complaining of it all, and ends in Bedlam. Morley saw this after a time, and counteracted it as well as he was able. On the whole, therefore, the old Turner much good, and made life easier for Rebecca.

CHAPTER XXI.

A SUDDEN SURPRISE.

ONE Saturday night Rebecca was alone in a very silent, thoughtful mood, and would not speak at all, but sat brooding, and now and then would kneel down and pray—to poor Rebecca's great discomfiture. How many bitter tears she shed that night who can tell? She saw that he was not angry with her; for even when he sat by the half-hour together, looking steadily at her, his look was not unkind. This little fact saved her from hysterics, for, as we accordingly sensitive nature like hers, the fact of having a stern old man sitting perfectly silent before her, hour after hour, and staring at her with intervals of prayer, was nearly too much. She was relieved when he took his candle and prepared to go to bed.

"Rebecca," he said, "I desire that you will be ready for Mr. Morley to-morrow morning by the first boat."

"What does he want with me?"

"I do not know; but you will have the goodness to go with him. Good-night." And he went.

It would be very difficult to say what Rebecca's thoughts were that night. They were, one would fancy, not very profound. She had tact enough to see that Mr. Morley would, most probably, ask her no question requiring any immediate answer; yet he might. Long before morning dawned she had thought all through, and had come to a resolution that if on this occasion, or on any other, Mr. Morley chose to put a certain question to her, that he would have a most decided and emphatic answer; an answer which would prevent his ever repeating his question. "For we do love Jack Hush, don't we?" she said to her little dog. "The only question is, what does he think of us?"

She had breakfast ready for him, and was nicely dressed when he came. "Well, Mr. Morley," she said, "I am told I am to have a Sunday out with you. If you are pleased, I am sure I am. This is very kind and considerate of you, indeed. Where are we going?"

"I was going to ask you to come down to Limehouse with me."

"I am quite ready to go where you will. Now we will start, or you will be late for your service."

Morley rose and leaned against the chimney-piece, and Rebecca stood before him. The man had resolved the night before to examine her character to the utmost. He had all day, after another six months. He had resolved that he would see her under every form of temptation before he committed himself irrevocably; he had determined that he would see how far he could mould her character—had made a hundred pigeon-holes ready. But as she stood before him at that moment she looked so grand, so noble, and withal so good, that his resolutions all went to the wind, and, like a true man as he was, he spoke his mind.

"Rebecca, child, love me, and I will be the world besides."

She only flushed up and stood quite still. She was so utterly unprepared for this as he was himself. She hardly thought it would come at all; still less on this day; still less at the beginning. But those words—"love me," and Rebecca, although prepared with her answer, could not give it from sheer surprise.

"Are you angry with me? Is there another?" he said. And she quickly found her tongue—"Oh no, no! no other. Please try to love me, Mr. Morley, as much as in my very best."

And so they kissed one another and jogged out to the steamboat arm in arm, with no further words when they were once over the telling of this story; and it was all over and done, for ever and ever, a great deal sooner than either of them dreamed of. And one of the world's laws informed me that this is frequently the case. "If a man and a woman," said one of them, sententiously, "have made up their minds to make fools of themselves, they no more know at what particular time they will do it any more than you or I do. They, however, always do it before they more mean to."

They jogged out arm in arm down the lane in the most exalted manner conceivable. But you can not keep that sort of thing quiet; it will show itself. Mr. Spicer said Mr. Akin were taking the first step of shoving off tobacco, out of the style of pipe which they called "long churchwardens," when Mr. Morley and Rebecca passed. They saw what had happened directly. Mr. Akin said:

"She's took him."

Mr. Spicer said, "He has got her, hard and fast."

"He is a Methody, ain't he?" said Mr. Akin.

"Oh! I'm not," Mr. Spicer, "but he is a sailor Methody. Why, that man," he went on, pointing after the disappearing Mr. Morley with his pipestem, "has been in a-battling with the shipwrecks and earthquakes, and gales of wind, more than any skipper as sails upon the sea. He has got a good 'un, and he has got a good 'un. There is her little dog a-coming out, Jim, a-trying to fetch; send her back. Hish back, little dog. Hish back, little dog. Hish back."

But Jim Akin, having secured Mab, with that firmness for which a high-bred dog which seems almost ingrained in the Londoner's nature, possessed himself of Mab's person, and made her take breakfast in a chair among his children. Mab, as great a radical as her mistress, enjoyed this extremely, and was, in fact, not taken back till just before shaped-time, by which time our two friends were landing far down the river.

The steamer was nearly empty, for it was very early, and they sat down and talked.

"When did you think of this first, my beloved?" said Morley.

"Only very lately. I am utterly taken by surprise."

"And I also. I never dreamed of speaking so soon. My own, I have no house to offer you. I am bound for the sea."

"And I must stay by father," she said. "So that happens well."

"Then will you wait, Rebecca?"

"Wait for what?"

"To be married."

"Of course I will wait, any time. I have got your heart; I care for nothing more."

"Now I am going to say something which will offend you," said Mr. Morley.

"I think not," said Rebecca, "but say it."

"All this has been talked over, time after time, between Hetty, Jack Harrop, and I."

"No, really! Well, I am very glad of that. Does Hetty think she will like me, dear?"

"You shall find out that for yourself."

"I am content. Alfred, this is the first day I have ever felt peace in my whole life. When may I know Hetty?"

"When she comes back from America, perhaps."

"Why, dear, perhaps. Are you going to America, Alfred?"

"I am going farther than what one generally calls America. I have failed here to a certain extent. I am only popular among sailors, and sailors come and go. I have never commenced an Limehouse dislike me for preaching pure moralisms, and for consorting with the men of the Establishment. They are right. I am not a scholar and a gentleman, and it is a sore temptation for me to mix with the men of the Establishment, who are scholars, and sailors, and gentlemen. And as for preaching moralisms, what can one preach else, when the heart is sick? And, again, Hetty, my darling Hetty, is a standing scandal to a certain set, the rich set, down there; and so I am going abroad; and I have no home to give you."

"But," said Rebecca, "if you have power among the sailors they should keep you."

"Well, you see your brother—Jem, Hagbut, has gone so terribly against Hetty. And he is all-powerful there."

"I will hear no more about Hetty," said Rebecca, laughing, "because I shan't be told. But all dissenters are not so narrow as these?"

"Bless them! It is only one little connection, fighting for sheer existence, which is so narrow. Any one of the largest sects would welcome you—any, and I with them."

"And you could not join them?"

"No," said Morley. "Hypocritically, our people are the worst Christians. Practically, from ignorance, vanity, and stupidity, we are the weakest of all sects. I don't see where to turn—eat."

"Where the goest I will go. Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God," murmured Rebecca. And so they went on their Sabbath-day journey.

Until the forward creeping tides
Began to draw and then to brave
The great ships lift their shining sides
Above the waves.

And Mr. Morley said, "This is Limehouse. Do you think you shall like it?"

"I'll see," said Rebecca, as they went on shore. He was not quite sure that she had not had his plans; but he did not press her, but waited anxiously, for Limehouse is not at all an attractive place. Rebecca looked about her, and saw, that it was very dirty; that it smelt of tar and coals; that the ladies of Limehouse did not do their hair as their feet, or love, and that she was seized in the middle of the street, with their arms crossed, and stopped talking to stare at her. That there were too many children, and too many cats out of upper windows, who talked to one another across the street, and had the same disconcerting habit of being quiet when you were telling of the story; and it was all over and done, for ever and ever, a great deal sooner than either of them dreamed of. And one of the world's laws informed me that this is frequently the case. "If a man and a woman," said one of them, sententiously, "have made up their minds to make fools of themselves, they no more know at what particular time they will do it any more than you or I do. They, however, always do it before they more mean to."

They jogged out arm in arm down the lane in the most exalted manner conceivable. But you can not keep that sort of thing quiet; it will show itself. Mr. Spicer said Mr. Akin were taking the first step of shoving off tobacco, out of the style of pipe which they called "long churchwardens," when Mr. Morley and Rebecca passed. They saw what had happened directly. Mr. Akin said:

"She's took him."

Mr. Spicer said, "He has got her, hard and fast."

"He is a Methody, ain't he?" said Mr. Akin.

"Oh! I'm not, Mr. Spicer, "but he is a sailor Methody. Why, that man," he went on, pointing after the disappearing Mr. Morley with his pipestem, "has been in a-battling with the shipwrecks and earthquakes, and gales of wind, more than any skipper as sails upon the sea. He has got a good 'un, and he has got a good 'un. There is her little dog a-coming out, Jim, a-trying to fetch her; send her back. Hish back, little dog. Hish back, little dog. Hish back."

But Jim Akin, having secured Mab, with that firmness for which a high-bred dog which seems almost ingrained in the Londoner's nature, possessed himself of Mab's person, and made her take breakfast in a chair among his children. Mab, as great a radical as her mistress, enjoyed this extremely, and was, in fact, not taken back till just before shaped-time, by which time our two friends were landing far down the river.

The steamer was nearly empty, for it was very early, and they sat down and talked.

"When did you think of this first, my beloved?" said Morley.

"Only very lately. I am utterly taken by surprise."

"And I also. I never dreamed of speaking so soon. My own, I have no house to offer you. I am bound for the sea."

"And I must stay by father," she said. "So that happens well."

"Then will you wait, Rebecca?"

"Wait for what?"

"To be married."

"Of course I will wait, any time. I have got your heart; I care for nothing more."

"Now I am going to say something which will offend you," said Mr. Morley.

"I think not," said Rebecca, "but say it."

"All this has been talked over, time after time, between Hetty, Jack Harrop, and I."

"Oh, really! Well, I am very glad of that. Does Hetty think she will like me, dear?"

"You shall find out that for yourself."

"I am content. Alfred, this is the first day I have ever felt peace in my whole life. When may I know Hetty?"

"When she comes back from America, perhaps."

"Why, dear, perhaps. Are you going to America, Alfred?"

"I am going farther than what one generally calls America. I have failed here to a certain extent. I am only popular among sailors, and sailors come and go. I have never commenced an Limehouse dislike me for preaching pure moralisms, and for consorting with the men of the Establishment. They are right. I am not a scholar and a gentleman, and it is a sore temptation for me to mix with the men of the Establishment, who are scholars, and sailors, and gentlemen. And as for preaching moralisms, what can one preach else, when the heart is sick? And, again, Hetty, my darling Hetty, is a standing scandal to a certain set, the rich set, down there; and so I am going abroad; and I have no home to give you."

"But," said Rebecca, "if you have power among the sailors they should keep you."

"Well, you see your brother—Jem, Hagbut, has gone so terribly against Hetty. And he is all-powerful there."

"I will hear no more about Hetty," said Rebecca, laughing, "because I shan't be told. But all dissenters are not so narrow as these?"

"Bless them! It is only one little connection, fighting for sheer existence, which is so narrow. Any one of the largest sects would welcome you—any, and I with them."

"And you could not join them?"

"No," said Morley. "Hypocritically, our people are the worst Christians. Practically, from ignorance, vanity, and stupidity, we are the weakest of all sects. I don't see where to turn—eat."

"Where the goest I will go. Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God," murmured Rebecca. And so they went on their Sabbath-day journey.

Until the forward creeping tides
Began to draw and then to brave
The great ships lift their shining sides
Above the waves.

And Mr. Morley said, "This is Limehouse. Do you think you shall like it?"

"I'll see," said Rebecca, as they went on shore. He was not quite sure that she had not had his plans; but he did not press her, but waited anxiously, for Limehouse is not at all an attractive place. Rebecca looked about her, and saw, that it was very dirty; that it smelt of tar and coals; that the ladies of Limehouse did not do their hair as their feet, or love, and that she was seized in the middle of the street, with their arms crossed, and stopped talking to stare at her. That there were too many children, and too many cats out of upper windows, who talked to one another across the street, and had the same disconcerting habit of being quiet when you were telling of the story; and Mr. Morley went by. Likewise the gentlemen, although evidently sailors, were by no means sailors of the long-shore type. Rebecca felt herself relieved, and far more ostentatious in the admiration of her beauty than was at all desirable; and, moreover, she could not disguise from herself that but a few of these gentlemen were exactly sober, though only one was positively drunk—a powerful person, broad man, with a great blonde curling beard down over his broad chest, who had been making a speech to a crowd of sympathizers during a day of it, but who was being taken to his ship by a select committee or caucus of experienced lovers of the ardent, and consequently was that his ship lay off the back-door of every public house which he passed. This was strange, and not very agreeable, to Rebecca, and she still withheld her opinion.

But, when they went further, she began to alter her opinion, and, in fact, changed it altogether.

On the edge of the brimming river they came on a quiet, peaceful place. There about houses partly faced the river one way, and on the other a dock, in which ships, small ones it is true, but ships of the sea, were lying, brought into great ocean, with their yard-arms against the windows of the houses.

They came to the dock in approaching the river, and Rebecca looked down on the decks of the ships, and began wondering how those tall masts could possibly be got up again, and the fury of wind and sea combined against them.

There was no sign of the great struggle on them now; only a waste of coiled ropes on deck, and colored-like rigging aloft. On one of them Mr. Morley saw a boy at work, and, finding him in the surrounding silence and peace, was remarkable. On board another was another boy; a wonderful one, this, for he was not the skipper's dog: this boy was an event; on another was the skipper's boy climbing up a high halter with a bundle on his shoulder, and on deck was a mutton, with potatoes under it, and a solitary onion atop, balanced on his head, going to the baker's, while, from below, the skipper's wife, baby on arm, watched him breathlessly.

I shall like this place very much indeed, she said, emphatically and assuredly.

"That is well," said Morley.

"Do you know these people?" asked Rebecca.

Morley stood still until the boy with the potatoes and mutton had effected his dangerous landing on that iron-bound coast, and continued to look down on to the deck of the ship. After a time the skipper's wife's eye, being attracted from the very dangerous landing of that bold young mariner, the apprentice, rested on Mr. Morley. Whereupon she said to the skipper, "Bailey!"

Mr. Morley in that peculiar veil with which the wives of coasting skippers hail the wives of other coasting skippers, their gossips, on the high seas. C'in also staccato, I suppose, not being musical myself, notes inaudible to the male ear on the waste of waters, but perfectly audible in dock to a priest as well used to them as Mr. Morley. While Rebecca was reading on the stern of the vessel, Jane, Ilfracombe, she heard the following dialogue:

"My dear, tender heart, how be ye?"

"All well here, Mrs. Camp?"

"He has a-been ashore, lapped, my dear," said Mrs. Camp, "and he is agoing to stay. So nice and kind he is. And I'm coming if the boy is lack in time; but I can't leave the ship."

"Listen to me," said Morley, in a strangely emphatic voice. "Have you any fire on board?"

"No," said Mrs. Camp, coming close under him, and speaking vaguely.

"Then, do you hear? come back, leave the ship and come and communicate. Remember, it may be the last chance either of you will have to communicate with your Creator. Come and kneel with him. There will be an empty place in his heart some day, maybe, if you do not."

The woman said "Ah!" and went into the cabin, and in a moment had reappeared with a bonnet on, not clean, and a gray shawl over her shoulders (for these people were not rich), and her baby on her arm. "Now," she said, "minister, I am ready. God bless you for pointing it out."

And they three walked away together. And Rebecca took all these things and hid them in her heart.

Now baby had not occurred as a difficulty to Rebecca, but Mrs. Camp had provided for baby, and was going to leave him on the way with one Mrs. Tryon, widow of a deceased warrant officer, R. N., who lived on the pension, and on the letting of lodgings to dissenting skippers. She was the most terrible tartar in that peaceful waterside district, and was the most difficult to manage. "No one," said the dwellers in Ropewalk Terrace, "could get to the windward of Mrs. Tryon, save Mr. Morley, and a sailor's wife in distress."

Now it so happened, in the everlasting fitness of things, that Mrs. Tryon's first-floor, if Vestried, a Papist, had run his schooner, the Ninety-eight, in on the tide opposite her house, and had then inconsiderately gone off, and aimed himself. And that schooner, finding herself deserted by the tide, with no hawsers laid to leward, heeled, fell, in a very heavy way, heeled over and poked her foretopsail-yard through Mrs. Tryon's best parlor-window, to the destruction of property to the tune of a Protestant ship she would not have cared; but a Papist ship—the Ninety-eight (she was old enough to remember Hoche), was much. The damage to property was small; but if a staunch dissenting Protestant woman's windows were to be broken by the yard-arm of a Papist ship, why then—So she had laid in wait for Captain Moriarty.

Captain Moriarty kept away like a good sailor and a dextrous Irishman, till he supposed she had started for chapel. But it was no good. As Mr. Morley and Rebecca came up they were hard at it. Both Mr. Moriarty and Mrs. Tryon were sincerely religious in their very various ways; but Mrs. Tryon's religion was the most evil, exercised on him principally on religious grounds, until he was half crazy with anger.

"I have a good mind to feol at Rome tells you to do, is it? To break into widows' houses with your foretopsail-yard, and for a pretense make long hawsers. Oh, yours is a precious religion, yours is!"

"You insult my religion, Mrs. Tryon," said the Irishman, "and I am insulted yours. It was an accident, and I am very sorry."

"Accident!" said Mrs. Tryon. "Why, if my poor husband, R. N., could have come home the worse for drink, and had moored his ship as you have moored yours, me and my gal would have gone out in the night, in the darkest night, and have taken the hawsers to larboard ourselves. Bah!"

By this moment our party had arrived, and had heard what had been said. There was no need for any interference on the part of Mr. Morley. Mrs. Camp stepped up to Mrs. Tryon with baby, and said:

"My dear, mind the fire. I want to go to chapel with Mr. Morley, and take Sacrament with my old man. For we are going to the old Cameroons, on the Slave Coast, and we shall never come back no more, I doubt."

Hard-featured Mrs. Tryon flushed up. "Here, Keziah," she said to her maid, "take this baby. I am going to chapel. Moriarty, don't mind my tongue, for you are a good man; mind your larboard hawsers."

And so they all went together. And Rebecca said, as they went, "I think I shall like this place very much indeed."

When they came out from chapel there was a brimming flood-tide under a bright sun, with a fresh, but moderate upward under a good brisk wind from the free happy sea beyond.

"How far is it to the sea, Alfred?" asked Rebecca, in a whisper, for the congregation was still round them.

"Fifty miles."

"We shall sail on it together one day, sha'n't we, with Hetty and Hartop?"

"I hope so, dear," said Morley, quietly; "but much must happen first. I must provide a home."

"Yes. I do not mean that," said Rebecca; "I was only thinking of your sermon. Why did you take such a text on such a happy day as this, and preach only of the cruelty of the sea? Such a wild, strange text—The burden of the desert of the sea."

"I only took it to check your fanciful love for it, Rebecca. A day will come when you will not love it as well as you do now."

And Rebecca said only, "Well, the present is with us, and I am very happy."

"I want to ask you, Rebecca, if you have any objection to my telling what has happened between us two to a few intimate friends?"

"I have none at all, Alfred, if you think it right. I am very proud of it, I assure you."

I, for my part, don't think that there was much necessity for any announcement at all. The whole congregation might run and read, and in fact did so. When they saw their very handsome and eminently marriageable minister with a beautiful young lady on his arm, to whom he talked in whispers, they formed their own conclusions, and generally "overhauled" her (we are in a nautical neighborhood), at their own o'clock dinner, some saying she was too fine for him, but the most of them thinking that she would do very well, but leaned rather more strongly in mind of that poor Mrs. Hartop; they hoped that he might have better luck with his wife than he had had with his daughter, but generally acquiesced in what did not in the least concern them, and wished their good minister well. Two young ladies went home for a week or so, and met one another at various chapels in the neighborhood for a few Sundays, but even they got over it in time. The "minister's wooing" was a pattern thing to all.

But here were the minister and his sweetheart (we will not better word it) on that clear old English one, except that abominable French one, finacle?) on the breezy quay, with all the congregation gone except a very few, dreaming and whispering. They were aroused by the emphatic voice of Mrs. Tryon, a woman given to management from her youth upward, who said:

"Where do you take your dinner to-day, minister?"

"Dear me!" said Mr. Morley, with a start, "I had not thought about that."

"No one ever believed that you had," said Mrs. Tryon, in the irrepressible. "Come up Captain and Mrs. Camp, making an extraordinary proposal."

And, indeed, there was no one on the wharf but Mrs. Tryon and Mr. and Mrs. Camp, when Mr. Morley turned round to speak to them.

"My dear friends," he said, "I want to tell you something. This young lady has promised to be my wife."

"So I should have supposed," said Mrs. Tryon in the irrepressible. "And a lucky woman, too, if she only knows it. Well, my dear, I wish you much joy and happiness. There's a good fish-tea on the world as sailors, my dear. And he is a sailor, true blue every inch of him! But what's to be done with that ridiculous proposal of Captain and Mrs. Camp?"

Captain Camp stood meekly behind his wife and Rebecca, and, presently, came up to whisper from behind his hand; and Mrs. Camp did the talking.

"Mr. Morley, me and my old man thought that you being a real sailor, and having made no arrangements for dinner, and Mrs. Tryon's winders being—"

"By the yard-arm of a Papist foretop-sail schooner," interposed Mrs. Tryon, with emphasis.

"Quite so, thank you," said Mrs. Camp, turning to Mrs. Tryon gratefully, as if from the bores of hell. "And knowing also that you had exercised with an additional argument which had previously escaped her. "Mrs. Tryon's house being taboo, me and Captain Moriarty, a dear loved friend, I am sure, but incautious; we thought that perhaps—seeing that we're for the Cameroons, and might never come back—that you would turn your dinner aboard. But the young lady. Miss, I humbly wish you every joy; but I doubt it wouldn't suit for you, Miss."

"Please let me go, Alfred. Do let me go," said Rebecca, eagerly. Whereupon Captain Camp came forward, and Rebecca looked at him.

A splendid young sailor, truly, but not of the Hartop type. Very blonde, with a golden beard, cool, deliberate, but wanting vitality; a man who would be a leader, under on a level, but an autocratic man, who kills himself by worrying about his responsibilities, when coarser natures, often more responsible, lose their ships and never seek a good sailor-like shore before the Board that they keep their certificates, when Captain Camp had been a merchant seaman. This young man said to them very quietly:

"If it was possible, Mr. Morley, that you could dine with us, we could give a great pleasure. If this lady is to be a true wife to you, and if you are the same man as ever, she will face rougher weather than this with ease. Our last was to Levant, Miss; and we can give you pretty and delicate things to eat, which you could scarcely get to shop."

"Please let me go, Alfred!"

"My dear, I am not overwhelming you. I should like you to go. Only I thought—"

"Never mind what you thought. I am very hungry, and I shall be very hungry to be on its hungry, and so we had better get on board ship as soon as possible.

"You will do, my dear," said Mrs. Tryon. "Camp, you had better start your boy up to my place for some knives and forks and things. You shall have my place with your back against the mizzen-mast."

"Are you coming?" said Rebecca, as they walked. "I am glad you are coming."

"Are you, my dear? well, that is good hearing, for it is few like me. As for coming, I make it a rule never to dine ashore on Sundays."—But bit the man, he will never be quiet in his grave till he has had my house down!"

This last exclamation was fortuned out of her as they rounded the corner and had come in sight of her own house, and the cause of it was this: the schooner Ninety-eight had righted with the rising tide, and, in so righting herself, pulled away the whole of Mrs. Tryon's verandah. In was really a serious disaster in a small way, and Mrs. Camp dreaded a terrible storm. She took Mrs. Tryon the terrible by the arm, and said:

"Don't be angry with him, dear; he is only an Irishman. Think when we have been together to-day, and don't be angry with him, he is such a good fellow."

"I won't be angry with him, my dear," said Mrs. Tryon. "But I will have it out of his owners if there is a law in the land."

"And then the Board will stop his certificate," said Mrs. Camp. "Don't'ee say any thing, don'tee. He was so kind to us, when my man got his ship over at Fayal. Don't'ee scold the thing. Minister, ask her not to quarrel with him."

"I will take no steps at all," said Mrs. Tryon, "further than asking him to moor his ship opposite some other widow's house. But how has he managed to do it? My old man used to tell me, when talking of gunnery, that the angle of incidence was equal to the angle of reflection. So I should have supposed that when he had once poked his yard-arm through my window, he could have taken it out again, without smashing half the wall down. I see, this is your Irish seamanship."

Captain Moriarty was straight in their way, and it was unavoidable that there should be an interchange of broadsides. They were all a little nervous, as the frigate Tryon manœuvred beside the frigate Moriarty. Moriarty prepared to fire.

Mrs. Tryon delivered her broadside and passed on, leaving Moriarty in a state of confusion.

"Seas and tidal waters," she said, "are free to all nations in times of peace. And at the same time, Captain Moriarty, the next time it pleases you to knock a Protestant widow's house about her ears, I shall trouble you to remember that it is better seamanship, according to English Protestant lights, to let a ship right as she went over, and not to steer her angle to suit your heaves. Likewise, if you had let go your larboard tacks and sheets, your yard-arm would have come out of my parlor without carrying away the sevandas. Whereas, there they are all taut now to shame you, as taut as any standing rigging. Have you anything, Mrs. Camp's baby's death, or has it escaped?"

No, Mrs. Camp's baby was waiting for them opposite Captain Camp's ship. Keziah had made it ill with Ipecacuanha lozenges, but babies generally are ill, as far as I have ever observed, due to it did not match matter. Not only the baby was here, but the boy, arriving from the baker's, with the cakes on his head, and going across the ladder (for it was now high tide) before them, without apology, feeling himself master of the situation. In less than three minutes Rebecca found herself, with her back to the mizzenmast, in a rather small cabin, eating baked nutmeg and cinnamon cake, and liking it also.

"I like this much," said Rebecca. "And I like the place I eat it in, and I like the people I eat it with."

"So you can make your mind easy, Mrs. Camp," struck in Mrs. Tryon. And to Rebecca, "I knew you were one of us, my dear, the first moment I set eyes on you."

"I'll do my best," said Rebecca. "If people will be kind to me, I will do any thing. But I am foolish. If any one is unkind to me, I will sit moping and dull, without any power of action, for days and days."

"That's bad," said Mrs. Tryon; "but it is better than flying out and saying things you never meant, and which you can't recall. If you are sorry for your words, her hard words are nothing. If he does, her words mean more than she thought, and he wants time to forget them, and to find ways do that. And a man's hard words to a woman are worse, because a woman can't ship for a voyage as a man can, and throw himself into a bridegroom. As for me, I only speak of what I have seen in others, for I have had no experience myself."

"You were married a long time, Mrs. Tryon?" said Rebecca.

"Yes, but me and my old man never had words. We both had tempers, and so, knowing that, we kept them. And he was a good husband to me; and the parting was hard. But I got the Sacrament in my mouth, I should not have ill-will: but it was that African squadron killed him, and so I bear ill-will to the Continent that didn't much matter. Our minister has assurance that we shall meet again. And then all doubts will be cleared up, and old love revived, as if it wanted reviving', and we shall go on hand in hand through eternity. Therefore, Miss Tyrer, what does any one mean by parting as one for if it wanted reviving', and we shall go on hand in hand through eternity. Therefore, Miss Tyrer, what does any one mean by parting as one for ever?"

"Then we shall meet our loved ones again?" said Rebecca.

"Certainly," said Mrs. Tryon: "unless the Book lies, 'I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me.' I think that finishes the argument, Miss, if there were any. Piff."

The gentle Mrs. Camp changed the conversation by arriving, after a short absence, with her husband, laden with quaint boxes and quainter bottles, the spoils of the East.

"We sailed in the smart last voyage, Miss," she said, "and we brought these things home, for friends. And if Mr. Morley and his sweet-heart (I know no better word, Miss Turner), are not friends, who are? Here are figs from Syra, better than you can buy, and here are the little grapes, from Xante (you call them currants), which I laid in sugar by my own hand, just before baby was born. You don't take wine, I doubt; but take a little to-day, for our sakes; this is some that my old man bought at St. Lucas, Spanish wine, strong, but very good. You be hospitable, my dear young lady, with a Devonshire woman, and drink a little drop of wine with us."

Rebecca consented most willingly, and indeed the wine was most admirable wine, like port, a wine not got in this country.

"You find this cabin close now," said Mrs. Camp, as soon as the boy, who had waited perfectly, as he waited from good-will, had been sent to his dinner, and baby was established on his throne. "You would feel naked in such a little cabin as this."

"It is the nicest place I have ever been in," said Rebecca. "I suppose it is different in a gale of wind at sea?"

"Ah!" said Mrs. Camp. "I have been through it all more than once, since the old man, in this cabin. This ain't our first baby, Miss Turner. Our first was drowned down there, under that locker, bathed you, when I lay drowned, and nigh dead on this very place, with my head cut open."

"Well, we don't want to hear about that," said Mrs. Tryon. "Sailors' wives have their trials, and you have had yours. Similarly I have mine. Similarly we have to answer for our lives here. Why, my boy was eighteen when he sailed for the West Coast, and never came home again. Therefore, what are your troubles to mine?"

"That is very true, Mrs. Tryon," said the humble Mrs. Camp; "and I am wicked to think of my little troubles, in any way. But I think I am sentimental to-day; and that is what a sailor's wife ought not to be. I suppose it is because I went to Sacrament with the old man for the last time."

"What do you mean by the last time?" said Mrs. Tryon, sternly.

"I didn't mean any harm," said Mrs. Camp. "But we are going to the West Coast."

"Better folks than you have been to the West Coast and come back again," said Mrs. Tryon. "Don't cry out about nothing, my dear. The Cleopatra has only lost ten hands in eighteen months. Of course, if you, in your lazy, merchant way, choose to meet with a dangerous swamp, you will all die. Veer out a couple of cables, and lie well off shore, out of the land-fog, as her Majesty's ships do, and you will have no harm at all. If you sneak into fever holds you will have fever. Mr. Morley, I am going to church."

Mr. Morley, after having a quiet conversation at the end of the table with Mr. Camp, asked Rebecca if she was inclined to go. She told Mrs. Camp that he was not going to chapel, but had provided for his duty.

"What do you mean by anger with us?" said Captain Camp. "We shall never see you again."

"She and I have much to speak of, as you may understand, Captain Camp," "I only said the words to her this morning."

"You have a prize," said Captain Camp.

"Yes, dear," said Mrs. Camp. "I have known her, and watched her for long."

"What does Hetty think of her?" said Captain Camp.

"She has never seen her; and Rebecca knows nothing of Hetty. Jack Hartop is the only one of our local connection who has ever seen her."

"But, my dear minister, is this concealment wise?"

"Hagbut hates Hetty so; and he is all-powerful."

"That is true. Well, Miss Rebecca is a trump, at all events. Good-by."

And Mr. Morley and Rebecca crossed the ladder, and stood again on dry shore. The afternoon had become wild and rainy, and the tide was going down; and Mrs. Tryon's ship (a mountebank-ship indeed was (through Mr. Moriarty's careless arrangement of hawsers) rapidly approaching Captain Tryon's house-window. Mrs. Tryon had resigned herself to this fresh desecration of her hearth-stone, and gone to chapel. The Camps had gone to their own little dwelling among the ships. But our two set their heads westward, knowing that their end for the present was Widow Hagbut's.

"Could you get on with such people as those, Rebecca?" said he. "If I was long away, could you live with them?"

"I could live and die with them," said Rebecca. "Those people are alive, ours are dead. In the sea sense as they tell us, dear?"

"The sea is very cruel. The world is cruel, also. Come, you have seen that."

"I shall have seen more."

"Yes."

"I wish I could wait for you there. Mrs. Tryon is better than Miss Soper; and I do so dearly like those Camps."

"You will hardly see much of them," said Mr. Morley; "they are bound on a long voyage."

Ay, indeed, they were. An old, old story, read in the papers every day; but a wearisome one to tell, from sheer monotony. The Camps sailed away on ebb-tide, a week after this, with their baby, and their apprentice, and five hands all told; and they sailed westward, and passed the east wind of late March; and they sailed away into the golden west of early spring, and nothing more ever heard of them, or of their ship, or this. Nothing will ever be heard of them until the sea gives up her dead. They had taken the Sacrament together for the last time on earth.

To Rebecca they had been like a bright gleam of sunshine, on the happiest, most April-like day of her whole life. In the time soon to come, when she was all alone, watching a dying life, behind windows which quivered and rattled in the furious blast, she would hear the cry of sailors mooring their ship. And she, in that vague, foolish superstition, of which those who have watched long by the beds of the dying can tell you, would slip down silently, saying "That is Camp's ship, or Tryon's ship, or Camp's ship, and it never will be; for Camp's ship, wife, baby, boy, and all her crew, are at the bottom of the blue, wandering sea.

CHAPTER XXII.

HOME AGAIN.

REBECCA got home soon after afternoon chapel, and Mr. Morley left her at the door. She was very quiet and cool over what had happened, not seeing any great reason why she should be otherwise. Mr. Morley had bidden her tell her father at once, and she went up stairs to do so very quietly.

He was sitting alone, with the little dog on his knee, reading the "Pilgrim's Progress." His mind was perfectly quiet and unclouded this day, and he lengthened up when he saw his handsome daughter before him. The little dog wriggled and scolded in his lap to get at her, and Mr. Turner put her down and smiled when she ran to Rebecca.

"My dear father, I hope you have not been dull?"

"No, Rebecca. I have been very happy. I was at the Communion with you in spirit; and I was glad to think that you were in pleasant, goodly company. Come and tell me where you have been."

"Please, pa," said Rebecca, kneeling at his feet, "I want to tell you something very particular indeed. Mr. Morley has asked me to marry him, and I have said that I would, if you would not. And you will let me, won't you?"

"I am very glad of this," said Mr. Turner; "this is the only wish I had in this world, I think. I am very glad, my dear; God bless you. Try to be worthy of him."

"I will, father, indeed."

"I dislike him very much, very deep," said Mr. Turner, as soon as Rebecca was seated. "You will have about £120 a year—he will never have any thing to speak of. He is not a driving man, to any except the poor. But I don't see why you should not be happy. I'll tie your money up, and you shall have it when you marry. Four thousand pounds is all I can guarantee you. There may be a little more; but I can't tell. Hagbut has been honest."

"I was not thinking of money, father," said Rebecca.

"It would be extreme indecent if you were," said Mr. Turner; "but I was. I have secured you from extreme poverty, and Hagbut is hard and near; and I gave my word to certain things with regard to Cary, or we should have had her on our hands within a day; and my word is as good as my bond. Beyond this four thousand pounds I can only give you Hobson Day ecrip, which may fall into something or nothing, for which has escaped that man's barrel-eyes. You won't starve, Rebecca."

"Pa, don't talk about money to-day."

"Well, I won't. Get me my tea."

Before she did that, and made him comfortable before the fire, Rebecca said, "And, dear father, I have told all good things to yourself, give me the little dog," said Mab, a black peaked nose and hair, was handed over to him by Rebecca.

Mab had a great idea of Mr. Turner, considering him in the light of an idol or fetich, requiring propitiation, veneration and flattery. So she scuffed over his waistcoat, licked his face, was only deterred from her culture of him when he gave her a little slap, after which she was quiet. Rebecca thought that she had seen the same sort of thing before in other people; and indeed one may see the same in certain churches also.

"Pa," she said, when Mab was quiet, "tell me all about Mr. Morley's sermon."

"I don't know much about it. Is he going to join it?"

"Lor, no! He would die sooner. Only I wanted to know."

"Well, the Establishment is the gentleman's church. He belongs to the Establishment. You listen to me, girl, and never you mind the Established Church."

"I was only talking to amuse you, Sir; and I will trouble you to remember that I have taken brevet rank, that I am engaged to Mr. Morley. So no airs."

They were but silly words, but they were said so prettily that Turner himself laughed for a moment. "Well, I am glad," he said, "you are happy to-day, and indeed, old Rebecca, I am happy in your happiness. I assure you that I am; but I am in trouble after trouble. Are you coming to him at once, for I am sore bested, and I want you at home?"

"My dear father, he has asked me to wait a very long time, and I have told him that I could not leave you, and that he must wait a very long time."

"That is good," said Mr. Turner, "that is very good. Hagbut, practically to me, for my will is unclouded to-night, and it may be clouded again to-morrow; for I have had a hard life of it, child. I have undergone a day's holidays with your mother—well, never mind her, poor dear, you have made it square between us—and my head goes at times, and my gait is uncertain. The second cake was that of a man who used a compound of white-lead and galipot, for the purpose of glazing the straw-hats that are imported from Florence. He also possesses the blue line along the gums, which is the absolute sign of some process of poisoning is due to the use of the antidote with the poison. The materials used by the former of these two patients have been placed in our hands by Dr. Oppert, and they consist of arsenite of copper (the employment of which is stated to be followed by bleeding from the nose) and oxide of lead. Here, at any rate, are two undoubted instances of metallic poisoning in the case of men employed in the glazing of coarse straw-hats. It is, of course, impossible to say how much mischief of a similar kind escapes detection. We have shown enough, however, to feel that some protection should be afforded to workmen engaged upon the use of dangerous colorants in manufactures.

ANTIDOTE FOR SNAKE-BITES.

In the last volume of "Transactions of the Royal Society of Victoria," published at Melbourne, there will be an account of Dr. Halford's interesting researches into the nature of the change produced in the blood by the poison of snake-bites. The blood examined with the microscope, satisfied himself that there was a change, and described it, and has since had an opportunity of testing his theory and the antidote. A man working on a railway was bitten by a snake; ere long drowsiness came on; medical assistance was procured, but by the time it arrived the man was comatose, and his lower extremities were paralyzed. Dr. Halford was then summoned, and decided to make an incision in a vein, inserted the point of a syringe, injected ammonia diluted with water; and the effect produced is described as "instantaneous and immediate." The man became conscious, steadily recovered, and became quite well. Dr. Halford did not publish the case in the medical journals, as he thought it would be useless to attempt to convince professional men that ammonia injected into a vein is the remedy for a bite.

THAT THE DANGER OF BEING MADE BEAUTIFUL FOREVER.

THAT the dangers to which enamelers of cards and other articles are exposed are not imaginary, says the Lancet, is proved in the instance of two cases quite recently brought under the notice of the Medical Society of London by Dr. Oppert. One case was that of a young lady, who had been in the trade for twenty-six years, and exhibits at the present time decided and severe symptoms of lead-poisoning. She has the unmistakable blue line along the gums, and, in addition, loss of sensibility and mobility of the left arm and hand, and a slight gait is retained. The second case was that of a man who used a compound of white-lead and galipot, for the purpose of glazing the straw-hats that are imported from Florence. He also possesses the blue line along the gums; and the absence of any severe symptoms of poisoning is due to the use of the antidote with the poison. The materials used by the former of these two patients have been placed in our hands by Dr. Oppert, and they consist of arsenite of copper (the employment of which is stated to be followed by bleeding from the nose) and oxide of lead. Here, at any rate, are two undoubted instances of metallic poisoning in the case of men employed in the glazing of coarse straw-hats. It is, of course, impossible to say how much mischief of a similar kind escapes detection. We have shown enough, however, to feel that some protection should be afforded to workmen engaged upon the use of dangerous colorants in manufactures.

"You mean papers which would involve Lord Ducentry?"

"Yes, and I am acting illegally in withholding them."

"Then why do you withhold them?" asked Rebecca. "Be sure it is best to follow the law."

"I don't know that," said Mr. Turner; "I have seen too much of law. These papers, if produced, would put Lord Ducentry's property into the bankruptcy."

"But the creditors," said Rebecca, aghast; "the poor souls who have invested their money —have you no pity for them?"

"They would take any advantage of the Company, and they must take their chance."

"But, pa, wrong can't make right. I am sorry for Lord Ducentry, but for Heaven's sake restore these papers."

"I can't," said Mr. Turner.

"Nonsense. Why not?" asked Rebecca.

"Because I have burned them," said Mr. Turner. "Now as you have your father's character, and in consequence your own independence, I wish to point out another little matter, more in your way of business."

Rebecca, sitting pale and calm, was dumb from that moment and forever about her father's felony. But their relations from this moment were altered, never to be placed on their former footing.

She never showed this fact to him, but he knew it, and acted on it. He was deferential to her after this. Sometimes he was insolent to her, but very seldom, and for a very short time: he was generally easy and almost jocular with her, but from this moment she was in a way mistress of the situation.

She had now entered into a community of guilt with her father. That her father's motives were of the most distant color was nothing, but still her father might be a convict to-morrow.

What was the effect of this community of guilty of Lord Ducentry from? A stronger one to ordinary eyes. A love which had never existed before. If pity, combined with admiration and love for an unfortunate, does not produce love, what does? Again, if admiration and trust do not produce love, what again does? These two hearts were further nearer.

But I must return to the original conversation. Rebecca said, "But these documents will be demanded of you, sir?"

"No, they won't, my dear. I have too many forgeries, both of my own name and Ducentry's, by Sir Gorhambury and Captain Gorhambury, for them ever to ask for them. Our danger does not lie in that."

"Where does it lie then, father?" said Rebecca.

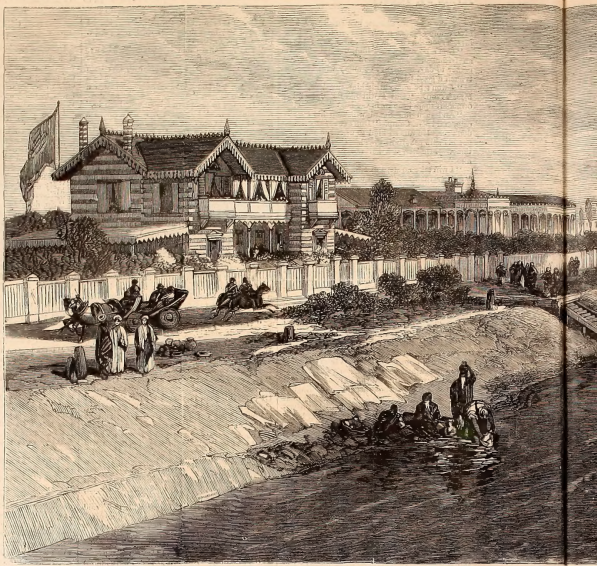
"In this," said Mr. Turner; "they will try to get into the house, and murder me to get at their own forgeries. So don't leave me, girl, and let the Lord help you with me."

And so he went to bed. And Rebecca spent the first evening of her engagement in brooding over the fire, alone and terrified.

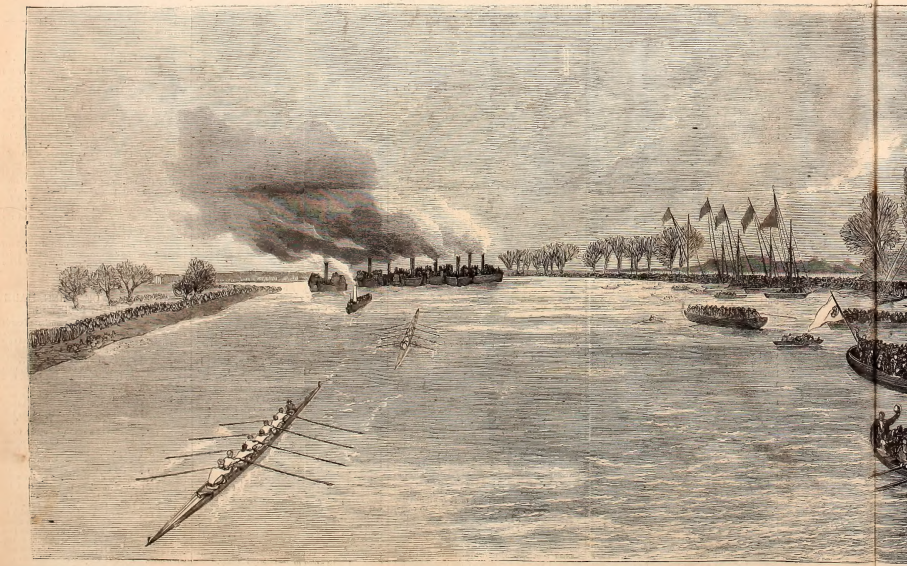
THE SUEZ CANAL.

Since our last notice of this great undertaking we have been informed by telegraph that a most important step in its progress toward completion was taken on March 18. The sluices of the dam erected between Toussoum and the Serapeum cutting, above fifty miles from Port Said, or more than half-way along the line of the canal, to keep out the waters of the Mediterranean, were on that day opened, with some public ceremony, in the presence of the Viceroy of Egypt, and the inland basins of the Bitter Lakes, extending twenty-four miles further toward Suez, are now being slowly filled by the admission of the sea from the north. When the Chaloof cutting is finished, between the southeastern extremity of the lesser lake and Suez, another dam will be removed, and the waters of the Red Sea will flow in, to mix with the Mediterranean.

The Fresh-Water Canal is really a tributary to the main canal between the two oceans. It runs from Zagazig to Lake Timsah. We give a view of the Fresh-Water Canal at Ismailia, with the houses of the Egyptian Governor, of M. Ferdinand de Lesseps, manager and president of the Suez Canal Company, and of M. Voisin, or Voisin Bey, the engineer-in-chief, agreeably situated on its bank. The chalet of M. de Lesseps is to the left hand; the next house, with Oriental arches, is that of his chief-engineer; and the Governor of Ismailia resides in the mansion beyond. These dwellings have a pleasant look-out over Lake Timsah. The new town of Ismailia, wholly created since 1862, has now more than 6000 inhabitants, of whom a third are Europeans. Two hotels, a theatre where vaudevilles are performed with spirit, a pretty Roman Catholic chapel, a mosque for Arab workmen, a hospital and a telegraph-office, a long and well-built street with numerous well-stocked shops, a large square, and a public garden planned by French taste and cultivated with French assiduity, a fountain supplied with Nile water—these are the features which attract the attention of the stranger as he wanders through the town. The rapid increase of vegetation since the fresh water was brought to Ismailia has been attended with a great improvement in the climate. At the present time Ismailia, during eight months of the year, is probably the healthiest spot in Northern Egypt. The heat of its summer is intense and almost intolerable; thermometrical observations taken during 1867 and 1868 show that the mean temperature of the four months, beginning with June and ending with September, was 94° Fahrenheit, and that 120° in the shade was not an uncommon record, while the minimum of night was 75°. The mean temperature of the succeeding four months was 74°; and the winter, if so it can be called, proved that the lowest range of the thermometer was 45°. Until two years ago rain was unknown; but in the twelvemonth ending April, 1868, there were actually fourteen days on which rain fell, and no later than three weeks ago fell a tremendous shower of rain, a phenomenon which the oldest Arab had never previously witnessed. "The scenery about Ismailia," says a recent observer, "is monotonous, but it can scarcely be regarded as uninteresting. Cloudless skies of the richest blue are contrasted with the vast expanse of yellow sand which stretches away into a hazy distance. The dark waters of the lake sparkle and flash unceasingly, for there is always a fresh breeze to temper the extreme sultriness. The desert is susceptible of many shades and transitions of color, sometimes so gradual as to be scarcely perceptible, often so sudden and mysterious that it is hard to understand by what subtle atmospheric changes such strange effects have been produced. At Ismailia the stranger can fully realize the balm and beauty of the Egyptian night; and, sitting on the balcony of the Hôtel des Voyageurs, which commands the view of Lake Timsah, he may watch the moon rising slowly in a silver dawn while the rosy tints of the sunset are still lingering in the west. About three miles to the south, on the line taken by the canal, twinkling lights mark the positions of the dredges, and in less than a year to come the graceful outlines of the largest and swiftest steamers will give additional animation to a picture which even now possesses a peculiar charm."



THE ISTHMUS OF SUEZ MARITIME CANAL—ISMAIL



OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITIES BOAT-RACE—VIEW

ALAISMAILIA AND THE FRESH-WATER CANAL.

The construction of the Fresh-Water Canal forms an interesting chapter in the history of the undertaking. The Nile water, to which Ismailia owes its pleasant gardens, is taken from a branch of the river that flows by Zagazig, the ancient Bubastis, and is brought, partly along the line of the ancient canal of the Pharaohs, to the shores of Lake Timsah. The level of the lake is considerably lower, and, consequently, it was necessary to construct two locks in order to facilitate the passage of boats and barges. But the Fresh-Water Canal answers other purposes no less important than the means of transport it affords for machinery and provisions. One of the great difficulties which had to be encountered and overcome was the supply of fresh water to the laborers on the line of works, and to the operatives engaged in the several immense chantiers or workshops between Ismailia and Port Said.

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE BOAT-RACE.

We illustrate this week the twenty-sixth rowing-match on the Thames between the two University crews of Oxford and Cambridge, which took place on March 17, and resulted once more in the victory of the Oxford boat—for the ninth time in as many successive years. There were seven men in each crew, including stroke and coxswain.

The toss for choice of sides was won by the Oxford boat, which therefore took the Middlesex side of the river. A few minutes before four o'clock both the crews embarked at Putney: the Oxford boat having been kept in the boat-house of the London Rowing Club, and the Cambridge boat in that of the Leander Club. The tide was a neap-tide, and three-quarters up; the towing-path on the Surrey side was crowded with people; thirteen large steamboats and eight steam-tugs, with several private yachts, and hundreds of row-boats and wherries, lay close to the Aqueduct; among these were the steamer Lotus, the umpire's boat, with the Viceroy of Egypt's son on board her; the steamer London Pride, engaged by the London Rowing Club, on board of which was Prince Arthur; and Mr. Blyth's private screw-steamer Ariel, from which Mr. Morrison had "coached" the Cambridge crew during their practice at Putney. The race was run in 20 minutes, 22 seconds.

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION.

In the Central Department of Cuba the Spaniards have been gaining ground against the insurgents. They have not only recovered a great deal of territory, but have re-established telegraphic communication with Villa Clara, Cienfuegos, and other points. The success of the Spaniards here has been so complete that we may credit their announcement that in this department the insurrection has been virtually put down.

From present signs New York would appear to be the real head-quarters of the Cuban patriots. Those who have emigrated from Cuba during the late troubles have, most of them, come to this city; and here they carry out operations for the assistance of their friends at home. We give, in this connection, on page 269, an illustration of one of the Cuban drill-rooms in this city.

This emigration to New York has so far disturbed the Government authorities of Cuba that they have caused a rumor to be circulated that this city is infested with the small-pox.

A remarkable feature of this Cuban civil war has been the cruelty of the Spaniards toward the Cubans. We give, on page 269, a portrait of General Augusto Arango, who was in last January murdered and cut in pieces by the Spaniards. He was not a prisoner. He came into the Spanish lines under the sacred protection of a flag of truce. This inhuman outrage was perpetrated by order of the Spanish General Mena. He caused the mutilated body of General Arango to be paraded through the streets of Puerto Principe.

E—VIEW OF THE RACE FROM BARNES RAILWAY-BRIDGE.

SWEETS TO THE SWEET.

Or roses sweet that scent the air,
The sweetest is, with leaves half shed,
The tea rose, sweet its fragrance rare,
And petals faintly tinged with red.

At early dawn it bloomed as white
And spotless as the virgin snow,
And glittered like the rays of light
That on the moonlit fountain flowers glow.

A butterfly came quick to woo,
And hovered o'er it in unwonted wise;
The ravished blossom blushed, and gave
The color of its lover's lip.

So richly hued, so subtly made,
The sweet rose flower that grows at springs
Seems strangely vain, and nigh to fade,
Like leaves that pallid Autumn brings.

But, lady, when the gathered rose
Beside thy damask cheek is placed,
Its tones their former lustre lose,
And all its beauty seems effaced.

And every rose that Spring has given
In floral robes the earth to dress,
In vain, with envious hope, has striven
To match thy passing loveliness.

ON THE VERGE OF THE TOWER.

BY JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

IN one of the Swiss cantons there stands a solitary, celebrated, crumbling old Tower. It stands on the brink of a crag which rises sharply from the bosom of a sunny and smiling valley. The valley itself is walled around with Alpine ramparts so huge that the crag on which the Tower stands hardly seems more than a mere speck on the broad plain of sun-lighted turf from which it springs. But, if, on a warm day, you climb from the vale to the summit of the rock on which the Tower is perched—and you can only climb from one side—you will find it hot and weary work, and you will begin to think, long before you have mounted half-way up, that the Tower must be retreating even as you advance. The view, when you have at last reached the level of the Tower—still more when you stand on the grass-grown roof of the old structure—is one worth the seeing and striving for. Beneath your feet lies the river—now only a stream just rushing down from its icy cradle among the glaciers, but which presently casts its clear wave into deeper pools and fuller lake, and onward till it flows under the bridges of huge commercial cities, and is lost in the sea at last. Below you, too, lie fields and flat meadows and the cows with the bells tinkling at their necks. Around you, on every side, are the vast mountains; the nearer ranges not so high as those more distant, whose snowy shoulders, glittering now in the height of the day, may be invisible to-morrow when the clouds gather. That way, over yonder double or triple wall of mountain, lies Italy. A little that other way, and you might see the fringe of the skirts of France. The everlasting snow of the great peaks lends a perpetual coolness and sweetly to the scene; even when the clouds and mists hide these melancholy and majestic giants from your sight you still feel and acknowledge their influence—as the peasant at the foot of the mountain may be made reverential by the mysterious, magic presence of the great Alps, though buried for within in its womb.

The Tower was the monument and ornament and pride of the village, and indeed of the whole canton. It had a history; one or two of its old rooms were filled with historical memorials and trophies—with weapons that had struck a stout blow against Charles the Bold, and breastpieces that had been battered by the swords of the Dukes of Savoy. So the local authorities always confided the care of the Tower to a trusty person, who had certain modest emoluments for keeping it in order—(keeping a ruin in order may seem a little paradoxical, but really ruins require a great deal of attention)—looking after the historical treasures it contained, and showing the whole to visitors.

The place had lately been a gray, gruff, honest old man. Now—I mean at the time of this story, twenty years ago—it was a young and pretty woman. The reason of the change was simple and sad. Old Martin Aldinger had had the office and died—as a young man. He and his wife Louise had kept the Tower and looked faithfully after its credit as a monument and a ruin. They had but one child, a daughter, Louise. Some years after the wife died, and was buried in the little grave-yard below in the valley—her grave could be seen by her daughter from the spot where the Tower stands. Then the daughter, a growing girl, helped her father in the gardening; and the daughter, when she was in the humor, helped her so far as he could. A few years went on and Martin, too, died, and was buried with his wife. Then arose the question what to do with Louise, the daughter, and to whom to intrust the guardianship of the old Tower. That was the one question settled the other. The authorities, without troubling themselves about the relative capacities of men and women, wisely decided on continuing Louise herself in the office her father had held; and there, for the bright, cheerful, shapely, unmarried young woman became, at twenty years of age, the responsible guardian of the Tower.

The old building had only two small rooms which were fit to sleep in. Louise now occupies one; her brother, sixteen years old, the other. They take their meals in summer very often in the open air—perhaps on the roof, perhaps on the plateau on the accessible side of the Tower—in winter wherever they could, having due regard to cold on the one hand and smoke on the other. Winter and summer they lived in the Tower—of course the permission to live there was one of the privileges and pejuisites of the office.

It was very sad living there for a while after the death of poor Martin. Louise felt the loneliness very much; and so did Pierre, the boy, only he showed his sense of the discomfort by going down to the village as often as he had the slightest pretext for doing so, and staying there when he had no pretext at all for staying—as this did not tend to make things brighter for his sister. He was very fond of her, too; but he had not much notion of denying himself any thing to her account, or doing any thing disagreeable to himself because it might possibly be convenient for her. He would grumble at Louise, when things—and grumbled all the while—if they were pointed out to him; but they did not occur to him, and the result was that she was often left lonely in the Tower. In Switzerland every where they work their women a good deal, and expect them to have and to exercise peculiar likings or dislikings where work is concerned.

It was therefore a great relief and joy to poor Louise when, after a while, she had a lover. It was all the greater joy to find a worthy lover, because she had been very near to accepting one who was unworthy. There was a time, and during the life of her father, when pretty Louise was very near having to wait long for husbands; darkhaired, swarthy young man, who came from Lugano, named Luigi or Louis Dolfo, and who had settled, or rather sojourned, in the village hotel. His flashing eyes and his bold grace rather imposed upon her at first; but there was something mysterious and equivocal and fraudulent about him; and there were many tales afloat of his disputation and general bad conduct having caused him to be driven from Lugano's canton, much eagerly and peremptorily passing him on to its neighbor. So Louise grew cooler as he grew warmer; and at last she quite left off altogether, and would have nothing more to say to him. In her utterly unprotected position—for the presence of her brother was of no account as any protection at all—and with the grave responsibility of the Tower on her mind, she had to be very particular about her acquaintances and associations; and she could not have this idle, tainted never-do-well hanging about her any longer.

It was a pity this man ever saw her, for, in truth, his love for her became very fierce and passionate, and although she was not at all sorry to whom love, however cordially returned, could have redressed, yet he certainly went down the hill much more pleased with the love than he had been when going before. More than that, he was carrying her brother along with him, for young Pierre was quite ready to take the new sullen scapegrace, and they would hang about together for hours, night and day, when Pierre could get the chance of escaping.

But Louise now had a lover, a true lover; such as her father and mother, were they living, would have approved of. He was a handsome, tall, fine, manly young fellow, who in one respect, and in a small way, resembled Justice Shallow—for he had land and leases. He was a splendid rifle-shot, and always distinguished himself at the annual shooting festival of the canton—although it must be said that in the last ten of recent competitions has a little taken the gilding off the splendor of the fame traditionally enjoyed as an marksman by the cousins of William Tell. However that may be, Nicolas Morlot was a good shot and a substantial man; a man who had something of his own, which is decidedly very good taste, or he would not have fallen in love with pretty Louise Aldinger. He was much better off than she in a worldly point of view, and he might, if he liked, have confidently looked higher. But he had evidently made up his mind that is to say—he could hardly have looked for a bride on a much loftier eyrie, unless he were to seek one among the haunts of the Witch of the Alps.

But he fell in love with her; in manly, earnest way he fell in love with her. He made her, he frank, sweet, womanly ways, her thrilling voice —when the voice of a true mountaineer is sweet at all, and not hoarse, it is sweet—his nobly thrilling—her fine figure, and her pretty face. Life brightened unspeakably for both of them when they found themselves one day with no more nothing to stand between them and their wishes; they agreed to be married very soon, and even fixed the day for their wedding.

From that moment a sudden change came over Louis Dolfo. He had hitherto been a sort of lodger-guest of the village people—a welcome, a voluntary outlive. He almost literally exiled himself from the companionship of the village; he came into the wine-house, and drank freely and to a great deal; but he drank silently and fiercely, and then he went out among the mountains, and prowled about and hid there like a wolf. Apparently he could have endured even his rejection by Louise, but he could not endure that she should marry any body else. He refused now even the company of Pierre, the lad who had been to be his cousin-in-law. People warned Nicolas Morlot against him, because he used to hang suspiciously about the roads and mountain passes through which he had to pass in the habit of going; and a vague kind of whisper went about that Dolfo was bent on some mischief.

One day Morlot met Dolfo openly and suddenly against his supposed enemy on the outskirts of the village. Nicolas held out his hand frankly and said:

"Come, Dolfo, let us not be enemies. I have done you no harm, and I bear you no grudge. They tell me here that you are angry with me, but I don't see why that should be. A girl must choose between two lovers. My fortune! But it might have been yours, and I should only have submitted and not blamed you. Let us embrace!"

"No!" growled Dolfo, savagely. "I hate you, and her too."

The successful lover shook his head, half in remonstrance, half in pity, and went on.

That night as he was returning home a shot was fired at him, which missed its mark. He made no talk about it, but afterward took good care not to be out without the company of his good dog and his good rifle. The story of the shot, however, got wind; and though nobody had been found to fix it on, every one suspected him; and the local authorities intimated to him that he had better promptly choose some other means for the settlement of his love affairs. He hint and disappeared, and the village breathed more freely when it was rid of his tainted and dangerous presence. Only poor Louise, who had been in intense fear for her lover's safety, became joyous and bright again when the danger was removed.

So the days wore on until the time for the marriage of our happy lovers was very near indeed. One evening Pierre Aldinger was crossing a ravine which lay between the Tower and the town, when a figure suddenly started up from bushes and rocks, and stood before him in an attitude of something like supplication. It was Dolfo.

"You ought not to have come back," said Pierre, shaking his head with immense gravity. "If you are seen here you will be marched off to the prison-house."

"You won't denounce me, Pierre, will you? We were always friends, and I like you."

"No, I won't denounce you. That goes without saying. But we all thought you were in France, or Switzerland. They don't like you here; and, look you, I have reformed!"

Pierre evidently wanted to make it apparent from the first that he had done with low company.

"I am going into France; but I want to talk to you, Pierre, much. I have something very particular to say."

"I can't be said now," declared Pierre, "unless it can be said in a breath. I must go home; my sister is waiting for me up yonder."

"No; I don't want to keep you now. But to-morrow morning, at the dawn, will you meet me just here?"

Pierre shook his head very doubtfully.

"If I am going to join you the silver-mounted pistol, Pierre, boy—as a parting gift, you know—if you come here to-morrow."

Now Pierre, though acknowledged a passionate affection for the silver-mounted pistol, which was in his eyes the most magnificent of weapons in all treasuries, and for the silver-mounted rifle that often asked Dolfo for it in the days of their close friendship, still Dolfo had so frankly declined to make the gift. It did not strike our young friend as suspicious that Dolfo should now, in his ruined fortunes, be willing to part with these things even as a natural and proper tribute of affection from a being now inferior, and he pledged himself to be on the appointed spot at the appointed hour at the first light of dawn, and to wait there for the coming of his disreputable friend. Very disreputable he was now, indeed, dressed with his gaunt and haggard face, his tremulous, bony, and grimy fingers, his hollow eyes lighted with a sinister unwonted fire.

When Pierre reached the Tower he took good care not to breathe a word to his sister of the encounter he had had with Dolfo. He had a dim kind of idea that she would disapprove of the interview arranged for next morning, and he had a vague intention to make a present to her afterward—a little better developed might have recognized as a pang of conscience, or honor, or something of the kind—for concealing it as to whether he had grasping at a gift of the very weapon which had probably fired on his sister's lover, and from the very hand of the man who could be considered her highly honorable or manly. He sent conscience to sleep, and went to sleep himself soon after. He awoke at the dawn, stole out of the Tower, leaving the outer gate unlocked behind him, and hurried down to the rendezvous.

When he reached the place there was no one there. But his friend was never a very punctual personage, and Pierre, he would have supposed, a good long time for the love of the silver-mounted pistol.

Meanwhile the summer morning dawned gracefully and gloriously over the valley. It had shone in hitrous rose, pink, and violet on the mountain ranges, and now was creeping down through the mists along their sides. Light was falling now on the old Tower, and its one lonely tenant was preparing. She was in the habit of rising very early, of course, as all people in such regions are; but a summer dawn is very, very early in the day. It is now that she looked from the roof of the Tower across the valley, she looked upon a scene almost as lonely as it was grand. She was used to it, and heard her brother out—the sound of his movements roused her; and she had always a certain doubt and fear of the goings on of that reckless youth. There was a stealthiness about his tread and his motions now which made her suspicious; and though she did not wish him to suppose that she was watching him. Therefore she did not close the gate of the Tower when he had left open. Let him come in when he would.

She hesitired herself about the Tower. She went on the roof and looked over that exquisite scene, the beauty of which no familiarity could efface or diminish. She thought of the somewhat sad life which lay behind her—of the happy life which her heart told her lay before; of her lover, and how good he was, and how she loved him, and how her father and mother would have loved him if they had been living, and how she would have his influence and his example would make her brother a worthy lad. Of the unfortunate wretch who once paid court to her I am afraid she never thought at all. Even tenderhearted women are sometimes pitiless as regards their discarded lovers. He was gone, and there was an end of him.

She was coming down the Tower stairs when she heard a hurried step on the threshold. The Tower, as I have said, was accessible only on one side, that side where the height on which it stood sloped gradually and rapidly down to the valley and was ascended by a broad path. On the opposite side the crag rose sheer from the valley, and the Tower stood on its edge. From over the mouldering battlement there you might throw a pebble down to the plain.

Louise turned pale and trembled when she heard the hurried step. Her mind was always perturbed by the dread that her brother was getting, or had got, into some scrape. Now she jumped at once to the conclusion that he had done something wrong, and was flying for shelter from pursuit. This became almost a certainty when she knew by the sounds that he was looking the door behind him.

"Oh, Pierre!" she cried, "what have you been doing? what has happened?" and she ran down the steps, and into the room below, and almost into the arms—not of her brother, but of Louis Dolfo.

She gave a great cry on seeing him. Indeed his look was enough to startle strong nerves, such as hers were. He was gaunt as a spectre, fierce as a tiger, and wild; his eyes were bloodshot; his lips were passionately compressed, and yet quivering; he was covered with dust and dirt, and the brambles and straws of the fields and paths were sticking uncouthly every where about his clothes, his beard, and his hair. If the old superstition about the witch-evil were true, this might have been taken for the possessed man just as the dawn of morning he surrendered the nightly wolfishness for his human form, and much of the aspect of the former still clung about the latter.

He gave a sort of harsh laugh, not unlike the wolf's bark, when he saw her terror.

"You thought I was gone forever," he said—"gone down into the valley, riding with your friends hunted me as far as you could. But I've come back, you see! Why don't you welcome an old friend?"

"I would welcome you, Louis," the girl said, firmly enough, "if I were glad to see you. But I am not glad to see you here, and you have no right to be here. I never wished you any harm, and I am sorry for you to see that I and my friends hunted you from the place. For shame! —when you know that though you fired at him you did not care to mention his name, and the quick flash in Dolfo's eye showed how little he needed greater explaintness) "like a coward from behind the trees as he was too generous to do any thing to find you out or punish you. You have no reason to hate him or me."

He laughed fierce, evil, wolfish laugh again.

"Now you must go, Louis; you have no right to come here, and you must go."

"Do you drive me?" he said, "that I have come here, then, to gather prunes, or to see the sun rise? You are alone—that I know. I have got your key in the door way. I have locked the door, and I have the key. You are in my power once for all, and I am as nearly mad as the devil. Your friends could not get to me, Now perhaps you begin to guess why I have come here."

"You would not murder me, Louis? I was always kind to you." The poor girl turned very pale and weak. Ordinarily she had good nerves and enough of courage. She would have walked or run without the faintest sensation of fear along perilous ledges or would make an ordinary woman almost sick to look at. But she had been sprung lightly over a mountain cleft hundreds of feet deep with a fervent confessing her lover. But now she was suddenly plunged into a danger of a kind she had never known or thought of before. Here was one she knew had driven to been a companion, a friend, or a protector, and now she was alone and absolutely in the power of a savage, and a desperate man. Her bloodless come to kill her—and life was now so very, very sweet to her!

"I don't want to kill you," he replied; "but one thing I have resolved on—you shall never marry him. I have come here for that. Listen to me, Louise. If you want to save your life, go down upon your knees there and swear by the Holy Virgin that you will never marry him—never, never! I am the fiercest lover—there is one among the mountains that belonged to your mother!—I will believe you and go away, and you shall never see or hear of me more. I never make any attempt to harm him. But if you don't, I'll kill you, Louise, and then myself. I don't care how I die. What good is life to me? I am a ruined wretch whom every body hates, and I hate myself. But never with my own—unless you promise that you will never marry him."

Long before he had come to this point he had seized both her wrists, and held them in his terribly strong grasp. Your Alpine girl is no delicate, fragile beauty bella, with dainty, fearful wrists; but Louise might almost as well have been a Broadway belle for all the effectual resistance she could make while in the grasp of this man. She had been glancing anxiously in the direction of the room where the old weapons were kept—for she was always ready to use dagger or sword, if needs were, to protect herself—and Dolfo saw the glance and read it, and so seized her arms and held her.

"Useless, useless, girl!" he exclaimed; "you can not save yourself. Nothing on earth could save you now from your unless you promise."

"I will never promise!" she cried; "never! Kill me, if you will, or if you can; but I will never make that promise!"

He gave a fierce yell. She endeavored to break away from him, but he pushed her backward waist and lifted her off her feet. Now he held her in his arms, clutched up to his breast, and he made for the winding stairs of stone which led to the battlements.

While they had been arguing and struggling she observed that he appeared to have no weapon, and she drew some hope and courage from the fact. Now her heart sank and sickened; she knew he was carrying her to the roof to fling her down.

She struggled vehemently and passionately. As Dolfo staggered with her up the narrow stairs she succeeded once in setting her feet firmly against the wall, and she thus endeavored to stay his progress. But he had all the coolness of desperate resolve, and he calmly stopped, removed her feet, gently, indeed, but resistlessly, and then changed his mode of carrying her so that she could no longer obstruct him in the way. This struggle took place near one of the windows which lighted the staircase, and the strong, fresh breath of the morning, redolent of flowers and of honey, came rushing on Louise's face, and made evening her wish for the love of life and increased longing to live. As they struggled upward she sent wild shrieks after shrieks through the smiling air.

Another window; another flash of early sunlight and breath of dew-moistened grass and morning flowers; another passionate, despairing cry from the poor girl, whose strength was all giving way.

Now they are on the roof, all the glorious light of morning radiant around them—around her agonized, and fainting and disheveled; around him fierce, desperate, demoniacal. The whole scene swam before the girl's eyes: the mountain peaks that were so dear to her, the sunny vale that she might see no more—the village, which might, perhaps, her lover would be trending, full of gladness and love, to find her dead.

"Oh, Lord, Dolfo!" she exclaimed, "have mercy on me! Don't kill me!"

He stood for a moment, as if to take breath and recover his strength. Then, with the girl still in his arms, he mounted lightly on to the top of one of the broken battlements. There he stood, firm as a statue, calm as a man about on duty, and he held Louise deliberately forward in his arms. One single spring nay, one step, and he and she would indeed sheer down from the roof of the Tower to the bottom of the crag on which it stood!

He seemed to exult in the position and the attitude. She did not struggle now. She did not dare to move limb or muscle. She kept her senses as well as she could, for she had still a kind of hope that Dolfo was but trying her, and she thought perhaps there was yet a chance of touching his heart.

In a moment he leaped back to the roof of the Tower from the battlement, and he continued to stand there on her feet, he still holding her wrists.

"Now, Louise," he said grimly, "you see what chance of escape you have from me. You must go on your knees there and swear never to marry him, or I take you in my arms again, and on this narrow path, and spring off with you! They'll find us both below in the valley. I like the prospect, and I'll be delighted to die on that way, if you will. I had rather die so than live. I am only too foolish and merciful to give you a chance of living. For the last time, I don't live in any case. Now, choose!"

"Have mercy on me! oh, have mercy!" was all she could say.

"Swear not to marry him, or you must come with me—down there from the roof!"

"O God, have mercy on me! I will not, I can not swear it."

He gave a short, but fury, half exultation. She collected all her wits, and was on her guard with desperating shrewdness. He caught her round the waist, and was mounting the parapet, when she sprang from his arms and fell on her knees, not by skill or design of hers, but merely because she had fainted and the sudden change from a resisting, struggling girl into a cowering, helpless, lifeless form surprised and unsettled his grasp, and she fell in a heap on the grassy floor.

"Better so, be said much better so!" He stooped, she wrenched, maddened creature, and kissed her lips again and again. In the very depths of her swoon she was conscious of his caresses. Then he drew her to the battlement again. He had her lifeless form once more in his arms. His figure rose higher by the extent than the battlement which he had chosen as the platform whence his death-spring and hers were to be made; he had seen the foot already on it, and in another instant would have mounted and made his awful leap, when—the knell, sharp report of a rifle was heard, a bullet passed through his brain, and he fell back on the roof of the Tower, and lay beside the senseless girl, dead.

Not many minutes passed before hurrying feet came up the path to the Tower, and strong, energetic arms battered at the gate, and finally beat it in. The crash brought Louise back to something like consciousness; but she had hardly time to remember any thing that had happened, or even to know where she was, when her lover clasped her in his arms.

Nicolas Morlot always declares that some good angel had made him sleepless all the night that went before that morning; and that he rose before the dawn and wandered out with his rifle, and naturally turned his steps toward the Tower where his affianced bride was living. On the way he fell upon Pierre lurking in a ravine, and questioning the perplexed and disappointed youth as to his motive for hiding about just then and there, got to the fact that Louis Dolfo had returned to the place. This alone seemed alarming to Nicolas, at least it made him hurry on. he knew not why, toward the Tower. To approach the one accessible side he would have to go round the base of the rock; and as he drew near his ears were startled by shrieks which, far and faint as they were, he knew to be those of a woman. He stood amazed, bewildered, Pierre standing by his side. The Pierre gave a cry, and pointed up, and there, on the battlement of the Tower, distinct against the bright sky, stood Louis Dolfo with Louise in his arms! An instant and they disappeared. Nicolas stood like one frozen. His first impulse had been to rush toward the Tower, but to climb the rock before him would be impossible; to go round by the base would be a circuit of half a mile. Even as he stood panting, dazed, and sick for the soul of the miserable, murderous creature who had so nearly robbed them of all earthly happiness, Louise's cries could endure the Tower no longer; so she lives with her husband near the village; and Nicolas, as he runs, rejoices that he was not in the charge of an ancient dame who never could have been pretty, but who became interesting to him as the nurse of his mistress, and who, as we had often heard it from the lips of Louise Morlot herself,

HORNS AND FOREIGN SOSSIP.

Five years ago people were content with the flickering light of a tallow-candle to brighten up the quiet home-room, and to enable them to read the news of the day and the day before. Nowadays, the multitude of night-workers—especially those who read and write—are always stricken with the compunctuous uncomfortable reflection that they are not in the service of the Company for the Improvement of our inventive countrymen—or, if Americans do not want more Company, Englishmen will be sure to make useful applications of foreign novelties. Thus we advance from one degree of perfection to another.

The Oxy-Hydrogen Gas Company (at Crystal Palace, New York City," having obtained a special charter from the Legislature, is now laying down the pipes and necessary measures to build new gas-works, for the purpose of manufacturing oxy-hydrogen gas. The work is now ordinarily used, and to furnish it to consumers at reasonable rates. The Company proposes to furnish extensive works in the Bronx, believing that a single manufactory, properly situated and managed, could supply the whole city. The Bronx, it is said, it would also be much more satisfactory to the public to have all gas-works outside the limits of the city.

In a recent report of the Oxy-Hydrogen Company it is stated that the quantity of gas furnished by the various Companies in New York during for the year 1868, in round numbers, amounted to 2,500,000,000 cubic feet. The cost of this enormous quantity, including the Government tax, is about $8,500,000 per year. Other estimates, approximately correct, increase the cost of artificial illumination to about $10,000,000. By the new process it is estimated that about one-half of the above expense could be saved to consumers annually, giving them a satisfactory light and also the great convenience of gas-works for ordinary heating purposes.

The new method consists simply in stilling the hydrogen present in the gas material, by which gas coal will yield nearly double the quantity of gas produced in the ordinary way. By the old process the quantity of gas made from a ton of coals on an average does not exceed 9,000 cubic feet, while by the new process, a ton of gas coal will yield over 20,000 feet of gas. The new process is patented in England, and is to be more than the expense in obtaining half the quantity in the old way, while the illuminating power of the gas may be made vastly superior.

The new arrangements for running hourly trains between New York and Yonkers on the Harlem River Railroad were perfected last week. Fifteen daily trains will carry accommodate all the commuters on the line. Eight new cars have been built for the Hudson River Railroad, each of which is capable of holding 120 persons. They are fitted up in the latest style like the horse cars, with side seats.

In China all civil offices must be literary graduates. Three degrees of letters have been established, which may be obtained at different colleges. The first degree is poetically called "Beautiful Ability," analogous to the A.B. of the United States, and may be obtained in the Imperial College. The Provincial College gives the second degree of "Advanced Merit," and the title, "Doctor of Laws," is conferred by the Imperial University at Pekin.

A terrible fire occurred a short time ago in the Yellow Jacket Mine at Gold Hill, Nevada, which soon communicated with the Kentuck and Crown Point Mines. About forty were lost. This catastrophe is the most dreadful one which has ever occurred in the mining district of that region.

An unexpected horror greeted Philadelphia one morning last week. George S. Twitchell, who had been condemned to death for the murder of his master-in-law, and for whom the gallows was in readiness, was found on the morning appointed for his execution dead in his cell. He had committed suicide by taking cyanide of potassium, doubly poisonous. How he obtained it is unknown; but for a few days before his death he had been prostrated and totally unnerved in view of his approaching doom. Although he had made a "confession" to the effect that his wife was not implicated in the murder, and that he had only sought to shield her by not revealing this at first, yet it is generally believed that he was really guilty of the crime with which

It is in contemplation to drive a tunnel under the Straits of Dover, connecting France, to connect the British and Continental railways. For securing sufficient ventilation, it is proposed to sink pits on each side, and to drive thence two small parallel driftways or galleries from each country, connected at intervals by transverse drift-ways. The pressure, aided by furnace-carburation and revolving air-fans, the air is to be made to circulate in the ordinary coal-mines. The formation of these double drift-ways in the preliminary part of the undertaking, and should it be impossible to execute these, the expense of entering upon the main work would be avoided. The cost of the galleries is estimated at from eight to ten millions of dollars, and of the regular tunnel about five times that amount. Three English and three French engineers are preparing to report upon the scheme to a committee, which will soon meet in Paris.

A second German Polar Expedition is in preparation. It is to consist of two vessels, the Germania and the Hansa, which will leave Bremerhaven, probably, in June. The Greenland will return before next winter to bring records of the expedition up to that point; the Germania is to winter northward. The purpose of the expedition is the exploration of the Arctic central region from seventy-five degrees north latitude, taking the Greenland coast as a guide.

Paper clothes have been patented in London, and the inventor claims for them that they are lighter, stronger, harder, and cheaper than any other material. By the application of his material as a casting for ships he undertakes to make them shot-proof. The material is perfectly air-tight and water-proof.

A scientific gentleman has been examining the dust of the streets in the large towns in England. He finds animal life abundant in every specimen, and the amount of "molecular activity" is most abundant at the height of five feet above the ground, or just the average height of the foot-passenger's mouth. This may account in a great measure for the mysterious way in which some diseases propagate themselves—for instance, cholera. The smallest atom of the poison received into the stomach will cause an attack of the disease.

It seems almost incredible that such an extensive robbery as that which was recently perpetrated in the city of Philadelphia could have been accomplished in broad daylight. Ten cuts was the cure. Between the hours of six in the morning and four in the afternoon the building occupied by the Beneficial Saving Fund Society was entered, and money, bonds, etc., to the amount of about a million dollars, were carried away. The building was situated on the great thoroughfare of the city, where it would be supposed no depredator could go on undetected. The valuables were thought to be perfectly secure from burglars. The robbery occurred on Sunday, and though a watchman was usually employed on the premises, for some reason he was absent that day.

According to official estimates there are about 8,000,000 horses in this country at the present time. Of this number, 400,000 are valued at prices averaging $200 each; 800,000 valued at about $300 apiece; 20,000 at $5000; and 1000 at $5000; while there are about one hundred horses valued at $10,000 each.

An inventive young woman of Chicago advertises that she will "give lessons in etiquette, and the way of conversing with the ladies, to any young gentleman who does not feel at ease in the society of the opposite sex. Tuition by novels, extra."

In the English House of Commons it is considered no breach of good manners for a member to wear his hat in the house or be pleased while he is in his seat; but it is long to be uncivil for his head be in himself-ately seated with a shovel. Nevertheless in clubhouses Englishmen stroll about the dining-rooms as they would in the streets, only uncovering their heads when they themselves sit down to eat.

In the city of Paris three hundred women are employed as printers, and about thirty as proof-readers.

A lunatic escaped from the lassaic asylum on Blackwell's Island a few days ago, and strolled quietly through the city. As the bells pealed the hour of noon, a policeman was surprised by seeing a young man, in East Twenty-sixth Street, take a pistol from his pocket, place it against his forehead, and pull the trigger. He fell apparently lifeless; but, though the bullet entered his forehead, the wound was not fatal. The man stated to the officer that by the revelation of God, as dictated to him through the spirit of Abraham Lincoln, the first ruler in heaven, he had been deputed to take his own life that day at twelve o'clock; that the spirit had given him the choice of hanging, cutting his throat, or shooting himself, and he had chosen the pistol; that he had already once failed to shoot, and his second death would be of little account."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A CURE FOR COLDS.—When your hands are dead, bury them in your pockets.

A court balloon having offended his sovereign, the monarch sentenced him to death. The culprit, in great terror, fell upon his knees and cried for mercy. "I will extend no other mercy to you," said the prince, "than permitting you to choose what kind of death you will die. Decide immediately, for I will be obeyed."

"I adore your clemency," said the crafty jester; "I choose to die of old age."

A Western paper having announced the "shooting" of a wild-cat by a little boy five feet eight inches long, an exchange queries what they call boy boys there.

THE VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

Annual flowering plants resemble whales, as they come up to blow.

Flowers are very warlike in their disposition, and are ever armed with pistils.

They are migratory in their habits, for, wherever they may winter, they are sure to leave in the spring, most of them very polite and full of bowgis.

Though there are no vegetable beans, there are a number of bean-stalks.

It is considered only right and proper to sax trees before you fell them.

Fruit trees have military characteristics. When young they are trained; they have parasols; and their shoots are straight.

Grain cannot be treated like infants; when the head bends it must be cradled; and thrashing is resorted to to fit them for sense.

Grain and seeds are not considered dangerous, except when in a state of chaff.

Several trees, like watch-dogs, are valued mostly for their bark.

The man who struck out a new path is supposed to have been of a belligerent turn.

WEDDED BLISS.

God bless our wives,
For they are loves
With little bees and honey;
They coax like chicks,
And scold our cocks,
And—don't they spend the money!

When we are sick
They heal us quicker
Than is if they let us be;
If not, we die,
And yet they cry,
With just one eye,
And with the other on a sly,
At some young man above us.

"MARY MAGDALEN had seven devils cast out of her, I see," said a man having seven devils cast out of him," growled a cynical bachelor, in the course of a discussion on the woman question, "eh, they are to be cast out, yet, I believe," was the quiet response of his fair antagonist.

"Get away! get away!" said an embarrassed mother to homeless Pat, who was hugging a night's lodging. "This is no place for you, I assure you, for shame! This is the lying in hospital." "Och, indeed, thin," replied the outcast, "it's the very place for me, for I've been lying out these three nights."

AN "EVENING PARTY"—A night-watchman.

EATING BY THE CARD.—A green 'un, from Oranges County, determined to spend a few weeks in New York, for the purpose of seeing all the sights, and in order to strike his acquaintances at home with a proper idea of the greatness of his visit, he took up lodgings at the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

When he was ushered in to dinner the first day, he was surprised at the number of people who eat down, as well as at the vastness of the dining-room. He was equally surprised to see that each man had a printed account of his dinner before him, and that each one, as he thought, ate according to the directions. He was quite hungry—and well he might be—but after waiting three hours over his meal time—as he attacked the head of the bill with vigor, and ate down as far as he could, but he soon came to a stand. Just then the waiter came to the right, requesting the favor to bring him some oyster pie, which our friend heard, and instantly referred to the bill to see where it was.

"What!" exclaimed he, with astonishment, turning to his neighbor, "are you all the way down there? Why, I have only got to roast beef, and I feel already as if I would burst!"

A clergyman was once told by one of his parishioners of a story to his disadvantage which was in circulation.

"Ah!" exclaimed he, "do they say so about me? If they knew half as well as I do myself, they might tell things much worse than that, and will more truth."

LAST LOVE.

First love is a pretty romance,
But one half so sweet is by reckoned;
And when one awakes from the trance,
There's a vast stock of bliss in a second.

And e'en should a second subside,
A lover should never despair;
The world is uncommonly wide,
And the women uncommonly fair.

The poets their raptures may fill,
Who love never been out to the test;
A first love is all very well,
But, believe me, 'tis not love's the best.

HOME AT LAST.

A. J.—"All right, Lucifer, it's me."

SCENES IN THE WHITE PINE MINING DISTRICT, NEVADA.—[SEE PAGE 269.]

MIDSHIPMAN THEODORUS B. M. MASON.

THE WHITE PINE MINING DISTRICT, NEVADA.

THE wealth of the new-discovered White Pine Mining District in Nevada is something remarkable. It is rarely surpassed in the history of mining operations. The Comstock lode, in the Washoe region of the same State, which has produced over $90,000,000 in bullion, furnished ores assaying as high as $4000 per ton. Specimens taken from the Eberhardt, Mississippi, and several other mines in the White Pine District, are said to have assayed $20,000 per ton.

The average yield per ton for November was $257 17; for December, $429 52. Some thirty considerable mines and numberless smaller ones are in course of development on Treasure Hill and in the neighborhood. Six mills, employing nearly a hundred stamps, are at work upon the ores, and four additional mills, employing about seventy stamps, are soon to be erected.

The same classes that usually rush to new mining regions are found here in crowds. Every day hundreds of them come to the White Pine District. A city has grown up called Treasure City, which rivals Virginia City; it is 9000 feet above the sea.

Two years since "a degraded and starving Indian carried to a camp of miners a piece of ore from the locality of the Hidden Treasure mines, which led to the exposure of the wealth of Treasure Hill." Now in Treasure City there are banking-offices, a newspaper, a post-office, faro-banks, and corner groceries. Real estate is at city prices. A corner lot 50 by 100 was sold the other day for $8000 gold.

Let us now see how a Sunday is passed in the White Pine District. There are here some 6000 people, of which about one-half are at work on the "locations" and mines within a neighborhood of two miles. There are no churches. Every other house on the street is a saloon, and is thronged with drinkers and gamblers. The gambling-room is back of the saloon. Here faro is played on an extensive scale, the stakes ranging from $1 to $1000. We notice one man, a San Francisco pioneer, who has gone through a dozen mining excitements in as many different localities, from Mexico to Cariboo, and made and lost fortunes in all, betting piles of checks, each representing $2 50, as high as they will stand without falling over of their own weight, on half a dozen cards at once. Sometimes he wins hundreds of dollars two or three times in succession, and the banker pays with the most imperturbable gravity, the expression of his face never changing for an instant. He knows very well that it will all come back to him and bring him more with it. At some of the tables the dealers are women—French or Spanish—and it is a noticeable fact that the betters are fewer than at the others the prevailing belief being, apparently, that the fair sex do not give the rougher so good a chance for getting their money back as do the male dealers.

The street is crowded with pedestrians, teams, and saddle or pack animals. Here comes a dark Mexican in broad sombrero, wrapped to his eyes in a serape, and with leather leggins bound round his legs, mounted on a small, thin, but spirited horse. He uses the huge Mexican bit and monster spurs, which jingle like bells as he rides along, and guides his horse, without apparent effort, by the merest motion of his finger, throwing the single rein to one side or the other. Following him is an old white horse with a bell hung by a leather strap around his neck, and at his heels in single file came a long train of Spanish pack-mules, with huge aparejos, each carrying two large sacks of silver ore for the mills down at Hamilton or Silver Springs, in the cañons at the foot of Treasure Hill, on the north or south.

Another Mexican, wrapped in broad serape and mounted on a mule, follows the train. The first one is as silent as a bronze statue, and looks neither to the right nor the left—being, in fact, the pilot of the train; but the last one is incessantly shouting Ja-cah! ja-cah! Vamos! Mules! vamos! swinging the long, heavy, braided raw-hide rein in his right hand, and showering curses, blows, and savage anathemas on the heads of the way-ward mules which happen to stray a foot out of the direct line of the train. Then comes a square box-wagon, such as distillery slops are carried in at the East. This is filled with snow-water, melted in large tanks over brush-wood fires, and sold round the streets at 12½ cents per gallon.

There are a few decent married women here; but the majority is against them, and they for the most part keep close at home.

A shot is fired in a saloon: there is a sudden stampede for the street; one combatant is disarmed and borne struggling away by his friends, while the other beats a masterly retreat in the opposite direction, his face and pistol kept always to the foe, and in an instant all is excitement and confusion. Such is Sunday in the White Pine District.

GENERAL AUGUSTO ARANGO.—[SEE DOUBLE PAGE.]

MIDSHIPMAN THEODORUS B. M. MASON.

OUR readers will be as agreeably impressed with the manly beauty of the young midshipman, whose portrait we lay before them, as the whole country has been filled with admiration for his heroism so recently displayed in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro.

On the 5th of February last Midshipman THEODORUS B. M. MASON, of the flag-ship Guerriere, then lying in the bay at Rio, was sent ashore with a boat's crew to pick up and bring back to the vessel a number of the men who had overstaid their leave of absence. He found them, and after a violent struggle—for the men were in liquor and resisted arrest—captured the greater number. Two of them, however, were so violent that he was compelled to put them in irons and place them on board the steam launch for conveyance to the flag-ship. While the launch yet remained at the ferry dock these men both leaped overboard, and would have been drowned, one after the other, had Midshipman MASON not jumped in, and, at the imminent risk of his own life, successively saved them. The first rescue was noble, the second was magnificent. Exhausted as the young hero must have been by his exertions in bringing up the one, he hesitated not a moment in pulling his life again to bring up the other. When we consider, too, that the ladder of his awarms was old shucks, the conduct of Midshipman MASON seems little less than self-concussion to duty.

CUBAN DRILL-ROOM IN NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE DOUBLE PAGE.]

The following letter has been addressed to young MASON by the Secretary of the Navy:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1869.

SIR,—The Department has just learned from a dispatch received from Rear-Admiral CHARLES H. DAVIS, commanding the squadron of a letter addressed by you to Captain M. B. WOOLSEY, commanding the Shawsheen, of your having left your assigned station to risk over the lives of two of your shipmates, enlisted men, in the hazardous feat of landing, on the 6th of February last.

I desire to express to you the Department's high appreciation of your heroic conduct on the occasion mentioned, which was not fell to effect rescue of your self-command you to the esteem of your brother officers and shipmates in the service.

It is gratifying to the Department to learn, also, from the dispatch of Rear-Admiral DAVIS, that your behavior and character in all other respects are in perfect harmony with these noble actions.

Very respectfully,
A. E. BORIE, Secretary of the Navy.

MIDSHIPMAN T. B. M. MASON, United States Ship Guerriere, South Atlantic Squadron.

Midshipman T. B. M. MASON is a New Yorker, and the son of our well-known citizen, Colonel T. BAILEY MASON, Commissioner of Public Buildings. Having the full name of his father, he assumed, in addition to it, his mother's maiden name, for family considerations. He is a graduate, of only eight months' standing, of the Naval School at Annapolis, and most worthily wearing in the same battle with the gallantry of his grand-uncle, Rear-Admiral THEODORUS BAILEY, who led the forlorn hope of Admiral FARRAGUT'S fleet past the rebel batteries on the Mississippi in the capture of New Orleans. Young handsome, brave, accomplished, and, last not least, well decked to him. Midshipman MASON is an honor to his native city and to his country's service, and his friends are easily gained are worth more than those of the conqueror.

"—Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war."

MUSICAL LIZARDS.

A SMALL lizard, lately taken to England from the Isle of Bermuda by Mr. Swinhoe, is found to be a new species by Dr. Günther, of the British Museum. Mr. Swinhoe found the eggs of this gecko, or lizard, in holes of trees or among mortar rubbish. They are round, and usually be several together, resembling eggs of ordinary lizards. The young, when first hatched, keep much under stones in dark cellars, where they remain until they attain about two-thirds of the adult size, when they begin to appear in order to catch insects, but evincing great shyness of their colors. Mr. Swinhoe states that on the plastered sides of his bedroom, close to the angle of the roof, every evening when the lamp was placed on the table below, four little musical lizards began to make their appearance and watch patiently for insects attracted by the light. A solitary cry of the tail is sometimes imitated as the body is jerked along, and much so when the animal is alarmed and doing its utmost to escape; but its progress even then is by no means, stopping at intervals and raising its head to look about. If a fly perch on the wall it cautiously approaches to within a short distance, then suddenly darts forward, and with its quick-fly-protruded tongue, tongue, fixes it. Apart from watching its curious manœuvres to catch insect-food, the attention of the most listless would be excited by the strange noise which the creatures these creatures utter at all hours of the day and night, more especially during cloudy and rainy weather. These notes resemble the musical lilies "chuck-chuck," several times repeated; and, from their more frequent occurrence during July and August, are thought to be the call notes of the male to the female.

During the greater part of the day the little creatures lay concealed in some crevice among the beams of the roof or in the wall of the house, where, however, it is ever watchful for the incautious fly that approaches its close, upon whom it darts forth with but little notice. But it is by no means a stranger to the habitation of men. Every old wall and almost every house possesses a tenant or two of this species. It is excessively shy, and even when heard quite quietly ensconced in a hole, generally manages to escape—its glittering little eyes (black with yellow edges) appearing to be always on the alert to make an attempt to capture the runaway seldom results in more than the seizure of an animated tail, wrenched off with a jerk by the fellow left to its slips away, without loss of blood. The younger individuals are much darker than the by no means uncommon, which are sometimes almost albinoes. In ordinary fly-catching habits, as they stick to the sides of a lamp, there is much similarity between this gecko and the little paradise, or wall-lizard of China; but this is decidedly a larger and much more active animal, and often engages in a struggle with insects of very large size. The Chinese colonists of Formosa greatly respect the gecko, in consequence of a legend which attributes to them the honor of having once poisoned the supplies of an invading rebellious army, which was thereby totally cut to pieces. The geckos were raised to the rank of generals by the grateful Emperor of China; which honor, the legend states, they greatly appreciated, and henceforth devoted their energies to the extermination of mosquitoes and other injurious insects.

BARKING UP THE WRONG TREE.

THE wiseacres who have been guessing at the vegetable constituents of SOZODONT have all barked up the wrong tree. The right tree, which is the flower dressed, of a the bosky Tree of Life, the bark of which is used by the Araucanian Indians to cleanse and preserve their garments, and clean their teeth and gums, and gives a flower-like fragrance to their breath. This is one of the leading ingredients of SOZODONT, the most wonderful purifier of all dental beautifiers and preservatives.—[Com.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine two years without the least repairs, doing all my family sewing, consisting of coats, overcoats, pants, and vests, down to the finest of sewing, even quilting all the seam and pants. Besides that, I have earned six hundred dollars ($600) in the six years. I earned thirty dollars in a single day. Have run the WHEELER & WILSON in preference to all others.

New Milford, Ct. MRS. LUCY DURDY.

INTERESTING TO LADIES.—The GROVER & BAKER Machine which I purchased in June, 1857, has given me the greatest satisfaction during the seven years I have been in constant use, and it has never required the least repair.

MRS. J. G. PHYPE,
108 West 12th Street, New York.

GENERAL USE.—COLGATE'S Toilet Soap is found in more families than any other soap. Sold by all druggists.—Pittsburgh Presbyterian Banner.

To remove MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, and TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.—[Com.]

WALTHAM WATCHES are the best and cheapest. Circulars sent free. "N. MATSON & CO., Chicago.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty cents per box. Mailed free. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 871 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

$3000 A YEAR—How to make it. See PHONOGRAPHIC VISITOR, 25c. A. J. GRAHAM, 25 Broadway, N. Y. Send 3c. stamp for specimen.

VELOCIPEDES.

Patented February 11, 1862; Patented November 30, 1869; Patented March 16, 1869.

The subscriber, having opened the large Warerooms No. 618 BROADWAY, is now prepared, with his immense Carriage Warerooms, 618 BROADWAY, having secured manufactories of the best and only receiving consignments from the most prominent Velocipede Manufacturers in the United States, to supply the trade with Velocipedes.

PRICES REDUCED. Illustrated Circulars mailed to purchasers of six or more.

NOTICE.

All persons are hereby cautioned against buying, selling, or using any Velocipedes, containing two wheels, so that the feet give motion to the front wheel, which is the same as the Velocipede invented by Messrs. BROWN & PAGE, by authorized parties.

Persons making, selling, using, buying, or importing from Paris or elsewhere Velocipedes, in violation of my rights under the Patent Letters Patent, will render themselves liable to prosecution and the payment of damages.

Manufacturers are PARTICULARLY CAUTIONED against preparing to make and make any two-wheeled Velocipedes from any parties who may claim to grant them, unless they have my authority in writing.

Information of infringements solicited.

CALVIN WITTY, Patentee, 618 Broadway.

DODSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.—A Complete Library of Modern Music for Voice and Piano-forte: Carefully Compiled, Correctly Copied, Handsomely Bound, and Reasonably Sold. Catalogues Free. DODSEY & CO., 598 Broadway, N. Y.

FINE WATCHES AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.

SOLID GOLD
HUNTING-CASE LADIES' WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Escapement, Chronometer Balance, Jeweled in Gold and Warranted, $36. Lepine Movement, Gold Balance, $46.

GENTS' HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, Lever Movement, First Quality, $45. Extra Quality, $56.

IMPERIAL DUPLEX
Enameled Movement, Ruby Jewels, Sweep Seconds, Silver Hunting Cases, $45.

AMERICAN MOVEMENT
3-oz. Silver Cases, $15. Full Jeweled, $18.

SOLID GOLD
GENTS' HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jeweled, Adjusted Balance, Repeating and Warranted, $60. Extra Quality, $85; and Watches of every description, equally low, sent by Express, to be Used for Examination, with the privilege of full exchange. Any Watch received from us may be returned or exchanged if not giving perfect satisfaction. Full Descriptive Price-Lists sent free.

S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
52 & 54 JOHN ST., NEW YORK.

PHYSICIANS! Give your Patients SWEET QUININE!

VELOCIPEDES, $55.
LEWIS F. TIDBALL, 478 Broadway, N. Y.

THOMAS R. AGNEW,

ESTABLISHED 1836,

260 & Greenwich St., corner Murray, New York,

IS OFFERING CHEAP,

FOR CASH:

COFFEES.—Green, Roasted, and Ground: all grades to suit the palate and the pocket of the million; 15c., 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., 40c. Mocha, 50c.

TEAS.—Every body should know who they buy teas of, as all who sell watches are not watchmakers. Mr. Agnew spent fifteen years in China, and knows exactly what teas are, and does not deal in damaged goods of any kind. Consequently every pound of tea sold is warranted as represented, or the money returned.

MOLASSES.—Mr. Agnew has his agent in New Orleans, an expert in the business, who ships him the choicest of the crop.

RICE.—Mr. Agnew has a house in South Carolina, who ship him the best head rice in markets.

SPICES.—Ground direct from the mills. Genesee, Indiana, and St. Louis, best brands in market, from $7 to $14 per bbl.

GROCERIES.—Every thing desired in families, hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, steamships and all supplied in bulk by Mr. Agnew, who is for many working 16, 18, and 20 hours every day for the best quarter of a century. Any other such competitor with the old fo—dated grocers, who have been brought up in a song—as butchers, or hackers for others, and now begin to flap their wings when gray-headed. In a word, Agnew is now at the head of the trade as he was of the cart-horse when trotting. He is the man for the people—quick as lightning and punctual as time.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

WATCHES, $15, $20, and $25. Sent by Express, C. O. D. for Examination, or see last issue of this paper. JOHN FOGGAN, Prest'Oriole Gold Watch Co., 78 Nassau St., N. Y.

A POOR GIRL'S

LETTER. New Song from Prichester.....Circe.
SPANISH MARCH AND MAID. Perkins. &c.
PERSEVERE WALTZES, 50c. "TELEGRAM WALTZ," 40c.
NOT SO FOOLISH AS YOU LOOK. Pepper's Song. 35c.
KA-ROOSH-EE (comic song), "DANDY PAT, each 35c.
Violin or Flute and Piano, 50c. Brass Band, $1.
Sheet Music mailed FREDERICK BLUME, 1128 Broadway, N.Y.

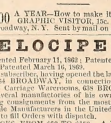
PICTURE, GILT, 22 x 28 Frames always on hand. Extra heavy, best quality, lowest price. Best Moulding supplies to the Trade. A choice lot of WALNUT MOULDINGS for sale low.
UNION FRAMING CO., 67 West 12th St., N. Y.

20TH THOUSAND—Hunter's Guide and Trapper's Manual. How to hunt, trap, and trap ALL animals. How to tan and cure hides, furs, &c. Price only $10 a year buy my informer. Neatly printed and bound—only 25 cts. postpaid; 6 for $1. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Alaska Diamonds.



The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or Rocky Mountain Gem, found in abundance by the real diamond, mounted at prices to suit every purse, in article diamond settings, guaranteed fine gold, and stamped. We are one of the sole agents of the real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Look at our Price-List.

Ladies' and Gents' Finger-Rings, $5, and $10: Solitaire Ear-Drops, $8, $6, and $10. Studs, $5 and $10. Sleeve-Buttons, $5 per Set. Pins, $6, $12, $14.
Cluster Set, $10, $15, $20, and $25 each; Cross Sets, $20 and $25.
Solitaire Pins, $2, $3, $5, $10, $15, $20; Gents' Solitaire Rings, $8, $10, $20, $30; Cluster Rings, $6, $10, $12 each.
Cluster Pins, $10 and $12; with tail, $10; Cross Pins, $10, $15, and $20; Gents' Scarf Pins, $5, $6, $8.

We do our business direct from our factory, located in N. Y., which has a world-wide reputation for its fine jewelry.

Orders for goods must be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods will be sent free of charge per express, C.O.D., reserving privilege of examining. A Large Discount to the Trade. Address

STANLEY, WHIPPLE & CO., Providence, R. I.

Warranted a Perfect Cure for all Kinds of PILES, Internal or External. Sent by mail, on receipt of price, by H. D. FOWLE, Chemist, Boston. $1 a Bottle. Sold by druggists everywhere. Sold by druggists everywhere.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y., offers a great variety of PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES for CASH, during the present season, or will take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid. The same to let, and rent allowed if purchased.

WICK RAISER and ADJUSTER; SUN BURNERS, SILVERED METALLIC Fit all Lamps; LAMP SHADES, Will not burn or get out of repair. Either of the above mailed free on receipt of 50 cents. Agents, male and female, wanted. Send for circular.
F. B. DOMINICK, 203 Hudson St., N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS—to sell the American Knitting Machine. Price $50. The simplest, most durable Knitting Machine ever believed. Will knit 20,000 stitches per minute. Liberal inducements to agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

BEAUTIFY the SKIN.

Even inherited disease of a scrofulous character can be cured by the persistent and regular use of STAFFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS. The natural magnetism of the body, which is antagonistic to every form of ulcerous and eruptive disease, is reinforced and intensified by the action of this tonic and the whole system revitalized and invigorated by the medicine. It creates the empoisoning principle from the circulation in the form of gas, and when it deteriorated to the extent is expelled through the pores. Instead of the skin is tend to inflammation. The cure becomes plain and palpable. Iron Powders dry on the tongue night and morning.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS.

1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 6 Packages, 12 Powders, $5. Mailed Free.

HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N.Y.

PRIVATE MEDICAL WORKS.—A SPECIAL LIST! A Catalogue of seventy or more Private Medical Works on subjects not adapted to general circulation, but invaluable to those who need them. Sent on receipt of stamp to prepay postage. Address

HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., New York.

IMPORTANT TO DEALERS IN VELOCIPEDES.

The undersigned, being extensively engaged in the manufacture of FIRST-CLASS VELOCIPEDES of the most improved pattern, is now prepared to furnish them in any quantity at least 25 per cent. under the usual prices. Warning, durable and Price as low as Fifty Dollars. A liberal discount to dealers buying in quantities.

J. DOUGHTY, 316 FULTON STREET, Brooklyn.

"STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" Still Waves. You can sell it. Splendid engraving; size 22x28; sells at whole year only 15 cts.; 8 pp. 40 new songs 10 cents. Sheet of music, 16 cts. Everything. Address H. M. SPENCER, Music, &c., Boston; for 6 cts. Address

"STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just Published:

Albert Barnes.

NOTES, CRITICAL EXPLANATORY, AND PRACTICAL, ON THE BOOK OF PSALMS. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," "Notes on the Epistles of Paul," &c., &c. In Three Volumes. Vols. II. and III. now ready. 16mo, Cloth, $1.00 per volume.

The Author of "Very Livingstone."

BREAKING A BUTTERFLY. By BLANCHE ELLERSLIE'S ENDING. By the Author of "Very Likely." Livingstone." 16mo, Cloth, $1.00 each; or, "Sans Merci," "Maurice Derzing," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

Genio C. Scott.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GENIO C. SCOTT. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3.50.

Charles Reade.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Hard Cash," "Never too Late to Mend," "Griffith Gaunt," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Fully Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HARD CASH. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Love Me Little, Love Me Long," "Never too Late to Mend," &c. With Illustrations. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

Charles Lever.

THE DIARY OF NORCOTT'S. By CHAS. LEVER, Author of "The Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly," "Barrington," "Maurice Tiernay," "Lord Kilgobbin," "Charles O'Malley," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

Countess Ossicini.

MY RECOLLECTIONS OF LORD BYRON: and Those of Eye-Witnesses of his Life. By the Countess OSSICINI. Translated from the French by JERVIS Shaw. With Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1.75.

Anthony Trollope.

PHINEAS FINN, THE IRISH MEMBER. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Know He was Right," "Orley Farm," "Small House at Allington," "Can You Forgive Her?" "Belton Estate," "Framley Parsonage," "The Three Clerks," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1.75; 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HE KNEW HE WAS RIGHT. Beautifully Illustrated. Part I. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

J. D. Baldwin.

PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Great Peoples and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to an still Older Civilization of the Egyptian or Cave Builders. By JOHN D. BALDWIN, Member of the American Ethnological Society. 12mo, Cloth, $2.50.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

SERMONS BY HENRY WARD BEECHER. Plymouth Collection. During 1868. Now First Published and Unpublished Discourses, and Revised by the Author. Steel Portrait. 12mo, Cloth. With Steel Portrait by Halpin, Cloth, $2.00.

William Hepworth Dixon.

HER MAJESTY'S TOWER. Historic Studies in the Tower of London. With Frontispiece Plan of the Tower. 12mo, Cloth, 60 cents.

Thomas Bosqé.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK: Its History, Condition, and Prospects. With Official Report to the Board of Education. By THOMAS BOSQÉ, Secretary of the Board. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2.50.

Miles O'Reilly.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF CHARLES G. HALPINE (MILES O'REILLY). Complete Edition of Odes, Poems, Sonnets, Epics, and Lyrical Effusions which have not heretofore been collected together. With a Biographical Sketch and Explanatory Notes. Edited by Mrs. GEORGE D. BRAYTON. Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $2.50.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

Oolong (black), 50c., 90c., 1 00c.; best, $1 per lb.
Mixed (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
English Breakfast (black), 90c., 1 00c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
Imperial (green), 90c., 1 00c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Young Hyson (green), 90c., 1 00c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Uncolored Japan, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Gunpowder (green), $1 00; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee,

which we sell at the low price of 25 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Roasted (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
Green (unroasted), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

Springfield, Mass., September 26, 1868.

To the Great American Tea Company,

31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York.

Gents: The people here will not be alone. They say I have united the road, and that I have got to send abused words to them. So here you have it, in the shape of my seventh order since the 6th of May last, making five hundred and forty-four pounds of mixed—lots costs I have sent you since that date.

Hoping that we may be as good as former packages, I remain Yours, &c., John W. Hawkins.

30 lbs. Uncolored Japan, Mrs. Kempton..... at $1.. $30 00
6 " Imperial..... do..... at 1 25.. 7 50
6 " Young Hyson.. A. L. Cummings.. at 1 25.. 7 50
3 " Imperial..... Eliza Stephens.. at 1 25.. 3 75
3 " Gunpowder.... L. Chapman..... at 1 25.. 3 75
2 " Gunpowder.... O. A. Watrous.. at 1 50.. 3 00
2 " Imperial..... Mrs. Leptic..... at 1 50.. 3 00
6 " Young Hyson.. J. Hopkins..... at 1 25.. 7 50
3 " Oolong..... do..... at 1 00.. 3 00
4 " Gunpowder.... John Stephens.. at 1 50.. 6 00
4 " Young Hyson.. Mrs. H. Doxey.. at 1 50.. 6 00
1 " do. do. H. Malone..... at 1 25.. 1 25
4 " do. do. C. W. Newcomb.. at 1 25.. 5 00
1 " do. do. Noah Campbell.. at 1 25.. 1 25
1 " Gunpowder.... Andrew Miller.... at 1 25.. 1 25
4 " do. do. A. Gale..... at 1 50.. 6 00
2 " Imperial..... Mrs. Bird..... at 1 50.. 3 00
$74 25

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-Office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom House stores in bond to purchasers.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can secure the cost of their Tea and Coffee about one third (besides the Express charges) by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in the city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less)

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

The Providence Tool Co.,
205 Broadway, New York,
offer at first hands their Heavy Hardware and Ship Chandlery, also PEABODY BREECH-LOADING FIRE-ARMS, for Infantry, Cavalry, and Sporting use. They are unequaled for strength, rapidity and accuracy of fire, and for simplicity of mechanism. Descriptive pamphlet and Price-Lists furnished by H. S. NEWHALL, Agent.

"ALUMINUM BRILLIANTE."—$10 WATCHES.

A new metal, similar in appearance, gold, improved cases, equal to Gold. Finish, style, and appearance of "Waltham" or C. D. and D. watch; can be detected if not satisfactory. Send for trade-list of cheap and costly watches, jewelry, &c., &c. Address

N. E. WATCH CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

THE DOLLAR SUN.

CHARLES A. DANA'S PAPER.

The cheapest, neatest, and most readable of New York Journals. Every body likes it. Three editions: Daily, Semi-Weekly, and Weekly, at $6, $2, and $1 a year. Full reports of markets, agriculture, Farmers' and Horticulturists' Clubs, and the latest story in every Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A valuable premium to every subscriber. Send for specimen, with premium list.

I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher Sun, New York.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for their acts or sales, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE),

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; there for Ladies' or Gentlemen's Watches. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Hunting Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate with each Watch. Ladies' Watches, size of Gentlemen's, $15 Watches are equal in appearance, style, and finish, and are fully equal to a Solid Gold Watch costing $100. Choice of every style, from $12 to $20. Ladies' Watches, $15. We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Gold Fobs, and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully good in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge. We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), so we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less prices. Remember, we manufacture. Our regular terms, Cash before delivery. In order to avoid delay, parties in New York or its vicinity can have the benefit of our lowest price. Parties in the country will please send a Post-Office Order or Draft on New York City. Customers are requested not to send for goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. Customers must get all orders sent to their residence, plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only office is

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

LIVINGSTON'S PATENT

BRACED WEB SAW.

PATENT SECURED.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and implement ever put on sale anywhere in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Send for circular.

LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO.,
No. 20 BEAVER ST., N. Y.

100 YARDS OF SHEETING

For a Club of 100 in our great

ONE DOLLAR SALE,

If all returned. A little extra exertion secures it. Send for circulars and full explanations before sending your clubs elsewhere. One trial will convince you that the true secret to success in trade, and the quality of our goods unequaled by any other house in our line of business.

S. C. THOMPSON & CO.,
129 Federal Street, Boston, Mass.

No excuse now for Papers and Magazines lying about loose all the year.

CONANT'S PATENT

PERIODICAL COVERS,

for Harper's Weekly or Bazar, sent by mail for $1 50. They bind the numbers together as a book.

Address R. CONANT, 39 Nassau St., N. Y.
A good Canvasser wanted.

Magazine Size, 50 Cents. Sheet-Music Size, $1 00.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

Prices from $16 to $22.

From the Scientific American of June 5, 1869.

"The color of this metal closely resembles that of fine gold, is more grateful to the eye, and its lustre brilliant," &c., &c.

When desired, these Watches will be sent to any express office, and permission of examination granted upon payment of freight charges.

Pictures, showing the case and metal sent free upon application. An inspection of my goods solicited.

JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
No. 3 Maiden Lane, Basement, New York.

For sale by all respectable dealers.

THE "BEST" SEWING MACHINE.—Will do all the work that any machine can do, and more.—Beware of all $5, $6, and $20 machines. It is the cheapest and best. Agents wanted everywhere. Low fee to Agents. Wanted, one smart Agent to control each County. Send stamp quick. Address

ASHUELOT S. M. CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

DR. STILLSON'S ELASTIC SUPPORTER.

The only perfect Supporter. Highly and justly recommended by every lady that has used it. Sent free, by mail, on receipt of $1 50. Address, or apply to

R. COOK, 62 Fulton St., N. Y. City, or C. A. PERKINS, Syracuse, N. Y., Agents for the Patentee. Liberal terms to dealers every town.

DO YOUR OWN PRINTING.

Cheapest and Best Portable Presses.

MEN AND BOYS MAKING MONEY.

Price of Presses, $8, $12, $16. Offices, $15, $30, $50. Send for a circular to GOLDING & CO., 20 Water Street, Boston, Mass.

DO IT NOW.—Don't delay, but send 25 cents at once and receive MAPLE LEAVES for twelve months. It is the cheapest, the best, and the most popular Monthly published. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a stamp. Address

A. G. ROBERTS, No. 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

SALESMEN wanted by a Manufacturing Co., to travel and sell goods to the trade. $100 per month. Situations permanent; wages good. H. H. RICKARDS & CO., 43 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Early Rose Potato.

ONE lb. EARLY ROSE sent by mail, postpaid, $1 00.
4 lbs. E. R. $3 50. 8 lbs. $6 50. Sent by mail, postpaid, $8 00. Best Spring Wheat in the World. Has survived and most productive Corn; wonderful. Yields 100 bushels white and black—weighing 45 pounds to the bushel. Early Mealy Barley; Grass Seeds; Extra Hops; the great Feed Cutter, Root Pulper, EXPERIMENTAL FARM AND GARDEN—most valuable Magazine issued in this country—only $1 per year. Specimen free. If you want to make your Farm pay. Address

JOHN A. DEITZ, Chambersburg, Pa.

THE LATEST AND BEST BOOK FOR SELF-INSTRUCTION UPON THE CABINET ORGAN IS THE NEW SPECIAL EDITION

The Best Book for Teaching! CLARKE'S NEW METHOD FOR REED ORGANS. By Wm. H. Clarke. Full of beautiful pieces for recreation.

"The selection of Exercises, Voluntaries, Interludes, &c., are the best we have ever seen for Reed Instruments."—Independent.

Price, in Boards, $2 50. Sent postpaid. O. DITSON & CO., Boston; C. H. DITSON & CO., New York. Sold at all Music Stores throughout the country.

ARE YOU BASHFUL? and would you overcome it? Read the Annals of Phrenology and Physiognomy for 1869—3 and 1870. In one volume of over 200 pages, with 200 illustrative engravings. Price, by first post, $1. Address

S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, New York.

CENTRAL PARK

SEAT AND GARDEN SWINGS,

LEWIS P. TIEBALS, 678 Broadway, New York.

BLACK-WALNUT PORTABLE RACKS for Parlor Papers, Magazines, &c. Holds Books and Fancy Articles. Sent by Express on receipt of price, $2 50. WM. WOODS, 3 Astor Place, N. Y.

WHOEVER

WILL act as Agent, either lady or gentleman, can find it to their interest. A WORK on Business, Dress Patterns, Watch, Cashier, Set of Weekly Novels, &c., &c., sent free from a great variety of other articles, as commission in our

GREAT SPECIAL TRADE SALE

Comprising over 250 different articles. Send for Catalogues. PARKER & CO.,
98 and 100 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

THE COMICAL ADVENTURES OF MR. TOODLES

will be sent free upon receipt of order addressed to BOX 2075, New York Post-Office.

Deafness, Catarrh, Scrofula.—A large number of cases for years from Deafness, Catarrh, and Scrofula, was cured by a simple remedy. For any person who will address the subscriber, the receipts free of charge to any one similarly afflicted. Address Mrs. M. C. HOWARD, Hoboken, N. J.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment are the safest and best remedies for whooping-cough. A few doses of the Pills, the Ointment to be well rubbed in externally through the chest and throat, relieves the most violent cases.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

AGENTS WANTED for the only steel engraving of the Head of Christ. Also, a splendid photograph with their signature. Size 11x14. Address GOODSPEED'S BOOK STORE, New York.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE,

First-class, and fully licensed. Agents Wanted. For terms, address CHICOPEE S. M. CO., Boston, Mass.

FUN, FUN.—Rubber Balloons.—Wonderful, lively, attractive, Amusing. Full directions and two sample balloons sent by mail, postpaid, for only 25 cents. postpaid. Address HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N.H.

$100 Sure pay. Salaries paid weekly. Agents wanted everywhere. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

FOURTH GUARANTEED GIFT CONCERT OF THE Lyra. Full particulars free. Address the GIRARD WIRE MILLS, Philadelphia, Pa.

AN Absolute Safeguard.

Invalids, broken down in health and spirits by Chronic Dyspepsia, or suffering from the terrible exhaustion which follows the attacks of acute disease, the testimony of thousands who have been raised as by a miracle from a similar state of prostration by

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS,

is a sure guarantee that by the same means you too may be strengthened and restored. But those who stand in peril of epidemics, to all who, by reason of exposure, privation, sad unrecognized climate or unhealthy pursuits, may at any moment be stricken down, this pagraph is most pertinently and emphatically addressed. This new and powerful agent, are proffered an absolute safeguard against the danger that menaces you. Turn not and ruminate in reproach with this harmless medicinal Stimulant and Alterative, and you will be freernsured against the malaises whose seeds float around you in the air unseen.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters

are not only a standard Tonic and Alterative throughout the United States, but long ere developed by the certificates of the most distinguished citizens of the Union, to the people of all other lands. In Canada, Australia, and the West Indies, they are gradually taking the place of all other stomachics, whether native or foreign, and as surely will they in progressive, and demonstration overthrown doubt, they will be universally superseded every other Invigorant and Restorative now employed in medicinal practice.

To the Working Class.—I am now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at their homes, the whole of the time, or for spare moments. Business new, light, and profitable. Persons of either sex, and the boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. Great inducements are offered. Those who will devote their whole time to the business; and, that every one may test the matter, I will send my own address and test the business for themselves; I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, directions, etc., sent free. Sample sent by mail for 10 cents. Address E. G. ALLEN, Portland, Maine.

THE WOODRUFF BAROMETER.

Best, cheapest, prettiest, and only perfectly reliable Barometer ever made. Also, over three hundred styles of Thermometers, made by CHAS. WOODRUFF, Peterboro, New Hampshire.

AGENTS wanted in every town.

A WATCH FREE.—GIVEN GRATIS to every Agent. We will not sell an article in a single family but honorable business paying $50 a day. No gift concerts. Sample free. Address, with stamp, Box 5643, New York City. Address R. MORROW SIDNEY & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

SHRUBS and PLANTS, very low. Special low rates by mail this month. Forest Stock Dug in Spring. Send for Catalogues. PRINCE & CO., Flushing, N. Y.

$245 A MONTH. TO AGENTS. 49 New and useful articles. Samples sent free. J. ROSS BROWNE & CO., Chicago, Ill.

IVINS' PATENT HAIR-CRIMPERS.—Every lady should have them. For sale at Variety Stores. Made only by IVINS, 1301 Market St., Philadelphia.

$10 A DAY to agents selling Sevens' Patent Self-Sealing Brooms. Harper Grocer says: "I predict it will soon be in every family." Address SEVENS & CO., Schenectady, N. Y.

$3000 Salary. Address { U. S. PIANO CO., N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

Harper's Magazine, One Year.....$4 00
Harper's Weekly, One Year.....4 00
Harper's Bazar, One Year.....4 00

Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and Harper's Bazar, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the Magazine 24 cents a year, for the Weekly or Bazar 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, semi-annually, or annually, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription commences, and it is desired when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give the name of the Post-Office.

The Volumes of the Magazine commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no Number is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of Weekly commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscription is intended to commence with the next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of Harper & Brothers is preferable to bank notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be recovered without loss to the owner.

In ordering the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar, the name, Post-Office, and State should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new address must be given.

Terms for Advertising in Harper's Periodicals.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $600; Half Page, $310; Quarter Page, $170—each insertion; 60 cents a line space, $1 00 per Line, inside Inserion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 25 per Line; Outside Pages, $1 50 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THE NAVY DISTINCTION BILL.

LORD VICE-ADMIRAL DUNDREARY. "There must be a Distinction between the Working Class—ah—and the—ah——."
SECRETARY OF THE NAVY. "Hold your Head up, Sonny."

Trade-Mark for Silver. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate. GORHAM MFG CO

GORHAM MFG. CO.,

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Sterling Silver Ware,

AND

Nickel Silver-Plated Ware,

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

DR DE JONGH'S
LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL

Universally recognized by the Faculty as

INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR

to every other kind,

and the unequaled remedy for

Consumption, General Debility,

and the Wasting Diseases of Children.

DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA in IMPERIAL HALF-PINTS only, sealed with a Blue capsule, while Cap, stamped with his Trade-Mark.

SOLD CONSIGNEES,

ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.

SOLE AUTHORIZED AGENTS IN AMERICA,

EDW'D DREEY & Co., 38, Vesey St., New York.

Sold by all Druggists, at $1.50 per Bottle.

☞ Beware of felonious imitations.

ABBATT & MOORE,

No. 507 BROADWAY,

HAVE A COMPLETE STOCK OF NEW STYLES OF CLOTHING

FOR MEN AND BOYS,

AT VERY MODERATE PRICES.

They have just received direct from PARIS a limited number of BOYS' AND CHILDREN'S SUITS, which they would be pleased to show to their customers.

FIRST-CLASS GOODS MADE TO ORDER, AS USUAL, AT POPULAR PRICES.

N. B.—Samples of goods and directions for self-measurement sent on application.

OLD PAPER

We guarantee to pay more than any other house in the city for

Old Books, Newspapers, Pamphlets, Magazines, Manuscripts and all kinds of Waste Paper.

MANAHAN & MILLAR,

Wholesale Paper Warehouse,

10 Spruce St., N. Y.

POLLAK & SON, Manufr's of Meerschaum goods. Stores: 485 Broadway, near Broome, & 17 John St., middle of block. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter Box 5646.

THE WILSON SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES,

Cheaper than all others.

Agents Wanted. Manufactured by

THE WILSON SEWING MACHINE CO., Cleveland, O.

THE GORHAM WARE may be obtained from ADAMS, CHANDLER, & CO., No. 20 JOHN STREET, New York.

TRAVELERS'

INSURANCE CO., of HARTFORD,

INSURES AGAINST

ACCIDENTS

Causing Death or Total Disability.

Cash Assets - - - $1,150,000.

The TRAVELERS' is the oldest Accident Insurance Company in America. It has issued 160,000 policies, and paid $900,000 to policy-holders for Death or Injury by Accident.

MR. CHAS. M. ROGERS, whose mysterious murder created such a sensation, was insured for $10,000. It was paid April 8th.

HON. JAMES HARPER, of HARPER & BROTHERS (whose portrait appeared in the last number of this paper), was insured for $10,000. The amount we paid last week.

More than TEN THOUSAND Claims of Policy-Holders, for Death or Injury by Accident, HAVE BEEN PAID, showing the value of Accident Insurance. A policy costs but little—try it

RODNEY DENNIS, Sec'y.
CHAS. E. WILSON, Ass't Sec'y.

J. G. BATTERSON, Pres't.
GEO. B. LESTER, Actuary.

NEW YORK OFFICE,

207 BROADWAY.

R. M. JOHNSON, General Ag't.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, Plans, and Details to Scale of Country, Suburban, and Village Houses, with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE Twelve Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

150 Designs; $1 50, postpaid. Geo. E. Woodward, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York. Send stamps for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

STEM-WINDING

Waltham Watches.

These watches are of the well-known 7-plate style, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy. The manufacture of watches of this fine quality is not even attempted in this country except at Waltham.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

$20 A DAY—TO MALE AND FEMALE AGENTS—To introduce the BUCKEYE $20 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only Licensed Shuttle Machine in the market sold for less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Full particulars free. Address

W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio.

Important Reduction

IN PRICES OF CHINA, GLASS WARE, SILVER-PLATED WARE, GAS FIXTURES, BRONZES, and FANCY GOODS. Our entire stock marked down and in plain figures.

DINNER SETS.

RICHLY DECORATED, $175, reduced to $125.
$200, reduced to $150.
$250, reduced to $200.
$400, reduced to $278.
$480 to $500, $600 to $426, $800 to $600, $1050 to $700.

GOBLETS, CHAMPAGNES, AND WINES, very cheap. CUT TUMBLERS, $3 per doz. Also, a choice assortment of

GAS FIXTURES,

In GLASS, BRONZE, and ORMULU. Please call and examine goods and prices. Also a full assortment of

Gorham Plated Ware,

at the manufacturers' prices.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT & CO.,

488, 490, and 492 BROADWAY, cor. Broome St., N. Y.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.

Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the finest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

Medical Superstitions Dissipated.—At last the profession is rid of the folly of prescribing nature in the effort to subdue disease. That delicious saline tonic and cathartic, TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT—Heaven's own medicine, as it has hobbled since the Creation from Nature's laboratory—is displacing all the nauseous and debilitating purgatives of the old school, and every where dyspepsia, liver complaint, rheumatism, and all ordinary complaints of the stomach, kidneys, and bowels are rigidly to its benign operation.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

DR. JNO. V. BUXTON'S

TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO. It perfectly counteracts the injurious effects of tobacco upon the blood, invigorates the nervous system, gives great purity to the breath, restores the keen edge of appetite, and imparts vigor to the digestive organs, thereby digest the heartiest food, insures sleep refreshing, and establishes perfect health. Smokers and chewers will find it a luxury indeed. Price Fifty cents per box, post free. An interesting treatise on the imperious effects of tobacco, with many illustrations, testimonials, etc., free on application. Address

DR. T. E. ANSLEY, Jersey City, N. J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.

[Trademark & Copyrighted.]

BUSNY & CO., 179 Water St., N. Y.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.

First Quality only. At VERY LOW PRICES.

PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

£150,000,000

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1600. Fee to search for any name, $3. Guy & Co., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

PURE WATER,

HOW TO USE IT.

The DIAPHRAGM FILTER, manufactured by ALEXANDER MCKENZIE & CO., Hydraulic Engineers, 20 West Fourth Street, New York, is the kind of Porous Filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its action.

JAMES B. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

P.S.—Having a knowledge of the theory and practice of Hydraulics for thirty years, we are able to apply water successfully, with economy, to all the modern improvements. Jobbing in city and country punctually attended to. ALEX. MCKENZIE & CO.,

Geo. (J. Cim Kendall.) Plumbers and Gasfitters.

HARVEY FISK. A. S. HATCH.

Office of FISK & HATCH,

Bankers & Dealers in Gov't Securities,

No. 5 Nassau Street, New York.

Opposite U. S. Sub Treasury.

We receive the accounts of Banks, Bankers, Corporations, and others, subject to check at sight, and allow interest on balances. We make collections on all points in the United States and Canada, and issue Certificates of Deposit available in all parts of the Union.

We buy and sell, at current rates, all classes of Government Securities, and the Bonds of the Central Pacific Railroad Company; also Gold and Silver coin and Gold Coupons.

We buy and sell at the Stock Exchange miscellaneous Stocks and Bonds, on commission, for cash.

We offer also the United States Six-per-cent. Thirty Year Currency Bonds issued in aid of the Pacific Railroad, which are widely esteemed by money-eyed corporations, as the longest Six-per-cent. Government Bond in the market.

Communications and inquiries by mail or Telegraph will receive attention.

FISK & HATCH.

PRINCE & CO'S ORGANS AND MELODEONS.

43,000, now in use.

BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Price only $15. Will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a manner unsurpassed by any machine. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will do a better range, more beautiful or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, PA., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

ELGIN WATCHES.

CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing our watches, or watches represented to be of our make, of parties who advertise to send them "C.O.D." We have no connection with such houses, and do not furnish our goods to any house for that purpose. The excellence and good repute of the real ELGIN WATCHES have caused several Foreign and American WATCH COMPANIES to make INFERIOR IMITATIONS with the same or similar trademarks as ours. Agents and parties who advertise to send our goods "C.O.D.," no matter whom. To get the real ELGIN WATCHES you can only obtain them in your vicinity or elsewhere whom you know to be honorable.

THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,
ELGIN, ILLINOIS.
Business Office, Nos. 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

O C

The Highest Cash Prices

PAID FOR

OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;

OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;

OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are writing full;

and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Public Officials, Magazine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinderies, Public and Private Libraries, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Offices, &c.

JOHN C. STOCKWELL,

75 Ann street, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 644.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

REJECTED.

I MET a maiden years agone—
A maiden most divinely fair,
With sunny eyes and face that shone,
Love-lighted, to dispel my care.

We walk'd, we talk'd, each smil'd on each,
Soft voices softer words would say,
And fancies that transcended speech
Fast whil'd the bright-wing'd hours away.

To rest beneath the trees was sweet,
What time the summer sun was low,
And there, reclining at her feet,
To watch her blushes come and go.

At length I ask'd her, would she deign
Accept the heart that clung to hers,
And she said, smiling at my pain,
"The fancy of a boy oft errs."

And so she stole my heart away,
She stole it and she keeps it yet;
Though youth and passion must decay,
Time can not force us to forget.

I blame her not—I love her still;
And though I mourn our parted lives,
And pity her less constant will,
'Tis something that my love survives.

GEN. SHERMAN'S RESIDENCE, WASHINGTON.

THIS residence was purchased from General GRANT by Mr. A. T. STEWART and others, who presented it to General SHERMAN, with a purse of $35,000. It was originally presented to General GRANT, who, in view of his removal to the White House, proposed to sell it. An offer was made for it, but this offer was not finally accepted, and thus those who desired to purchase it for General SHERMAN found an opportunity to carry out their design. The subscribers paid General GRANT $65,000 for the house. It was a delicate tribute to General SHERMAN'S patriotic devotion to his country, and it was well deserved. In the brief and characteristic remarks made by General SHERMAN in accepting the gift, he said that he would be glad to receive at any time as his guests those who had thus contributed to his own happiness. These tributes, coming from the most wealthy and patriotic of our citizens, have sprung from motives as pure and as noble as the qualities which called them forth.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S RESIDENCE, WASHINGTON, D. C.—(PHOT. BY BELL BROS., WASHINGTON.)

HON. JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY.

JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, the newly-appointed Minister to England, was born in Dorchester, Massachusetts, April 15, 1814. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1831, after which he passed a number of years in Europe, partly in travel and partly as a student at the Universities of Göttingen and Berlin. He returned to the United States and devoted himself to the legal profession. He soon abandoned this profession, and during the next twenty years his attention was chiefly directed toward literary pursuits. A novel entitled "Morton's Hope" was published by him in 1839, and a second, "Merry Mount," appeared ten years later. During this interval Mr. MOTLEY revisited Europe for a few months as Secretary of Legation to the Russian Embassy, and contributed a number of historical papers to leading American periodicals. In 1851 he once more returned to Europe in search of material for a work which he had long contemplated, and which, on its appearance in 1856, at once placed the author in the first rank of modern historians —"The Rise of the Dutch Republic." He received in 1860 the degrees of D.C.L. from Oxford, and LL.D. from Harvard, and in the same year a part of his sequel to "The Dutch Republic," "The History of the United Netherlands," etc., was issued, the concluding volumes following in 1865. He was appointed Minister to Austria in November, 1861, which position he occupied until 1867, when, on the occasion of the memorable M'CRACKEN scandal, he tendered his resignation in the famous reply to Mr. SEWARD'S remarkable diplomatic circular. Since his return to this country he has taken no active part in public affairs beyond making an elaborate and effective address advocating General GRANT'S election.

HON. JOHN JAY.

JOHN JAY, just appointed Minister to Austria, is of Huguenot descent, his ancestors having come to this country after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. His family has occupied a prominent and honorable position from the beginning of our history. His grandfather, JOHN JAY, was President of the First Congress, and was Minister from this country to England, and also to Spain. He was one of the Commissioners who negotiated the treaty of peace.

JOHN JAY'S father was Judge WILLIAM JAY, who was a prominent leader in the constitutional anti-slavery movement. JOHN, the subject of our sketch, was born in 1817, and was graduated at Columbia College in 1836. He studied law with DANIEL LORD—Mr. EVARTS, the late Attorney-General, being one of his fellow-students. He was engaged upon many very important cases, in one of which the leading opposing counsel was DANIEL WEBSTER. He twice presided over the New York State Convention of the Free-Soil party. Mr. JAY has twice visited Europe, the first time in 1848, on which occasion he passed some months in England, where he was cordially received by a large and influential circle; and again in 1865

HON. JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY, MINISTER TO ENGLAND.

HON. JOHN JAY, MINISTER TO AUSTRIA.—(PHOT. BY SARONY & CO., NEW YORK.)

and 1866, when he presided at a Thanksgiving dinner at the Grand Hotel, Paris—the first reunion of Americans subsequent to the war. During this tour Mr. JAY was elected President of the Union League Club, an office to which he has three distinct times been re-elected. Apart from his professional and public career Mr. JAY has nobly maintained the traditional reputation of his distinguished family by the publication of numerous literary efforts, which have been devoted to the discussion of questions of public interest.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1869.

MR. SUMNER'S SPEECH.

MR. SUMNER'S speech upon the English treaty is a very forcible statement of a whole subject, and the sternest arraignment of England. It is the more effective that it is evidently the speech of a true friend of that country and of peace, made in the interest and for the benefit of both. The speech is a comprehensive and not diffuse survey of the position and conduct of England throughout the war, and can hardly fail to excite the profound attention of the most thoughtful Englishmen.

Belligerency, says Mr. SUMNER, according to CANNING'S dictum, is a fact, not a privilege. The recognition of rebel belligerency upon the sea, where the insurgents had no ship and no port, and upon the land, where they had only organized a rebellious military force, was virtually to create the Confederacy as a belligerent, and to place it upon precisely the footing of a friendly Power. It opened all the warlike resources of England to the rebels, equally with the United States, at a time when, by international law, it was incumbent upon England to prevent her soil from being used as an arsenal to equip assaults upon foreign governments. To attempt to justify this conduct because of the use of the word blockade in the Queen's proclamation, and to a technical evasion which is not sustained by fact, and if it were is wholly inadmissible. To declare neutrality was, under the circumstances, to proclaim a hostility hardly less to the United States Government and the rebellion.

Then came the building of the pirate ships, and Lord RUSSELL himself admits that the escape of the Alabama was a "scandal and reproach." Her departure was the sailing of a hostile expedition from England against this country. It was a consuercial transaction; it was an act of war. This act was continuous, and renewed by the entertainment of the pirate in English ports. Mr. SUMNER'S description of the British origin and support of these ships, and the applause with which the House of Common received the anti-American taunts of Mr. LAIRD, the builder of the Alabama, is very striking and powerful. This conduct was aggravated by the hot haste with which England placed herself at the command and disposal of the rebels, and by the flagrant departure which it involved from the anti-slavery policy of England officially declared. In May of 1862 Lord JOHN RUSSELL declared himself to "give aid and comfort to the foulest of crimes."

But when, despite the efforts of England, the rebellion is quashed, without one friendly word, without a syllable of regret, England quietly proposes to submit the question of liability to a board on which chance plays a part. This, and this only. In the case of the Leopard and Chesapeake, when the United States were a small Power, CANNING offered to make reparation for the alleged injury to the sovereignty of the United States. He disavowed the act; he offered to restore the state quo as far as practicable, and to make pecuniary compensation. In the case of the Caroline Lord ASHBURTON expressed the regrets of his Government, making atonement to the national sovereignty which had been outraged. In the present case there is an unprecedented injury to the national sovereignty—a vast private, and an almost incalculable public loss; and England offers to leave the private claims to a chance tribunal. Now the private loss is a small part of the whole. The national loss includes the reduction of our tonnage, the whole paralysis of our mercantile marine in all its ramifications and relations, and the prolongation of the war. For this chief and national and moral injury England not only offers no method of reparation, but the treaty does not even allude to it. Mr. SUMNER concludes by the observation that the question should not be left open, for it may involve war with a nation with whom he would have "more than peace; more even than cordial."

It will be seen that the Senator does not propose the articles or even the conditions of a treaty. He speaks states the light in which the question should be viewed, and the principles that should control its settlement. The injury done by England to the United States is both material and moral; it involves both individual and national loss. "No nation ever before received such injury from a foreign Power," says Mr. SUMNER; and he implies, although he does not say, that the reparation must be as exceptional. There must be an acknowledgment by England of her regret at the unfriendly error she committed, and a proffer of readiness to pay both individual and national damages; the former to be determined by fair appraisal, the latter by a mutual agreement of the extent of responsibility. This last understanding, which is very vague, is still, in Mr. SUMNER'S view, the important one. But how to determine whether England shall, in satisfaction of the national loss, assume the expenses of one or two years of the war, is a very perplexing question.

We must think, as we have always believed, that this kind of moral injury between nations is hardly susceptible of a pecuniary settlement. But intelligent Englishmen must now surely see that, without a generous expression of regret at the enormous and unfriendly act which England directed against this country when the war began, no treaty for damages and no pleasant international feeling is possible. If, as we have thought, a real surrender was made by England in the dry, formal terms of the treaty, it is now evident by the vote of all parties in the Senate, and by the virtually unanimous expression of national feeling, that the implied or inferential acknowledgment is not sufficient. There must be a frank, full, generous confession, such as one truly honorable man would make to another. Without this, in some form, there can be no treaty; and the precedent which England has established will remain a stain and a blot on her. That fear, indeed, would merely move the proud scorn of an Englishman if the precedent were just. But it was a precedent confidently, unjustly, and in defiance of public law, and therefore to be openly and generously renounced.

But should this be done by England the moral account seems to us to be as fairly closed as when one honorable man apologizes to another. The aggrieved person does not insist further upon pecuniary compensation for the injured honor. He asks only in addition that computable losses may be satisfied. When, therefore, England shall have made the expression of regret which Mr. SUMNER demands, there will remain only the question of damages for actual and proved losses. If, however, the London Times argues that the whole expenses of England as Mr. SUMNER that of the United States, there will be no present settlement.

OUR FRIENDS THE ENEMY.

TWENTY-ONE States have ratified the Equal Suffrage amendment—the Democratic party every where opposing. Now in party warfare, as in all other, there is a reasonable limit to the respect of the foe, as there is one which moves his contempt. Four or five years ago equal suffrage was defeated in Connecticut by a majority of seven thousand. Last spring the Democrats elected their Governor by nearly two thousand majority, and three Members of Congress. In the Presidential campaign carried the State for GRANT. This spring, when, according to the Democrats, equal suffrage was the issue, the Republicans carried the Governor and gain two Members of Congress, beating the Democracy in their strongest holds; and because the majority for Governor is smaller than that for President, the Democrats which we speak deride the meagre and dismal majority! The Democratic party are more signally defeated on the issue which they have been for many a year, and instead of frankly acknowledging the fact, and seeing that it is futile to fight upon an issue settled and settled again, one of the party organs argues that it isn't much of a shower, and another gravely declares that it is the natural consequence of not sticking to WADE HAMPTON'S platform of last July!

The one great truth of our recent political history is, that the Republican and Democratic parties were agreed upon the issue of slavery. The Republicans won at the polls and upon the field of battle, and again and again and again at the polls. They have emancipated the slaves. They have conferred civil rights. They have given them political rights. At each step they have appealed to the country, and have been sustained by the country and by every branch of the government for four more years. Their new administration begins by the plain declaration that equal rights shall be every where protected by and the law every where enforced, and by the urgent recommendation that the amendment to the Constitution be adopted, which shall secure the political equality of the whole nation; and still the Democratic party piteously asks its absurd question, as a conclusive political argument, "Do you wish your daughter to marry a nigger?"

It perceives that there is a prejudice in the country against color, but it is unable to see that the country has not the slightest intention of indulging that prejudice. Instead, therefore, of accepting the facts, however much it may deplore them—instead of joining issue as to the better method of securing an equality which is inevitable, the Democratic party ridicules the negro, and argues against him, and denounces him, and belies him, and all as if there were really a hope of reducing him again to some kind of vassalage. The whole Democratic force is expended in this business, and in meeting at the President. The party papers have nothing to say but that every thing is wrong, nothing to propose but that every thing be undone.

As usual, the Democratic party hopes for revivigoration not from fair debate of great policies, but from the readmission to political privilege of those who repudiate the American principle of the equality of all citizens. But that will not be enough. The prejudice against color which is now the life of the system of which the Democratic party was the defense was incalculably useful; but with the fall of the system the appeal to the prejudice is pumpkined. There is no insight, no heroism in the Democratic leadership. The party is but a disorderly camp of the disaffected and disappointed. It must find some surer ground than hostility to equal rights, or relinquish the hope of success, unless the conduct of the Republican party, where it has a majority, as in the Legislature of New York, shall persuade the country that there is really no choice between the parties. But even in such instances as the Legislature of which we speak, it is the duty of all good citizens to remark that it is the combination of a few Republicans only with the Democrats that does the mischief.

THE GOVERNOR'S VETO.

THE extraordinary Broadway Railroad bill, of which we spoke last week, and which gives the control of the chief streets in the city of New York to a few persons named or their assigns, has been vetoed by the Governor, in the spirit of a veto from the Governor. The bill for a railroad in One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street having been presented to the Governor he returned it to the Senate with a decisive message. The motion to lay the veto upon the table was carried by a vote of 16 to 11. The next day the Broadway bill came up for a third reading, and it was tabled by its friends, who did not dare to bring it to a decision. And let it be observed by those who think that both parties are equally involved in such schemes, that the 13 nays were all Republicans, and the 18 ayes were all Democrats except four, Messrs. HUMPHREY, LINCOLN, PETTER, and WILLIAMS. We hope that Governor HOFFMAN will have an opportunity to veto this bill also. We should be glad to see a Democratic Governor vetoing the Democratic ring of the city of New York.

The principle of the veto is very distinctly stated by the Governor, and it is perfectly sound and of universal application. "In my judgment," he says, speaking of the Sixth and Eighth Avenue railroads, "the Legislature had no more right in reason to give away these privileges and deprive the tax-payers of the city of their just rights in respect to them, than they had to impose a direct tax for the same pecuniary extent for the benefit of the persons named in the bill." Nothing could be truer. Here is a franchise for which two millions of dollars have been offered, and refused, by others. Indeed, the very offer only revealed to the men bought with the stock—if any such there were—the real value of their bribe. Here is a bill which authorizes a company to collect seven cents fare, and a responsible offer is made to do the same work for three cents fare, and it is laughed at. The game is very much like that usually played at cards. Amendment after amendment, designed to save their money to the people, was voted down by the Democratic members of the enterprise, assisted by a few Republican allies; and it was the hope that the bill might be pushed through before the public understood its character.

If its friends had not been again and succeed in passing it, the Governor must necessarily veto it—an act which would bring him in direct conflict with his party friends, and seriously imperil his political prospects. It has been, indeed, suggested that the whole affair is a party plot to enable the Governor to pose as an austere advocate of public justice and economy. But that is "putting rather too fine a point upon it;" although we certainly think that the author of the proclamation in regard to the alleged electoral frauds last November ought very carefully to improve every opportunity of seeming to favor common honesty in politics.

THE FOREIGN APPOINTMENTS.

THE nominations to the chief foreign missions have been received with general favor, with one or two exceptions. There are but two nations with which we are likely to have any serious difficulties or questions of which the treatment will require ability and experience—these are England and Spain. Mr. MOTLEY, who goes to England, takes with him the entire confidence of the country, which we presume, has grounds for supposing that he would be appointed to that post.

Mr. HENRY S. SANFORD is nominated to Spain, and will probably be confirmed. It is understood that Mr. SANFORD has the support of Mr. SUMNER. If that be so, it must be only because of Mr. SUMNER'S conviction that Mr. SANFORD has the peculiar sagacity and knowledge which are sure to be demanded of our Minister in Spain. We are not aware of any opportunity that he has enjoyed of testing his capacity for delicate diplomatic negotiation; but when such a point the Senate will probably trust the judgment of so wise and experienced a man as Senator SUMNER. If he is convinced from his personal acquaintance with Mr. SANFORD, and his official knowledge of Mr. SANFORD'S diplomatic ability, that he is equal to the Spanish Mission under the present circumstances, the Senate will undoubtedly listen with great deference. But we hope sincerely that the Senators will reflect that it is in no sense a personal affair, and that the position at this time demands the highest capacity.

Mr. JOHN JAY goes to Austria, the first important official recognition, we believe, of his long and spotless and faithful advocacy of the principles which at last control the Government. This is one of the appointments which is instinctively and universally approved. Ex-Governor CURTIN of Pennsylvania is appointed to Russia. Governor CURTIN'S name is familiar to the country as one of the War-Governors, but there is not a very clear knowledge of his powers. He was a candidate for the Vice-Presidency, but the great States generally have a candidate, and he was urged for a place in the Cabinet. His appointment to Russia is generally felt, we should say, to be a proper one, for the War-Governors are very gratefully remembered.

Mr. BANCROFT will undoubtedly remain for the present in Prussia, and Mr. MARSH in Italy. They are both most accomplished and efficient Ministers, and such as the country ought to regard with the utmost satisfaction. Indeed, it is pleasant to reflect that, whatever objection may be urged in some instances, the foreign representatives of the United States, as a body, are most heartily in sympathy with the principles of the Government and the people of the people. They are no longer the lackeys of slavery and the apologists of rebellion. They are no longer afraid to assert that they believe in the great principles of the Declaration of Independence with which we parted from Europe; and they need no longer blush, if they are honorable men, under scorching taunts at a slaveholding republic of equal rights. A man has only to recall our foreign representatives of a very few years ago to perceive that nothing can cause truly revolt in Europe the strong and beneficial change which the war has wrought in this country than the character and views of the chief men who now officially represent the United States in Europe.

ANOTHER GLIMPSE AT THE LEGISLATURE.

IT is with indignation as well as regret that the friends of public decency and order, who have earnestly supported the principles and worked for the success of the dominant party in the councils of in this State, observe the conduct of some who still claim to belong to that party, yet who connive at such enormities as the Railroad bill in the State Legislature, which we already elsewhere. No party can afford to have such friends. No party can survive the reputation which it must infallibly, although unjustly, bear from the corruption of a Legislature in which it controls the majority. As we write the Legislature has not adjourned. The Republicans have, we believe, a majority of seventy-one in the Assembly, and of one vote in the Senate. If this Legislature shall be stigmatized as the worst that ever assembled in Albany, which probably—because immediate as a party—must bear the blame? There are most noble and true and tried Republicans in both Houses—men upon whom suspicion does not rest—but unless it is not their action, it is that of those who selfishly combine with the enemy, which casts the odium upon the Legislature.

If the debates of the Legislature were published the people of New York would be amazed. Thus the Committee on Elections, after meeting of seventy days, finally reported in favor of Mr. HAWKINS, who contested the seat of Mr. DECKER from Richmond County. It was the first case taken up by the Committee, and was plain throughout. The registry in one of the districts was clearly illegal, and the four Republican members of the Committee proposed to throw it out, and the chairman—a Republican, Mr. HEGEMAN—so reported, and gave the seat to Mr. HAWKINS. A Democratic minority report was made that Mr. DECKER should keep his seat. Now we learn that the chairman of the Committee, Mr. HEGEMAN, a Republican from Dutchess, said, or very plainly implied, in his speech, supposed to be in favor of his own report, that Mr. DECKER was an extremely agreeable person, and that it seemed, after all, rather hard to unseat him at the end of the session, especially as he was not charged with personal complicity in the fraud!

That is to say, the Republicans in Richmond County having at last, and for the first time, succeeded in electing a Republican member of Assembly, a Republican from Dutchess insinuates that it is very hard to give him his seat, which is occupied by a person no more entitled to it than the Pope of Rome, because he is what is called a good sort of fellow! We hope that there is some mistake in this report, but it comes to us from the best authority. And it is certain that, when it was moved to substitute the minority for the majority report, Messrs. Bemus, Calkins, Crane, W. H. Stuart, D. Stewart, and Tremain, all Republicans, are mentioned in the Tribune as voting in favor of the motion; while Messrs. Allaban, Barse, Berry, Randall, and Weed, also Republicans, according to the same authority, dodged. The motion to substitute was lost. But when a motion was made to postpone for a week the consideration of the report it was carried by the aid of nine Republican votes.

The reasons of such votes are not to be sought in doubts of the testimony, but in log-rolling, in the tickle-me-and-I'll-tickle-you policy, in the fear of members that if they vote to support the report they will alienate votes necessary for their own success. We are yet to see whether a Republican Assembly will deprive a member of the seat to which his claim has been established, and in favor of whom the Committee has reported. If it does so, we remind our friends elsewhere that it is not because of the action of the party, but of a few persons in it. The great body of the Republicans voted against postponement and against the substitution of the minority report. They will vote, if the opportunity is offered, to give Mr. Hawkins his seat; but if he loses it, either by a few votes or by adjournment, it will still be a Republican Legislature that deprives a Republican of the seat to which his legal claim has been established to the satisfaction of the Committee of Investigation.

SENATOR SPRAGUE AS CRITIC.

The most extraordinary political episode of the moment is the victory of Senator Sprague of Rhode Island. After several years of silence he has suddenly, and it may be said loudly, begun to speak to and to shake the whole country. He began by lamenting the general decay of virtue in the country, and by especially denouncing the Senate as composed of lawyers, and therefore a very dangerous and corrupt body. This was followed by the statement of a financial theory which proposes that the Government shall furnish capital to the needy; and in remarking upon the power of capital Senator Sprague, as an illustration, held up to national scorn and derision what he was pleased to call "a great failure" in Rhode Island, which, at the beginning of the war, had made to him, as the representative of another great family, the most odious business proposition. He further illustrated his influence by decrying the military prowess of the rich young men who were in the first regiment sent from Rhode Island to the war, and especially in denouncing the inhuman and cowardice of General Burnside, its commander.

To this extraordinary oration, which occupied some hours in the delivery, and in which he depicted with the darkest shadows the enormities of the "great family," Mr. Sprague's colleague, Senator Anthony, replied in a speech which certainly showed that the "great family" was not destitute of patriotism, and that the criticisms of Mr. Sprague upon the conduct of the first Rhode Island regiment were singularly inharmonious with historical facts. Senator Sprague says that General Burnside deserted his regiment at the first battle of Bull Run and "sought safety in safe places," a statement which is fully answered by the smile it kindles. To call Burnside a coward is like calling Grant a knave.

The Senator continues:

"With blanched face I was begged by the commander, who was stupefied by the million dollars to go to the rear and surrender the troops, as they could not have them cut up. Twice, Sir, was I thus solicited. Did I prove a traitor or run from the battle-field and cowardly proposition? Sir, we were disgraced."

Now at this time Mr. Sprague was Governor of Rhode Island. In the next month the Legislature of the State commended in the warmest terms the bravery and skill of Burnside, and suggested that he be made General and placed in command of all the Rhode Island troops. Governor Sprague, exactly a month to the day on which he now says that Burnside made to him miserable and cowardly and disgraceful propositions, wrote to Burnside as follows:

"The people of Rhode Island will long remember your services to them and to our common country. No man, in the whole history of the State has, in so short a time, more firmly entwined himself around the hearts of our people than yourself. I take this opportunity to tender you my sincere thanks for the martial and patriotic spirit which has actuated you in all our intercourse since the commencement of the war."

In his message at the opening of the next session of the Legislature, in 1862, Governor Sprague speaks of the victory of Roanoke as due to "the skill of Reeves and" the energy of Burnside," and alludes to his "personal intercourse with that brave and gallant man." It is plain enough that the friends of General Burnside may safely leave Senator Sprague to the demolishing blows of Governor Sprague.

Of course, for the public attack upon private and respected merchants there can be no excuse. To the Senator's detailed statement that they made base business propositions—a statement made in the Senate of the United States upon his personal authority, and known throughout the country—the members of the House oppose a complete denial; and if it is to be viewed as a question of personal veracity, Senator Sprague can hardly expect that his assertion will prevail against that of the gentlemen whom he accuses. In his denunciation of capital Senator Sprague should remember what nobody else forgets, that his own political career is believed to have illustrated both its power and its unscrupulousness. It is certainly the received tradition—which may indeed be untrue—that the Senator buys voters like sheep, and has bought all his way into every position that he has held. A man who makes such mad onslaughts upon the character of other men invites criticism of his own. Does Senator Sprague mean seriously to challenge such a contest?

THE CARRYING TRADE.

"Editor Harper's Weekly: "New York.

"Dear Sir,—I recently observed an editorial on Exports and Imports, in which you state that the latter exceed the former in value. That a similar state of affairs may be profitable for Great Britain you are ready to grant, but add that our experience is the reverse of the experience of that country.

"Wherein? Principally, you state, because we are not carrying, and lose the profit arising on that score as most of the bankers' profits incident to the traffic between different countries.

"Will you allow me to doubt the soundness of your conclusion? And as you may have little confidence in the argument of a commercial writer, I will quote from the article on Exchange, last edition of the 'Encyclopedia Britanica,' vol. ix., p. 430:

"'It is of little importance, so far as the interests of commerce are concerned, whether a nation carries its own imports and exports or employs others. A carrying nation appears to derive a considerable profit from its commercial transactions. But this excess of profit is seldom sufficient to compensation for the capital it employs and the risk it incurs in transporting commodities.'

"Again:

"'In the United States the value of the imports, deduced from the custom-house returns, always exceeds the value of the exports. And this has never been accustomed to consider the exports over imports as the only true criterion of the advantageous commerce, the practical politicians of America early discovered (Pitkin on the Commerce of the United States) to have referred to the trade of the United States has been nearly in proportion as their imports have exceeded their exports.'

"I presume that you are not prepared to grant that previous to the late war this discovery of the practical politicians of this country embodies a true statement of the relative of our foreign commerce, although it is in contradiction to that bugbear and myth—the balance of trade against us—which our sons so often in the newspapers. If you are not, I would say, as it is false now? We are shipping books abroad in large quantities, it is true, but do we not publish for them? We get what we prefer to the boude, else the exchange would not go on. We are simply borrowing money at a certain rate per cent., and the vital question is, Can we afford to pay the rate (with the present discount on our securities in London over seven per cent.)? It is very well to say, keep the boude at home, and pay the interest to our own people; but how is that to be done if we have no wish to have the will bring is worth more to us than the bonds themselves? And if it was not worth more, of course the exchange would cease. The wealth of a nation is the wealth of its individuals; are they not, as a whole, capable of taking care of it? It may be answered that we squander our wealth in the purchase of silks and laces, too much wine and other commodities adding comparatively nothing to our wealth. But they hold to our country, and cannot be living for taste or more luxury. Take away this desire, and you remove the supporting of earthen, the very cause which drives this country onward in its creation of wealth and power with such tremendous momentum.

"If it were possible to remove the desire of taste and luxury, as well as every other of utility and used, within our own limits, would it be wise? Keep our goods, produce, and money at home, and where our cotton, tobacco, and cereals, and import only gold. China has done precisely this for two thousand years, and is just learning better.

"Yours, etc., C. P. M."

The criticism of C. P. M. upon what we expressed with respect to the danger of a constant excess of our imports over our exports, and of being mislaid, now appears, and we readily publish it, as it presents views which many entertain.

The theory which our correspondent adopts, that there is no danger in this excess, and that it is of no consequence whether we are the carriers or employ others, is a singularly unsound source. They are the doctrines of Great Britain, which strains every nerve to be the carriers of others, and to produce at every foreign port the very excess of imports which our practice differ very widely, and the latter will be more generally followed.

The loss of our carrying trade, which was one of the consequences of her unfriendly policy during the war, is seriously felt in every commercial port. The rejection of the treaty lately negotiated in England for the settlement of the Alabama claims is due to the profound conviction widely entertained that the damage extended far beyond the value of vessels and cargoes destroyed on the ocean, and rose to the magnitude of a nearly irreparable injury. Why did England seek to destroy this trade and to absorb it for herself? Her profits are largely augmented by being the chief carrier. The policy contributes to her strength upon the ocean and to her wealth at home. The tax she now imposes upon our agricultural products, in the shape of advanced freights, is felt in all our markets, and indeed in our whole industry. Do those who shape the policy of England act upon the theory that "It is of little importance, so far as the interests of commerce are concerned, whether a nation carries its own imports and exports or employs others?" We submit that they do not, and that her aim has been for ages to be mistress upon the sea.

But reducing it to the mere economical question, is not the inference just that the capital and industry employed in the carrying trade meet with a fair reward, and that it is material to every enterprising nation to engage in it? If the profit upon this trade is paid to our own ships are we not so much the better off than if it were paid to foreign people? The policy which would induce us to forego this profit on the ground that it "is only a fair remuneration for the capital" "and the risk" would apply with equal force to other industries, and turn them all over to Great Britain.

So far as concerns the danger resulting from an adverse balance of trade the country has had some bitter experience which can not easily be forgotten. But the panic of 1837, and of 1857, would not have occurred but for the export of gold and silver abroad to pay the accumulated balance of debt due to foreigners. The substratum of our paper currency having been too largely expelled from the country the structure could not stand. But yet there were evidences of such apparent prosperity during the particular years of the excess of imports over exports that many were misled, and perhaps never knew what it was that produced their misfortune. As our correspondent concedes that we are now selling bonds actively in Europe. We are now incurring a debt abroad the proportions of which are known to be immense.

What are the concomitants of this imprudence? From this port our exports for the month of March, exclusive of nearly two millions and a half of specie sent abroad, amount to only about twelve and a half millions of dollars at currency value; while our imports for the same month, at a gold value, amount to nearly thirty-five millions. At Boston the excess was in the same direction, very nearly five millions to one. We are very probably exporting from Southern ports more than we import; but when we arrive at the total of exports and imports for the year a large balance will be found against us notwithstanding the great price paid for our cotton, and that a large demand will exist for our agricultural productions.

The ability of the country to sell its bonds freely in Europe is due to the abundance of money in the markets of Europe—which abundance is caused in part by the sole use of paper money throughout the United States in our ordinary transactions, and the want of activity in business at this particular juncture abroad. Under other circumstances it would be difficult, if not impossible, to sell so heavily into debt; and the question should be maturely weighed whether we derive any solid and permanent advantage from these large imports, and in what this policy is to terminate.

These imports are not of a character to aid the country in returning to specie payments. On the contrary they hinder and obstruct this object. The time will come when we shall feel severely the obligation to pay in gold fifty millions or five hundred millions to the foreign holders of our public debt. Much of it is for the unusual and serious extravagance indulged in since the war—a weakness which waits for disaster to check it.

As long as the credit of our bonds is maintained—and we trust this will ever be—no such panic as that of 1857, or the weaker one of 1857, can occur; but the entire prosperity of the country is not based upon gold, and can not be discredited or deprived of its debt-paying quality except by its own citizens—so far, at least, as concerns ordinary debts incurred among ourselves since the Legal-tender act; but serious injury to individuals and to the country must arise from the fatal facility with which debts are incurred in gratifying "the taste and luxury" which, in the view of our correspondent, constitute the very cause of the tremendous momentum with which we drive onward in the creation of wealth and power.

NOTES.

We are glad to hear that Mr. Du Chaillu has been induced to deliver lectures to the young folks of New York in Steinway Hall. His lectures are appointed for April 23, 27, and 29, at four o'clock P. M. His remarkable success in Boston, Brooklyn, and other cities, in this course of lectures, and his brilliant reputation as an author, ought to secure him multitudes of youthful hearers.

The Western Bookseller is a monthly publication of the general form and appearance of the Publisher's Circular, which gives current literary intelligence, with notes and notices of new books. It aims "to give book-buyers honest aid in the selection of purchases," and will, we hope, be found as faithful in that respect as it is useful and attractive. It is issued by the Western News Company in Chicago.

THE FUTURE.

A figure wanders through my dreams
And wears a veil upon its face,
Still bending to my breast it seems,
Yet ever turns from my embrace.
And sometimes, passing from my sight,
It lifts the veil as it departs,
And eyes flash out with such a light
As never dawned on waking hearts.

There is no need of sound or speech
Or tolling through the troubled years;
The rapture of that smile can teach
More than a century of tears.
And this I know, if it could move
Out of my dreams into my days,
One service of unbroken love
Should fill and crown my life with praise.

Love with no doubts and no demands,
But generous as a southern June—
Vast brotherhood of hearts and hands,
Choir of a world in perfect tune—
No shallow sunset-flushes to gild
Far summits which are not climb,
But ceaseless charms of hope fulfilled,
Making a miracle of time.

How sure, how calm, the picture seems!
How near it comes, behold, possessed!
It is not only in my dreams
I feel that touch upon my breast.
It throbs me through the barren day,
It holds me in the heart of strife,
No phantom-grasp that fades away,
It seems—it is—the touch of Life!

We look into the heart of flowers
And wonder whence their bloom can rise;
The secret hope of human hours
Is hidden deeper from our eyes.
In helpless trusts of wind and rain
The work goes on without a sound;
And while you weep your worst it is vain,"
The flower is growing underground.

We know the lesson; but a cry,
Bitter and vain, is in our ears;
One life of fruitless misery
Shakes all our wisdom into tears.
Thronged by the clamorous griefs that say,
"Behold what is, forget what seems,"
I can but answer, "Welladay;
There is that figure in my dreams!"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

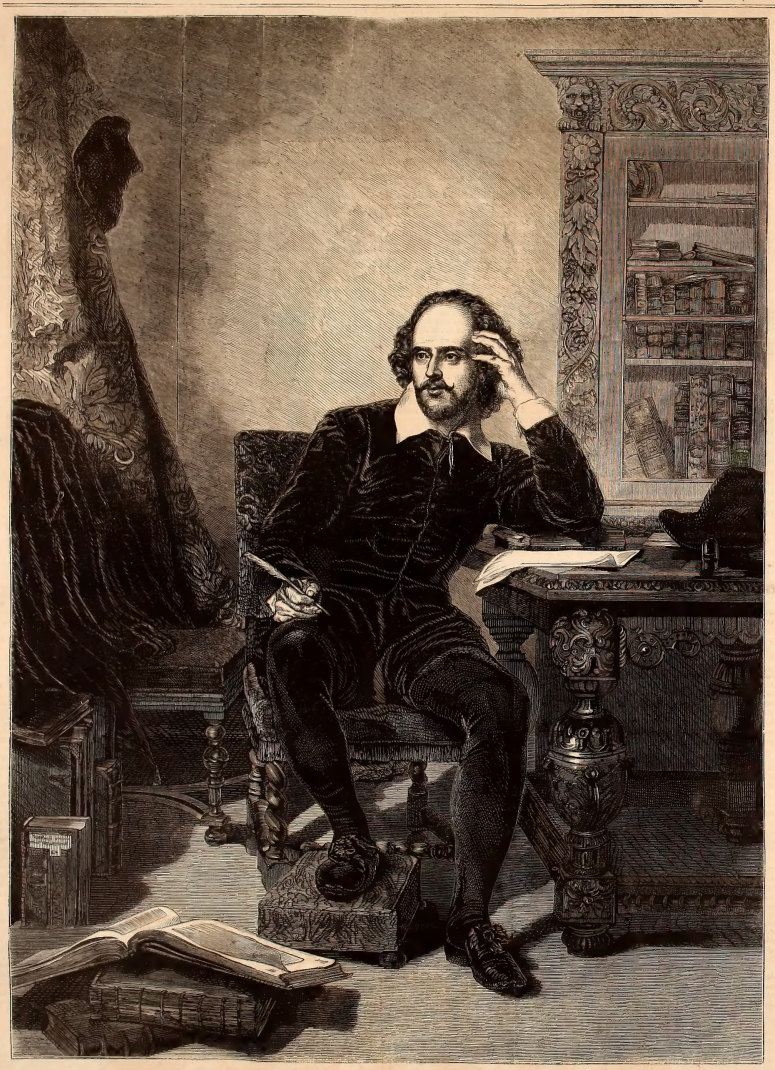
EXECUTIVE SESSION OF THE SENATE.

The session of the Senate, which began on the 12th of April, has been occupied in the consideration of Treaties and in the confirmation or rejection of the President's new nominations. On the first day of the session the Commissioners to settle the Alabama claims met with Boden, a second with Warrenburg, a third with Bowen, and a fourth with Bradford. These were all drawn up on the basis of the treaty established with the North German Confederation.

The President sent in the following nominations: J. Lothrop Motley, Minister to England; A. Bernard Jones to Belgium; John S. Carlisle to Sweden; J. H. Gray to Denmark; Stephen A. Hurlbut to Rio Janeiro; Silas A. Hudson (colored) to Guatemala; Elbert Edmonds (colored) to Liberia; Andrew G. Curtin to Russia, and John Jay to Austria.

On the 13th, the Alabama Claims treaty was rejected in the Senate by 54 votes. The only vote in its favor was that of Gregory, of Kentucky. The following additional nominations were sent in by the President: William H. Seward to be Minister to Mexico; Henry T. Sanford to Spain; William A. Pile to Bolivia; Wm. Hemsley Peck to Peru; Andrew G. Curtin to Russia, and John Jay to Austria.

On the 14th, the Alabama Claims treaty was rejected in the Senate by 54 votes. The only vote in its favor was that of Gregory, of Kentucky. The following additional nominations were sent in by the President: Wm. Hemsley Peck to Peru; Henry T. Sanford to Spain; William A. Pile to Bolivia; Andrew G. Curtin to Russia, and John Jay to Austria. Also, Robert C. Kirkwood to be Minister to Belgium; Wm. Hunter to be Secretary of State; Benjamin F. Wade to be Vice-President; Robert C. Schenck to be Minister to England; John Lothrop Motley to be Minister to Austria; John Bigelow to be Minister to France; Samuel Hooper to be Minister to Germany; Reverdy Johnson to be Minister to Italy; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Peru; Henry T. Blow to be Minister to Brazil; Wm. Hunter to be Minister to Rio Janeiro; Thomas Corwin to be Minister to Mexico; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Chili; Wm. A. Pile to be Minister to Bolivia; Andrew G. Curtin to be Minister to Russia; Thomas H. Dudley to be Minister to Hayti; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Ecuador; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to New Granada; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Venezuela; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Guatemala; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Salvador; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Honduras; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Nicaragua; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Costa Rica; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Hayti; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Liberia; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Dominica; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Paraguay; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Uruguay; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Chili; Wm. Hemsley Peck to be Minister to Bolivia



PORTRAIT OF SHAKSPEARE.

PORTRAITS OF SHAKSPEARE.

THE revival of SHAKSPEARE'S plays, so splendidly inaugurated by EDWIN BOOTH in his new theatre, as also the late Tercentenary Festival of 1864, have done much to intensify the interest which always exists in regard to the greatest dramatist of all times. Criticism, photography, and paleography have recently been strained to the utmost degree in order to bring before us the poet, his words, and the circumstances of his life.

There are few portraits of SHAKSPEARE extant that have respectable claims to genuineness. Among these we may enumerate the Stratford bust; DROESHOUT'S print from the folio of 1623; a portrait from an edition of the Sonnets, published in 1640, which is evidently copied from the DROESHOUT print; one which is said to have been painted by CORNELIUS JANSEN; and the CHANDOS portrait, which can be traced back to the possession of DAVENANT (born 1605, died 1688), who is said to have claimed to have been a natural son of SHAKSPEARE. The last mentioned has the most authoritative claim to genuineness, and is the one after which the portrait which we lay before our readers on this page was painted.

The first folio had a portrait of SHAKSPEARE which must have been a fair likeness, since BEN JONSON, a familiar friend of the poet, wrote by the side of it these lines:

> This Figure, that thou here see'st put,
> It was for gentle shakespeare cut;
> Wherein the Grauer had a strife
> With Nature, to out-doe the life:
> O could he but haue drawne his Wit
> As well in Brasse, as he hath hit
> His Face; the Print would then surpasse
> All, that was ever writ in Brasse.
> But, since he cannot, Reader, looke
> Not on his Picture, but his Booke.

ST. HELENA.—[SEE PAGE 278.]

THE MATE OF THE "ARETHUSA."

A stout, gallant ship than the Arethusa never sailed over the waters of the ocean. Swift, steady, and quick to obey her helm, she was the pride of her sailors and envy of other seamen.

As she sailed out of port on her last voyage to Hong Kong there was a little knot of people on her quarter-deck, who stood looking back in silence to the slowly fading shores. One was an elderly man, of mild and benevolent face, who seemed much more fitted to be a city missionary than any thing else. He was the captain. Near him was another of about the same age, short, thick-set, with an irascible face and abrupt manner. A young girl of extreme beauty leaned upon his arm. Her name was Helen Travers, and this was her father, a rich China merchant, who was taking her from boarding-school to his own far-distant home. As lovely as the dawn, amiable, and accomplished, her charms would have made her a prize for any man, but they were heightened by her being the sole and declared heiress to the vast wealth of Mr. Travers. Such seemed to be the impression of a man of important air who stood at her elbow. This personage gave himself out as the Hon. Eugene Beresford, a traveler to China for the benefit of his health. He was the only one who spoke, and his conversation was addressed solely to the lovely Helen Travers.

The last who composed the group was Talbot, the mate of the ship. He was a man of small size, but muscular frame. His face was dark, and his eyes intensely black and piercing. His age did not seem to be over twenty-one, and his energy and skill marked him out as the real ruler of the vessel.

The shore faded out from view, and the first day of the voyage was succeeded by others. They passed beyond the Bay of Biscay, and beyond the Azores. They sailed within sight of Saint Helena, whose stern cliffs tower on high like the walls of a huge fortress; and at length, rounding the Cape of Good Hope, they passed into the Indian Ocean.

Long before this the characters of all on board had been plainly exhibited.

The Hon. Eugene Beresford devoted himself unremittingly to the fair young heiress. In fine weather he was her constant attendant, and sought in every possible way to create a favorable impression. This he sought to do by telling her of the marvelous exploits in which he had been an actor, by land and sea, in different parts of the world. He had been in the wilds of America, through the pampas of South America, over the steppes of Asia; and in almost every clime and zone he had performed deeds of valor and heroism. Tales like these, narrated with the impressive air and deep voice of Beresford, exalted him greatly in the mind of the inexperienced young girl.

Yet Beresford had a rival. In his haughty self-complacency he at first ignored the rivalry altogether, but at length he could not help noticing it. The young mate in his own way was no less assiduous than himself in his attentions. He it was who in sunshine arranged awnings and seats for Miss Travers. He it was whose hand was ever ready to assist her over the treacherous decks; and, worse than all, he it was who monopolized the fair lady in stormy days, when the Hon. Eugene Beresford was forced to lock himself up and groan in his state-room.

The young mate had a handsome face and a musical voice. He could tell Miss Travers all the secrets of the sea, of perils on the deep, and dangers on a rocky shore. He could sing songs of love, and roving adventure, and death, and victory. Songs can often express what the tongue would not dare to utter in words, and so it needed but little penetration for Miss Travers to see that Talbot was overcome by a passionate love for her that bordered on idolatry. In spite of their difference in rank she was not shocked at the discovery. The young mate had intelligence beyond his station, and gentle manners that would have graced the highest in the land. She was flattered by her conquest, and gratified by the devotion of so pure and simple a nature as his.

Such was the state of affairs before the voyage was half over, and as they entered the Indian Ocean Talbot was manifestly feeding his heart with mad ambitious hopes, and Beresford was fast giving way to ungovernable jealousy.

At first Beresford tried to cut off his rival by mentioning the subject to Mr. Travers. The old gentleman was so fearfully indignant—not at the mate, but at his informant—that the latter did not dare to allude to the subject again.

"Zounds, Sir!" cried he; "because a bold sailor is polite to a pretty girl, do you pretend to think that he dares to hope to marry her? I wish my daughter to receive attention, Sir; and allow me to say, Sir, that you show very little courtesy to interfere in this way. Mr. Talbot knows his duty to his passengers, and his place on board this vessel."

Mr. Beresford being thus balked, resolved on another course. He began a systematic persecution of the mate, and carried it out to a degree that was maddening. The mate endured it all patiently, contenting himself with reminding him that, as it was an officer's duty to make the ship pleasant to passengers, he was unable to resent his conduct. Emboldened by this forbearance, which he mistook for cowardice, Beresford grew worse and worse, and at length set no bounds to his insults. Impertinences of every kind, coarse jests at his expense, sneers, ridicule, and taunts of the most cruel and cutting nature, not only in public, but also in private, were showered upon the head of Mr. Talbot. The latter, in spite of his patience, shrewd how deeply he was stung; but his regard for the rules of the ship and the comfort of his passengers effectually kept him from any exhibition of anger.

Miss Travers looked with surprise at such scenes as these. She despised Beresford for his resentment of the unoffending man, but she despised no less what seemed to be the craven spirit of Talbot. She herself would have turned in fury to resist one tithe of the wrongs which he endured so meekly. Nor did she understand how any one who called himself a man could bear any one who called himself a man could bear such treatment. Her delicacy prevented her from making any allusion to the subject; yet she showed her contempt in receiving the polite attentions of Talbot. She even evinced greater pleasure for Beresford's society, in the exact ratio that this excited the other's latent manhood.

"ON! MY LADS!" CRIED TALBOT. "SWEEP THE DEVILS INTO THE SEA."

In vain, however. Talbot grew sad, and remained deaf to all her attentions. The change was specially withdrew his attentions also, for she had brought melancholy to the ship, and she feared to take pleasure in the society of the burned to take pleasure in the society of the mate, and felt its absence to be a loss.

Once at the table Beresford addressed a remark to Talbot of more than usual severity.

Miss Travers rose.

"For shame!" said she. "If Mr. Talbot has not the spirit to resent this, I will not countenance it by my presence. These scenes are insufferable to me, and I will witness them no more." She turned to go.

Talbot sprang to his feet. His face was pale, and his eyes flashed with excitement.

"I am no coward; I entreat you to stay, Miss Travers. I am not afraid of a solemn promise not to raise my hand against any one on shipboard. But if you give the word, I will break all such, and this very moment I will turn this puppy overboard."

"Bravo!" cried Mr. Travers, who had been listening with pride and contempt for Talbot's pusillanimity. "Bravo! I say, Nell, for God's sake give the fellow the word, and let him pay off old scores."

"No; no, gentlemen, no violence!" said Miss Travers, resuming her seat. "But I beg of you, Talbot, that you will use the propriety of transferring these scenes elsewhere."

"Throw me overboard! his, ha!" cried Beresford. "It's his fortunate for me that you made that promise. Pay, to whom did you make it?"

"To my dying mother," said Talbot, with deep solemnity.

"Your mother!" sneered Beresford. "Poor dear woman! Was she in the washing line of business?"

"Come outside!" cried Talbot, in stern, commanding tones. "Come outside, I say!" And Beresford obeyed mechanically.

"Now, Sir," said Talbot, when they had reached the deck, "you must be stopped. The moment that we reach port you and I will wash out our account in blood! Meanwhile, if you utter another word of this kind I will put you in irons, and take the consequences. Remember, I am master here, and you are in my power."

Beresford muttered a word and re-entered the cabin. He related there what had occurred.

"He'll do it," said the captain. "He's a wonderful determined man, is Talbot. Don't you know him, Sir—"

"You'd better stop, Beresford, or you'll get into trouble," said Travers, coolly. "If you make the man desperate he'll have you in irons in a jiffy, and run the ship."

The result was that Beresford thought it best to stop the more violent part of his persecution, and confine himself solely to hints. But Mr. Talbot kept out of the way as much as possible, and sat at the table no more.

"He's a strange chap," said Mr. Travers, "that's clear—an in-fernal coward."

But Helen Travers thought differently. In his eyes that were quick to blaze forth at every insult she saw other signs than fear; and in his strong command over his feelings and his stubborn resolve she confidently she saw the proof of a mighty soul. Now her thoughts turned to him constantly; and while she no longer spoke to him she remembered all his acts and words of devotion. Was it possible that such a frank and joyous and brave spirit as he one showed himself to be could be the base thing which Beresford asserted? A thousand times no. If there were cowardice it belonged to the other, and was so ready to persecute the man who would not resist.

Thus the days and weeks passed on. Miss Travers kept more to herself, and passed the time in reading and in thought. From her cabin she could see the quarter-deck, but she could see Talbot among the men, who obeyed his slightest nod, and sprang to their duties at every intimation of his desire. The captain seemed to be fit for nothing but sitting amiably at the head of the cabin table. Talbot was every thing on board, and out of the ship. He would have been captain himself, it was said, had not his superior officer been a relative of the owner of the Arethusa.

At last a change occurred which proved to be memorable and eventful one in the lives of all the passengers.

They were approaching the Straits of Sunda, a place which at that time was dreaded by all navigators in those seas as the favorite lurking-place of a great Malay pirate, Tomawa.

Some hints to this effect were dropped among the passengers, with the request that they should not on any account say any thing to Miss Travers about it, since it would alarm her.

To this request of all Beresford mentioned this very thing to Miss Travers the next time they met. His only motive seemed to be a desire to glorify himself, since he has made use of the fact of the danger before them to promise what he personally would do when the dreaded pirate made his appearance.

That very day the ship was becalmed, and Miss Travers, on coming out to the quarter-deck about mid-day, noticed the captain and mate anxiously looking out over the sea. There was a strange sail there. It was a Malay proa.

"What a singular ship!" said she to Talbot. "Is it a Chinese junk?"

"No," said Talbot. "It is a Malay."

"A Malay! Is it the pirate?" said she, turning pale.

"I hope not," said Talbot, earnestly.

"For my part," said Beresford, in an ardent tone, "I hope it may be, since it will give me a chance to show what I can do for you."

Talbot turned away abruptly, and again examined the vessel through his spy-glass. He whispered a few hurried words to the captain; the latter nodded, and left the quarter-deck.

The Arethusa had a crew of about forty men, and two small guns. She had also a supply of arms for the men in case of attack. Miss Travers saw preparations going on forward which seemed to promise a fight. The idea terrified her. She shuddered at the thought of strife and blood.

The Malay proa was moving steadily toward them, first on one tack and then on the other, as were working. The men of the Arethusa saw all this, and at the command of Talbot they separated, and by and by, loaded their muskets and pistols, and strapped on their swords. About as pirate was a very well to do-looking vessel was provided with thirty stalwart seamen as they awaited the pirates. The preparations were at length complete, and Talbot walked aft.

"We're about ready," said he to the captain.

"All right," said the latter. "You'll manage them better than I. I'll take my station by the helm after you, as I can, my boy. I'm too old and too stupid to lead those brave fellows."

"I wish you would," said he, as a volunteer," said old Travers, who had buckled on a sword and held a pistol in each hand.

Talbot smiled.

Beresford stood aloof, pretending not to take any notice of this.

"Had not Miss Travers better go below?" said Talbot to her father.

"Yes, certainly—certainly. Helen, you must go down. You'll be frightened, dear."

Beresford assisted her down into the cabin. Then Ben assisted them among the men. Talbot was on the quarter-deck. The Malay proa had come up close. Her decks were crowded. About a hundred and fifty villainous looking fellows were gathered there. A hoarse voice in broken English summoned them to surrender.

"Fire!" cried the mate, in a moment of thunder. Two guns followed. A wild shriek arose among the Malays. The cannon, loaded with grape, had made fearful havoc among the men. A fire crowd. Then followed a discharge of small-arms. Soon after the cannon, which had been loaded again, were discharged with the same fearful effect. A panic seized the Malays. They stopped rowing. The proa swung a little to one side, and presented her entire length to the crew of the Arethusa.

In the midst of their panic there were not idle. Their guns were fired also, but their firing was wild, and but few shots took effect. At last the proa, as it swung around, struck against the side of the Arethusa. Grappling-irons were flung down. With a shout to his men he leaped on board, and the gallant fellows swarmed after him.

The odds were against them, but it is always so when the Saxon fights with the Malay. But that single fact tells; and these were not the men to falter before a crowd of Malays.

With Talbot at their head they threw themselves into the midst of the crowd. Well armed with pistols and cutlasses, they first discharged the former, and then went to work hewing their way forward.

A compact body of men, with a bold, skillful leader, they could not be met with any suddenness or short attack. Having at the outset gained a headway, they could not be checked. The impetus with which they began bore them on. The Malays fell back. The panic which the first cannon-shot had flung into the crowd of pirates was not overcome. There was no resistance on the part of some, but wild confusion among most. Many leaped into the sea, and swam about amazed.

One huge Malay tried in vain to rally his fellowers. Several fought around him. He himself engaged one man, struck right and left, his face like the face of a fiend, and his eyes blazing with savage rage.

Through the midst of it struggling crowd Talbot forced his way toward this man. The Malay waited his approach, and with a shout of defiance rushed to meet him. Talbot dextrously evaded the descending weapon, and before the Malay could raise it, grasped it by the hilt with his left hand. His right he struck the pirate a tremendous blow between his eyes with the butt of his pistol. The Malay fell heavily to the deck, stunned.

"On! my lads!" cried Talbot. "Sweep the devils into the sea."

With a shout rush the men flung themselves forward. The few Malays who were resisting fell back disheartened. Some threw themselves at once into the sea; others, surrounded by others, in despair, leaped into the sea, choosing rather to drown than be captured.

In about an hour from the beginning of the fight the proa lay silent by the side of the Arethusa, with thirty Malays as captives, and many more dead. Their chief, the terrible pirate Tomawa. Talbot had captured this one with his own hand.

The captain had fought with that fierce man, first, and had received a wound on his hand from a Malay cross to show. Travers had fought by his side, and had a cut on his arm from a kris, which he was incapressibly proud. Six of the seamen had been killed, ten wounded; but they had gained the victory, and captured the greatest pirate of the Eastern seas.

Where was Beresford?

Where?

That was the question. The captain and Travers looked gloomily at one another. The seamen spoke darkly about pitching him overboard. Talbot said not a word. The noise of the fight had now died out. They were talking together on the quarter-deck. Suddenly Miss Travers came rushing up, her face pale, her breathing quick and hurried. She flung herself into her father's arms and overwhelmed him with caresses. Then she looked around, and saw from the bloody decks of the proa and the wounded and dead how fierce had been the conflict.

But the pirate chief was not there. He was suddenly overspread with a flush, and her eyes kindled.

"That wretch!" she cried; "that base coward! Go away and leave you to fight for him!"

"Where is he?" asked Travers.

"In his room."

"In his room?"

"Yes. I told him to go up and fight, but he swore he would stay with me to defend me. I told him to defend me by going up on deck and fighting. He said he would only lay down his life at my feet. I called him a coward, and reproached him for letting my aged father fight. At this the noise of the fight arose; he turned pale, and muttering a few words went into his room.

There was a long silence.

"He's the most infernal coward that ever lived!" cried Travers at last. "So infernal a coward that I'll be hanged if I'm not inclined to—"

"Why, then," said Talbot, "I'll fight, after all," said he. "These cowards of Malays! But they don't amount to much. I'm infernally sorry I wasn't able to fight for you, Miss Travers; but the fact is, just as I went into my room to get my pistols —revolvers, by-the-way, first-rate ones—that infernal Malay, as he was seized with an epileptic attack, to which all the Beresfords are subject, and—"

"Captain," said Travers, interrupting him, "what do sailors generally do with skulkers and sneaks?"

"Well, they generally duck 'em, keel-haul 'em, or something of that sort," said the captain, in a loud voice.

All the seamen were glaring wrathfully at Beresford. They overheard the captain's words.

"Keel-haul him! ay—that's it! Keel-haul that coward!" roared a score of deep, wrathful voices.

Talbot heard it and started. He saw the sailors' looks, and understood it all in a moment.

He rushed forward.

"No, my lads!" he cried, in a voice like the peal of a trumpet; "none of that—none of that! You've brave fellows. You've done what none of you have succeeded in doing. You've caught Tomawa. Don't disgrace yourselves, my brave boys, by touching even with the end of a finger a thing like that—" And he pointed with unutterable contempt to Beresford. The wretch was as pale as death.

The sailors gave place for Talbot, and turned contemptuously away. Beresford skulked below, and scarcely left his room for the remainder of the voyage. "It was well," he said.

At length they approached their destination. On the following day they would all land. Travers, Helen, and Talbot were on the quarter-deck.

"My brave boy," said Travers, "you have saved our lives. I wish you could stand up beside me, as a dear creature I don't know. Why didn't you pitch him overboard?"

"I told you why."

"I said, I could do something to show my esteem for you," said Travers, smilingly.

"You can," said Talbot.

"How?"

"Give me something."

"What?"

"This," said Talbot, and he caught the hand of Helen in both of his. Helen's head dropped. She said nothing.

Travers looked thunder-struck. "The devil!" he cried, and stood silent and overwhelmed. "It's Heaven's own retribution," he said, "and, I'll be hanged if I don't do it. I couldn't do better. Egad, she's yours, for you saved her! Haven't you, my dear, need to save for me, my boy?" And he held out his hand. Talbot seized it, and twined his other arm around Helen's waist. Her head fell upon his shoulder and rested there.

"But I'm not the mate of the Arethusa," said Talbot, with a smile. "I'm an impostor."

"Then go home with you're giving your daughter."

"My love! yes, I do!" I'm giving her to the bravest boy that ever lived."

"Did you ever happen to hear of a fellow called the Flying George Talbot, who spent a fortune on the ring?"

Travers looked at him in bewilderment.

"I'm that person," said Talbot. "I was a spendthrift, and after my ruin returned to see my dying mother. She implored me to reform and—"

Travers executed from me a solemn promise not to gamble or bet for a year, and under no provocation to strike a man for that time. I gave it. I tried to reform. I went to sea. As I was always a good yachtsman, I had no difficulty in becoming mate of the Arethusa.

"This day has revealed me is some nobody, or he would have recognized me. I could not knock him down on account of my promise to my mother. It's up now. He's too much of a coward to fight me, but I hope to have the pleasure of kicking him out of the ship."

"Hon. George Talbot!" cried Travers. "By Heaven, Sir, I don't know but I'd rather have you as the mate of the Arethusa, and plain Mr."

"You can't go back from your word in any rate," said Talbot; "and you may 'mister' me to the end of my days."

"Nonsense!" said Travers, wringing his hand, "you're every inch a man, and the bravest lad that ever stepped. So take her, my boy, and a father's blessing."

On landing Talbot did not have the pleasure of kicking Beresford. The latter managed to skulk himself unnoticed.

He turned out to be a certain John Peters, who had come out to be clerk in a merchant's house. Talbot did not think it was worth his while to hunt him out.

Talbot was married a few days after landing, took his bride and stopped for a few weeks at the Governor's residence, and then went back home in the ship Arethusa, leaving the Arethusa to sail home with a new mate.

A DAY AT ST. HELENA.

ST. HELENA is a scowl upon the face of nature. Its sea walls rise sheer and bare to a great height out of the sea, as if the necessity for a prison in human economy had been present to the mind of the Creator when came into being. The crowded fortress of Gibraltar, with its various great cannon, which now bristle from various points of interest, and into the rock, look as thorough indignance to the place as if they too had been cast up, ready-made, when the interior rock revealed their angriest points, and gave birth to the island.

HAWTHORNE makes a "Note" that a lighthouse would be a charming place for a young couple to spend the first year of their married life in; methinks a little green island would be better still, and a little shelly walled about with water, having its own peculiar quota of sunshine and rain, sufficient unto itself. But to desire St. Helena for a honeymoon would be like coveting a penitentiary or the Tower of London.

It was first settled by Portuguese, and a time, and has ever since been a sort of house of call for ships on the Indian voyage. American ships stop there on the way home, but only when a long passage has exhausted fresh provisions.

Our good ship had been tossed and buffeted by a hundred days of bitter weather since leaving Calcutta, from the chart showed our close proximity to St. Helena. I dreaded lest we might pass it in the night without knowing it, and was despairingly skeptical as to the science which could hit so small a point in the howling waste of waters. But I looked out at last, on the morning my eyes seemed actually to knock against the wall of rock which reposed in the distance, and steep that the easiest way of overcoming its ascent was by building flights of stairs all the way up, which, seen from the sea, look like rope-ladders on the wall of a fortress otherwise inaccessible.

We stepped from a little boat on dry stones at the landing, and found ourselves in the main street. The houses seemed to be repaired fair-ly to decay, the timbers and doorposts being more shells; and the explanation is that some unlucky ship landed a number of years ago with her cargo, which have proved worse than an Egyptian plague, having multiplied enormously and devoured all before them. As the ship was long while their eyes to meet us, and invited us into his house, of which the white ants had left but one story habitable. Our host proved to be the ex-consul of Genoa; he received the office under President JACKSON, and had held it off and on for more than thirty years.

He was a man, with tears in his eyes, "they have turned out their old servant like a dog, and without so much as a thank you." It was not without so much as a thank you." It was not all that it valuable to him—oh no! and on this string he harped continually while we remained with him. It was with a mournful accent, democracy, like SYDNEY SMITH'S corporation, has neither a conscience to touch nor a body to kick, and the ex-consul appears not to be employed from it; but the iron of republican ingratitude had entered his soul. I could not help a little private wonder as to the extent to which one so ardently if there were no money to be made out of it; for in a place so terribly expensive as St. Helena, in fact in all other islands, the sense of honor is found in the pocket. A happy question made him open warmly to JACKSON. He was buried with the honors of war—when he was exhumed and carried to France; when he was buried there for the first time—when he was buried with the highest military honors—when he was exhumed and carried to France; when he was buried there for the first time—when he's house, which had been built for him

We went to Longwood in a light American buggy. The road was a very easy one for the most part, cut into the hill-side overlooking the town, and appeared to be much traveled. Rising on the other side of the valley is the highest elevation on the island; it is called High Knoll, and has a battery on its summit.

The last view of the valley, as the road makes a sharp turn, can not surely be surpassed in the world. No view can be perfect without sea and land together, and on this platform of basalt the horizon lost in a mellow haze, the sea mirrored the sky so entirely that one could not tell where they met; the white tips of foam and the fleecy flocks of cloud seemed one and the same—now in the sky and now in the sea, till one doubted whether the island rested on a rock, or only a gray cloud on which we were floating in space.

The house at Longwood is of one story, small, and, if one does not look at it from a point of too great contrast, it is comfortable; such a house as a mechanic in America might hope to build for his old age from moderate earnings. The visitor enters from a simple latticed piazza, from which NAPOLEON may have often watched the sunset, a room of very moderate size, with boarded sides, painted a bright green, as it was in his time. If it did not please him, he says it certainly could not injure them. This was the drawing-room, and, like all the rest, it is perfectly clean and empty of furnishing.

This room opens into the one that witnessed his death; and on the spot where his bed stood is a marble bed of life-size sculptured with the dead face; and it is said his features were never so beautiful as when settled in their last rest after the "labor and heat" of his life.

The house at Longwood contains a few more small rooms—the bedroom where NAPOLEON slept, a writing-room where he wrote the "Memorial from St. Helena," dining and billiard rooms; and in these confined quarters his few faithful friends broke up, so far as they were able the etiquette of the Tuileries.

No more painful account of the agony long drawn out was ever written than the Journal kept minutely by LAS CASAS of the life of the Emperor, from 1815, when he landed on the island, till LAS CASAS fell under suspicion of the Governor and was removed from Longwood. It is but a commentary on the one magnificent sentence that now hangs on the wall of the bedroom:

"If this room could tell the torments which were here endured, what a tremendous agony it would have to disclose!" "There is but one comfort left us," said NAPOLEON, when the fast narrowing bars of his prison left no hope of escape—"the eyes of the universe are upon us." This was true French consolation, but it kept him alive six years only.

In 1855, when BAYARD TAYLOR visited it, the house had fallen almost to ruin by neglect; the room where NAPOLEON died was a pile of rubbish in the bedroom horses and cows were stabled. Since 1858, when the place passed into possession of the French, it has been restored to its former state, and placed under the care of a sergeant, who followed us silently from room to room, merely mentioning the name of each as we entered it.

The body of NAPOLEON was placed in a tomb about two miles from the house, near a favorite spring. We had to leave the carriage and walk a long way on the edge of a steep ravine. Happily the wind blew the right way, for the crazy-gourd bedeck was but a shrub or a prostrating pebble to grip if one lost his footing. The tomb, like the house, has undergone much change; a small space of ground is inclosed by an iron ailing, and bordered with evergreens, which always look as if they had been intended by nature for a fenceyard use. A large oblong tablet without inscription, and covered with the remains of flowers thrown upon it, marks the spot which held the Emperor's body for twenty years.

The sergeant watched us narrowly; but I was no anxious for a token of my pilgrimage that I secured the smallest possible twig of the willow tree that droops over the tomb. Stealing is never reputable unless successful, and I was not a little excited when the sergeant presented me a surrender of my prize at the gate. An English shilling bought it again, however; and this little bargain leads me to think that the sergeant at the tomb must have had English blood in his veins.

There were two willow-trees originally, but one of them has died of its wounds at the hands of travelers.

The return drive seemed to have shortened by half the way. Here and there a few drops of clear water, falling from a crack in the rock, showed a spring not far off, and Mr. C—— said there were two hundred and forty of these springs in the island.

In the valley it was warm as July ought to be, but on the hills it was piercingly cold. Small country houses are scattered about the island, where the better class of people live in the hot months; but at the time of our visit they were all empty, as it was what, for form's sake, they called winter. The mountain road was very lonely, and we were much amused, on the latter part of the last hill, to see a fat, barefooted negro wench, who had tied her baby round her waist, so that its hands and feet hung on each side with these it beat a lively tattoo on its mother's fat sides, while her principal burden was an enormous bundle of sticks which she balanced on her head.

Jamestown is built in a long, straggling valley, not more than 100 yards at its widest, between rocks almost perpendicular. It is as if a race of pigmies should build their small city in that rocky avenue called the "Flume," in the White Mountains.

The main street is nearly straight, and leads past the barracks, the ghostly burial-grounds (which boast about three grave-stones apiece), a few houses of the better class, and ends with a place called "The Briars"—a sort of summer pavilion (built on what in any other spot would be called a high rock—which was the home of NAPOLEON from his arrival till Longwood could be prepared for him.

There seemed not much thing as driving in the town; we met one man on horseback, and his steed was the only one besides our own that we saw during the day; but there were a crazy of donkeys, small, gray, stubbed creatures, the same the world over; these carried the heavier burdens, and the rest up the hills on the backs of the men—and such women! They are very straight from the practice I have mentioned; but, aside from this, I have never seen more unmitigated specimens of womanhood than the mixed breed of St. Helena; stunted, flat-breasted, haggard, I think it would be the general verdict if a prize was given. The pure blacks, who seem to be held inferior to those worse colored creatures, are a positive relief to the eye, in the happy and healthy development of all their animal powers, which seems to be a negro's birth-right.

We discovered a nice little shop, which might have been the "store" of a country village in New England for the variety of goods that it contained; we did a little shopping, for the luxury of the thing, after total deprivation for three months on shipboard, and the prices were all multiplied by the distance from the main land. The poorest hotel accommodation costs eight dollars a day.

The street was full of the lowest order of humanity, and, on the whole, I should think the lookers and the looked at were glad to get to a respectable part of the native inhabitants of St. Helena. A great number of slavers, captured on the African coast, have been brought here and tried to the island; the vessels are broken up and form a large part of the wood used there, and the slaves receive a free pardon, which the Government expense till they are shipped to the West Indies. At the time of our visit a thousand of these half wild and wholly wretched creatures were waiting for shipment.

LAST IN SHE AFFRICAN.—The latest last words of sympathy to the venerable ex-consul on republican injustice, we walked slowly down to our little boat, jumping impatiently against the stepping-stones.

A few steady pulls at the oars carry us outside the projecting point of rock which forms the town till one is close upon it. The sea has taken all sorts of liberties with this wall, and carved it into as many fantastic shapes as one would find on an old cathedral wall.

Several feet above the usual sea level a large circular hole has been worn through the rock, and through this window, as the sun sunk into the sea in splendors of red and gold, we cast a last long look at Jamestown, lying deep and lonely in its valley:

"Sown in a wrinkle of the monstrous hill,
The city sparkled like a grain of salt."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE last Report of the Department of Agriculture contains, among numerous interesting statistics, some valuable suggestions and facts relative to the cultivation of the sugar-beet. As our immense sum is every year paid for foreign sugars, and it is believed that under an improved system of agriculture this country might supply the home demand for this necessary article of food, and have a large surplus for export, various investigations are being made, and experiments are in progress, which, when completed, will show with considerable accuracy what success may be expected in the culture of the sugar-beet in this country. A field of but three and seven degrees wide, lying between the parallels 36 and 43, is considered favorable as regards temperature for the sugar-beet. The growing of the best requires rotation. In France, where it has been cultivated with great success, an ordinary rotation is: 1. Barley or wheat. 2. Beets. 3. Oats. The product of beets per acre is from fourteen to fifteen tons in France and Belgium, and occasionally enormous crops are reported. A ton of beets yields about one hundred pounds of sugar, and the beet-sake, or the residue after the pressure, is very valuable as a food for cattle, being both nutritious and agreeable. The beets may be cut into small pieces, dried by artificial heat, and sold in that state to manufacturers, to use sugar being extracted then by inflation. The Agricultural Report gives a detailed account of what is now known in regard to the cultivation of this vegetable in this and other countries; and also of the European processes of manufacturing the sugar. Some factories are now in operation in the United States; and when the success of this business upon our soil is fully demonstrated many will be ready to engage in it.

It is proposed to erect a new hospital for the treatment of diseases of the eye and ear in the upper part of the city. The necessity for dealing with diseases of these organs is exceedingly large, and it is desirable that ample provision be made for their relief. A number of prominent philanthropic gentlemen of this city have combined to take immediate steps to raise a permanent fund for the building of such an institution. The proposed site is on the corner of Forty-first Street and Fourth Avenue.

Parisian ladies have a dreadful reputation! If they have a disagreeable, ill-tempered husband, who comes home intoxicated and full of abuse, they do not throw the tea-pot at his head, but patiently endure his insults and then lower until he is asleep, when they give him coffee and arsenic for breakfast! At least this is the report.

The forty-fourth annual exhibition of the National Academy of Design indicates a decided progress in American art. The show of pictures is in many respects more satisfactory than it has been on some past occasions. To be sure, some of our best artists are abroad, and have no works on exhibition. Others, who are at home, are not represented, for various reasons, and the absence of these is felt. But younger artists, and some who have not been prominent before, show by their present contributions that progress for the future are bright.

The following statement of the way matrimonial matters stand in Portland, Maine, has been prepared by an ingenious statistician of that city: Runaway wives, 94; runaway husbands, 16; married persons legally divorced, 347; living in open warfare, 1445; living in private misunderstanding, 1196; naturally indifferent, 4000; regarded as happy, 264; nearly happy, 38; perfectly happy, 2. A census of the kind, showing how affairs are in other cities, might be an interesting document—to bachelors!

It is still a mooted question where Twitchell obtained the poison which destroyed his life. It was not the ordinary hydrocyanic acid of the drug stores, which is largely diluted with water. The acid which was found in Twitchell's cell required ninety-nine parts of water to reduce it to the standard of the acid used in pharmacy. Apothecaries do not keep it, and the wonder is, how it was obtained, and by whom. Mrs. Twitchell has made public certain "confessions," which she states were sent to her by her husband, with the urgent demand that she should adopt them as her own, and thereby save him from death on the gallows. She indignantly refused to mean his own horror of death, and that, though many believed her to be guilty of the murder, she would not speak to trial for the crime, having once been acquitted.

A New York dodge recently fixed a milkman fifty dollars for mixing water with his milk. If justice continues to be meted out thus to offenders we shall stand a good chance of obtaining the pure article.

The Journal of Chemistry says that dish may be kept alive for ten days or more without water by filling their mouths and cavities of bread saturated with brandy, and pouring a little brandy into their stomachs. This, after all, is the torpid state, they may be packed in straw. They become alive in a few hours when again supplied with water. A very nice plan for dealers; but how do the fishes like it? Besides, there is the danger of their acquiring bad habits, and wanting brandy as a steady drink instead of water!

At this season, when oranges and bananas are to be had at every street corner, the public may well utter a post of indignation against the usual disposition of the rind of these fruits made by those who lunch while promenading for an airing. It is a common thing to see men and boys walking along, scattering bits of orange-peel here and there as they are eating. Such a practice should be regarded as a misdemeanor, for it is highly dangerous. Many a person has slipped in consequence of treading unawares upon piece of this rind, and cast down upon the sidewalk, and have been seriously injured thereby.

The fine building lately erected on Broadway and Eleventh Street, which was purchased by the Methodists for $900,000, and will afford excellent headquarters for the agents who issue the "Book Concern," Stores on the ground-floor will be rented, and the basement devoted to printing. The remainder of the building will be occupied by the Concern, together with the Missionary Society, Tract Society, and Sunday-school Union.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"How late is it, Tom?" "Look at the hour and see if he's drunk; if he ain't, it can't be much after seven." "Oh, you're very good time!" "Splendid! they regulate the town clock by his nose."

HOW ADVERTISING WINS.

The first time a man looks at an advertisement he does not see it.

The second time, he does not notice it.

The third time, he is dimly conscious of it.

The fourth time, he faintly remembers having seen something of the kind before.

The fifth time, he half reads it.

The sixth time, he turns up his nose at it.

The seventh time, he reads it all through, and says, "Pshaw!"

The eighth time, he ejaculates, "Here's that confounded thing again!"

The ninth time, he wonders "if there is any thing in it."

The tenth time, he thinks it might suit somebody else's case.

The eleventh time, he thinks he will ask his neighbor if he has ever tried the article, or knows about it.

The twelfth time, he wonders how the advertiser can make it pay.

The thirteenth time, he rather thinks it must be a good thing.

The fourteenth time, he happens to think it is just what he wanted the other day.

The fifteenth time, he resolves to try it as soon as he can afford it.

The sixteenth time, he examines the address carefully, and writes it in his memorandum of it.

The seventeenth time, he feels tantalized to think he hardly able to do so.

The eighteenth time, he is painfully reminded he is in need of the article, and particularly excellent article.

The nineteenth time, he accounts his money to see how much he would have left if he bought it: and

The twentieth time, he feels tantalized to think he hardly able to do so.

Then he hastily runs to the office and buys.

PARTHENOGENESIS.—A pallid drome is a line that reels when talks backward and forward. One of the best is Adam's first observation to Eve: "Madam, I'm Adam." Another is the story that Napoleon, when at St. Helena, being asked by an Englishman if he could have seduced London, replied, "Able was I ere I saw Elba." Another letter is the best palindrome probably in the language. The following, the third and last, read backward the same backward as forward: "Sing, a few men; Few men, a Sing."

A LIGHT EMPLOYMENT.—Cleaning windows.

Why is a baker a most extraordinary man? Because, before taking breakfast, he does it no inconvenience to Ajoe an oyster.

COARSE LANGUAGE.—A reporter apologizes for the coarseness of his language, excused, as he says, by the cold pen with which he was writing having been lately used to open oysters.

"FLAT" FISH.—All that are stupid enough to get caught.

A good story is told of an old lady living in some backwoods settlement, who hospitably received a Methodist preacher who was traveling on his circuit. After setting provision before him she began to question him. "Stranger, where mought you be from?" "Madam, I reside in Shelby County, Kentucky." "Wa'al, stranger, no offence, but what mought you be doin' up here?" "Madam, I am searching for the lost sheep of the tribe of Israel." "John! John!" shouted the old lady, "come on here this minute; here's a stranger all the way from Shelby County, Kentucky, a-hunting stock, and I'll bet a cent that his tangle-haired black ram that's been in our lot all week is one of his'n."

A new method of committing suicide (!) is reported from the West. A woman in Wisconsin, finding she did not enjoy perfect domestic felicity, informed her wife that he was going to retire from the wicked world, and go where weary husbands are at rest. He left the house, but his partner followed him. He reached the bridge, and there was a splash. The wife shrieked and fainted. Recovering from the first wonderful sensation she saw her husband was settled down for a good cry, when the husband suggested once more upon the scene. He had thrown a rock into the river, and then dodged under the bridge. These probabilities are that they "made up" their difficulties.

"THE MAN AT THE WHEEL."—The Velocipedestrian.

Why is a dog's tail like the heart of a tree?—Because it is farthest from the bark.

A Western paper says: "Wanted, at this office, an editor who can please every body. Also, a forematch who can strike a single paper as to allow every man's advertisement to head the column."

A select boy took place at a ball in Corning, recently, and the programme announced, "No German. A well-to-do Yankee saw it, and stepping one of the managers in the street, he said, "Vot for you calls it a fool dance, eh? you ain't got no sort of suit your show all the vile? 'No German?' den I backs my vider coods, and gives back to vater vorehand, and den I gets up one grand Shpeetz hop, and I say, 'No Yanker,' and see if you can't get a full in vile."

TAKING THE OATH.

"Do you," said Fanny, t'other day,
"In answer true and candid say?
Or are those tender words applied Alike to fifty girls beside?"

"Dear cruel girl," cried I, "forbear;
For, by those eyes, those lips, I swear,"
She stopped me, as the oath I took,
And cried, "You've sworn, now kiss the book!"

A gentleman was arguing with a Scotch lady, when at length he appealed to her if all put what, Mawk," said he, "I'll not argue with you any longer; you're not open to conviction." "Not open to conviction, sir! was the indignant reply: "I scorn the imputation, Sir; I am open to conviction. But," she added, after a moment's pause, "show me the man that can convince me."

"Here's your money, doit; and now tell me why your rascally master wrote me eighteen letters about that contemptible sum."

"I'm sure I can't tell; but, if you'll excuse me, Sir, I guess it was because seventeen didn't reach it."

The following novel intimation appears at the end of a recent invitation to a wedding: "No cards! No cake! No wine! No kissing the bride!"

"What are you doing there, all alone in that large room?" said a gentleman to a boy who was the sole occupant of a dilapidated building in Pine Street.

"Sure and I'm the editor I am, your Honor," said Pat.

"An editor! how so?"

"Why, you see, the others are all gone, and I'm a leftenant."

Much libelous matter has been written on tombstones about wives. Witness this from Selby, in Yorkshire:

"Here lies my wife, and thirteen and three;
If I ask a request, 'tis to tread on me."

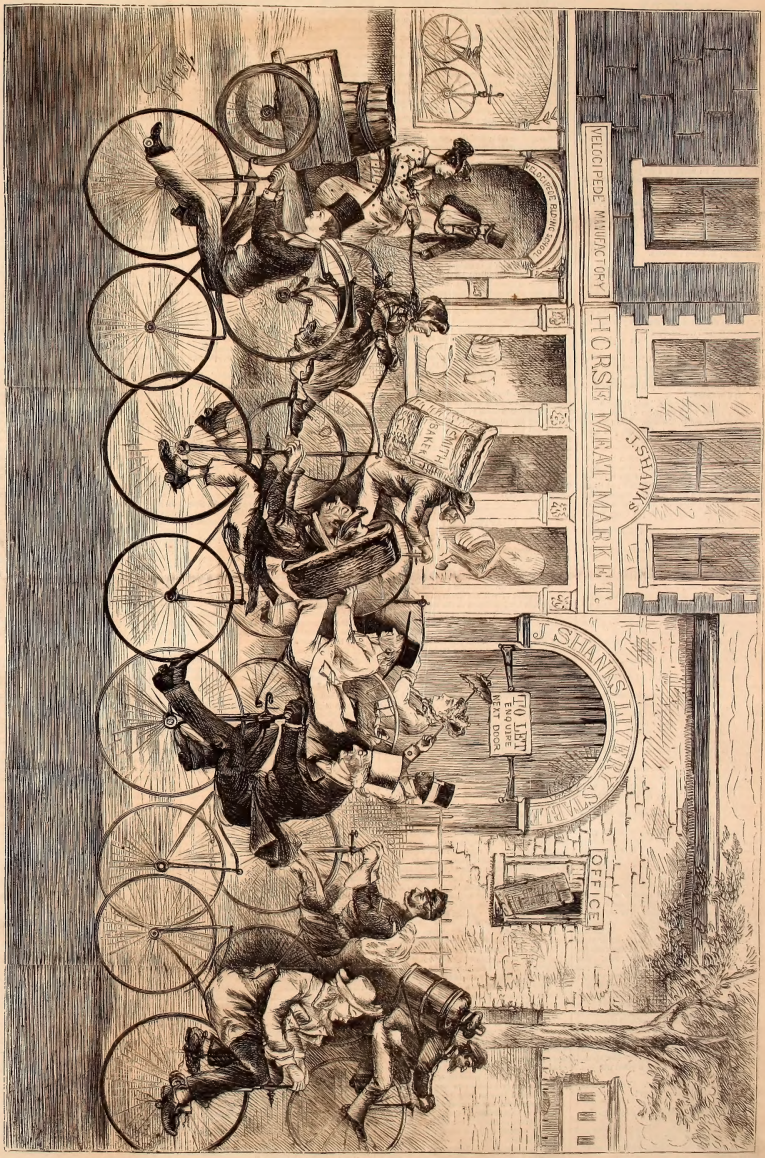
Here is another, often attributed to Dryden, but to be found in the Friend's burying before:

"Here lies my wife; here let her lie:
Now she is at rest and so am I."

The following one breathes a spirit of resignation which is far more Christian. There is also a lachrymose touch of the pedlar about it:

"Here lies one whose name was John;
And now
To Thee, O Lord, I her resign
And am your children, humble servant,
Robert Kemp."

SURRENDER OF LORD CORNWALLIS AT YORKTOWN, VIRGINIA, OCTOBER 19, 1781.—[SEE PAGE 283.]



THE VELOCIPEDE MANIA—WHAT IT MAY COME TO!—[DRAWN BY THOMAS WORTH.]

HETTY.

By HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THALATTA.

THE very next afternoon Mr. Morley called, and was told by the little maid that Miss Turner was too ill to see him, but she gave him a note, which he opened in such cases, opened and read:

"DEAR SIR,—Let yesterday be as though it never had been. Forget it, and forget me. It was all a mistake from beginning to end. I should like to have seen Hetty; but that can never be. But, for her sake, for she is unalterable, I never loved any one on earth as I do you. But what we talked of yesterday is utterly and entirely impossible.

REBECCA."

Morley stepped into Mr. Turner's study, and taking pen and ink, wrote:

"Come down stairs directly, and tell me all about it. Don't keep me waiting, for I have news for you, and but little time to give you. Look sharp, and don't dawdle.

A. M."

So she came down. She was very pale, but there was no sign of stillness about her. She was shocked at her appearance, but he did not show it at all. He received her affectionately and kissed her.

"My dear Rebecca," he said, "can you excuse me for the meaning of the note you sent me down just now?"

"No, Alfred," she said; "an explanation would involve others."

"So I have supposed for a very long time," he answered. "I have quite expected to hear of something like this for a year past. But that note I got this morning from you was never written. It don't exist."

"I am no fit wife for you," said Rebecca.

"I am surely the best judge of that. You are held to your words, Rebecca. Have you repented of that silly note? Can not you trust me, as I am going to trust you?"

"If you know all, Alfred!"

"I know all that I know more than all. Do you think that your sister knows nothing? Do you think that Hagbut has not got it out of her? Do you not think that Russel and Sopes have not heard of it from him, and illustrated it? My story is, that your father has raised money on Lord Derwent's title-deeds to pay Carry's marriage-portion."

"You never dared believe it of him?" said Rebecca.

"Not for one instant," said Morley, laughing: "only, this being the report about him in our little world, I asked his daughter to marry me. There is very little time to talk nonsense, my dear: let us therefore talk sense. If your father's alleged utterly wrong, what earthly difference would it make between us? And under any circumstances, you know," he went on, laughing louder, "you can never be the plague and disgrace to me that Hetty has been."

Whereat he mentioned Hetty a smile came on his face, and a brightness in his eye. What had Rebecca to say to such wooing? Why, nothing.

"I repent. I am all yours. I will never distrust you again."

"Bravely said. Now I am going utterly away from you, to leave you entirely alone, without one solitary friend, for a long time. I have no hopes in England; and Naples is only full of sailors, and sailors do not pay. But our connection has given me the new Tahiti mission, wisely and well, for all Tahiti over can manage the natives, but no one the sailors. Another man was appointed, but has got a good chapel and has refused. That is to me this morning, and it came to me like a gleam of light, pretty bird, that my work for my Master lay among the sailors, and I will go."

"I see," said Rebecca, nodding her head and smiling: "this is good."

"I am half a sailor myself, you know, and I can talk to our wild boys in their own language without offending and without condescending, which is a great thing; for men dislike following a man who exhibits ignorance on their own specialité. Also, to talk coarse sometimes makes errors which the cook's mate would be ashamed of; how can we trust him in other things? It is wrong and illogical on their part, but they are silly and illogical. For my part, I think the priest who simply confesses ignorance, and applies to me for instruction, will have a good chance with them; possibly better than mine. I mean the man who will show them his ignorance, and then show them their own. But we have not these men. Our men are all too scholastic; they will talk to our sailors about the one thing of which they know nothing—seamanship. Hagbut preached a nautical sermon at my church once, which made my ears burn with sheer shame; and the lubber believes to this day that he produced a profound impression —indeed did—by one of his own utter pretentious imbecility. I have not time to go into this. I feel that I am the right man in the right place: and, to use our Saviour's own words, humbly and reverently, 'I go to prepare a place for you.' Are you content?"

"I am more than content. You are doing well. Shall you be away long?"

"A year at least."

"A whole year? And when do you go?"

"The day after to-morrow."

"That is very sudden. But is all right and well, and very good, Alfred? I shall know that you are not lost but working, and shall stay by home to prove to you that I am worthy of you. Yes. This is a little hard, and a little bitter too; but it is right and good. You have forgiven my folly of this morning?"

"Why, I really don't know that there was any folly to forgive. You acted exactly as I should have wished my wife to act. You are the dearer to me for it."

"May I help you with your preparations?" she asked.

"My chest is always packed," he answered, with a smile. "It does not take long to ship sash an old sailor as me. One chest of clothes and one of books, are all I own; and my landlady has taken good care of them."

"But I may come and see you off?" she asked.

"Surely," he said; and they passed on to talk of other matters, and talked until it was time for him to go.

She scarcely knew how to break this sudden resolution to her father; whether he would think it a kind of desertion on Mr. Morley's part she could not tell. But she broke it gently, and only said, "So soon, hey! Well, I am glad he has left me you. We will wait for him together, my child; and perhaps when he comes to fetch you away you shall take me with you out of this hateful, miserable place to a happier one."

There was a wild surging wind from the northwest, bringing with it occasional heavy showers of cold rain and hail, though there was still sunshine—one of those bitter days which are almost worse than any weather in England, except east. The river was brisk though not broken, and muddy, dashing in short crisp waves against the piles of Trafalgar Terrace. Mr. Morley was gone on board a little lugger up the river, and Rebecca had said the last words to him; she was standing at the edge of the wharf in the piercing blast, wrapped up from head to foot, shielding her little dog from the cold, and watching the ships pass swiftly seaward until his should come.

It was not long in coming. A beautiful schooner came by her head with the sea, carrying her sharp high bows in triumphant anticipation, flying before the swift squall with only a foretop-sail and a storm-jib. Then the pilot was waved his hand, and so the ship passed on eastward, under a gleam of sun, toward a heavy black cloud which lay on her path, and he was gone. And she stood silently weeping on the shore, and holding her little dog close to nestle the moist desolate heart which beat in England that day.

CHAPTER XXIV.

HOMEWARD ALONE.

But by degrees her silent crying stilled itself, and, the cold blast arousing her, she turned resolutely westward again, and left the river-side, as it was, caused her but little annoyance, for the heavy weariness which showed itself in her gait, and the feeling of solitude which grazed at her heart, made her indifferent to the weather.

A gleam of such happiness so rapidly overclouded. She had only had time for three days, and had never realized anything but position toward him. Never, as she took him on the deck of the schooner passing rapidly eastward down the river. Then she knew really, for the first time, that the man had owned her as well—had, that is to say, understood her thoroughly, and persistently shown her the best side of herself, and of himself also. Love aroused and encouraged what was good in her, and ignored what was bad; nay, had gone so high in the art of wooing that he had made her proud at her best, and himself as something better still; then she found there was no one like him in the whole of her little world. She would search no one like him in the larger world beyond hers. She knew that she loved him entirely with her whole heart.

There was no more struggle against her love for him. He was very handsome, certainly, of a rare and peculiar beauty, dangerous to the peace of mind of many women, but she thought little of that. It was his "way" which was so irresistible, and the impression left on her mind was that he had selected her, out of the girl who had been a plague to every one, to do the work which no other woman could do. That he was a penniless, friendless, and unpopular man she never considered. She looked on him as a man who had selected her as the object of perfect truth and perfect virtue, to do honor to her. She could not understand it, for, like every other young girl, she had formed a notion of herself; but the fact was the same. He loved her, and she had lost him.

She thought but as one at her face westward, in her solitude, toward her miserable home. If there was any more sentimentalism in her deep love for Morley, she could not see it. It was romantic and sentimental about him. In fact, a sentimental young lady would scarcely have liked him as a husband. He was small-limbed, delicate for a twelvemonth, three days after he had proposed to her. In Rebecca's sensible eyes this only made him bolder and more dear to her: she was assured of his love, and could laugh at detail and bogey.—Not quite at the bogey.

But this young lady had a good deal of sentimentality also, but, strangely enough, or rather naturally enough, it was not about the wooing of that article, not for Morley, but for his daughter Hetty, whom she had never seen.

If one was a Frenchman one might write, "Sentimental love is born of Mystery. Calypso steps from her pedestal and assists Eros to bind the napkin over his eyes." But I am not a Frenchman, and so will not say it. There was certainly nothing Calypsic about Rebecca's love for Mr. Morley.

But with regard to his daughter. That young lady's sentimentality was mystery to her (which made Calypso step from her pedestal). And she had certainly, in some way or another, broken through all rules, which caused Rebecca to love her, while knowing nothing about her. (Calypso binds the eyes of Eros.) And so, fighting westward against the wind, she found herself thinking very much about Hetty. "She will be home before him, and we can talk together about him. I know that I shall love her."

Stereoscopes are to me only magnified photographs. Others have the stereoscopic eye. I have only the different eye—say the left.

There went wearily along the streets of Bermondsey that day a weak, ill-clad woman with a baby on her arm, against the wind westward. There came such a driving, furious storm of cold rain that the poor woman was forced to put into an archway, and took this opportunity of opening her bosom and giving the baby her milk.

While she was doing so a shadow passed before her, and she hurriedly was drawing her shawl over her bosom, when she saw that it was only a woman, and was more at her ease.

It was a singular woman too. Very young, very handsome, dressed in a red cotton cloak, the hood to foot in a shawl, the price of which would have kept that cowering woman for a twelvemonth. Her hat was of sodden sealskin, the value of which that poor woman had reason to know, and in it was set a storm-pencil, a bird that would not mind the wet. She carried her head high this lady, and was so beautiful in face and in carriage that the cowering woman turned away.

In her bosom this splendid lady had something which was not a baby, only a little dog, with bright eyes, who put his head up to her chin.

She put her grand head down to look at it, and caught sight of her shivering companion. She spoke at once. In high, clear, splendid voice of an unaffected English lady.

"My dear creature, you are very cold."

"Yes, my lady," said the woman, "but my master is colder."

"Where is he?" said Rebecca.

"He is gone to sea, my lady, with half his kit, poor dear. He broke his arm in the frost hauling a rotten rope through a hatyard, and he misses a voyage, and we have pawned every thing, and now my man is gone to sea again."

"So is mine," said Rebecca, without thinking.

"Yes, my dear lady; but your good gentleman has his full kit aboard, no doubt. My poor man will be up country with the navvy, thin clad, while yours is warm and comfortable."

"Do you worry and vex yourself all the time your husband is away?" asked Rebecca.

"What would be the good?" the woman answered; "I've got to live, and to hope."

"Has he left you money to live on?" asked Rebecca.

"Lord bless you, no; he hadn't got none to leave. He will send it when he can, though."

"And what have you to live on, then?" asked Rebecca, deeply interested.

"Charing and needlework."

"Have you plenty of it?"

"No," she said; "don't need to be beholden; I have a connection among sea-faring men and women, and I can make my three shillings a week when I've a mind to."

"Look here," said Rebecca, suddenly and quickly, "our cases are similar in some way, but your circumstances are less than mine. I have money, you have not. Take this five pounds; I mean it to be my present to him, but had not time. When he comes home you can give to me."

"But I might be an imposter, miss," said the woman, aghast.

"I can always show that you are none," said Rebecca, and, giving her address, she walked quickly away.

Although having got thoroughly well tired, she turned, after an eight miles' walk, into her own dismal inn, and found herself comforted with Mr. Morley's last note.

In small communities mews fly fast: the whole earth is a small community now, thanks to the agency of Reuter's telegrams, which always require to be emphatically contradicted next day. It had got about in the small Waltham town connection that Mr. Morley was going to marry Miss Turner, but that she had shown such abominable temper that he had shipped on board a fast brig, and was gone to sea; and that she had started early that morning, down to the Docks, to look after the book. But this was good a thing for Russel and Sopes to miss. She must come home some time in the afternoon, and the Russel and Sopes connection of the city of Lane, as Anson did for the Acapulco plate ship, knowing that if they could lay her by the board they would make a good thing to reward them.

Their cruise was (comparatively speaking) as long as Lord Anson's, and in the end very little more dangerous. They made raids into the lane, and took Akin's house and Mr. Spicer's house—with tracts: but they were always soon off to sea again, and Akin's small schooner and the Acapulco ship arrived, and they boarded her, to the intense delight of Akin and Mr. Spicer, who were watching.

Rebecca, tall, handsome, fresh from the sea, head and shoulders in hat and storm-pencil for ornament, thinking of things far away, was arrested by Russel and Soper. Mah, who had been doing a little in the shipping-agency which she used for a cloak of licentiousness, for she bit Soper's gown without a moment's hesitation, and kept hold of it too: which so agitated Soper that fat old Russel had to do the talking.

She is a varmint little thing," said Akin to Soper, in the office.

"So is her mistress," said Mr. Spicer.

"My dear," said Russel, "we were here, and saw you coming. Are we to congratulate you?"

"On what?" said Rebecca. "Mah, you naughty little thing, be quiet."

"On your approaching marriage with Mr. Morley."

"No, I think not," said Rebecca. "He sailed for Tahiti this morning. But I am very much obliged to you, all the same."

"Is he coming back soon?" said Miss Soper, who had been delivered from Mah by Rebecca.

"I should think not," said Rebecca. "It is quite impossible that he can be back under a twelvemonth; possibly not for two years. But we are of no consequence that I know of."

And so those two very good people went away, and told the whole truth to the connection. And the whole town knew, that Mr. Morley had found out too much, and had shipped for Tahiti.

CHAPTER XXV.

HAGBUT IN A NEW LIGHT.

But to Rebecca's great and never-ending astonishment, Hagbut came out in an entirely new line of business. Hagbut was stupid, vain, avaricious, and selfish. You will find such characters in every form of religion, just as you will find Morleys. But Hagbut was an exceptional man. The man had power. He had put a few seals before him, social and religious; and in steadily resuming those ends he looked neither to the right nor the left. The success of his own small religious connection, and his own personal governance of that connection, were his two great objects. Take him apart from those objects, and you would find a sane not without strength, but who seemed narrower, because he referred all matters in heaven and earth to his own services and that of his connection. If my matter did not appear to him to interfere with these two objects he could be just, and even generous.

Now Rebecca had done no such thing as the scandalous Hetty; and besides—and besides—well, he had been fond of Rebecca once on a time. And sometimes, when Carry was most religious, and most affectionate—when he was rewarded with most obvious work, and would gladly have heard something of the world which he was bound to despise in words, Hagbut thought earnestly that he had made a mistake. Rebecca would not have him, it is true; still, Carry, with her money, was a great bore, and Rebecca was worth ten of Carry.

Russel and Soper invaded him when he was thinking of these things, and saying to himself that he was glad the poor girl was so well treated with Morley; and honestly, and, as far as he was able, tenderly wishing her good luck, Russel and Soper did not meet with the impression which they calculated.

"It has gone and left her," said Miss Soper.

Rebecca Turner was down after him to the docks this morning; but he has gone and left her."

"He has gone to provide a home for her," said Mr. Hagbut.

"Very likely, it is not so. Mr. Morley has run away. She told us with her own lips that he was gone away, and that she didn't care when he came back."

"I know she didn't say that," said Hagbut, bending his ugly face on Miss Soper, and thrusting his most wretched jaw in a way which Miss Soper did not like. "What were her words?"

"Her words were that he was gone for a twelvemonth, and that it was no matter," said Mrs. Russel.

"See how you stand cross-examination, you two," said Hagbut. "I can't trust a word you say. Now look you here, you two. That girl is my sister-in-law, and a good girl too; and Morley is the most refined and educated man in our connection—a connection which wants, what I have not got, refinement and education more than most. And you have frightened her pulled about. She is a fine creature."

The more cowardly Russel was abashed at once: not so the more resolute and sourer Soper, who had never felt a man's influence, but who had got on by bullying by brute force.

You pulled her name about one time pretty freely yourself," said she.

"Yes: but it was my business. This is none of yours. You mind what I say, and leave the girl alone. I won't have her meddled with. Russel, I have said my say."

And, indeed, he looked very much as if he did. Pale, ugly, and generally lazy as he was, there was an unusual amount of energy and animation in the man, with a good deal of shrewd sense. Russel and Soper had brains enough to tell that this; Rebecca had brains enough to find out more.

She was alone that evening, with no sister to bore her, looking Morley across the map, when the little maid told her that Mr. Hagbut was come to see her. And she said, "Show him in."

Mr. Hagbut came in, and they greeted one another civilly; after which Mr. Hagbut pointed to the sofas, and said:

"After him?"

"Yes."

"You are a happy woman, Rebecca, if it is all right between you and Morley. Come, sister-in-law, tell me that it is."

"It is 'all right,' as you call it," said Rebecca, laughing. "He is going to be away for an indefinite time; but we are, what the vulgar call, engaged."

I wish you happy, most heartily," said Hagbut, leaning his ugly face on his great fat hands and looking at her. "It is your own fault if you are not. He is refined, and a gentleman; I am neither one nor the other."

"I think you are a very good man, Mr. Hagbut," she said, looking him frankly in the face.

"I do among vulgar people, being vulgar myself. And I do good where a gentleman would fail. But, Rebecca, it is well we did not marry."

"It is very well, indeed," said Rebecca.

"I suppose you have often put this case to yourself with regard to me—If I had married that ugly, fat man, without ideas, without the manners of a gentleman, without education, death would have been better than life.' You have put it so, have you not?"

"Not as strongly as that, Mr. Hagbut; but still very strongly," said Rebecca, with resolution.

"Did you ever put the other side of the question?" asked Hagbut. "Did you ever think of me? Did you ever think for one instant what a hell on earth (I beg pardon) my life would have been, tied for life to a beautiful, clever, refined, and furiously rebellious woman like yourself? You cannot comprehend on your second day's graduate me on mine. We should not have lived together a month in decency; for my will is as invariable."

Rebecca paused for a long time. At last she said:

"It seems to me, brother-in-law, that you are a very honest man. You served me ill once; but let us forget all, and be friends as we could have I want them. Come, brother-in-law, do not be my enemy, although we can never be companions; for we should squabble so decidedly over ways of speech on religious matters, you know; and I doubt if we should agree with regard to Henry."

"What do you know of her?" said Mr. Hagbut.

"Nothing. What has she done?"

"If you do not know, I see no reason for telling you. I have taken my side there, and will maintain it."

"Well, if you go against her, you will spare me?" said Rebecca.

Hagbut would not have taken an oath in a court of justice to save his life; but in his heart, without speech, he swore a deep and terrible oath then. No relapse that can be without comment; and the deepest sentimental part of Hagbut's soul was aroused by the spectacle of this lovely unaided and defenceless girl, whom he had once thought that he had loved, in spite of his fear of her, alone against the world. Hagbut made no protestation silently to himself that he would stand between this poor child and the world, which meant their small connection. And he did it like a real and loyal soul. It is easy to see the worst of these men. You must know them to find out the best of them. For my part, I love down many ministers of religion. Roman Catholic verbiage or Dissenting verbiage may be offensive to the ear; but in twenty years I have only known two bad ministers of religion of any sect, and that is not a large percentage, after all! one speaks, of course, merely of a limited personal acquaintance. Being on dangerous ground I will step off it; merely enrolling my opinion that the ministers of religion, with a few remarkable exceptions, are the most valuable class in the community.

Hagbut spoke to Rebecca no more after this. Carry would have been jealous had she known that he had said so much. But Russel and Soper's ridiculing of Rebecca were now reduced to sniffs and glances.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE GAZETTE.

AND so it came about that Rebecca, who began at the beginning of this story by finding herself dead, wished nothing of the kind now; but only wished, like Jane Eyre, "that she might keep in good health and not die."

Yet she was infinitely worse off than in the old times when she wished herself dead. She was in utter and entire solitude; for her father was not much better company than can be found in the saner side of Bedlam. She had not a soul to speak to in the way of sympathy—knowledge the confidential, except Mab, and Mab could not answer her.

Although Hagbut had stilled all tongues with his fat emphatic fist, yet even he could not prevent people looking at Rebecca in chapel; and she knew that they were looking at her, and she hated it. She never saw them looking at her, but she felt it; and the effect of this consciousness on her face was to produce an expression of calm, careless anger, which assisted devotion in no way whatever.

Had she known that they were only studying in a humble way her imperial, magnificent beauty, reading it like a book, and learning from it, as one learns art at first, from a great and traditionally authenticated picture, she might have been content, and have given at times softer developments of her not very mobile face. But she thought they were only staring at her, and she hated to her chapel worse than ever.

She felt this more than ever one morning, when she had gone alone, her father being too ill to come. "I will never go again," she said. "They hate me." And she stalked out through the crowd with her head in the air.

Soper was helping Russel along, and said, "Did you ever see any thing like that?"

"A bold-faced jig," said Russel.

"Or a hussy," said Soper the schoolmistress, "did you ever see such beauty in all your life? Because I have had some experience, and I never did."

Soper and Russel went their ways, and Rebecca went hers. But she was followed home by two admirers.

Mr. Akin and Mr. Spicer. When they had turned into their own lane they came up beside her, one on each side, and spoke to her boldly and eagerly.

"Glad to see you about, Miss. Mr. Turner is quite well, I hope?"

"My father is not at all well," said Rebecca. "I am so glad to see you two at chapel."

"We will leave that alone, Miss, at present," said Mr. Spicer. "We want to speak to you very particular indeed, Miss. Don't us, Jim?"

"Indeed we do."

"You see, Miss," said Mr. Spicer the sweep, "we sweeps as a general rule are the cleanest of all working classes, always a-washing when we turns in. But we have what we call the black bed, into which we turns in all our crock when there's a difficult flue and a early morning. And we got orders for Beaufort House, and (you won't tell on a man for breaking the act) I lay in the black bed with my youngest son Tom, to put he up the flue before the police was round. It was about the hours, I know, but that boy loves his perfession. He will say he was late for that boy is as much an artist in a crooked flue as the great Lawley in the Mycenæ. Well, Miss, with a father's feelings I went with him, of course, and we was no sooner out of our house than he said,

"'See to those coves round Mr. Turner's, father.'

"Burglars?' asked Rebecca.

"There was two on them, Miss. It was pretty dark, but we could see. One was a young chap, and the other a old 'ooman.'

"This is very alarming," said Rebecca. "What did you do?"

"I called out the name of the man I knowed. I said, 'Bob Syers, you hook it.' And he offered to return a low remark, referring to a misfortune of mine in years gone by; but he looked it all the same."

"Whatever shall we do?" said Rebecca.

"Put the police to watch. Syers is well knowed, as a doubtless the young swell."

"I can't employ the police," said Rebecca, imploringly. "Whatever shall I do?"

In the following paragraph I am only speaking of what I have seen with my own eyes. And the fortune and intensity, but there it is, for better or for worse—a great deal for worse, I should say.

Rebecca had won these men. Not by her beauty, for their eyes were too utterly untrained to see her beauty. Had Hagbut suddenly pronounced Buckingham Palace to be finer than Wells, Bayeux, or Salisbury, and have called Whitehorse an barn, Mr. Spicer would have called a red-faced Devon lass far prettier than Rebecca; it was not her beauty which had won them unto, it was her sympathy with misery. They were neither of them very respectable men, but either of them would have fought for her, gladly in return for what would have been for their wives, at any time. Now that she had confessed to them that there was something the matter in her father's house, which made the police being called in, they would die for her or risk it. There was a new bond of sympathy between her and these men now, which made them ready for any thing in her behalf. It is all wrong and bad, but so it is. Here is a case where the criminal class begins. Still less do you know where the sympathy with the criminal class begins.

And further, Mr. Turner, solicitor and Methodist, had been an offensive person to them both by his mere existence hitherto. Mr. Turner also was an obvious hitch in his affairs, insoluble by those enemies of mankind the Metropolitan police, they began to have a fellow-feeling for him which they never had before. The sympathies of people like Mr. Spicer and Mr. Akin are distinctly not of the intellectual kind. An old sentimental grounds they were perfectly ready to assist Rebecca.

"Lord bless you, Miss," said Mr. Spicer, "don't vex yourself. We will watch. You have got a little dog as will bark."

"Yes," said Rebecca, drawing Mab.

"Pretty dear," said Jim Akin, "there she is. Let me have the handling of her, Miss, please. She is worth ten pounds of any dog as a pup about this dog which is at fault, Miss," he continued, nursing Mab.

"Never mind the dog, Jim," said Mr. Spicer.

"Ah, but I do mind the dog, Tom," said Mr. Akin. "You ain't a eyesoure in dogs, you see."

"He'd serve any burglar as he's tasked before, Miss," said Mr. Spicer. "We all have our fancies. But see here; don't vex a gun?"

"Yes, I know how my father has shown me."

"Then," said Mr. Spicer, "every time that little dog barks, you fire a gun out a window by me and Jim will be with you. They won't try it on often, if you do that, Miss. Their nerves is never good, with the cracking of cockchafers, so they will get scared; if we get 'em in the house, why, then, we shall know what to do. You couldn't believe how we can manage. In fact, we don't want no police round here."

"I will do what you tell me," said Rebecca. "If any thing were to happen, no one could hold your tongues—keep silent—could you not?"

Mr. Spicer sniffed, and Mr. Akin, in giving Mab back, winked. "I'll tell no more about the hocker, Tom," said this coarse young man.

"Hold your tongue, you fool," said Mr. Spicer. "What do you suppose the young lady would want to know about the running of a two-penny half-penny, four inches a minute, such as high up the river as this, in a ballast lighter? I am ashamed on you. Good-afternoon, Miss; depend on us." And so they went.

Leaving Rebecca with the terrible impression that she had connected herself with the criminal classes, not through her own fault, but utterly without hope of extrication. She was so puzzled by her quaint position that she was to Mab, by mistress at Akin's until I come out again. I said father had not broken the law in this matter, even from his very high motives. Bother you!" she continued, shaking her fist at the law of the land; "you will pass over Sir Gorham Philpott and Lord Docetry, and you will catch my father. You Brute, not if I can stop it."

She had come at her purpose before she reached home. Her father was in a very difficult position—retaining papers which he had no right to detain—detaining them on very chivalrous grounds. Chivalry had only been part of the consequences in a sentimental, or, as she put it, Wallham Green way; the first thing she had to do was to get rid of the papers—view of the question before him.

So she burst in on him suddenly, and said, "Pa, you have made a nice mess of it. They are going to rob and murder us all. They were about the house last night, I am sure."

"So I suppose," said Mr. Turner.

"So you suppose," said Rebecca. "Well, I tell you, pa, the Mycenæ is to be sunk, and that I am not going to stand it. Trampling about in other people's gardens, indeed! I tell you, pa, that I am not going to stand it."

"Are you going to leave me, Becky?" said Mr. Turner.

Rebecca had not calculated on this. The thread of her argument was raveled.

"Leave you, dear," she said, kneeling at his feet, "I will leave no one, father, I have no one left but you, now Alfred is gone. My dear, I will never leave you this side of the grave."

"I called that name of the man I knowed. I said, 'Bob Syers, you hook it.' And he offered in return a low remark, referring to a misfortune of mine in years gone by; but he looked it all the same."

"Whatever shall we do?" said Rebecca.

"Put the police to watch. Syers is well knowed, as a doubtless the young swell."

"I can't employ the police," said Rebecca, imploringly. "Whatever shall I do?"

In the following paragraph I am only speaking of what I have seen with my own eyes. And the fortune and intensity, but there it is, for better or for worse—a great deal for worse, I should say.

Rebecca had won these men. Not by her beauty, for their eyes were too utterly untrained to see her beauty. Had Hagbut suddenly pronounced Buckingham Palace to be finer than Wells, Bayeux, or Salisbury, and have called Whitehorse an barn, Mr. Spicer would have called a red-faced Devon lass far prettier than Rebecca; it was not her beauty which had won them unto, it was her sympathy with misery. They were neither of them very respectable men, but either of them would have fought for her, gladly in return for what would have been for their wives, at any time. Now that she had confessed to them that there was something the matter in her father's house, which made the police being called in, they would die for her or risk it. There was a new bond of sympathy between her and these men now, which made them ready for any thing in her behalf. It is all wrong and bad, but so it is. Here is a case where the criminal class begins. Still less do you know where the sympathy with the criminal class begins.

And further, Mr. Turner, solicitor and Methodist, had been an offensive person to them both by his mere existence hitherto. Mr. Turner also was an obvious hitch in his affairs, insoluble by those enemies of mankind the Metropolitan police, they began to have a fellow-feeling for him which they never had before. The sympathies of people like Mr. Spicer and Mr. Akin are distinctly not of the intellectual kind. An old sentimental grounds they were perfectly ready to assist Rebecca.

"Lord bless you, Miss," said Mr. Spicer, "don't vex yourself. We will watch. You have got a little dog as will bark."

"Yes," said Rebecca, drawing Mab.

"Pretty dear," said Jim Akin, "there she is. Let me have the handling of her, Miss, please. She is worth ten pounds of any dog as a pup about this dog which is at fault, Miss," he continued, nursing Mab.

"Never mind the dog, Jim," said Mr. Spicer.

"Ah, but I do mind the dog, Tom," said Mr. Akin. "You ain't a eyesoure in dogs, you see."

"He'd serve any burglar as he's tasked before, Miss," said Mr. Spicer. "We all have our fancies. But see here; don't vex a gun?"

"Yes, I know how my father has shown me."

"Then," said Mr. Spicer, "every time that little dog barks, you fire a gun out a window by me and Jim will be with you. They won't try it on often, if you do that, Miss. Their nerves is never good, with the cracking of cockchafers, so they will get scared; if we get 'em in the house, why, then, we shall know what to do. You couldn't believe how we can manage. In fact, we don't want no police round here."

"I will do what you tell me," said Rebecca. "If any thing were to happen, you

THE HARVARD MONUMENT.

In the year 1637 there landed upon the shores of New England a devout clergyman, "one Mr. HARVARD, a godly gentleman and lover of learning." Little is known of his life, or of his career as a preacher; and no work of his authorship has come down to us. He settled in Charlestown, Massachusetts, where he labored at his calling for a short time, and died of consumption scarcely two years after his arrival. He brought over from England a small collection of books, which, with a moiety of his fortune, amounting to £800, he bequeathed to a school at Newtowne, now Cambridge. The following year this school was incorporated, and received the title of Harvard College.

The traveler going from Boston eastward by the Boston and Maine Railroad may plainly discern upon his right, across a small sheet of water forming a small bay in the river Charles, crowded down to the water's edge, within a stone's throw of the northern wall which surrounds the State Prison, and almost under the shadow of that massy shaft which towers majestically over Bunker Hill, a small and unpretending cemetery, now somewhat hidden among the green foliage of its trees and shrubbery. In earlier days it was probably retired in its situation, but as the population of the town increased the dwellings of the inhabitants approached nearer and nearer, until they loomed it entirely to except upon the water side.

The cemetery is now apparently but little used, and save now and then some wandering visitors, like ourselves a day or two ago, few persons are ever seen within its walls. The approach to it is along a narrow street, or rather court, since the entrance gate bounds the end of the passage. The houses of the immediate vicinity are somewhat dingy, of the humbler and lowly class, and noisy, bareheaded, barefooted urchins shout and play up and down the court, or before the iron gateway.

Procuring the key of the grating, we enter the ancient burying-ground. There is an absence of the usual white marble monuments and gravestones which now so generally mark the resting-places of the dead; and the monumental slabs, being mostly of a dark, dull, grayish hue, give rather a sombre aspect to the place. The whole cemetery is overrun with long, tangled grass and weeds, with no trim borders, no clinging vines or flowering plants, tended by the hand of love and friendship. Long ranges of tombs are built into the rising ground, and line the sides of its base, mostly with brick fronts, and all wearing a neglected and dilapidated appearance. Some of the fronts are bulging outward, and some only seem to need the displacement of a brick to cause the whole wall to tumble. There are but few paths, and some of them are hardly traceable under the rank herbage.

THE HARVARD MONUMENT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY G. W. VENNER, CHARLESTOWN, MASSACHUSETTS.]

No dates upon the tombstones are very recent, and many date far back to the early colonial days. Here one may read the familiar names of BUNKER and BREED, which are interwoven in the history of the first struggles of the Revolution on the adjacent hills. We noticed one small, weather-beaten stone bearing this inscription in plain and well-cut letters:

Here lies ye Body of FAITHFVL ROWSE,
Aged 76 years.
Died May ye 10th, 1664.

The centre of the ground rises in a gentle hillock, and upon the summit of the mound stands a plain shaft of granite, which is the principal monument of the cemetery. Upon one side of that simple obelisk is chiseled the revered and honored name,

HARVARD.

The monument is of Quincy granite, fifteen feet in height, four feet square at the foot, resting upon its foundation without a pedestal or base, and is inclosed with a plain iron fence.

The name in large letters is in high relief, said to have been the first attempt of the kind in granite. Two inscriptions, one in Latin and one in English, are cut in tablets of white marble set into the stone.

Upon that burial hill for nearly one hundred and forty years after his death the grave of the good JOHN HARVARD remained unmolested and undisturbed. Then the waves of the Revolution rolled over the land, and even this quiet abode of death did not escape being disturbed by the rude turmoils of war. Its simple memorial stones were thrown down, broken, or sacrilegiously appropriated for other uses, and among them the stone which marked JOHN HARVARD'S hallowed dust was lost. On the 26th of September, 1828, upon the one hundred and ninetieth anniversary of his death, the present monument, with its appropriate inscriptions, was erected, with simple and impressive ceremonies, by the officers and students of the college at that time, and numerous graduates, one of whom, the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT, delivered the address upon the occasion.

Nearly two and a half centuries have now passed since the dying gift of the Rev. JOHN HARVARD "minister of God's word," was received, and his wishes carried into execution. Behold then and now! The little library of three hundred and twenty volumes has multiplied into more than one hundred and fifty thousand, while the modest sum of eight hundred pounds has increased a thousandfold. There, almost within sight of each other, stand the two monuments which perpetuate his name and memory. One stands amidst the silent habitations of the dead, where now and then the curious visitor steps with softened tread, tarries a passing hour to read the brief records of those whose ashes rest below, then turns away with calmed and sobered thought. The other stands a living and ever-increasing good to all who linger within its pleasant precincts, and, as the years roll on, still multiplying its blessings and its usefulness.

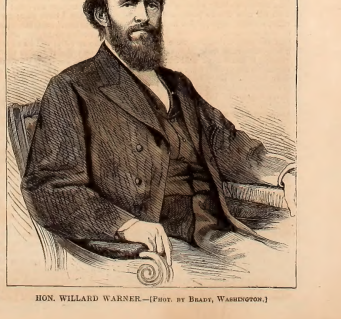
THE ALABAMA SENATORS.

We give on this page portraits of Generals GEORGE E. SPENCER and WILLARD WARNER, Senators from the State of Alabama.

General WILLARD WARNER was born in Granville, Ohio, in 1826. He graduated at Marietta College in 1845, and subsequently went to California, where he remained until 1852; during his stay there he assisted in the organization of the State Government. Upon his return to Ohio he built the Newark Machine Shops, said to be the most excellent west of the Alleghany Mountains. He remained in charge of these shops until the beginning of the civil war, when he took an active part in the raising of men and material for the use of the Government. He became Major of the Seventy-fifth Ohio Infantry, and soon afterward was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel, and, by the request of General SHERMAN, was assigned to that officer's staff. Before the close of the Atlanta campaign he was promoted to the Colonelship of the One Hundred and Eightieth Ohio, and in that capacity served under THOMAS at Nashville, and SCHOFIELD in North Carolina. He was elected to the Ohio Senate in 1865, serving two years. In the spring of 1867 he settled in Alabama, having been for the two years previous engaged in planting near Montgomery. He was elected from Alabama to the United States Senate in July, 1868, for the short term. He is a man of marked ability and of undoubted integrity.

General GEORGE E. SPENCER was born in Jefferson County, New York, November 1, 1836. He left New York in 1855 for the West and South. When the war broke out he was appointed Adjutant-General to General DODGE. In 1862 he organized the First Alabama Cavalry, in command of which he served throughout the war. His services in this connection were remarkably brilliant and valuable. Our readers probably well remember his charge at White Pond Run, where with his single regiment he attacked and routed five regiments of rebel cavalry, capturing their colors, and pursuing them for eight miles.

HON. GEORGE E. SPENCER.—[PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.]



HON. WILLARD WARNER.—[PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.]

As in the cases of Senators WARNER and SPENCER, the men who are now appointed to responsible positions in the South are, as a rule, men distinguished for their fidelity to the Union.

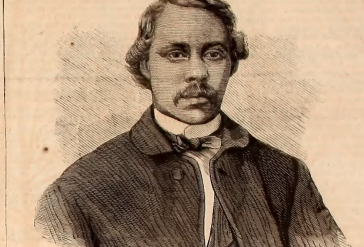
NEW CITY HALL, BALTIMORE.

AFTER the question of a new City Hall for the accommodation of the municipal offices of the city of Baltimore had been agitated for some years, the City Council, in 1863, issued a call to architects for the submission of plans for the proposed edifice. Quite a number responded, and from them was selected, for its peculiar fitness and completeness of arrangement, as well as elegance, the design of MR. GEORGE A. FREDERICK, Architect, the view of which, taken from his drawings, is shown in our illustration.

The ground which the building will occupy lies directly in the centre of the city and in the business portion thereof, and for location and suitability could not be surpassed. It is directly opposite the new United States Court-house—a handsome building erected within the last few years—and within a short distance of the Post-office, the Custom-house, the Courts, and other public buildings. The square occupied is bounded respectively by North, Holliday, Lexington, and Fayette streets, and embraces an area of 45,936 square feet, of which the building will occupy 25,000 square feet.

The style of the architecture adopted is the Renaissance, which, by not being confined with undeviating strictness to ancient classic art, is peculiarly well adapted to a building of this description.

The foundations are very massive. A course of concrete or beton is first laid down, three feet six inches deep and seven feet wide, and then rammed. This beton is composed of broken stone and hydraulic cement in courses of nine inches. A course of blue stone flags seven feet wide is laid upon this. Upon this foundation the walls begin. They are five feet wide at the bottom, but gradually diminish to three feet at the top. The building being square, there are four exterior fronts. Smooth white marble, obtained from the Baltimore County quarries, will be used to face these fronts, which will be relieved by projecting columns, pilasters, cornices, balustrades, and arches to the windows. The main body of the building will be four stories high, and will be surmounted by an iron dome, which is to contain a large clock and alarm-bell. The dome will be surmounted by an immense lantern, and will rise



EBENEZER D. BASSETT, COLORED MINISTER TO HAYTI.
PHOT. BY J. W. HUBS, PHILADELPHIA.—(SEE PAGE 283.)

131 feet above the roof, the total height of the summit of the dome from the ground being 227 feet.

The Board of Health, Fire, Telegraph, Police, and Water departments will occupy the ground-floor. Here will also be located several inspectors' rooms and some apartments which can be rented out for offices, and which would yield a large revenue to the city, as they would be very eligible business locations. The Council chambers and Committee-rooms entirely occupy the second story. The design of the City Hall is beautiful and pleasing, and for elegance can scarcely be surpassed. When completed it will be the finest municipal structure in the United States.

ATTAR OF ROSES.

THE imitations of this perfume convey but a faint idea of the exquisite delicacy of the genuine oil, the high price of which, combined with its pungency, rendering it an object of general and easy adulteration. Even at Ghazipoor, in British India, where it is very extensively manufactured, the pure attar can not readily be obtained, the temptation to fraud being greater than the cupidity of the needy Ryot can withstand.

A field of ripe wheat waving in the sunlight, a plantation of opening cotton pods, and an expanse of flowering poppies are all lovely sights, but not to be compared with the rose fields of Ghazipoor; there roses are not cultivated in patches, but by acres, and these counted by hundreds and thousands; far as the eye can reach there are roses, and nothing but roses, the surrounding atmosphere being saturated with the charming odor.

When full blown the roses are carefully gathered, the petals stripped off and thrown into a trough, in which they are bruised under a heavy stone, something after the fashion of an ancient cider-press, until a pulpy mass is formed, which is then distributed in small quantities into numerous shallow earthenware dishes, and water sufficient to cover it poured on. These dishes are then placed in a well-shaded spot, from whence the rays of the sun are excluded, and carefully watched for a fine film of oil which appears on the surface of the water; this, being removed by very delicate manipulation, is the genuine attar, to produce an ounce of which the petals of 400,000 roses are required; so volatile is its nature that the slightest increase of temperature would dissipate the fruits of a season's labor, for the water from which the oil is taken can only be sold as second quality rose-water, the first quality containing all the essential oil of the flowers.

The price of the attar varies with the extent of the rose crop; in Calcutta it ranges from $60 to $100 per ounce, but that high figure will not certainly command the pure article, for the cultivators very skillfully adulterate the oil before selling it, by an admixture of sandal-wood oil and rosolio—an oil obtained from the grass of the teak jungles of Western Hindostan.

The natives of Southern India use much of the produce of Ghazipoor in anointing their hideous gods, and on certain festival days, when the images are paraded through the streets, the atmosphere is rendered heavy and almost sickening by the powerful odor permeating from Vishnu and his attendant priests.

Apropos of the strength of the genuine attar, an anecdote occurs to the writer which may be of interest to the readers of this journal:

An attaché of the English Embassy at Constantinople was conveying dispatches from the legation to the Foreign Office in London, when one evening, just after he had crossed the Turkish frontier, his carriage was attacked by a band of robbers who, without maltreating him, pilfered his baggage. The horses having run off when the traces were cut, MR. K—— was compelled to return on foot to the town which he had left an hour before. Late as it was the young diplomat sought and obtained an interview with the Pacha, a renegade Frenchman, who listened with attentive politeness to a recital of his misfortune, in the course of which Mr. K—— mentioned that in the scramble for plunder the robbers had managed to break a pint bottle of attar which he was carrying under the magic seal of the F. O. to some high personage in England. "A pint of attar! Holy! Jupiter!" exclaimed the Pacha, "it is enough to perfume the whole vile town." His own exclamation appeared to have exhausted an idea of official mind, for he assured Mr. K—— that if the robbers were in his Pachalic they should be discovered and punished. With this assurance Mr. K—— was fain to rest content, and accept the hospitality of the Turkish Governor for the night.

THE NEW CITY HALL, BALTIMORE.

At sunrise on the following morning he was roused by a summons from the Pacha to attend a military parade of the entire garrison, which, to the number of some thousands, was already assembled on the Maidan outside the walls of the town.

The Pacha walked slowly through the ranks of the soldiery, every now and then stopping to pick out a man, who was consigned to the care of his escort; in this manner he selected about a dozen, and sent them to Mr. K—— to see if he could identify them as the robbers, but the Englishman could not say whether any one of them was of the number of his assailants.

"I know these are the men," said the Pacha, "and I will prove it." He ordered the bastinado to be applied to those who should confess where the booty was concealed. Before three blows had been struck they were all yelling out the desired information.

The Pacha was greatly elated at the result of his inspection, privately confessing to Mr. K—— that having a peculiarly sensitive organ of smell, and, moreover, being passionately fond of attar, he had easily detected the robbers by the odor which hung around their persons for long intervals from contact with the articles saturated with the contents of the broken bottle. He had also cautions about his soldiers, and when the attar was mentioned by Mr. K——, he at once saw how his suspicions could be set at rest.

The stolen property was recovered, and "if a royal personage in England had lost a pint of attar, that he should, in parting, "it had cost the Sultan twelve soldiers."

Mr. K—— realized the price paid when, driving again from the palace, he saw twelve dead bodies hanging like scarecrows against the wall.

ODD MONSTERS.

It is as good as a nightmare to look at the pictures in Schenck's "History of Monsters," a little quarto book of memorable human deformities, published by two brothers and sixty years ago. The author was one of the best physicians of his time, a voluminous writer who has left us a thick, closely-printed folio of the most interesting cases he had met with in medicine and surgery, monsters included; but the monsters have also a little volume to themselves. We start with a double body and no head, but having windows in its breasts, for there was its eyes. Then comes the son of a tailor of Mecklenburg, who had what seemed to be the faint suggestion of a face wrapped round with a great Turkish night-cap. As there seemed to be a face under a plastic mask, the mask was removed, and below was revealed a horribly gross mouth which opened to roar without a tongue, and eyes without pupils, behind which fire seemed to shine; there was no brain, and there were no bones to the skull, but the upper part of the head was twisted up like a tall turban. The right hand of this child was always open, the left always doubled into a fist. Doctor Schenck gives an edifying picture, after the manner of a modern Valentine, showing the child's hand as it appeared before the mask was lifted. You may lift the mask here for yourself, and see what you shall see—not a Cupid. It is hardly worth while to mention children with cats heads; or with horns, and a broad mouth like a whale's, or a young rabbit before its spanking; or with pigtails actually growing from their necks. That latter form must, in the days of parsley, have been known to be a hundred—at least in the part of nature to keep pace with the fashions. One child had a goose's back and wings, another a frog's head, another a deer-eyed human face, and a little fellow at Stettin was born with something like a tortoise-shell on the top of his head, and a white mouse's tail peeping out from under it. There was (was there?) a child born in Basle, in 1556, with such wide nostrils that his brain could be seen through them. But then another had no nose at all, nor eyes, nor ears, only a mouth, and the rest of the face blank; while another had no nose and in his head that a full calf-sized arm grew out from where one of his ears should be. This monster had also no elbow bridge.

From the commentaries of Sigibert we are told of the child born at Remuso in the reign of, Emperor Frederick, who bore the sign (or the rather chests), with four arms, and two heads. The two heads were not better than one, for they were differently disposed, so one might be crying while the other laughed, one feeding, the other sleeping; sometimes they quarrelled, and there was a fight of the two pairs of arms. This child is said to have lived two years, one part dying four days before the other, which was killed by the decay of its inseparable neighbor. Cardan tells us of a Milanese girl with two heads, in all other respects single, except that she was found after death to have two stomachs. It would not have been bigamy to marry her, although in fairness she would be entitled to a husband with two heads; not the creature figured by the side of her with two monkey heads, monkey legs, and a fox's brush, but possibly the rage two-headed philosopher figured below her, one of whose heads looks very much startled at what his other head is whispering into its ear. There are gentlemen living who would find it a great convenience, if they could indulge in this mutual confidence by proxy, and yet keep their conversation to themselves. Among the two-headed women was one in Bavaria, twenty-six of whose two faces one was pretty the other ugly. In the time of Francis the First of France there was a man named Lazarus, whose second head grew out of the trunk of his body, and was carried under his wristcoat. This head had a secret hunger of its own that no food taken by the visible mouth would satisfy.

Ancestors of Miss Biffin we can more literally believe in. A man of forty four years ago not long before Doctor Schenck made his collection at cases, who, being without arms, could grasp an axe with his mouth, and with it chop wood, throw it as far as his neighbors, or in the same way hold and crack a whip with the best of them. Although he had no hands to keep from picking and stealing, he was eventually condemned for theft, and broken on the wheel. He also had a nose, it is said, for eating and drinking. Dion tells that one of the gifts sent to Augustus from the Indian princes was without arms, who could hit his feet skillfully in shooting with the bow. Schenck himself saw an armless woman doing needle-work with her feet, and Cardan saw an armless man throw a spear, stitch a garment, cut, drink, write, and thread a needle. Two cases with the same object in the highest repute for handwriting—or, shouldn't we say, footwriting?—with his toes, and to the elegant designs in which the original specimens of this accomplished ship. He excelled also in arithmetic and chess-playing without eyes. Another armless woman cut, book-binding, cross-bow shooting. He cut for himself his slices of bread with his feet, carried food and drink to his mouth with his foot also mended his own pens when he wrote. A hundred years earlier there had been a man living to old age under the care of the landlord, who had learned to be very helpful to himself, though he had no right hand, three fingers joined together of a left hand, and no toes even to his feet. He learned to write well, and do many things with his misshapen and imperfect left hand.

From the people without feet we pass to the records of joint births like that of the Siamese twins. Some had a second head on the chest, some by the forehead, some by the chest, some by the back; there are plenty of all kinds. The most remarkable case of all is that of adult years, who, in 1519, showed himself in Switzerland with another man's body and head growing from his breast, alive and complete in all parts from the neck downward; but the head, if there was any, seemed to have disappeared with his chest. He lured his chest and displayed what seemed to be a living child which had forced its head through it. The rest of Doctor Schenck's collection we will leave to the imagination of any one who, having brought himself into a state of temporary lunacy, will confine himself for six weeks to a diet of pork-chops. For, after winding up the catalogue of human monsters, with a sensation very like a fever and delirium coming on, he gives his mind to the monstrosities of brutes.

TEETH WITHOUT A STAIN.

No impurity can infect the teeth cleaned daily with SOZODONT. Quillay, the bark of the Chilian Soap Tree, an article of the whole world's commerce properties superior to those of any other known substance, is one of the ingredients of this peerless compound. So powerful is its detergent influence in existence in which this salubrious botanical product is incorporated. —[Com.]

INTERESTING TO LADIES.—My GROVER & BAKER Machine has been over ten years in steady family use, and has never needed any thing in the way of repairs. It seems likely to answer as well for the next ten years.

R. ROODE, Lexington, Ky.

FRAGRANCE OF THE BOUQUET.

COLGATE & CO. have been completely successful in imparting to their TOILET SOAPS the fragrance of the bouquet.—Nashville Union and Times.

TO REMOVE MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Prepared only by DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.—[Com.]

WALTHAM WATCHES are the best and the cheapest.—N. MATSON & Co., Chicago.

DYSPEPSIA TABLETS cure Indigestion, Heartburn, and Sour Stomach. Fifty Cents per Box. Mailed for 60c. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 37 Broadway.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" Still Waves. You whole page only 25 cts. 8 pp., 40 long columns (Ledger size). Its worth reading. Subscribe NOW. Specimen, 6 cts. Address "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," Bluffdale, N. H.

THOMAS R. AGNEW,
ESTABLISHED 1836,
260 Greenwich St., corner Murray, New York,
IS OFFERING CHEAP,
FOR CASH:
COFFEES.—Green, Roasted, and Ground: all grades to suit the palate and the pocket of the million; 15c., 20c., 25c., 30c., 40c.; Mocha, 50c.
TEAS.—Every body should know who they buy teas of, as all who sell them are not wholesale dealers. Mr. Agnew spent three years in China, and knows exactly what teas are, and does not deal in damaged goods of any kind; consequently every pound of tea sold is warranted as represented, or the money returned.
MOLASSES.—Mr. Agnew has his agent in New Orleans, so expects to receive two ships this fall, the choicest of the crop.
RICE.—Mr. Agnew has a house in South Carolina, who ship him the best bean rice in market.
FLOUR is received direct from the mills. Genesee, Indiana, and St. Louis, best brands in market, from $7 to $8 per barrel.
GROCERIES.—Every thing desired in families, hotels, restaurants, boarding-houses, steamships and sailing vessels will be fill'd by Mr. Agnew, who is a live man, working 16, 18, and 20 hours every day for the last quarter of a century. He is a thorough-acquainted with the old-fashioned grocers, who have been brought up in a snug-fist school, or old masters for others, and now begin to flap their wings when grog-headed. In a word, Agnew is as far ahead of the triple as Lucifer is of the cart-horse when trotting. He is the man for the people—quick and thorough and punctual as time.

A COMPLEXION
FRESH AND SPOTLESS.
This important element of beauty depends upon the condition of the blood, and the vigor with which it circulates. If the vital fluid, meandering through the small vessels, immediately underlie the cuticle, is of a rich red color, and flows freely under the semi-transparent veil of his complexion, the complexion will be rosy, pure, and brilliant. Stafford's IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS, by toning the circulating vessels, and depriving the blood of all impurities that it may contain, soon removes pimples, blotches, and every species of discoloration or eruption from the face, arms, bosom, or any part of the body, and renders the complexion as free from blemish as a cloudless sky. Try them, and look purer day on the tongue.
Sold by all DRUGGISTS.
1 Package, 12 Powders, $1. 2 Packages, 50 Powders, $2. Mailed Free.
HALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N. Y.

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.—A Complete Library of Modern Music for Voice and Piano-forte:
SCOTCH VOCAL ALBUM.....50c.
EIGHTEEN BARITONE AND BASS SONGS.....50c.
BEETHOVEN'S 40 GERMAN SONGS.....50c.
COMPLETE OPERAS FOR PIANO, each.....50c.
Mailed on receipt of price. CATALOGUES FREE.
BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

HERMAN TROST & Co.,
Nos. 48 and 50 Murray St., N. Y.
FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,
TEA SETS,
VASES, &c., &c.,
PARIS BRONZES,
PARIAN MARBLE STATUETTES,
CRYSTAL TABLE GLASSWARE,
BOHEMIAN GLASSWARE,
LAVA ARTICLES,
HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.
IN PARIS,
130 Faubourg St. Denis.

20TH THOUSAND.—Hunter's Guide and Trapper's Companion.—How to hunt, fish, and trap all animals. How to tan and cure hides and furs. How to cook. $10 to any boy or farmer. Neatly printed and bound—only 50 cents paid; 6 for $1. Address
HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.
Prices from $16 to $32.
From the Scientific American of April 11, 1868.
"The color of this metal closely resembles that of 18-carat gold, is more grateful to the eye, and its lustre brilliant," &c., &c.
When desired, these Watches will be sent to any express office, and permission of examination granted upon payment of freight charges.
Description of goods and prices sent on application. An inspection of my goods earnestly solicited.
JULES D. HIRSH & VUILLEMIN,
44 Nassau Street, New York.
For sale by all respectable dealers.

BIG MONEY. Something New! also, best Key-Tag & Stencil Tools. Circulars sent FREE. Address DAVID. STENCIL WORKS, Mo.

AGENTS WANTED, local and traveling, to sell a staple manufactured article. Liberal inducements. Send for Circular.
A. D. WAGNER, 65 Murray St., New York.

100 PHOTOGRAPHS OF BEAUTIFUL WOMEN (small size) for 25 cts. Also, Catalogue of 1,000 others. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, New York.

FINE WATCHES
AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.
SOLID GOLD
HUNTING-CASE LADIES' WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jewelled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, $36. Lepine Movement, Gold Balance, $32. FINE SILVER
GENTS' HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, Lever Movement, First Quality, $14; Extra Quality, $16.
IMPERIAL DUPLEX
Engraved Movement, Ruby Jewels, Sweep Seconds. SILVER HUNTING CASES, $15.
AMERICAN MOVEMENT
9-oz. Silver Cases, $15: Full Jewelled, $18.
SOLID GOLD
GENTS' HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jewelled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, $40; Extra Quality, $48; and Watches of every description, equally low, sent by Express, to be paid for after they have been received and examined. Any WATCH not proving as represented may be returned or exchanged if not giving perfect satisfaction. Full Descriptive Price-List sent free.
S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
52 & 54 JOHN ST., NEW YORK.

WRIGHT'S PATENT VARIABLE CUT-OFF STEAM ENGINE.
MANUFACTURED BY THE WASHINGTON IRON WORKS.
Send for Illustrated Circular. 37 Cortlandt St., New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just published:
BARNES'S NOTES ON THE PSALMS.
Notes, Critical, Explanatory, and Practical, on the Book of Psalms. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," "Lectures on Evidences of Christianity," &c. In Three Volumes. Uniform with all THE same readily. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00 per volume.
BREAKING A BUTTERFLY.
Breaking a Butterfly; or, Blanche Elerslie's Ending. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," "Brakespeare," "Sans Merci," "Maurice Dering," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 26 cents.
SCOTT'S FISHING-BOOK.
Fishing in American Waters. By GEORGE C. SCOTT. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.
CHARLES READE'S NOVELS.
It is Never too Late to Mend. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHAS. READE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
Griffith Gaunt; or, Jealousy. By CHAS. READE. Fully Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 26 cents.
Hard Cash. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHAS. READE. Illustrations. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
GUICCIOLI'S LORD BYRON.
My Recollections of Lord Byron: and Those of Byron's Wherein a Lady Is the Principal Personage. Translated by Hubert E. H. Jerningham. With Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.
LEVER'S THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.
That Boy of Norcott's. By CHAS. LEVER. Author of "The Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly," "Barrington," "Maurice Tiernay," "The Dolmens," "Charles O'Malley," &c. Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
HARPER'S SCHOOL AND FAMILY SLATE.
School and Family Slate, with Outline Maps, Instruction in Writing, Printing, Drawing, and Arithmetic. $1 25 each.
BALDWIN'S PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS.
Pre-Historic Nations; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Great Races and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to a still Older Civilization of the Ethiopians or Cushites of Arabia. By JOHN D. BALDWIN, Member of the American Oriental Society. 12mo, Cloth, $2 25.
ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S NOVELS:
Phineas Finn, the Irish Member. A Novel. By Anthony Trollope, Author of "Barchester Towers," "Small House at Allington," "Can You Forgive Her?" "Doctor Thorne," &c. Illustrated by Millais. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.
He Knew He was Right. By Anthony Trollope. Beautifully Illustrated. Part I. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
HENRY WARD BEECHER'S SERMONS.
Sermons by Henry Ward Beecher; Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. Reported expressly for Harper's Periodicals Discourses, and Revised by their Author. In Two Volumes. 8vo. With Steel Portrait by Halpin. Cloth, $5 00.
DIXON'S HER MAJESTY'S TOWER.
Her Majesty's Tower. Historic Studies in the Tower of London. By W. Hepworth Dixon. Fine Edition. 12mo, Cloth, 60 cents.
WHYMPER'S ALASKA.
Travel and Adventure in the Territory of Alaska, formerly Russian America — now Ceded to the United States — and in various other parts of the North Pacific. By FREDERICK WHYMPER. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.
MILES O'REILLY'S POEMS.
The Poetical Works of Charles G. Halpine (Miles O'Reilly). Including all Odes, Poems, Songs, Epics, and Lyrical Effusions which have not heretofore been Collected together. With a Biographical Sketch and Explanatory Notes. Edited by Robert B. Roosevelt. Portrait on Steel. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.
NEVIUS'S CHINA.
China and the Chinese: a General Description of the Country and its Inhabitants, its Civilization and Form of Government, its Religions and Social Institutions; its Intercourse with other Nations; and its Present Condition and Prospects. By the Rev. JOHN L. NEVIUS, Ten Years a Missionary in China. With a Map and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.
NATURE'S NOBLEMAN.
Nature's Nobleman. A Novel. By the Author of "Rachel's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE
GREAT AMERICAN
TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF
CHINA AND JAPAN,
and sell them in quantities to suit customers
AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to those who wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

Good Common Sort, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
Medium Green and Black, 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
English Breakfast (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
Imperial (green), 90c., 80c., $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Young Hyson (green), 90c., 80c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Uncolored Japan, 70c., 80c., $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Gunpowder (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

Extract of Burnt-Rye and Dandie Coffee,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Roasted (ground), 20c., 30c.; best, 40c. per lb.
Green (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

Portsmouth, Mich., August 26, 1868.

To the Great American Tea Company,
Cor. Vesey Street, New York.

Gents: The people here will not let me alone. They say I keep the best tea road, and that I must get up another order for them. So here you have it, to the shape of a money order. Make the 6th of May last, making five hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-four cents I have sent you since last date.

Hoping this will be as good as former packages, I remain Yours, &c.,
Jesse W. Dale.

10 lbs.	Uncolor'd Japan, Mrs. Kempton	at $1 00	$10 00
5	" Imperial	" 1 00	5 00
5	" Young Hyson	A. L. Cummings,	at 1 25	3 75
5	" Imperial	Miss Stephens,	at 1 00	5 00
5	" Coffee	J. L. Chapman,	at 40	1 60
5	" Gunpowder	O. A. Watrous,	at 1 25	6 25
5	" Imperial	F. Taylor,	at 1 25	6 00
5	" Young Hyson	H. Hopkins,	at 1 00	5 00
5	" Coffee	do.	at 30	1 50
5	" Gunpowder	John Stephens,	at 1 25	6 25
5	" Young Hyson	Wm. H. Dorsey,	at 1 25	6 25
5	" do.	do.	H. Mercer,	at 1 25	6 25
5	" do.	do.	N. Newcomb,	at 1 25	6 25
5	" do.	do.	Noah Campbell,	at 1 25	6 25
5	" Gunpowder	Judge Miller,	at 1 50	4 50
5	" do.	do.	A. Gale,	at 1 50	4 50
5	" Imperial	Mrs. Bird,	at 1 25	2 50
				$74 60

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-Office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned to our agents within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third besides the Express charges, by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, and appear in the advertisement. This will prevent their orders from going into the hands of spurious dealers.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 544, New York City.

THE DOLLAR SUN.

CHARLES A. DANA'S PAPER.

The cheapest, neatest, and most readable of New York Journals. Every day it has a little of everything. Every week it has all the best articles of the Daily, Tri-Weekly, and Weekly, at $6, $2, and $1 a year. Full and timely reports of markets, with a Farmers' and Fruit Growers' Club, and a complete story in every Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A valuable premium to every subscriber. Send for specimen, with premium list, free.

J. W. ENGLAND, Publisher of Sun, New York.

WHOEVER

WILL act as Agent, either lady or gentleman, can easily earn in an evening a Watch or Sewing Machine. Full particulars sent free. Address, Union Sewing Machine Co., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or Alton, Ill.

GREAT SPRING TRADE SALE.

Comprising over 350 different articles. Send for Catalogues.

PARKER & CO.,
98 and 100 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

THE "BEST" SEWING MACHINE.—Will do all that any machine can do. Price only $18.—Beware of all $5, $6, and $10 machines. It is the cheapest and best. Agents wanted. Samples to Local Agents. Wanted, one smart Agent to control each County. Speak quick. Address
ASHUELOT S. M. CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold
$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.
THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.
Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability; also, a protecting plate for the inspection hereafter, we have named it the "COLLINS METAL,"

OF THE
COLLINS METAL
(IMPROVED OROIDE).

and will prosecute any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting its intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, elegantly and fully engraved by superior workmen, and are equal in appearance, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $100. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Cabinet of every size, from $1 to $5.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Pencils, Charms, Gent's Fine Guard and Vest Chains, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO AGENTS.—When $15 Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our present cash prices, and we prefer to give the benefit of our lower prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested, not to send money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. Parties can call at our office and examine goods. All express charges paid by us. Give name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

TO THE WORKING CLASS:—I am now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at their homes, the whole of the time, or for their spare moments. Business new, light, and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50 cents to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. Those who see this notice may send their address and test the business for themselves. I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, etc., sent free. Sample sent by mail for 10 cents. Address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Me.

DO IT NOW—Don't delay, but send 25 cents at once and receive MAPLE LEAVES for twelve months. It is the cheapest, best, and the most popular Monthly published. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a stamp.

O. A. ROORBACH, No. 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE COMICAL ADVENTURES OF
MR. TOODLES will be sent free upon receipt of order addressed to HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y.

"A LUMINIUM BRILLIANTE."—$16 WATCHES. A new metal, splendid timers. Elegantly engraved Hunting-cases. Equal to Gold. Sent by express for "Waltham." Sent C. O. D., and can be returned if not satisfactory. Circular free. Trade of Gold and costly watches, jewelry, &c., &c. Address
HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y.

A GREAT OFFER.

HORACE WATERS, No. 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of 100 PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, at extraordinary low prices for CASH, during this month, or will take from $5 to $20 monthly until paid. The same will be rented, with monthly application if purchased.

DEAFNESS, CATARRH, SCROFULA.

A lady who had suffered nearly every pain from Catarrh, Deafness, Scrofula, was cured by a simple remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompt her to send the recipe to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. C. LEGGETT, Rahway, N. J.

AGENTS WANTED for the only steel engraving of Gen. Grant and his family, published with their approval. Address
GOUGH & CO., 37 Park Row, New York.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.—The free use of this Ointment will subdue redness, remove every pimple and blotch from the skin, imparting a beautiful, soft, velvet appearance to the most delicate complexion.

20 MAGIC PHOTOGRAPHS. Library of Love, a vols., for 25 cents. Pictures, 25 cents. Stereoscopes, $1 60. W. C. WEMYSS, 9 Astor Place, N. Y.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE.
Pinch-Cam and Slide Movement. Agents Wanted. For terms, address CHICOPEE S. M. CO., Boston, Mass.

DRUGGISTS! Sell your Customers
SWEET QUININE!
$3000 Salary. { U. S. PIANO CO., N. Y. Address

The Celebrated Genuine Oroide Gold
Hunting-Case Watches, fac-similé Walthams.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

Genuine Oroide Gold Watch Co. Geneva, Swittzerland, manufacture, on strictly scientific principles, style, and finish, the celebrated Oroide gold; a fac-simile of the most rare and costly description of Gold Watches. They are manufactured in the following styles: Ladies' and Gentlemen's fine Swiss Movements, $15; Ladies' and Gentlemen's Extra Jeweled, $20; Gentlemen's Grade Walthams Patent Levers, $20; Chronometer Balance, $25. Railroad Conductors, Engineers, Expressmen—the most exacting of your employees will be thoroughly demonstrated the strength, durability, accuracy, and utility of our celebrated watches, and pronounce them invaluable as reliable time-keepers. Each Watch warranted by special certificate from the Oroide Gold Watch Co. to be perfect time-keepers, and to retain their color equal to gold. Express Co's will exhibit the Watch, &c., when requested, on receipt of express charges both ways. Expressed every where, to be paid for on delivery. Can be sent C. O. D., subject to examination. In parties who make you pay for Watches before you see them, beware. Customers must pay all charges. Don't send orders to AN EXTRA WATCH FREE. The universal demand for CLUBS FOR SIX WATCHES WILL RECEIVE our counterfeit or inimitable Watch with worthless metal our specialties have induced unprincipled persons to use the reputation of our Oroide Gold Watches. that furnish in a word, chinking for them the JOHN TOGGAN, President Oroide Gold Watch Co.

Only Office in the United States No. 78 Nassau Street, New York.

COMMON-SENSE

rules the mass of the people, whatever the misnamed and misanthropic philosophers may say to the contrary. Show them a good thing, let its merits be clearly demonstrated, and they will not hesitate to give it their most cordial patronage. The masses have already ratified the judgment of a physician concerning the virtues of as may be seen in the immense quantities of this medicine that are annually sold in every section of the land. It is now recognized as greatly superior to all other remedies yet devised for diseases of the digestive organs, such as diarrhœa, dysentery, dyspepsia, and for the various fevers that arise from derangement of those portions of the system. Hostetter's name is rapidly becoming a household word from Maine to Texas, from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific. These celebrated STOMACH BITTERS have doubtless created as much sensation in the community for their remarkable curative as any other medicinal agent. It is a fact that in the minds of many persons a prejudice exists against what are called patent medicines; but why should this prevent you resorting to an article that has such an array of testimony to support it as HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS? Physicians prescribe it: why should you discard it? Judges, usually considered men of talent, have and do use it in their families; why should you reject it? Let not your prejudice warp your reason, to the detriment of injury of your health. It is the only preparation of the kind that is reliable in all cases, and it is therefore worthy the consideration of the afflicted. If your friends are pleasant to the taste, agreeable in their effects, and altogether valuable as a tonic or remedy for indigestion.

HOSTETTER'S BITTERS,

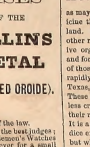
Alaska Diamonds.



The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the real diamond, has created at our own factory, in artistic diamond settings, guaranteed fine Gold, and sold by us at our startling low cost of $5, $10, and upwards, which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Look at our Price-List.

Ladies' Solitaire Finger-Rings, $3 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Drops, $6, $8, and $16. Cluster Finger-Rings, $5, $10, $12; Cluster Ear-Drops, $8, $15, $20. Cluster Sets, $10, $15, $20, and $25 each; Cross Sets, $20 and $25. Gents' Solitaire Pins, $3, $5, $8, $10, $15, $20; Gents' Solitaire Rings, $5, $10, $15, $20, $30; Studs, $2, $3, $6, $10, $12 each.

Cluster Pins, $8 and $12; with tail, $10; Cross Pins, $6, $10, and $15; Studs, per set, $5, $8, $10.

We do our business direct with the people only, located in a city which has a world-wide reputation for its Diamond trade.

Orders less than $5 should be accompanied with 25 cents extra, to cover postage and the additional cost of packing. Everything must be sent by express, C.O.D., the purchaser paying all express charges. Price-List sent to the Trade. TRY US. Address

STANLEY, WHITNEY & CO., Providence, R. I.

$20 A DAY to Male and Female

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $36 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES. Stitch alike on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE in the market sold for less than $40. All others are infringements, and sold by the seller and user liable to prosecution and imprisonment. Full particulars free.
Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

Back Numbers Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Two Subscribers' Names sent at one time, with the cash, at the subscription price, or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each Wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical commences with the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number.

At the time of sending a remittance, state that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar, and his order will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

Remittances should be by Postal Money Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS. Where neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in the presence of the postmaster, who will give a receipt for the same, which will be considered a sufficient voucher in case the letter should be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the subscriber.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $300: Half Page, $150: Quarter Page, $76—each insertion; or, for a less space, $2 50 per Line, each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

YOUNG SOL. "Shine yer Boots—shine 'em up. I shines for all; only Two Cents a Shine."
GREELEY. "Go 'way, boy, go 'way. I never have my Boots shined."

Trade-Mark for Silver. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate. GORHAM MFG CO

GORHAM MFG. CO.,

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Sterling Silver Ware,

AND

Nickel Silver-Plated Ware,

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

Waltham Watches.

These watches are by far the best made in this country, and warranted to satisfy the most exacting demand for beauty, finish, and accuracy.

For Sale by all Leading Jewelers.

KEMLO'S WATCH REPAIRER'S GUIDE.—Being a complete hand-book to the young beginner in taking apart, putting together, and thoroughly cleaning the English Lever and other Foreign and all American Watches. By F. KEMLO, Practical Watch-maker. With Illustrations. 1 vol., 12mo. Cloth. Price $1.25. For sale by all Booksellers on the United States. Single copies sent by mail, free of postage, on receipt of price. Address A. WILLIAMS & CO., Booksellers, 100 Washington St., Boston.

A POOR GIRL'S

LETTER. New Song from Peichole ..... 35c.
SPEAKING AND CARVING TABLES MADE. Perfected. Priceless Wants. 50c. "Telegram, Waltz." 40c. NOT YOU JOE Galop. 50c. "On the Sea Shore," Waltz. 30c. RAVOGLI'S (comic song), "DANDY PAT," each 50c. Violin or Flute Arrangements, 15c. each. Music mailed. FREDERICK BLUME, 1185 Broadway, N.Y.

TWENTY ONE years' experience.
With more extensive means for obtaining Patents in the world.
TWENTY thousand Patents obtained in United States and Europe.
Best facilities for all other reliable agents.
PATENT LAWS and Facsimile of Advice to Inventors mailed free. A bound volume of 110 mechanical engravings and full descriptions of the United States by countries, with hints and directions how to obtain Patents in them. Information confidential. Address
MUNN & CO.,
No. 37 Park Row, N. Y.

COMPETITION EXTRAORDINARY.

BUY the Celebrated Wilson Shuttle Sewing Machine. You can have three years to pay for it. Send for Illustrated Pamphlet of the 40 patent points, with full particulars of our new plan of placing our Sewing Machines into every household in the land. Address C. D. HARPER, Cleveland, Ohio. Special Agent of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co. Disorganized under the laws of Ohio.

THE CELEBRATED

BRAND

BLACK ALPACA

is one of the most desirable fabrics now worn by ladies, either for promenade or house dress. There are no Alpacas imported equal to the "CELEBRATED BUFFALO BRAND" for fineness of texture, brilliancy of color, and durability of wear; they excel all others ever offered in this market. They have all the finish and lustre of a gros-grain silk, are made of the very best material, and are positively superior to any Black Alpaca ever introduced. These beautiful goods are sold by most of the leading retail dry-goods merchants in New York, Brooklyn, and the principal cities and towns throughout the country, and are rapidly becoming the most popular and fashionable goods worn.

WM. I. PEAKE & CO., 46, 48, & 50 WHITE ST., N.Y.,
Sole Importers of the Brand for the United States.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.

Established 1826. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, Plans, and Details in Working Scale of Country Residences and Village Houses, with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto, 100 pages. Twenty Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. { 150 Designs, $1 50, postpaid. GEO. E. WOODWARD, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York. Send stamp for Catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

£150,000,000

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1866. Fee to search for any name, $2. GUY & CO., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

DRUNKENNESS — C. C. BEERS, M. D., Boston, Mass., cures the most helpless cases. Send stamp for evidence.

PURE WATER,

HOW TO USE IT.

THE DIAPHRAGM FILTER, manufactured by ALEXANDER MCKENZIE & CO., Hydraulic Engineers, 39 West Fourth Street, New York, is the kind of Porous Filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its efficiency.

JAMES B. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

P.S.—Having a knowledge of the theory and practice of Hydraulics for thirty years, we are able to apply water successfully, with economy, to all the modern improvements. Jobbing in city and country punctually attended to. ALEX. MCKENZIE & CO.,
Geo. J. Chas. Randall.} Plumbers and Gasfitters.

MADAME PAREPA ROSA'S NEW SONGS:

Waiting ..... Price 75c.
The Return, Answer to Waiting ..... 30c.
Not Yet .....
The New Home, Sweet Home ..... 50c.
The Rose at the Window ..... 30c.
Copies mailed. WM. A. POND & CO.,
No. 547 Broadway, N.Y.

DR DE JONGH'S

Celebrated

LIGHT-BROWN COD LIVER OIL

Universally recognized by the Faculty as

INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR

to every other kind,

and the unequaled remedy for

Consumption, General Debility,

and the Wasting Diseases of Children.

DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA in IMPERIAL HALF-PINTS only, sealed with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with the Trade-Mark.

SOLE CONSIGNEES,

ANSAR, HARFORD & CO., 77, Strand, London.

SOLE ACCREDITED AGENTS IN AMERICA,

EDW'D GREEF & Co., 38, Vesey St., New York.

Sold by all Druggists, at $1.50 per Bottle.

☞ Beware of felonious imitations.

Dr. JNO. V. BURTON'S

TOBACCO ANTIDOTE.

WARRANTED TO REMOVE ALL DESIRE FOR TOBACCO. It is entirely vegetable and harmless. Purifies and enriches the blood, invigorates the nervous system, gives wonderful and strengthening power, is an excellent tonic and appetizer, and leaves the mouth in a healthy condition. It makes many offended friends, but makes robust health. Smokers and chewers for ten years cured. Price Fifty cents per box, $1. Address Dr. JNO. V. BURTON, 1 Dey St., Sole Proprietor, New York. Also, Burton's Antidote for the various effects of tobacco, with hints to consumptives, reformers, etc., 25 cents. Address Dr. J. V. BURTON, Jersey City, N. J.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Caution.—Beware of humbug imitations.

[Trademark Copyrighted.]

ELGIN WATCHES.

CAUTION.—The public are respectfully cautioned against purchasing our watches, or watches represented to be of our make, of parties who advertise to send them "C.O.D." We have no connection with such houses, and do not furnish our goods to any house for that purpose. The excellence and good reputa of the real ELGIN WATCHES have caused several Foreign and American Watch Companies to make INFERIOR IMITATIONS with the same or similar trademarks as ours. Avoid all parties who advertise to send our goods "C.O.D.," no matter whom. To get the real ELGIN WATCHES purchase only of dealers in your vicinity or elsewhere whom you know to be honorable.

THE NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY,

Per B. F. SHERMAN, Agent,

Business Office, Nos. 159 and 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

OIC

The Highest Cash Prices

PAID FOR

OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;

PAMPHLETS, PERIODICALS of every kind.

OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are not filled;

and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Public and Private Libraries, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Offices, &c.

JOHN C. STOCKWELL,
25 Ann street, N. Y.

POLLAK & SON, Manufr's of Meerschaum GOODS. Stores: 483 Broadway, next Broome, & 37 John St., middle of Ofice. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send for wholesale or retail circular. Letter-Box 5046.

FREEMAN & BURR, CLOTHIERS,

Always have in Stock, Ready for Immediate Wear,

SUITS	OVERCOATS	BOYS' SUITS
For all Occasions,	For all Seasons,	For all Ages.
ONE PRICE TO ALL.	FURNISHING GOODS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.	ONE PRICE TO ALL.

Our Stock of Goods in the piece,—Cloths, Cassimeres, Coatings, Vestings, &c.,—is of unparalleled extent and variety. Orders for Garments to measure executed within a few hours. Gentlemen in all parts of the Country are ordering their Clothing direct from us, with entire satisfaction. Perfect Fitting guaranteed in all cases by

Our New Rules for Self-Measurement.

Rules for Measurement, Price List and Samples of Goods mailed free on application.

FREEMAN & BURR'S WAREHOUSES,

124 & 126 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK.

TO WATCH BUYERS.—An illustrated description of the Watches made by the American Watch Company of Waltham will be sent to any address on application.

In addition to a description of the Watches, the pamphlet contains much other useful information to watch buyers. Address ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents, No. 182 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS—AGENTS—

$75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Their Machine will sew, bem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will prove it to any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still every stitch can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which forty-five per cent can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical chesp machine manufactured.

OLD PAPER

We guarantee to pay more than any other house in the city for

Old Books, Newspapers, Pamphlets, Magazines, Manuscripts and all kinds of Waste Paper.

MANAHAN & MILLAR,
Wholesale Paper Warehouse,
10 Spruce St., N. Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Sound Doctrine for the Sick.—It would be as wise to attempt to regulate a chronometer with a pickax and sledge hammer, as it is to assist the obstructed and constipated bowels with abrasive purgatives. That gentle and delightful laxative, TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT APERIENT, which relieves and tones the alimentary canal at the same time, is the safest and surest means of superinducing a regular habit of body, in cases of chronic constipation.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PRINCE & COS. ORGANS AND MELODEONS. 43,000, now in use. BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL

Heads of Gen. Grant and his Cabinet, with an estimate of their Characters, in the MAY NO. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. ALSO GLADSTONE, the English Premier; EMERSON, the Inventor; Caroline L. Herschel, Astronomer; Old German Artists—Holbein, Cranach, Vischer, Sow and Durer, with portraits. BRAIN WAVES. The Planchette Mystery; How to Tread Grapes. The South Cape; White Men and Black Men; Inequality of Minds; What can I do best? 30 cents, or $3 a year. Newsmen have it. Address S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N.Y.

BLUNT & CO., 179 Water St., N. Y.

SURVEYING INSTRUMENTS.

First Quality only. AT VERY LOW PRICES.
PRICE-LIST SENT FREE.

CEDAR CAMPHOR

Cheapest and Best Defense against CLOTHES-MOTHS. Factured by THEOD. S. HARRIS, Boston.

☞ Sold by every druggist.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Now just Published.

BREAKING A BUTTERFLY.

Breaking a Butterfly; or, Blanche Ellerslie's Ending. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," "Brakespeare," "Sans Merci," "Maurice Dering," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For 50 Pamphlet, address Simpson & Co., Hartford, Ct.

Diamond Rubber Cement,—Local & Traveling Agents wanted every where, rare chance, ready sale, large commission, or salary, $75 per month. Terms and territory, address N. S. SYLL & Co., Watertown, N.Y.

NEBRASKA—SOIL, CLIMATE, AND PEOPLE.—A pamphlet free (8 cts. CROMWELL & BAIN, Lincoln, Neb.

MARVIN & CO.'s

CHROME IRON SAFES

ARE THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
265 Broadway N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 645.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

SPIRITUAL PHOTOGRAPHY.

THE case of the people against WILLIAM H. MUMLER, of 630 Broadway, is one so remarkable and without precedent in the annals of criminal jurisprudence that we devote this page to illustrations bearing upon it. The charge against Mr. MUMLER is that, by means of what he terms spiritual photographs, he has swindled many credulous persons, leading them to believe it possible to photograph the immaterial forms of their departed friends.

The case has excited the profoundest interest, and, strange as it may seem, there are thousands of people who believe that its development will justify the claims made by the spiritual photographer. We shall not attempt to give an expression to our own opinions, but simply to follow the developments of the case through the testimony offered during the first few days of the trial.

It is through the instrumentality of Marshal JOSEPH H. TOOKER that the case has been brought before the courts. He deposes that he was ordered by Mayor HALL to investigate the case, which he did by assuming a false name, and by getting his photograph taken by Mr. MUMLER. After the taking of the picture the negative was shown him, with a dim, indistinct outline of a ghostly face staring out of one corner; and he was told that the picture represented the spirit of his father-in-law. He, however, failed to recognize the worthy old gentleman, and emphatically declared that the picture neither represented his father-in-law, nor any of his relations, nor yet any person whom he had ever seen or known. With this evidence the prosecution rested.

The counsel for the defense have brought forward a number of witnesses who testify to the genuineness of spiritual photographs taken for them by Mr. MUMLER. WILLIAM P. SNIDER, a photographer, of Poughkeepsie, testifies that MUMLER succeeded in producing spiritual photographs at his gallery in Poughkeepsie, and he was unable to discover how it was done. Judge EDMONDS, one of the most distinguished advocates of Spiritualism, deposed that he had two photographs taken by MUMLER, the spirit form in one of them he thought he could recognise, but not the one in the other. He said: "I believe that the camera can take a photograph of a spirit, and I believe also that spirits have materiality [illegible] that gross materiality that mortals possess, but still they are material enough to be visible to the human eye, for I have seen them; only a few days since I was in a court in Brooklyn when a suit against a life insurance company for the amount claimed to be due on a certain policy was being heard. Looking toward that part of the court-room occupied by the jury, I saw the spirit of the man whose death was the basis of the suit. The spirit told me the circumstances connected with the death; said that the suit was groundless, that the claimant was not entitled to recover from the company, and said that he (the man whose spirit was speaking) had committed suicide under certain circumstances; I drew a diagram of the place at which his death occurred, and on showing it to the counsel, was told that it was exact in every particular."

A large number of witnesses deposed that they recognized the forms of departed friends (in some cases of those long dead) in the photographs taken for them by MUMLER. The most striking case was that of a gentleman of Wall Street, whose deceased wife's features both he and his friends distinctly recognized in a photograph taken for him in this way.

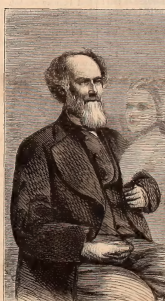
If there is a trick in Mr. MUMLER'S process it has certainly not been detected as yet. To all appearances spiritual photography rests just where the rappings and table-turnings have rested for some years. Those who believe in it at all will respect no opposing arguments, and disbelievers will reject every favorable hypothesis or explanation. Mr. MUMLER has certainly been very fortunate. He has been believed in, in the first place, by a large number of people. He has obtained, again, a good price for his photographs; for who could expect spirits to be called "from the vasty deep" for less than ten dollars per head? And, finally, he has been prosecuted, and thus extensively advertised. Beyond this, the trial, like all legal prosecutions of this nature, will amount to nothing.

In addition to our illustrations of specimens of Mr. MUMLER'S spirit photographs, we give also representations of similar photographs taken by Mr. ROCKWOOD of this city. The latter were taken by natural means, but not so as to escape detection as to the trick resorted to to secure the result. Mr. MUMLER has certainly the advantage of longer experience in the business.

W. H. MUMLER.

MRS. W. H. MUMLER.—BY MUMLER.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPH BY MUMLER.

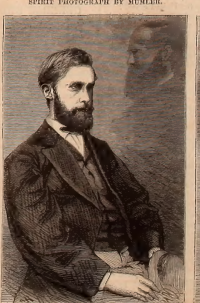


SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPH BY MUMLER.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPH BY MUMLER.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPH BY MUMLER.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPH BY MUMLER.



F. V. HICKEY.—BY ROCKWOOD.

C. E. BOTLE.—BY ROCKWOOD.

SPIRITUAL PHOTOGRAPHY.—[SPECIMENS FURNISHED BY MUMLER AND ROCKWOOD.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1869.

AMERICA AND SPAIN.

WHAT has been and ought to be the policy of the United States in regard to colonial revolutions upon this continent with parent and foreign powers? This is a question which is just now at issue, and it is interesting.

The war between Spain and her American colonies began in 1810. But it was not until the 8th of March, 1822, two years afterwards, that President Monroe, in a special message, stated to Congress that the provinces had been so successful that it was a question if they should not be considered as independent; for they not only were so in fact, but there was no prospect of their ceasing to be so. After long and able debate, and with the approval of John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, Congress authorized the recognition. But it was not until after ten years, in 1822, that Spain acknowledged what had been long a fact.

In 1823 Mr. Canning, the British Foreign Minister, with the intention of baffling the designs of the Holy Alliance, urged the United States Government to join in a declaration that, while nothing should be done by either power to obstruct negotiations between Spain and her colonies, yet that they would not see the transfer of any part of the colonies to another power "with indifference." Mr. Canning's urgency was so stringent that in his annual message in December, 1823, President Monroe said: "With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States." In another part of the same message the President said: "The American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power."

These statements compose the famous Monroe doctrine; of which Mr. Evarts, one of the most prudent and careful of our students of international law, says: "It has never, in any recognition, received a legislative confirmation; it rests upon the broad basis as an executive declaration, wise and seasonable at the time it was made, creditable to the administration from which it proceeded, and beneficial to the country and the cause of free government throughout the world."

Neither this American declaration nor the sending of British consuls to some of the principal ports ended the war. In the month of May, 1825, John Quincy Adams was President and Henry Clay was Secretary of State. The war had now continued for about seventeen years, and the United States were very anxious that Spain should formally recognize the fact that she had lost her hold upon the American continent. With this purpose Mr. Clay wrote to our Minister in Russia, Mr. Henry Middleton, to ask that government to use its influence with Spain. In the course of his vigorous letter Mr. Clay says: "In the war which has so long been raging between Spain and her Colonies the United States have taken no part, and will produce or to sustain it. They have been inactive and neutral spectators of the pressing scenes. Our sentiments forbids, however, that they should say that they have beheld those scenes with feelings of indifference. They have, on the contrary, anxiously desired the success of the contending parties to acquire and enjoy that independence with which, by the valor and the patriotism of the people, the love liberty, they have been, under the smiles of Heaven, so greatly blessed. But in the indulgence of this sympathetic feeling they have not, for one moment, been unmindful of the duties of an impartial neutrality which they had deliberately announced."

Mr. Clay proceeds to describe the actual situation: "Throughout the whole continent, from the western limits of the United States to Cape Horn, the Spanish power is subdued.....Not a foot of territory in all that vast extent owns the dominion. Not a bayonet sustains the cause of Spain.....Some of the most considerable of the new States have established governments which are in full and successful operation, regularly collecting large revenues, levying and maintaining numerous and well-appointed armies, and already laying the foundations of respectable maritime.....From the vicinity of Cuba to the United States, its valuable commerce and the nature of its population, their Government can not be indifferent to any political change to which that island may be destined. Great Britain and France, also, have deep interests in its fortunes, and will not see them wide awake to all those changes. In short, what European state has not much at stake, direct or indirect, in the destiny, be it what it may, of that most valuable of all the West India islands?.....They [the United States] are satisfied with the present condition of those islands [Cuba and Porto Rico], now open to the commerce and enterprise of their citizens. They desire for themselves no political change in them. If Cuba were to declare itself independent, the amount and the character of its population render it improbable that it could maintain its independence." Mr. Clay adds, in conclusion, that the United States would have been justified in seizing Cuba and Porto Rico in reprisal for the seizure of American citizens and property from pirates who found succor and refuge in Spanish territory; but that they had preferred patience and moderation and scrupulous respect for the sovereignty of Spain.

President Monroe and Mr. Clay were representatives of what is called an "American policy." And what that policy was in regard to the relation of foreign nations to this continent and its dependencies is plain from what we have quoted. In brief, it was this: the United States will not forcibly expel any foreign power in colonial possession; but it will tolerate no further foreign acquisitions or control upon this continent. Nor will it see any "ordained by Providence" of a separation between the colony and the remote parent arrives the United States will naturally recognize the position which they are striving for independence, but will only, "on great consideration and on just principles," acknowledge "the government de facto whose authority, their independence and maintain it." Is not this a good policy? Can we improve it? Have not nations duties as well as sympathies? Has not Mr. Senator Sumner shown Mr. Canning in stating that belligerence is not a principle, but a fact; and that an actual war, and an organized government de facto, with which the world established before there can be a just recognition of belligerent rights. Napoleon would have no paper blockades. International law, he says, is what the people of the world, will have no belligerence without actual belligerents.

If we propose to punish Spain for the old Bourbon Government which she expelled from Cuba by the island, the proposition is at least as distinct as it is absurd. We might, indeed, reflect that Spain has by a bloodless revolution deposed the Bourbons, and by a national assembly of the people has, with virtual unanimity, decreed universal suffrage. We might reflect that we owe some sympathy to a people in a republic which has so quietly overthrown a despotism, and which is peacefully establishing a free popular government in its place. But, perhaps unhappily, we have very little sympathy for a freedom which does not produce sugar.

For three years Cuba, with unparalleled bravery and enormous sacrifice, has fought under an organized government, with Turkey, the most changeless of Despotisms. Thermopylæ is not a more heroic name than Cauea, but, with the exception of a very small number of persons, nobody knows or cares any thing about Crete. For some months there has been trouble in Cuba, but on a large scale never before has there been profound obscurity. There is no organized government of Cubans, so far as we can learn; there has been no serious loss of which any account has been published, and yet there is a loud warmth of sympathy which all the three heroic years and decads of Crete have not awakened. The Cubans ever had a regular island, and could not be made profitable to its owner, should we care more for Cuban than for Cretan liberty and independence? And as the Cretans have not persistent and vociferous in the cry of Cuban independence mean the independence of the island or its annexation to the United States?

If the Cubans are entitled upon independence, and mean to fight with the deadly earnestness that is necessary to obtain it, they will certainly have the sympathy of the best part of the people of the United States. But that sympathy must necessarily wait for some evidence of such a purpose and such a spirit.

THE ENGLISH QUESTION.

IN a speech at Glasgow Lord Stanley, who made the Alabama treaty with Mr. Reverdy Johnson, said: "There has been any question unsettled, and we are capable of offering reparation for willful and intentional wrong, because we do not admit, and we have no right to admit, that any such wrong was ever committed by us." He added that international law is vague, and that England may have unintentionally done wrong, and is willing to make that part of an impartial arbitrator. Mr. Sumner says it is evident that England did wrong, and must therefore apologize. And in saying this, as we stated last week, he unquestionably speaks the general sentiment of this country.

International law is merely custom, and every nation decides its action for itself. In doing this it necessarily takes all the risks, moral and sentimental included. If a rebellion breaks out in Yorkshire, and the insurrectionary government instantly proclaims neutrality, and exhorts all citizens not to aid either belligerent, it undoubtedly treats the insurgents in Yorkshire precisely as it would treat France if it declared war against England. It at once dignifies insurgents with the attributes of an equal status with that of Great Britain, and it assumes the consequences. If it should happen that privateers were presently built in New York for the Yorkshire cause; that they sailed and destroyed British ships wherever they could find them, having no other port to carry them to for adjudgment; that some such ships, after being built and escaping in a manner which the Secretary of State described as "a scandal and reproach," entertained and aided in other American ports; and that the American press and Congress rang with cheers for the deeds of these vessels in British service; and if it should chance, after three years of such events, that England should unconditionally subdue the rebellion, and again extend her rule over Yorkshire, and upon the request of the British Government to come to an understanding, the United States should reply that they were willing to make reparation for willful wrong, and to leave the question of wrong to an arbitrator, how would England feel and what would England do? That is a question for Englishmen to consider. But we should say that the United States must first of all confess that they had done wrong and apologize, how would the United States feel, and what would they do? That is a question for us to consider.

Some months ago, in speaking of this question, we said that nations did not apologize in this way. But we are sure but three ways of settling such a difference: a congress, a commission for claims and damages, or war. Now, apart from the feeling between the two countries which, in the case of our late troubles, was heated to the highest degree, and still remains dangerously warm despite the wisdom of Mr. Reverdy Johnson's eloquence, there is but one pivotal question of international law underlying the whole controversy. It is not at all whether England acknowledged the belligerent rights of the insurgents too soon, viewed as an act of friendship to the United States. Of that we think there can be no question. But the principle for that, if we choose to press it, is war. It is folly to suppose that England will confess that she is sorry she was not more friendly in 1861. An offense of sentiment can not be settled by sentiment.

The practical point of the difference is this: whether ocean-belligerency can be properly conferred by a nation upon subjects who have no ships nor prize courts, and whose actual situation, as Mr. Sumner says, is "without any of the means of power which are the essential prerequisite to a war succession?" A ship sailing in the name of a belligerent under such circumstances can have no other count than its own piracy. It has no port, it can have no court at all, and it necessarily has no other status than that of a pirate. Upon such a theory a handful of Indians upon the Plains, fighting with United States troops, may have frigates built and equipped in England or France sailing on my ocean and annihilating American commerce. It is impossible in international law that such a belligerent as the rebel States were can have such a ship England is responsible for the whole amount of loss from such privateers. But if it be good international law, England is responsible only for the consequences of such escapes and evasions as the British Government should have prevented.

That the ground taken by England is untenable upon sound principles of international comity is the point to which we trust the attention of the British Government will be invited in any new negotiations.

GENERAL DULCE'S FOLLIES.

THE trouble in Cuba and the feeling in this country respecting it make the case of the Mary Lowell important. This was an American brig loaded with arms which put into one of the Bahamas, and while in charge of the British authorities was seized by a Spanish ship of war, taken to Havana, and there condemned by a prize court. Of course the first movement upon our part is to ask the British Government why the brig was not protected, and whether she were surrendered under protest. If it appears that the British authorities were unable to protect the vessel and so protested accordingly, the next question must be addressed to the Spanish Government.

The case of the brig Lizzie Major was similar to that of the Trent. Two passengers were taken from the vessel and imprisoned. Mr. Fish sent for the Spanish Minister in Washington and asked why the prisoners must be released, and an apology and indemnity and ample reparation of every kind offered. Senor Rosa promptly replied that the Government would undoubtedly act as requested. There was some delay in hearing from Spain, and the Secretary of State sent for the Spanish Minister and suggested that delay was very dangerous, upon which Spain is understood to have acceded to every demand.

General Prim, the Spanish Governor-General in Cuba, recently issued a very foolish proclamation that all vessels with arms and munitions of war on board, captured in Spanish waters or near Cuba, will be treated as pirates. Mr. Fish suggested to Senor Roberts this violation of recognized international law, and, upon due representation to Spain, the Government instantly disavowed the proclamation.

Spain has evidently very foolish agents; but there is no reason to apprehend that she will persist in any conduct which is manifestly at variance with good neighborhood or the laws of nations. We hope that the United States will do the same. The Secretary of State is fortunately not a Captain Bobadil, and he is not likely to swagger. He will doubtless reflect that the United States is a powerful nation, and that its character will be determined by the use of its power. A bully among nations is as contemptible as among men. Nobody, probably, likes to recall Gretorex now. Spain is undoubtedly, and the United States are strong. But who remembers without an honest blush the proposition signed by the three chief foreign ministers of the United States thirteen years ago, to steal Cuba from Spain for the strengthening of slavery?

The Secretary of State may be very sure that the best exercise of this country demands reluctance to take offense rather than an eagerness to perceive affronts. If we are to be regarded as the peers of really popular governments, we are especially to consider that Spain is at present remodeling her government in that form, and that the Spanish colonial policy is consequently yet to be developed. But whatever that policy may be, if it shall appear that any colony seriously wishes to be independent, it will undoubtedly, as we have said elsewhere, be sure of the sympathy of the American people.

CONDITION OF TRADE.

THE stream of currency which, until the middle of April, had been against England is now in the opposite direction, and has created an easy money market. This change indicates that provision is being made for spring purchases by a much larger class of dealers than the market has yet felt, and there is a corresponding increase of activity. Merchants from the Northern and Western States have hitherto held back on account of heavy snows in some quarters, and in others from a desire to wait until the market had become settled. There is nothing like speculation in the whole country on the contrary, it is marked by uncommon prudence.

Cotton goods are held with some want of confidence on account of the price of the raw material, which, however, shows signs of weakness, notwithstanding the unusual movements in England. At Preston the dispute between the operatives and mill-owners continues unsettled, and a number of spinners and weavers have been sent off, many of them to the United States, in order to meet the demand made by the mills for reduced wages. Although a great many looms have been stopped, those remaining at work seem to have the capacity to supply the trade in England with as much of their fabrics as is now required.

There is a large diminution in the number of yards of cotton goods exported from England recently, and little probability of such an immediate advance as to place the trade on a sound footing. The disturbance is due to the inequality between the production of materials for food and the demand with those for clothing, and can be corrected not until a good crop shall have been grown. The London Daily News informs us that the Treaty of Commerce with Prussia and Russia has been renewed this year, and it would appear from the London correspondent of the New York Times that the purchases in England some months ago of natural and other laborers were subsisting on insufficient food. In India it was hoped that recent extensive rains gave promise of yield sufficient for the immediate wants. The contest in England on the subject of wages is an unavoidable result of the world's inability to give adequate support under the circumstances to her manufacturing industry.

The revolution in Cuba is watched with great interest on account of the importance of its sugar crop, which sometimes reaches a third of the world's production. Refined hard sugars, which were at 15¾ at the commencement of the rebellion, went up to over 20 cents per pound, and have decided to between 16 and 17 cents from various causes. Accounts were very contradictory as to the real state of things, and consumption was immediately checked by the rapid advance, which advance was founded on the supposed prospect of success on the part of the insurgents. The lesson is instructive, as it deals with what is rapidly or anticipated a large advance in prices, and how certain it is to be followed by repentance.

The important fruit of fruit this season from the Mediterranean has been attended with severe losses on account of the simultaneous arrivals of vessels at this port laden with such cargoes. The losses were principally in oranges, which sold at not enough to cover freights and charges. This trade at Boston is conducted in entirely unsuitable vessels, ready to make the voyage in short time, and such is the spirit of navigators that the captains of some of them, after passing Gibraltar, sleep in their clothing in order that they may be instantly ready for every change of weather. A first arrival often pays for the vessel. An arrival during a glut exposes to heavy loss; but when that is over, and is followed by scarcity, the market is often fortunately hit with a fresh cargo. The English conduct their trade with the Mediterranean without as much loss as we suffer from damaged fruit, as it is conducted in steam vessels which do not hold the fruit long enough to inflict damage from heat. The trade with us, which is always precarious on account of the length of the voyage and the necessity of using sailing vessels, was this season very disastrous. "We lost a million this year," was the remark of one of the copartners of a considerable house.

Congress adjourned, as we assured our readers it would, without arriving at any definitest of policy with respect to financial affairs, and it has become more difficult than ever to predict when any will be adopted. The number of those who will resist contraction of the currency has been augmented by heavy speculations in real estate and in stocks; but we repeat what we have often said, that the quantity of money in certain to remain a fixed quantity over the United States for the remainder of the year at least. The effect of this is not generally understood, inasmuch as there are many who still look for an early panic, disastrous in its consequences, as the immediate result of our present activity in speculation. Every one knows our market is regarded as the premonitory symptom of impending danger; but it is found that an extraordinary demand for money in any quarter is immediately met by supplies from other quarters, and the expected difficulty vanishes. It is due to the fact that the quantity of what we have continues fixed and within reach, whereas great panics are the result of a large diminution in the quantity from exportation to foreign countries, which is not possible when our returns are made and received only in a local currency. The trade of this season will therefore be conducted with the certainty that the time is not yet arrived for any material disaster resulting from organic changes present or anticipated.

We can not offer our readers to suppose, however, that although the advantage we have named attends our financial condition, we do not desire a radical change in our finances. It is the true interest of the country to return to specie payments as soon as it can be done with safety, and we regret the temerity that, in the face of this obvious and imperative duty, encourages reckless and extravagant trade.

Perhaps, in the absence of legislation, this tendency might be checked by a voluntary policy on the part of conservative bankers. The duty particularly for years by the Metropolitan Bank of asserting and returning country issues was chiefly voluntary, and might be renewed without legislation with solid advantage.

To what extent we may rely on legislation and how much on voluntary combinations is a question soon to be forced on those who have the responsibility for the safe working of financial affairs. If we have not reached the point where the roads fork we must soon do so; and when we reflect that extravagance, speculation, and expansion mean repudiation, and that the absolute control of these tendencies is alone compatible with safety, solid bank influence, and consider whether, in the absence of legislation, they will not take the firm course which will save the honor of the country.

THE RHODE ISLAND LINE.

WHEN Senator SPRAGUE declared that the Rhode Island soldiers of the First regiment in the war were cowards, and that their Colonel, now Governor BURNSIDE, ran into places of safety during the battle, he did not expect that the people of the State, or the survivors of the regiment, would quietly acquiesce because Mr. SPRAGUE is a Rhode Islander, and he knows that the State, though small, has a fair fame as precious to it as if it were an empire.

The speech in which he made this his own State the sentiment of indignation was universal, and it instantly took form in an address, signed by General ROMAIN ROBBINS and scores of the best men of the soldiers and citizens of Rhode Island, inviting General BURNSIDE to meet them at a public reception, that the country might witness how profound the sense and of opinion in regard to that officer is between Senator SPRAGUE and his fellow-citizens. General BURNSIDE declined the demonstration, but in his letter he briefly recounts the history of his regiment, and exposes the untruthfulness of the Senator's statements.

It is to be hoped that the Senator's modesty is not the measure of his veracity. He remarks in his speech that the First Rhode Island regiment was raised and equipped by his individual exertions. The truth is, by General BURNSIDE'S account, that when the Government called for troops, Mr. SPRAGUE, then Governor, appealed to the people, and telegraphed to BURNSIDE, then in New York, to come on and command a regiment. On the same evening BURNSIDE arrived in Providence, and found the people prompt and warm as he was. No effort was needed there more than elsewhere in that inspiring moment to raise troops, and more than enough for a regiment and a battery immediately offered. The State paid for uniforms, equipments, rations, bounties, and transportation. "All Rhode Island troops," says General BURNSIDE, "were raised by the loyal sentiment of the people, and the expenses were paid by them."

When the regiment and battery reached Washington they were ordered to report to and "moved in fear." General BURNSIDE says that "no body of troops ever moved with greater alacrity and less fear." They were sent to General PATTERSON, who hastily recalled to the defense of Washington marched thirty-five miles on the first day, and were especially complimented for their soldierly and prompt movements. When the movement was made toward Manassas Colonel BURNSIDE was in command of a brigade, which included the First and Second Rhode Island regiments. Senator SPRAGUE says that BURNSIDE'S own regiment, the First, "refused to move." The General quietly remarks, "this statement is false." A few men discussed the time of the expiration of their enlistment, a wrangle which was instantly suppressed by the Colonel. The action at Bull Run was opened by the Second Rhode Island, "and never did men fight better." The First Rhode Island presently went into action with the battery. "They fought like soldiers," says Gen. BURNSIDE, "until ordered to retire." "Or horseback" and "jumping fences," returned to Washington in an ambulance, and "was in bed while the Rhode Island soldiers were steadily marching from the field to camp." The Senator adds that the regiment refused to wait, and left Washington by the next train. "This statement is untrue," says General BURNSIDE; "we reached Washington on Monday morning at daylight, and remained there until Thursday night;" and the Colonel returned in the train which was directed by General SCOTT to take his regiment home.

General BURNSIDE, with natural and simple dignity, says that he has not been able to see Senator SPRAGUE'S personal charges. "My conduct is well known to my comrades and to the people. My character and reputation are above your testimony, and not on any statement of mine." He adds that he has many letters and documents from Mr. SPRAGUE, both official and private, dated at various periods during the war, expressing the warmest confidence and friendship.

Upon one side in this controversy is Senator SPRAGUE'S unsupported assertion, made evidently under great excitement. Upon the other are the authentic records of the war, the testimony of eye-witnesses, and the statement of General BURNSIDE. But to all those who know Rhode Island and Rhode Islanders no refutation of the alleged cowardice of the Rhode Island Line of Greece upon the land and of PERRY on the sea—is necessary.

OFFICE-SEEKING.

BY a hard necessity of the case which Mr. FESSENDEN so grimly describes, Governors and Representatives in Congress are compelled to solicit office. "If," says Mr. FESSENDEN, "a melancholy truth that they are agents to get office for their constituents.....As the matter now stands, a Senator or Representative must look out for those offices." But is there a Senator or Representative who does not recognize it as his position and duty who would not prefer to be relieved of the necessity? Is there one who is so aware that it is not a legitimate and proper part of his official function, whatever the present apparent predicament may be? Mr. TRUMBULL proposes a measure of relief. He says that the Constitution can not endure this increasing strain of Senatorial solicitation of office, and therefore at the next session he will introduce a bill to make it a penal offense for any member of Congress to go to the Departments begging for office. See how it works. General FILE was nominated by the President as Minister to Brazil. He was rejected by the Senate by a vote of 25 to 21. The President then sent for the papers recommending him, and discovered that five of the Senators who recommended his nomination voted against his confirmation.

If they had discovered in the morning while that he was an unfit person they did right in voting to reject him. But the fact as stated shows most forcibly how careful any man ought to be in recommending persons for office, and that a Senator ought not to recommend at all, because his previous action necessarily hampers his judgment in confirming. It was, of course, very difficult for Senator CRAGIN or Senator WILSON to oppose General FILE after recommending him, because their good judgment and consistency were involved. But Mr. TRUMBULL'S bill will be opposed by the same feeling that imperils Mr. JENCKES'S Civil Service bill, and that retained the Tenure-of-Office law. That feeling is the love of power. Men are generally willing to pay the necessary price for the possession of power of any kind. Under the custom that has now almost the force of law the Senate is the seat of power in our system. Mr. SUMNER is reported to have said that the Senate is the Government. It is certainly the most powerful branch of it. So, therefore, in the midst of office scramble as has just closed in Washington, many a Senator would gladly embrace the opportunity of future relief, yet when he reflects upon all that such relief involves, it is very possible that, being human, he will be willing to take the chances still.

Mr. JENCKES'S Civil Service bill would relieve the particular difficulty at which Mr. CARPENTER'S resolution aimed, and which Mr. TRUMBULL denounced. But it would not affect, by any means to suppose, the chief struggle. In his last speech upon the subject in the House, on the 5th of April, Mr. JENCKES said: "This measure, it should be remembered, deals only with the inferior offices whose appointment is made by the President alone or by the Heads of Departments. It does not touch places which are filled with the advice and consent of the Senate. It would not in the least interfere with the scramble for office which now disgraces the end of the avenue, or which fills with anxious crowds the corridors of the other wing of the Capitol. It relates only to the appointments which may be made by the President alone, and does not meet the eye of the reader of newspapers, but which are a hundredfold more numerous than those which await the confirmation of the Senate, and without which the Government could not be carried on."

Mr. JENCKES'S bill does not include postmasters, nor any kind of diplomatic office, nor assessors and collectors of the internal revenue. The exception is very large. There are about 60,000 names in the Blue book, and there are 24,000 places which the gift of Heads of Departments that are included in the bill. But the bill is a step in the true direction; and when the country sees how much better it is to have intelligent and competent officers than mere political agents, it will cry aloud for more. As for the practical relief to those interested, it would rest upon the luckless willing side, it is to be considered that the Custom-house appointments are included in Mr. JENCKES'S bill.

Meanwhile it is for good men in the Senate and House to decide whether the present system is either desirable or safe.

DIPLOMATIC.

MR. SANFORD'S nomination, as Minister to Spain was not confirmed, and he remains at Brussels. The President will appoint some one in his place, as it is understood that Mr. HALE returns home; and it is very clear, irrespective of any personal considerations, what kind of Minister the emergency demands in Spain at this time. It is not that a Minister is bound by instructions, but it is no less true that it makes a vital difference who is instructed.

Our Minister to Spain goes to one of the earliest friends of the United States. In the summer of 1776 a Marblehead privateer, sailing under authority of Congress, put into the port of Bilboa for repairs and munitions. There were prize prisoners on board, and they instantly protested to the local authorities, and demanded the arrest of ELIJAH LEE of the privateer as a pirate. The case was referred to the Ministry at Madrid. The English Minister warmly supported the protest. But while the Ministry were debating the news of the Declaration of Independence arrived, and instantly the protest was dismissed, the flag welcomed, and the supplies of Spain flowed. GERMAN SERMON tells the story in his excellent oration in Boston ten years ago. The early friendship of France has been always gratefully remembered, but not that of Spain be forgotten. Both, indeed, had their own purposes, but they helped ours.

Moreover, as we have remarked elsewhere, Spain is now establishing a truly popular government. Universal suffrage and freedom of the press are already guaranteed, and universal suffrage will be given more surely than the true friendship of the United States. Let us have in Spain, therefore, a man of unblemished character and career, of whom every American may gladly say that he represents the best type of American citizenship. Let him also be a man whose political principles are thoroughly settled in political life, after so sharp a contest has prevailed, are deep and sincere, and whose life has been their faithful witness. Then let him be of quick mind and large knowledge and of a past and generous disposition, knowing that national glory is not essentially different from individual honor, and that no nation can honorably do what no man under similar circumstances is morally forbidden to a man.

Such a Minister, with patience, coolness, and sagacity, will show the government and people of Spain that, while every American necessarily sympathizes with the aspiration of all men every where, in Cuba as in Spain, to be politically as well as personally free, he does so without forgetting international duty. Such a Minister would show that, if a friend to Cuba, he is not an enemy to Spain.

This is not an ideal Minister, for the United States has now, and has had before, such foreign representatives.

NOTES.

IN Harper's Magazine for May begins the new story by the author of John Halifax, "A Heart Lady," and it begins with the interest with which Miss MULOCK, or Mrs. CRAIK, always invests even her opening chapter. It will be copiously illustrated, and our readers need nothing more than the announcement that the story begins to begin with it. Among the other excellent things in this Number is an article upon "The Working-men of the Middle Ages," which is full of timely interest.

THE Grand National Peace Jubilee is certainly to take place in Boston during the month of June, and more than two hundred men are busily at work throughout the colossal structure in which the colossal and continental and mammoth concerts are to take place. It is announced that the coliseum will be thoroughly lighted and ventilated, and that thousands and thousands of listeners can be accommodated. The attendance will very probably be enormous. All New England will of course come, and a large part of the West and Southwest. It is an affair of immense promise and proportions.

IN a late Number of the Radical is a paper upon the Palaces of America, which is the name given by the author, Mr. FRANK J. SCOTT, an accomplished architect of Toledo, to the public schools. He proposes that as the school-houses are the most important buildings in the country they should be also the most beautiful, noble in architecture and surrounded with lovely gardens and groves. The enthusiastic author "scouts the idea that there is any limit to a proper uniform of government that requires us to be simple in our tastes or moderate in our public expenditures," and he becomes a poet in developing his scheme.

IN "Planchette," a very pretty volume of the "Handy-Volume Series" by ROBERTS BROTHERS, there is a copious and popular, but faithful, summary of the phenomena and theories of modern "Spiritualism," by "E. S.," evidently a profoundly interested and competent student of the mystery. The simple knowledge and literary skill with which the subject is treated makes this volume the most commendable manual to all who are attracted to this speculation; and it will be read with great interest by the skeptic as well as by the believer.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE Hudson River has risen higher this spring than at any time during the past twelve years. All the low-lying portions of Troy and Albany were submerged, and the cellars of different kinds were flooded away, and traffic on the railroads converging at those cities was suspended. The Schoharie Creek and the Fall Kills overflowed at Troy becoming lashed by the rapid current, and set on fire by the burning oil. In New England freshets prevailed every where.

General LEE, the new Governor of Virginia, is reported to all persons who are now holding office, by a circular, to resign.

The Oxford boat race here occurred on the 31st ult. The course for a four-oared race is August next.

A terrible accident happened on the railroad train on the Lake Shore Railroad on the morning of April 28. A rail broke at Willow Station, a mile and a half E. of Ashtabula, and threw the rear car from the track, and the latter, as it struck the ground, turned over on its side, broke the draw-bars rail and the iron broke through the side next the ground, leaving the passengers in the car next to the track, while the wreck was dragged over these bodies for several rods. Six persons were killed and eleven seriously injured.

Two boys are under terrible agony of suffering at sea, in consequence of the brutality of the officers of the American ship Ocean Express, which left Liverpool for Calcutta April 3rd. The crew threw marks of ill-usage, and declare that the officers beat them with belaying pins, brass knuckles and other implements of a similar character. The boys, it is stated, were lowered over the side, but they were paralyzed; and that the lives of some of them were only saved through the interposition of the Captain's wife.

FOREIGN NEWS.

IN the House of Commons on April 19 the amendment postponing the operation of the bill for the disestablishment of the Irish Church till 1874 was lost, the majority against it being 107.

The Spanish Cortes is still occupied with the question as to what form of government shall be adopted. The action in the House of Deputies favoring universal suffrage has been adopted almost unanimously.

An amendment for establishing a moderate censorship of the Press has been rejected, and the original motion guaranteeing liberty of the Press, the free election of municipal councils, and the right of petition have been carried by a large majority.

The Spanish Cortes has declared that the King of Spain is still strengthening. A resolution has been adopted by the Cortes enabling the King to raise funds from the Cortes. This is deemed favorable to Montpensier's success.

The Government at Madrid has ordered that the proceeds of the property of religious parties, confiscated in Cuba, be applied to defray the expenses of the war.

A Commission, appointed to examine the Penal Code in Italy, have unanimously agreed in recommending the abolition of capital punishment.

The Bedini Theatre of Naples, Italy, was destroyed by fire on the night of April 19.

The Pope's Encyclical letter was promptly condemned by Prussia, Bavaria, the Bavarian Prime Minister declaring, a recent discussion in the Bavarian Chambers positive to educational matters.

JACQUES OFFENBACH, THE FRENCH COMPOSER OF "OPERA BOUFFE."

GARROTING OF POLITICAL PRISONERS IN CUBA.

We give on this page three illustrations which are very characteristic in their connection with the Cuban Revolution. One is a representation of the execution of MEDINA and LEON in Havana on the 8th of April; the other two illustrate the garrote, the instrument of execution. One is a top view of the iron-work of the garrote. It is attached to the upper part of a post about three feet in height. The principal feature is a peculiar treble-threaded screw; one half is left-handed, the other is right-handed. Affixed to the back end is a double handle by which the screw can be turned. The front half of the screw passes through the post, and turns in a nut fixed in the latter. About an inch from the end there is a curved piece to fit the back of the neck. The end of the screw is somewhat rounded. To the back half of the screw a cross-bar is fitted. From the ends of this two rods pass through holes in the post. To the end of one a semicircular "cravat" of iron is hinged, so that it can be closed upon the end of the other rod and pinned to it. A half turn of the screw will draw back the cravat by means of the left-hand screw, cross-bar, and rods, while at the same time the point and curved piece will be thrown forward an equal distance. There is a seat attached to the post, which is so adjusted that the point of the screw will come against a particular portion of the spine.

THE GARROTE.

When the culprit is seated the cravat is closed and pinned, and at a given signal the executioner gives a quick turn to the screw. The spine is broken and death is instantaneous. Seldom does the slightest movement or even tremor of any part of the body take place.

The persons sentenced to death are placed in capilla (chapel) the day previous, where they have the attendance of a priest, and are furnished with any thing they need. An instance is recorded of a Chinese murderer asking for and getting a bath of rose-water. The sentence of the courts is usually death by garrote vil. By the old laws if a nobleman is to be executed the sentence must be by garrote noble. The only difference is, that in the first case the platform is not sheltered or its boards covered, while the nobleman can demand to have a roof over him and his feet rest on a carpet. There is but one garrote in the Department, and when required at any place it is sent under an escort of soldiers, together with the executioner. Undoubtedly the execution by garrote is less inhuman, and less disgusting to the spectator, than any other mode of capital punishment.

The crime for which LEON and MEDINA were executed consisted of secreting arms in Havana for the benefit of the patriots. As these men were led to execution a remarkable incident occurred, which at the same time illustrated the bravery of the victims and the brutality of the Spanish soldiers. There was an immense crowd present to witness the execution, of whom not a small portion sympathized with the patriot cause. LEON, when he reached the scaffold, in spite of an attempt made by the priest to dissuade him, determined to speak. In order to gain a hearing he cried out viva España! which was responded to by huzzas from the Volunteers. He then went on to denounce, in a few brief words, the oppression of which he was a victim, and ended his harangue with enthusiastic vivas for Cuba, independence, and CESPEDES. This conduct so astonished the drummers, who had been ordered to drown any seditious remarks by the noise of their drums, that they were taken all aback. As the first words of the prisoner had called forth the cheers of the soldiers, so his final vivas met with a tumultuous response from the Cubans. In their rage the Volunteers turned upon the vast crowd and fired, killing or wounding over a score of unarmed persons. Efforts had been made, but unsuccessfully, by MR. HALE, the American Consul, to prevent the execution.

THE PRISONER'S SEAT.

EXECUTION BY GARROTING OF LEON AND MEDINA AT HAVANA, APRIL 8, 1869.—[SKETCHED BY OUR CUBAN ARTIST.]

BY THE MERE SIDE.

'Twas a sweet balmy summer day;
I stole toward the dimpled mere,
Where oft, with slow and lonely steps,
I came my doubting heart to cheer.

Twinkling with myriad smiles it lay
O'eshadowed by the loving trees,
Whose branches waved a fond embrace,
Rocked by the gently playful breeze.

Each flower with its perfumed breath
Methought did yearn to kiss my cheek,
And whisper of that angel's peace
My doubting heart had come to seek.

I sat beside the dimpled mere,
And gazed upon its joyous face,
Whose laughing humor seemed to add
To each reflected flower new grace.

The faint distortions which it limned
Of every weeping-willow's bough,
Seemed but to say with mirthful ire,
"Be sad to-morrow, be joyous now."

The very insects lay asleep,
In lazy ecstasy of joy:
Amid such peace they must forget
Their stings had power to annoy.

And so I gazed into the mere,
To rend my beating heart's fate there,
And all I saw was glowing hope,
And not one darkling shade of care.

I laughed and whispered to the flowers
"She loves me; yes, she loves but me;"
Their rippling faces bowed and said,
"She loves thee; yes, she loves but thee."

THE FACE OF HORROR.

I AM a very nervous man, and extremely superstitious. Owing partly to constitutional infirmity, and still more to the thoughtless folly of a miserable old nurse, who by her ghost stories made my childhood a scene of terror, my imagination has always been filled with fearful images. While a lad I was always afraid in the dark, nor have I yet, although a full-grown man, so far overcome my imagination as to feel entirely at ease when alone at night in a house. In vain I attempt to reason away my fear. Reason is all very well when the sun shines brightly and friends are around, but when darkness comes down, and when loneliness is added to it, then fancy has full sway, and all wiser thoughts are useless.

I was once staying at a house of mine in the country. I am passionately fond of the country. I live there all through the summer months, from the first disappearance of snow till the very verge of frosty weather, and am never happy in the town. On this occasion I was left alone in my house. The family were all away. Even the servants had gone, and the old house-dog had gone also with the family.

"THERE APPEARED, ALSO, THE DIM OUTLINE OF A WHITE FACE."

I confess that it was with much trepidation that I found myself entirely alone, and I looked forward to the night with considerable dismay. However, I tried to banish my fearful thoughts from my mind, and concluded to trust in Providence. So the day gradually faded away, and night came on. As the shades thickened, and gradually a deeper gloom was apparent, I began to lament my fool-hardiness in venturing against my own nature to dare the terrors which I knew were before me. My usual nervous fears were rapidly beginning to overcome me. To have gone away even then was possible, but I was ashamed to yield to such childish feelings. I therefore tried to struggle against them as best I could. I went around the house, fastened the doors and windows, entered into the sitting-room, lighted the lamps, and tried to make preparations for a quiet evening.

Had there been a dog, or even a cat, or a bird in the house I should have felt easy in mind. But there was no living thing except myself, and so the sense of loneliness which already oppressed me grew stronger, and it was in vain that I struggled against it. The thought that outside of the room door, and all through the house, there was the awful pall of darkness eastrouding all things was too much for me.

In vain I resorted to all the usual remedies which are resorted to in such cases. I drank a stiff glass of brandy, and smoked several large pipes, in the vain endeavor to strengthen my nerves. It was all useless. The soothing principle was not forthcoming. I could not quiet myself, and the thought of retiring to bed in the midst of this overpowering loneliness was intolerable.

The worst of it was that all the while I was fully conscious of the extreme childishness, the worse than folly of my feelings. My reasoning faculty was perfectly sound, it was my nerves that were out of order, and I could not withstand the physical infirmity.

At last, in a sort of desperation, I thought that perhaps active exercise might be beneficial. If I were only to light my lantern, take an axe, and bluster about in the wood-house, I might possibly distract my troublesome thoughts.

No sooner thought of than done. Without giving myself time to think I lighted a lantern, took my axe, and swinging it about, and singing a loud song, I stamped forth into the wood-house.

Arriving there I put the lantern on the floor, and taking down a quantity of wood, I began to cut and chop most vigorously; stick after stick fell before my efforts, and I was beginning to congratulate myself upon the success of my plan. At length I got a huge knotted stick in my grasp and began to struggle with it. The stick was so tough and strong that it gave full exercise to my patience, and was rapidly taking the chief place in my thoughts, when all of a sudden my proceedings were abruptly stopped.

SUBMARINE DIVERS EQUIPPED FOR THEIR DESCENT.—[SEE PAGE 295.]

I heard a low sigh close behind me.

Down went my axe and stick. A cold thrill passed through every nerve.

I trembled.

Yet I reasoned a moment. It is a mistake. It can not be—

My reasonings were suddenly interrupted. The same sound came again. I turned my head, by an irresistible impulse.

The window of the barn was just behind me. It was from that direction that the sound seemed to come, and to that direction my eyes were forced to turn. As I slowly turned my eyes encountered two other eyes, round, bright, starring, which I at once knew belonged to the window. To my startled senses nothing else was apparent except these eyes. They seemed to draw all my gaze into them, and exhaust all my life and all my strength. There appeared also, as I stared, the dim outline of a white face, of doubtful purity, over which a cloth partly hung covering the brow. The lips seemed to move, yet I heard no sound whatever. But the stare of the eyes held me spellbound. I had strength neither to speak, nor to move, nor to cry. The awful fascination of the fixed stare thrilled me, yet throught me, and at each successive thrill my strength failed me. I was conscious of nothing, but the horror of that night. I did not try to think what it was. I did not venture to think of going closer to examine it. All reason and reflection had become utterly at the pressure of overmastering fear; and never in all my life had my fear which I had ever felt in any degree attained to the proportions of this overwhelming passion—this anguish of terror which now paralyzed me. It was a fright of which one might die.

But as I stared the face gradually vanished. I staggered back, and drew again the breath which had left me. Then with a wild impulse I rushed out of the shed.

Once out in the open air, away from walls of houses, I felt safe. It is a singular thing that nervousness never affects me any where except within a house. I am fearless when under the sky. I have traveled carelessly over the loneliest roads. I have no concern about churchyards. I could walk through any one at any hour of night with no more concern than by day. I would rather sleep upon a tombstone in a graveyard than upon a spring-bed in a comfortable bed in a respectable house, if I had to be alone. What is the reason? The accursed effect of childish superstitions which referred always and invariably to rooms in houses, to garrets, and to cellars.

After a half hour's waiting, in which I became thirsty for a smoke, and sauntered about the garden, I felt calm. I heard footsteps about, but thought nothing of them. They were cows, I supposed. I heard sighs, but smiled as I thought how terrible they would be if I were in the house. There was calm. I said to myself, not the breathings of the cows. But what about that face of horror? Could I account for that? I could not.

"I am diseased," said I; "my brain is out of order; my nerves are affected. Of course. That is why I see apparitions. This is what the books tell me."

By this time I thought that I would try the house again. I went into the barn to get the lantern. I refrained from looking at the window. I knew that nothing had moved. But there was some horrible fascination about it which I could not resist. My eyes seemed drawn there. I looked.

Great Heaven! there was the horrible face!

My blood froze in my veins. My eyes seemed starting out from their sockets. My hair bristled, cold chills passed over me, and it seemed as if my heart stopped beating. The face, deathly pale, slowly descended into the opening of dark and wild eyes, with the awful fascination of their gaze—these were before me, and seemed like a head hanging from the window. Again the lips moved; yet, as before, no sound escaped.

I stood frozen to the spot. My breath left me, my heart was dead, my brain reeled. Had that horror lasted one instant longer I should have fallen, and that dead or at best senseless. Yet I was spared this. As before, while I looked the face passed away, and with a low sigh, which I could hear, my agitated senses to fill all the place, it disappeared.

Once more I rushed forth into the open air.

A few minutes I walked in the garden, under the serene open sky, sufficed to restore me. The calm face of Nature was before me, and obliterated all horrors. I took away all dread of that other face. The sweet face of Nature rose up over me, like the face of a mother who bends over her child, and I drank it up, shrinking from some terrible dream, and calms him, and soothes him, and seeks to lull him again to sleep. So I soothed myself; and I blessed Nature, and I blessed the Creator also who had given me so deep a love for Nature that her very presence could drive away all fear.

Once more in the open air footsteps, and sighs, and other sounds were heard; but I gave no more trouble than they would have given by day. These as they arose were scarce noticed, or if they were, I easily referred them to the cows of the adjoining pasture field.

I sat on a seat in an arbor of the garden, and mused passively. What change was there now in me? Was I the same? The murmur of the night air soothed me still more. The dark shadow of the house rose in front of me; but so long as I was not inside its walls it had no terror. Let apparitions come in the open air if they chose, and I would face them with nerves of iron. They did not come.

For more than two hours I remained among there, until at last I had used up all my tobacco. I had made up my mind to pass the night there; but after my tobacco had gone, it was necessary for me to get some more. It was in the house. Could I go after it?

Worse still, the lantern was in the barn. Dared I venture again into that barn?

In the open air I felt bold, and in my calmness I made up my mind to try it. Fully conscious of my weakness in the house, I determined not to turn my head toward that window in the barn, but to go straight to the lantern, turning neither to the right nor to the left. Armed with the strength of this resolution, I went to the barn, found the door open, only sufficiently open to see the light, seized it, and rushed out again. Nothing occurred. I heard no noise. I had conquered at any rate in that trial.

It was a small thing to do. It was a coward-ly thing, yet I congratulated myself in the open air once more I felt triumphant. Now could I venture into the house? Why not?

I did not see or understand it. I boldly entered, walked through the back entrance, from which I had come out, and passed along the hall into the front parlor.

The house was an old-fashioned one, low, with the windows only a few feet from the ground. The blinds had not been closed. The room looked cheerful and cozy. Oh, if I only might dare to sit quietly here and pass the night. Why not? Why not sit down and smoke and enjoy myself?

I put my light on the table, and sat on a sofa near it, before I could stand it. Stranger! Already my nerves had grown excited. Faint sounds seemed to sound afar through the house. Up stairs seemed to me to be a region of horror. The dark hall seemed also terrible. Suddenly I jumped up and lighted the hall lamp. Then I lighted another, which I placed in the opposite room. I strove to drive away the darkness, thinking that then I should feel more free.

But my nervousness only increased.

"Pooh," said I, "I will put down the blinds and then I shall be a friend."

I rose and walked to the window.

Suddenly a sharp thrill flashed through me. Oh, my God! It had come again—the face of horror!

Yes, there it was, at the window; the white face; the dark eyes; the cloth bound round eyes; the lips that moved but uttered no sound. I staggered back. The horror that came over me was unbearable. I fell on the floor with a freezing chill congealing all my blood, and bristling all my hair.

I did not die. I did not faint. An overmastering fear held me. My face was hidden in my hands. The Terror impelled me to fly—and I fled.

Forth I rushed, feeling as if the Thing were after me. I bounded out, and once more entered the open air.

Ah me! how sweet was that outer world! The moon shone brightly. The winds murmured sweetly. My fear fell from me. I was calm instantly and at peace.

Apparitions! These were possible to me, and terrible in the house; but outside I laughed at them. I walked up and down for some time.

The house was surrounded by a high fence, which inclosed the garden and a yard. The front of the house faced the road. The barn was without the inclosure, and opened on the yard.

After a time the garden inclosure grew wearisome, and I determined to stroll about. Go back into the house I would not. Indeed, such was now the terror within that I could not. Yet outside I was free from fear, and I thought savagely how differently I would face that apparition under the sky.

Eager to amuse myself with a stroll, I unbarred the garden gate, and went out into the field. Then I walked around, and after a time I came out into the road in front.

Scarcely had I reached the road when I saw something standing by the window of the parlor. It was the face. Instead of being terrible, the face stood plainly defined against this window. The front of the house was in the shadow, so that I could see nothing but the face. And I saw that this figure was staring into the room.

In a moment the thought flashed upon me that this was the thing that had been terrifying me. There was no fear now—not a vestige. I was in the open air, and all the savage recklessness seized me. I would be revenged on this, whatever or whoever it was, that had dared to subject me to such agony, and expose my shameful weakness.

Silently, stealthily, and swiftly I rushed up to the window. The figure did not move. I grasped it with both arms.

A low moan escaped—a heart-broken moan—a moan which went to my very heart.

The face of the figure turned around. It was close beside mine: a white face, the brow overhung by an overshadow of tresses, thousands; the lips white and bloodless; the eyes large, round, and staring. The face was close by mine.

I looked. It was no face.

The eyes were lustreless. Alas! I saw all: life was there, but the light of life was extinguished. Reason had fled. These were the eyes of a maniac that glared into mine!

The creature was a woman. She uttered nothing but feeble moans as she stared into my face.

A maniac! She had come where she had seen lights shining, attracted by the glitter. She had caused my anguish, but had no thought of it; she had made me weak, but had not been conscious of my weakness.

And all my anger straightway turned into pity.

The poor creature only moaned.

She had no words to speak. Sighs and moans were her only utterance.

I took her hand and led her gently after me. She followed unresistingly. I led her around through the garden gate, into the house, and into the parlor. I made her lie down on my sofa. I threw my dressing-gown over her.

She resisted not. She only moaned.

Strange! This thing of terror had become my companion. I was no longer alone.

All my fear departed at once. I had a living, breathing being with me, and at once all superstitions feeling vanished. Yet it was strange that the being who had inspired such horror should have been the first one to bring calm.

There are some among my friends who would have felt far more horrified at the idea of passing the night with a maniac than facing an apparition. With me it was different.

I played for this poor creature soft, soothing music. I offered her food. The food she took. The music seemed to soothe her. The food she would not take.

The night passed quickly.

On the following day I found out that she had wandered away from a company of insane people who had been taken out from an asylum in the neighborhood on a picnic. I restored her to her keepers. They told me that her case was incurable, and that she often fearfully violent.

After that night I did not venture to stay in the house, but went off, under various pretexts, to the neighboring village, day till the family returned.

Some persons would have been cured of superstition by the result of that night.

I am different. My superstition is as strong as ever, and prevents me from ever thinking of staying alone all night any where except out of doors.

RUTH'S STORY.

"Is love! Of course you are; what good-looking young fellow ever goes through his first London season without a slight attack of the malady?"

"Well, but, Roe—"

"Well, but, cousin Fred: I don't want to hear any thing now about it. I am tired of love; every body's in love—Hester is in love, Godfrey is in love, you're in love, and, in fact, I'm the only person that is not in love."

And Ruth, who had the downiest peach-colored cheeks, colored a most beautiful rich crimson.

"Wicked one, I fell into the trap floor with a triumphantly, and then both laughed, Rue the heartiest, for when didn't she laugh, this same Rue?

It was a large square room in a country house, a comfortable old-fashioned drawing-room, and the time was the middle month of June. The window lay open, and a great scent of roses filled the air both within and without. Far into the distance the gardens, the park, the meadow fields, the boundary of hedges, and beyond a range of purple hills.

"And, Rue, you won't listen to my love-story, may I speak of something else? When is Mr. Urquhart coming to stay here?"

"Next week," Ruth answered, briefly.

"May I abuse him, Rue?"

"As much as you please, Fred."

"May I really? How kind! But I sha'n't; it wouldn't be fair. Where's Hester?"

"In the garden."

"I shall join her there; perhaps she may listen to my love-story."

"Perhaps she may," Ruth laughed again, and then he went out of the room.

"Rue, mamma says you are to mend my frock. Look here; I tore it by mistake trying to get some ferns in the grove."

Rue looked up from the window, where she had been following with sad brown eyes the tall figure of cousin Fred, as he went off across the terrace in search of Hester in the garden.

"What a sad child you are, Kit; you're always a bundle of rags. Hand me my work-box. Here, kneel down and keep quiet."

Stitch, stitch, stitch, went the needle and thread, Kit eager to be off, following with her eyes every movement of Rue by the window, every figure that crossed the terrace.

"I see Hester and Fred," broke out the child. "Hester and Fred are always together now, ain't they? Rue, may I go?"

"Yes; run off, and don't make a mess of yourself."

Away flew the little girl, and Rue fell to her stitching with her thoughts once more. "Always together now." Those words had given her quite a little start, and her thoughts made a journey back in time when some one had been her property, and not Hester's at all. All that was changed now. She saw them coming down the path engaging and talking; and as they came over the grass her thoughts were with other summer times. It was all over now. The sweetness, the joy, the odor of trees, thousands of roses blossoming just as they used in those other long-ago days; and the man whom she had loved was far, far away—Seal, perhaps, with a vast sea rolling between them. Ruth will never love another man more; she is carrying the memory of one beloved one with her to a grave.

"I am very fond of Roe; I wonder does she know it, or is there any use in my telling her so?" Fred said to Hester.

"Why? Is there such a problem which the family have never been able to solve," Hester answered.

"Do you think she likes Urquhart?"

"I haven't an idea."

"Do you know what I think of him, Hetty?"

"What?"

"That he's a snob and a fool. Shall I give you a little sketch of his way of living? He reads Sunday Times, reading John Bull and Bell's Life, with a cigar. He drinks more brandy, diluted in soda and water, than any three other men put together. He is well dressed, I confess, but he wears Mr. Poole a little account which that gentleman may go whistle for, I can tell you. There is always a delicate odor of wille fleurs and bouquet d'amour about him, which becomes quite oppressive when he takes out his pocket-handkerchief. He stands in the window of the Junior Carlton half the afternoon to show the passers-by that he is a member. His own brougham takes him to dinner parties. He never gets up until three o'clock P.M., and he is never in bed before four or five o'clock A.M. There are some Hebrew gentlemen who claim acquaintance with him. He pretends to teach me billiards, and I could give him fifteen in twenty. I don't believe he ever handled a gun or a bat in his life; and he owns a grand little Arab that he's afraid to mount. In fact, he's a snob and a sneak, and I mean to tell him so some day."

"He's gentlemanlike in his manners," Hester said, quietly.

"Oh, that's just it! I should like to write a pamphlet for young men, with a few hints how to get on with ladies. Walk at a foot had a chronic pain below your waistcoat; look as if your collar would cut your head off if you turned to one side; speak, as—"

"Fred, you're jealous, I'm afraid."

Whereupon Fred began to laugh again, he was such a good-humored fellow.

"Rue, papa wants you in the study," a round-faced boy popped his head into the drawing-room to say, and Rue put by her work and hurried away.

"Well, papa?"

"Come over here. What do these bills mean?"

She went over, and bent her head over a pile of papers on the table. Well she knew those bills she had pored over them many times.

"The housekeeping, papa."

"I know that," he answered, tartly; "but I tell you once for all, we must curtail our expenses, or I sha'n't be able to keep a roof over your heads soon. Why, here's twenty pounds for a pack of children who contrive to live on bread and milk."

Then Ruth, the drudge of the family, was allowed to gather up the unpaid bills and carry them off.

"Rue, do you mean to accept Mr. Urquhart?"

"Not before he asks me, Fred."

"But what if he does?"

"You shall stop behind the curtain and listen, my inquisitive cousin."

"I'll be ashamed of you to flirt with him if you don't mean to have him in the end."

"I don't flirt. I've been flirting with you all my life, but I don't mean ever to marry you, even if you ask me, dear old fellow."

Fred laughed, but the tears came to her eyes. What was one to say to such a girl, laughing one minute, crying the next? When he thought of her he always called her poor Rue, and what she feel at all like other people? Could she even feel sorrow, or would not the sunshine break through her tears?

"You have no heart, Rue."

"None, Fred. Now you have got that foolish idea fairly out of your head, and had a laugh a great deal, and see the ridiculous in so many things, I can not ever be serious."

"It would be hard to find a subject to make you think seriously upon," he answered, shaking his head.

"Do you think so indeed? Then you are unjust to me. You think I have no heart."

And had she—was she indeed so foolish? Ah, Fred's words!

She was a girl who had no sort of shyness about her, who was as full of fun and frolic as a mountain-lamb of a midwinter's night, the best running about the house after the children, singing and laughing with them; or who laid aside and Bunyan, and knew as how the old leg of mutton might be cut up and hashed to the best advantage; who laughed sometimes at the ridiculous, and kept her eyes at her own queer observations, and who, ten minutes later, was to be found down in a morbid fit of the blues over-night.

The jolliest, kindest young soul that ever lived, whom the children loved and the servants obeyed. Other girls were done more in their lives, but few so many little kindly offices for others. Where she got her spirits from was a mystery to every one, for never was there a more lamentable Castle Rackrent of a place than the Hermitage, her father's place. A sickly invalid mother, who seldom left her room, who left a house and nursery full of children in the charge of a girl of seventeen. A poor bookworm of a father, who lived apart from the family in a sort of a world of his own, who only came upon the scene when there was a bill to be paid, or a slight matter administered to the children.

I don't know why I have taken this last chapter of Ruth's life to write about, except that I was in need of some little remembrance of her, for she and her pleasant ways have night out of sight, and in what avail was all the love that my little Rue had gotten to herself when the time came that the cruel hand was stretched out to gather the sweet spring flowers and bear them away to His own eternal garden, away from the "evils to come?" Whether cousin Fred loved her, whether the children and their father could spare her, whether Hetty began to find out that life at the Hermitage was wretched, Rue herself knew not, and she was gone out of it.

The years go over, and children's voices sound, laughing and talking, through the rooms and in the garden. But Ruth never joins in their play, or peeps in to whisper "Hush!" and a caution that "Poor mamma has a headache." Some one plays and sings in the library of evenings where she used to sing, but her young voice is singing in the celestial songs among the choirs of angels. Ruth's canary, a frail little bird with a poor worthless life sings all day in its cage in the drawing-room, but the strong heart of its mistress is still forever and forever!

THE RIVER OF TIME.

Out a wonderful stream is the river of Time,
As it runs through the realms of tears,
With a faithless rhythm and a musical rhyme,
And a horrible song and a mystic sublime,
That bends with the ocean of years.

How the waters are drifting like flakes of snow,
And the summer has built bowers,
And the year is the sheaf—so they come and they go
On the river's breast, with its ebb and flow,
As it glides through the shadow and sheen.

There's a musical bell on the river of Time,
Where the echoes of sins are plying;
There's a cloudless sky and tropical clime,
And a song at sweet an vesper chime,
When the Junes with the roses are staying.

And the name of this isle is the Long Ago,
And we hurry our treasures there—
There are brows of beauty and bosoms of snow—
There are heaps of dust, but we love the more so!
There are kirtles and tresses of hair.

There are fragments of song that nobody sings,
And a part of an infant's prayer—
There's a harp unstrung, and a harp without strings,
There are broken vows and pieces of rings,
And the ring that is sweet to wear.

There are hands that are waved when the airy shore
By the tempus is lifted in air—
And we weep and we laugh through the turbulent roar
Sweet voices we heard in days gone before,
When the wind blows the river to bear.

Oh! remembered for aye be that blessed isle,
All the days of our life till night—
When the soul comes with its beautiful smile,
And our eyes are closed to slumber a while,
May our "greenwood" of soul be in sight.

SUBMARINE DIVERS.

VARIOUS styles of apparatus have been used to enable divers to remain for a long time under water. The principal means employed for this purpose has been the diving-bell and the diving-armor. It is estimated that the natural constitution of man unfits him for remaining under water with ease for more than two minutes at a time. By long practice it is said that the Indian pearl-divers of Ceylon are able to remain under water for ten minutes. The self-supplying armor contrived to render a longer stay under water practicable consist of the diving-bell; of a partial covering for the body, made of India-rubber with a metallic helmet protecting the head; or of water-tight metallic vessels inclosing the whole body, and furnished with flexible arms and appliances of strong glass. At least 200 cubic inches of air per minute are required in order to support life. The diving-bell was used in Europe as early as the beginning of the sixteenth century. But the use of this bell has been of late greatly superseded by the submarine armor, which allows the operator to remain longer under the surface, as he is supplied with fresh air from above. The diving-armor in this armor was invented in 1830, and has been since then greatly improved. In the recovery of treasure, and in the execution of important works, it has been found of the greatest use. The best armors now in use are those made of rubber and canvas, the former being placed between two thicknesses of canvas. The covering for the head is metallic. The diver's arm is supplied with air by means of a powerful three-cylinder air-pump.

Our illustration represents eight submarine divers recently employed under Col. E. B. HARRISON, Submarine Engineer (from whom we receive the photographic representation from which our engraving is made), engaged in laying the foundation of the Kansas City Bridge over the Missouri River. A strong wooden caisson, 70 feet long by 23 feet wide, was first constructed in this a masonry pier was built. The sand beneath the caisson was removed by dredges, and the courses of masonry were laid as the caisson sank. This process was carried on successfully until the caisson was lowered to within four feet of the bed-rock, when a close layer of boulders was encountered. The services of the submarine divers were required to remove these so that they could be worked for a whole month, night and day, at a depth of about fifty feet below the surface of the water with 3000 tons of masonry above them.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WAS there ever a May-day in New York when some of the valuables in the process of moving did not receive a sprinkling of rain? Perhaps; but our memory fails to recall it. If there is no rain on that coming day, so charming in name, so dreadful in reality, there is certain to be dust in abundance, and all manner of disagreeable and uncomfortable things in the streets. And for a fortnight to come, as for a fortnight past, all kinds of rubbish will clog the thoroughfares. Then —may we hope for a cleansing time?

Moving day is a test of temper and character; an ordeal through which few can pass with credit to themselves—at least they do not. Moving days are like saying, in the words of the poet, but without his jollity:

"First of May,
Clear the way!
Baskets, barrows, trundles;
Take good care,
Mind the stare!
Betty, where the bundles?"

A word in your ear, gentle reader. If you are among the host of movers, you must expect to lose some of your goods and chattels in the confusion; but —don't lose your temper.

Freshets have been prevailing in all parts of the country. The Hudson River has risen higher than at any season for twelve years. The waters of the Connecticut, Merrimac, Mohawk, Black, and St. Lawrence rivers have swollen into floods; railroad travel has been suspended on some routes; families have been driven from their dwellings by the inundation, and great damage has resulted. A singular incident occurred near Troy. The steamboat on the Glenn's Falls Lime Company at Green Island, containing about 1900 barrels of lime, was set on fire by the water slaking the lime, and the building was wholly destroyed.

The fine group of statuary recently presented to the Central Park by several of our citizens has been located near the marble arch on the Mall. The group is of bronze, and represents an Indian, accompanied by his dog, defending against a panther supposed to be in view. The loss of the Indian are gut by the skin of some wild animal. The Indian carries a Yoo bow and arrow; his right rests on the head of his dog, whose arbor he intently watches.

What ingenious creatures Frenchmen are! A French chemist, Monsieur Sacquet by name, has just invented a soft pencil which can be mixed in the substance of the various pastes and preparations that are put up for the toilet. It makes the preparations keep longer, and imparts no disagreeable taste.

"Hannah Tyler" seems not to be popular. She (or he), sheltered under the name, succeeded in smuggling to injure the general reputation of the employees of the Government Printing Office (and it is correct), but that scores of vindictive arise to plead the cause of women who are unjustly shabbed.

A novel style of hand-dress—and the very latest too —is a garland of tulips worn upon the head, so arranged that the heat from the sunrises the tulips gradually to unfold, displaying diamonds, sudden and pre cious stones. The expense is not light.

A few days ago a novel scene occurred at Washington. While the Board of Registry was in session, and a long column of voters were being examined, it occurred to have their names placed upon the list, a boy of seven women opposite the ground floor seated, or perhaps more properly, accompanied by two gentlemen. They presented a paper, in which they declared their belief that they were entitled to the right of suffrage, and requested that their names be placed on the list of qualified voters. The request was promptly complied. The Board received the paper, and promised to give it due consideration.

"Grace Greenwood," having been mated by newspaper gossip with a certain "Dr. Lippincot," writes a spicy note to the New York Tribune, telling the world not her husbande. She thinks she has some reason to complain of editors for assigning to her "new and amiable consorts." The same disclaimer which she says she rote forth for the benefit of "Dr. Lippincott," the reader must also apply to Mr. J. B. Lippincott, the great publisher, and to General Lippincott, the door-keeper of the Senate.

"They are 'all honorable men,' doubtless," she remarks, in conclusion, "but I am not the wife of either, and I hereby warn all persons against trusting me on their account."

Mrs. Irving la Portsmouth, New Hampshire, has for the past few years suffered much from a nervous affection. She has now in her possession, as a scientific gentleman—recently analyzed her hyperspage, and found that the amount in a pound of tea diminished at once would produce instant death.

Ghosts are making a sensation in the court-room. The real ghosts at large are not the ones that appear to take the portrait of any person desiring it, and also to take the same from any fancy picture of some deceased friend. These spirit likenesses are said to be painted by some spiritual force. The subject seems to be as mysterious as the Rochester rappings —and probably has a similar origin.

A queer sort is that the latest fashion in regard to hair is to evenly divide the entire head of hair between the two colors! A portion of the hair is made of the ebony black on the other, or a fiery red and a brilliant green, makes a charming contrast!

The great depth of snow in Vermont gave rise to the fear that the sugar crop would prove a failure this year; but the sunny weather and melting of ice freely for some weeks, and the supply has been larger than usual. The sugar-making season this year is a source of considerable income to the State, as well as a pleasure and luxury to residents, both old and young.

Senators are said to be very polite to every body at the commencement of their term. It is not unlikely a certain Senator sent for him one day shortly before his term expired. He came and found a person that she stammered out, "I fear you are very busy." "I am," he replied, curtly. "I fear I have intruded." "You have," glaring at her with ill-concealed impatience. "Might I ask if—if—" Then followed a long pause, trifling one, bowing up with "If you please." To which he replied, "No, Madam, I do not please at all; good-morning!" and away she went, "I'll bury here into tears.

Children look at things in a fresh, simple way that is amusing and often charming. The matter of "not playing on Sunday" is a great puzzle to those children. A story is told of a little Southern boy whose mother one Sunday bade him put away his toys. "Why can't I play Sunday, ma?" said he, in a grieving tone. "Because it's God's day, and God will not love little boys that play on Sunday." "Well, ma," returned the boy, "I'll bet God played on Sunday when he was little!"

Another mother said to her son: "Stevy, don't your conscience tell you it is wrong to play with your toys on Sunday?" "No, mamma," answered Stevy. "Yes," well," said his mother; "if your conscience don't tell you it is wrong, go to bed." Stevy put down his toy, and eat some momentas patiently waiting. After a while he took it up again, and said, "Well, I guess I might be well go on with my play, don't hear my conscience say any thing."

The great musical event of the season is the production of Rossini's Petite Messe Solennelle. When the illustrious composer began to write the music he was over seventy-two years old. It was first privately rehearsed March, 1864, in Paris, and was received with unbounded delight by the few privileged and critical auditors. The first public performance of the mass, as all know, took place at the Théâtre Italien Théâtre, Paris, Sunday, February 28, 1869, the seventy-eighth anniversary of its author's birth. It was under the direction of M. Bagier; and Mlle. Krauss, Madame Alboni, Signor Nicolini, e Signor Agnesi were the solo singers. Mr. Strakosch, who was for a long time an intimate friend of Rossini, paid Madame Rossini one hundred thousand francs for the great work, and from him Mr. Ullmann purchased the right for Italy for fifty thousand francs. In England the Sacred Harmonic Society first presents it. Mr. Max Strakosch procured the right for America from his brother. Maurice, and before this paragraph meets the reader's eye, the mass will have been produced at the Academy of Music in this city. Miss Kellogg takes the soprano part, Madame Testa the contralto, Bostli the tenor, and Antonucci the bass. This mass, Rossini's musical legacy to the world, is said to be worthy of the master. Its praise can be greater.

Parisian publishers offer some novel inducements to the public to subscribe to journals. Last year the Figaro gave to its readers a ball and a supper at one of the Champs Elysées in Paris. A child's paper, L'Eloquence des Enfants, proposes to give each young reader an opening with directions for playing upon it, but those who disdain such childish toys may take a kerosene lamp instead. The Paris offers this year a performance of two Opera, four subscribers being entitled to a box. Le National bestows upon its subscribers a key containing a hundred packets of twelve different kinds of soup powder from a well-known manufacturer, twelve sonnets, and a guide to etiquette.

The twelve hundred operatives at the Lyman Mills, Holyoke, Massachusetts, are to take their choice either to be vaccinated or to be discharged.

Street obstructions have been a common subject of complaint for many months—and with reason. The serious, practical question is, What can people do when the sidewalk on the right hand and on the left of their dwelling is absolutely impassable? The answer seems obvious—Walk in the road. But when the street happens to be undergoing the process of repaving—a work of time under present arrangements—and stones are also blockaded with building materials, what then? Some serial convenience is positively need for there are several localities in this most uncomfortable condition. One is never to be overcome, namely, at night whether to remain in his own domicile at all, except he walk through pools of mortar, and climb over pieces of boards and bricks. Surely these ought not so to be.

Salt Lake City has a dry, bracing climate, equally free from extremes of heat and cold, and should be one of the healthiest cities in the world. Such, however, is not seem to be the case, though the habits of the people, rather than the climate, is the cause. By actual statistics it is shown that the mortality among children is greater in Salt Lake City than any where in America, except New Orleans. Polygamists do not and can not properly attend to their children, and there is a general neglect of medical care. One Norman bishop in Salt Lake City has seventeen children buried in a row, and the longest grave is not over four feet! Last year was an unusually healthy one, yet the death rate in Utah exceeded that of any other State or Territory west of the Mississippi.

The Abbé Deguery, preaching to fashionable Paris against the fashions, during Lent, exclaimed: "Oh, my sisters, what can be the meaning of the slight covering you wear on your shoulders? What can, every evening, be the motive of the absence of sleeves in your dresses? Is this dress eye have I beheld. Robes of the most irreproachable character spending their whole evening in catching at their shoulder straps lest their dresses should fall off entirely; and this is not from any feeling of propriety, but from the dread of inconvenience."

A somewhat novel Sunday evening entertainment was recently given at the National Theatre in Washington. It consisted of readings by James E. Murdoch of "Scriptural and Sacred Literature," interwoven with Addison's hymn, "When all Thy mercies, oh, my God!" and concluding with a reading of the Lord's Prayer. Various Bible stories were also read in connection with poems upon the same subjects. A large audience seemed highly pleased with the whole programme.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN, Sally," said Jonathan, "that you locked in my arms for the first day we kissed."

THE FOOT GRAINS—Boots and shoes!

A poor man once came to a miser, and said, "I have a favor to ask."

"No favor!" said the miser; "grant me the first."

"Agreed."

"My request is," said the miser, "that you ask me for nothing."

AN IMPUDENCENT.—A person who advertises in a morning paper for a clerk boldly sets out the requirement: "A small salary will be given, but he will have enough of overwork to make up the deficiency."

"A FIELD OF LAUGH"—A brick-field.

A MILITARY DOG.—Recently in Paris, on the day when hunting began, a corporal of the Grenadiers of the Guard, accompanied by a dog, asked for a ticket for the animal at the depot of the rail-baggage bureau.

"How much for this dog to Melun?"

"Twenty cents."

"What! twenty cents! and I, as a soldier, only pay four cents? Observe that this is a military dog—why, it's the dog of the colonel."

"Dare say," replied the railroad man; "but he isn't in uniform."

Little Jimmy is not so well posted in spiritual matters as he might be. The other day, during a discussion as to what constituted a lie, during which war a very earnest listener, and as last the remark was made that his father was a liar, he said, "I came to him like a severe charge against his paternal; and, assuming a grave air, he said: "Well, father's a Christian; he's a member of the Methodist Church."

DOMESTIC SCENE.

"Pretty time of night, Mr. M——, for you to come home!" exclaimed Mrs. M——, in the morning; you, a respectable man in the community, and the father of a family!"

"Don't three—fifs only one," I hurried it strike. "Don't always six till one o'clock—so true as I'm alive!"

"My soul! Mr. M——, you're drunk—as true as I'm alive! It's only one, I tell you, three in the morning."

"I say, Mrs. M——, you're one, I mean it strike one a second time the corner, two or three times."

His spouse could say no more; so she retired.

A CURIOSITY.—A governess, advertising for a situation, says "she is a perfect mistress of her own tongue."

"OPERATIVE SYSTEMS"—Spiders.

HE CAME TOO LATE.

He came too late to have the meal dried
Before the fire too long;
The cakes were scorched upon the side
And every thing was wrong!
She scorned to wait till night for one
Who lingered on his way,
And so she took her tea alone,
And cleared the things away!

He came too late! at once he felt
The upper hand was over;
Indifference in her calm smile dwelt,
She closed the parlor door.
The table-cloth had passed away—
No dishes could be set;
She met him, and her words were gay—
She never spoke of tea!

He came too late! the subtle chorus
Of patience were unbound—
Not by offense but by words
But by the slights that wound!
She knew he would say nothing now
That could the post repair;
She bade him go and milk the cow
And coldly turned away!

He came too late! the fragrant steam
Of tea and hour since flown;
The fire had fallen in the grate—
The bread was cold as stone;
And when, with word and will, he tried
His hungry state to prove,
She served her heart with woman's pride,
And never deigned to move!

"LENT SERVICES"—Borrowed sermons.

A STRANGE WANT.

This is a strange want, clipped from an English journal:

WANTED—A Paper Machine Man, used to elephants, must be a steady set and serious—Address, Messrs. Spottiswoode & Co.

A man who is a machine, and who is alert to be steady, is a miracle indeed. But is he to be "used to elephants" too? Would an acquaintance with chiromancy, or possibly with hippopotami, do as well? Because if so, we know hundreds of people who won't do.

A CONUNDRUM.

A young man seated at dinner, the other day, said to his wife:

"Ellen, if you are good at guessing, here is a conundrum for you: If the devil should pass the tail where would he go to get another one?"

After some time spent in guessing, she gave it up.

"Well," said he, "where they re-tail spirits."

Eager to get it off, she hastened to a lady friend with:

"Oh, Marian, I have such a nice conundrum! Joe just told me of it. I know you can't guess it. If the devil should pass his tail, where would he go to get another one?"

Her friend Marian having given it up as said:

"Where they sell liquor by the glass."

Marian didn't see the point of it.

"PRESSED AT COURT"—Being seen for debt.

THE WASHINGTON PUMP.—"QUITE DRY."

THE MAN-OF-WAR'S-MAN.

HON. ANDREW G. CURTIN.

THE HON. ANDREW G. CURTIN, who has been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate as Minister to Russia, was born at Bellefonte, Pennsylvania, April 2, 1817. His father was a rich iron manufacturer in Centre County. Mr. CURTIN was educated at an academy at Milton, a small village on the Susquehanna River, and read law in the office of Judge REED of Carlisle. He was admitted to the bar in 1839, and entered upon the practice of his profession in his native village. From this time he engaged actively in political life, supporting the Whig party. He was elected Governor of Pennsylvania in 1860, and was re-elected in 1863. During the war he exerted a very powerful influence in behalf of the Union, and was one of the leading spirits among the loyal Governors of the Northern States. Among the soldiers he was always popular on account of his constant zeal in their behalf. He was pressed at the Chicago Convention in May, 1868, for the Vice-Presidency on the ticket with General GRANT; but the current being in favor of Mr. COLFAX, he caused his name to be withdrawn. He took an active interest in the ensuing campaign, speaking in New York, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and other States.

Our portrait, published on this page, is from a photograph taken a few days since, and is the best representation of the Governor which has yet appeared.

HON. ANDREW G. CURTIN, MINISTER TO RUSSIA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GUTEKUNST, PHILADELPHIA.]

JACQUES OFFENBACH.

ALL of our readers who have enjoyed opera bouffe in New York, or who have looked upon the inventor of that institution as a sort of Orpheus—not leading his Eurydice from the under-world, but, on the contrary, leading the whole world devilward—will be glad to see the face of OFFENBACH, which we offer them on page 292.

JACQUES OFFENBACH, the distinguished French musical composer, was born about 1822. He succeeded BARBEREAU as chef d'orchestre at the Théâtre Français in 1847. At this epoch he was known as a composer of light and gay music, which had a run in the salons: the most popular of these inspirations were le Cloate et la Fournaise; le Corbeau; le Savetier; le Rat; la Laitière, etc. He was distinguished also as a violoncellist. In 1855 he obtained the privilege of the new theatre of Bouffes-Parisiens, in the Champs Elysées. His later productions, however, have been those which have made his influence the most universal. La Belle Hélène, Geneviève de Brabant, and La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein, transferred from Paris to New York, have created a great furore.

These productions have been brought out in this country under the best auspices. Both the acting and the music have been excellent. There is much in the accessories of the opera bouffe that has (and perhaps justly) given offense; the ballet is not over-delicate, and even the expurgated editions of the librettos are not by any means free from grossness. But music in itself is always pure; and we wonder that no attempt has been made to weed out the indelicacies of the French opera bouffe, retaining the lightness and gayety of the music, and the exquisite dramatic features of the accompanying plays.

CUTTING CORKS.

WHILE nearly every branch of industry has had assistance of some kind, through the invention of labor-saving machinery, the manufacture of corks, which gives employment to a large number of human beings, remains about stationary. A cork is a small thing at best; but the millions demanded in all countries require a prodigious army of hands to supply the market.

Corks are ordinarily fashioned by a very sharp broad knife, which the cutter uses so adroitly that cutting a cork of any size is the work of a moment. But the late Commodore Le Barron, of the United States Navy, invented and patented a curious machine for expediting the business many years ago, which, though ingenious and at first promising, did not succeed. It was a kind of embryotic lathe, in which a strip of sheet cork, first cut into pieces about one inch square (or larger, according to the size of the intended cork) by a foot in length, revolved against the edge of a sharp knife, on a screwing motion, giving it a tapering shape, afterward to be cut into sections, and thus the cork of the bottle was abandoned, giving variously sized corks. It was abandoned as being unsuccessful in action, and by no means able to compete with ordinary hand-cutters. If any one should happen to succeed in this description of accomplish quickly and perfectly cork-cutting by machinery, it would not only be exceedingly remunerative, but would revolutionize the business entirely.

THE CAPITOL AT WASHINGTON DURING A NIGHT SESSION OF CONGRESS.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE WATCHING NIGHT.

Mr. Trewen slept, or pretended to, till nine o'clock; then he began furiously ringing his bell. Rebecca came to him in her dressing-gown.

"Is the Times come, child?" he said.

"How could it be come, pa?"

"Go Eastward, child, and meet it. Quick, do!"

She dressed herself and went Eastward; she had got nearly to the South Kensington Museum before she got the Times, and she hurried back with it. Her father sat up in bed while he perused it. After glancing at a column or so, he said, "What a blundering lie!"

"What, pa?"

"Philpott & Co., Limited," he answered, "bankrupt for £800,000. Why, child, I could account for £1,200,000. I will have another nap after that. If any genteel looking man calls, tell him—well, tell him he had better call somewhere else. We know too much here."

What between Mr. Trewen's wildness of the night before, and his shrewd jocularity now, poor Rebecca was utterly puzzled. One thing she knew, and that was that Morley, Hurton, and the never-seen Hetty were all at sea, that her father's mind was going, and that she with her affectionate bosom was alone in the world together.

One can see how our nation has developed by turning over old novels: for one, over Bombay and Sou, written by Dickens, a man who was acquainted with the ways of this world, but by our new lights rather behind his time, in a few parenthesis.

For instance, Mr. Dombey goes bankrupt for the mean sum of one hundred thousand pounds. That was all the world in 1848, but we have improved on that since. Mr. Perch, the messenger, congratulated himself on the fact that Dombey had paid for "one hundred-and-twenty-second." That is but a small smash now. Great, and heretofore trusted names in trade, seem to be vying with the worst of the old commercial scoundrels, and beating them hollow. The frightful recklessness of the habitual gambler, Lord Morningcoat, about £700,000, leaving no one unpaid in the end, or that of the unhappy boy just dead (some £200,000), is fairly beaten out of calculation by the deficiencies of some of the clearest and best heads in the world of business. How these men can keep sane under such a huge nightmare of hopeless debt is the wonder to some. See if this little case of the Philpotts is overstated in any way. Do we not all know the old honored (justly honored) member of the House, now dead and beyond trouble, who sat later than any one at the table; sat through the long wearisome of business, sooner than go home? There was a leaden weight of £300,000 on that man's soul. The hopeless deficiency of assets by which well used would have settled Brand Green, or the Isle of Dogs, from their present state, hanging on by a shred, hanging round his neck. It was so error of his, but of younger branches of his family. He was one of the greatest, purest, and noblest of men, but condemned to silence for the love which he bore to his family.

So that the matter is not good to think about. Better to study William Blake, when he is most wildly melancholy, and most muttereddly sad. Still in his most frightful sadness there is always tenderness and hope. And so we should think of this poor member, who had never one selfish thought in his heart. Turn to Hogarth's great master-piece, *Death's Door (which I have known since I was six years old, and which never palls on me), and you will think of an old man, hampered through no fault of his, creeping to his tomb, as Sir Gorbam Philpott was to his.

The youngest member of a dishonored family will, however, sometimes make a fight to save what can not be saved, more particularly where there has been criminality. Young Philpott was distinctly criminal. He had forged more boldly than Sir John Paul. He was, unlike that man, dissolute, dissipated, and utterly reckless. He was perfectly safe if he could recover his own forgeries, and he knew that Turner had the all. Could he get those forgeries in his own hands? He was well provided for. With a view to these contingencies he had bought heavily in foreign bonds, during that every kind of luxury to do so. In the case of a mere bankruptcy, these funds could not be tracked; but in the case of a criminal prosecution, his money was of little value to him, for he would spend his time at Portland. This made him desperate.

Another thing made him still more desperate. This young forger was a very handsome young fellow, of good manners. And his family had treated him like a gentleman with another great house. And so he had married, somewhat against his will, one of the most beautiful and charming women alive.

He married her first, and fell in love with her afterward, as is often the case. His love for her grew as time went on; her exceeding beauty, her perfect equable temper, her beauty, her deference to him, her intelligence—all had their effect on him. And after two years he awoke one morning, by her side, and saw the whole of his very miserable position. He was a fresh convict put in Cold-Bath Fields to-morrow, and she thought him an honest and respectable man.

"She would stand the infamy nobly, but she could not stand that," he said. "By the Lord, I have a good mind to tell her the whole business and get it over."

So it happened one morning that Mrs. Philpott, turning over in her bed, found her husband kneeling at the bedside with his head buried in blood. "I have hurt my head," he said. "I got out of bed incautiously and have broken my head over the fender-post. Ring the bell, please," and tender over his accident; little thinking that the young man in his mad despair had rushed against the bell. Enough of such things: the man was desperate.

His desperation little matters to us save that he brought it to Turner's house, and so involved our Rebecca and her dog Mab. In a little story about homely facts like these, one has not room for one's fancies to play. We have not room for Shakspeare to develop one's rascal (Falstaff) until loving gets to be the fashion, and one loves him.

Rebecca came to her father, "Pa, haven't you made a great mess of it?"

"Very great indeed, my dear."

"Why don't you tell the whole truth, pa?"

"Because I should be in Cold-Bath Fields Prison, my dear."

"But we can't come out of it, dear pa, any way."

"My dear child," said Mr. Turner; "the whole thing is a stalemate at chess. No one dare move for his life. I have seen worse muddled matters than this got through." And indeed he gave her proof.

"Why, even in Paul's case," he said, "if it had not been for a high-minded and very indignant parson the whole thing would have dropped through. I tell you, child, that you don't know mankind. You will be accept a married sister's butler. I am very, very tired again, Rebecca. I am going to die."

"Pa, you had better go to bed again if you talk such nonsense as that."

"I am going, my dear. I shall sleep through the day, and to-night I die. They will try the house to-night. Be ready for them."

"How shall I be ready for them, father?"

"Bless the child!" he said, "Ducetoy's deeds are in the iron safe. Philpotts' papers are in the box under my bed. Do the best you can, child; I am horribly drowsy—deadly drowsy. They will try the house to-night, and if the house goes into the possession of the police, I can't say what will happen. Go and see to matters, I am going to sleep."

Rebecca, seeing that there was nothing more to be got out of her father, did probably the quaintest and most indirectest thing which she ever did in all her life. Instead of going to bed, she went to work. Anticipated disaster had been familiar with her for some time. But here was disaster from the invasion

One bolt and the lock was all that opposed her. She had got into a state of horror by solitude and mystery. One simple physical movement, even of a door-handle, restored her to herself in an instant. "We will get this through, my gentleman," she thought, with a low laugh; and suddenly and dexterously unlocked and unbolted the door, threw it open, and said, "Walk in, if you please."

No one was there. There was nothing before her but a dark passage, nothing in darkness. The solitary glance at her feet showed her, not only that no one was there, but that no one had been there at all. The dust of twenty years, so lightly laid by the hand of ever busy Nature, was untouched. The foot of a spider might be traced on it, but not the foot of a man. The door had been tried by hands not of this world.

So her horror revived again tenfold; but, in her obstinate courage, she ran into the passage, and as she went she turned round and saw the marks of her own footsteps in the dust. She was the first there. There was no other footstep. The door had been tried by a ghost; and she went on until she came to the head of the stairs, at the foot of which her mother has been picked up dead. And as she looked down them her candle struck against something, and she saw that it was a halter hanging from the ceiling, with a noose in it, ready for any man to put his head into. Half overcome by a corpse and a gallows and of Bewick's over the front-stream in it, she could not have been more unutterably terrified. She fled swiftly, with some number of the other world's skinny hand entwined in her back hair, with a view of detaining her and showing her a little more. But she was strong and resolute, and when she had got back to her bedroom, locked and bolted the door, put Carry's bed back, and found that she had unruffled, she began to believe that she had been making a fool of herself, and thought she would go and look at her friends.

Mr. Akin was what you may call a violent sleeper. Like the famous Hackney-coachman of our youth, I should, whatever he did was done with fury and effusion. The frantic physical exertion which that young man would put forth through going to sleep would have ruined some constitutions. It was a University race to him going to sleep, and a two-mile handicap (he starting from bench) for him to wake up again. At this time he was quiescent. He had taken off his waistcoat, and rammed himself into his arms round his neck, and suffocated himself by ramming his head into one of the bare pockets. He likewise found it necessary to cross his left leg over his body, and bind on tight by his left boot with its right hand. It was impossible, in regard to this young man in his sleep, to avoid wondering what Mrs. Akin thought of it.

In a similar way, when one looked at Mr. Spicer as he was wondered whether Mrs. Spicer, in spite of accumulating wealth and good position, did not wish that there might be a few alterations in her details. For Mr. Spicer, though a quiet sleeper, lay on his back, and spread himself out in every possible direction, snoring unceasingly. And, moreover, he had placed in his sleep, very constantly, as people who sleep under constant expectation of being awakened always do. And Rebecca heard him as she had watched them for a moment, "Jane's mother is a lie. The chancery and ten-spoons was give to you by word of mouth."

This was realistic enough to do away with the folly of the deserted staircase; her father's confident slumber was very far much more so.

He was sitting up before his writing-table, examining papers and accounts. "Come in, old girl," he said. "Is there any news?"

"There is none yet, father," she said. "How are you to-night?"

"I am better, my love; hard at work, you see."

"Pa," she said, "is it wise of you to work?"

"My dear," he said, "I believe an old man. Mere work never hurt any one in this world. Just look at the number of our public men, who have lived the longest are generally found to have worked the hardest. Work don't kill: excitement does. Any mechanical exercise which I am doing now is doing me more good than a doctor's shopful of medicine. Where have you been?"

"I have been frightened, father. I opened the door behind Carry's bed, and I got utterly terrified. I went into a room there with a noose in it, as though one was going to hang himself."

"You silly child, to frighten yourself with fancies when there is real danger abroad. That is the rope of the old bell which hangs in the cupola."

"Gracious me!" said Rebecca. "What a guby I must have been not to think of that!"

"Did you see many ghosts?" said Mr. Turner.

"Heaps," said Rebecca.

"How many?"

"A dozen or two. One of them turned the handle of the door, under my nose."

"A ghost, eh?" Re sure."

"Oh yes, a ghost. The dust on the staircase was quite undisturbed."

"You are a silly child, you!"

"Because we must mind that they do not get in that way."

"I will put my sheets on Carry's bed, and sleep there," said Rebecca.

"I would if I were you," said her father. "Ho! They will not come to-night."

"Will they come at all, father?"

"They will most certainly come, one would fancy. But they will come soon, I should think. It is possible that they have been round the house to-night, and have seen us moving. Leave those two good fellows to sleep here for another night or so. We can reward them."

Morning dawned, and there was no sign of their haggers. Rebecca had a consultation with Mr. Spicer and Mr. Akin before they went away.

"My opinion is, Miss," said Akin (and Spicer hung on his words as on those of an expert), "that they won't try it on until every thing is quiet. Is it plate, Miss, or is it jewels?"

"Neither," said Rebecca. "Papers."

Spicer and Akin looked at one another and laughed. "Lord love you, Miss: that accounts for the well being in it. Burning 'em? Shall get another professional hand—we sprung one—and they will make a mess of it at last. Have you got a pistol, or any kind of fire-arm?"

"We have pistols; but I am a little afraid of them."

"Well, we will sleep here, turn and turn about, for a week. After that, if you hear any thing fire your pistol and we will be with you. The next time it will be alarm. I will warn you. If your father slept closer together. You trust to us and the little dog."

"Do you know any thing about the past of our house which is shut up?" asked Rebecca.

"Only what I've heard," said lower, Miss? No, I don't, and I don't want to."

"Come with me, then," said Rebecca. "Good-morning, Mr. Spicer, and a hundred thanks."

Akin, left alone with Rebecca, exhibited a strange unwillingness to follow her. Still you could be utterly certain that he would not find a cockney was neither chivalrous nor superstitious. He would sooner have fought any man within a mile than have followed Rebecca. He would sooner have seen a man privately hanged than have gone into the disused part of the house, "where the noose was in it."

But she took him to her bedroom. "You see, Mr. Akin, you know more of this sort of thing than I do. What do you think we need have done.) "I am going to put my bed across this door. Just move that bed, will you, and help me?"

Akin followed next unwillingly, though it was broad day. "Do you mean to sleep there?" he asked, when they were in the passage; "they are mine last night. Do you see any others?"

"They have been up the chimney, because of court for twenty years, Miss," said Akin, with emphasis. "Are you going any further?"

"Yes," said Rebecca; "I want to see what is below."

And she led the way down the stairs. Akin following in the same manner as he would with a wild beast.

"You are quite right," she chattered, "the stairs are piled with dust. It was all my fancy that I could hear footsteps on the stairs in the night. There is not a foot-mark on the dust. See, here, at the bottom of the stairs, is a shoe with a blue rosette; I will have that."

"Come away, Miss, and leave it alone," said Akin, sharply; "there is ghostesses enough without yours." He was evidently under the impression that this shoe had been left there after the removal of Rebecca's mother from the very same place.

Rebecca got seared also, and came back with him somewhat hurriedly, with the ghost feeling at her back. But she kept the shoe with her for all that.

"If you put your bed across that door, Miss," said Akin, "as you propose, you stop 'em that way. I can't make out what they want, but I will come. There is plenty if we leaves watching."

"Do you think they will come at all, Mr. Akin?" said Rebecca, confidentially.

"Will they come? I gather that there is forged work. I gather that there is a swell with cash. I gather that the governor has those papers here. And that swell will have those same papers, with professional assistance, as sure as they apple-trees will blossom next April. Money or no money, I'll have a hand in it, Miss, if he will get two years for 'em, it stands to reason that he will chance three (and it's seldom more for a first offence), for stealing 'em. He'll come fast enough."

"What can poor father do?" said Rebecca.

"That is more than I can tell you, Miss; all I let your pa write to that swell, and say, 'Here, Tom,' and he says, 'you have been a-writing of those filthy letters and I have got them in my fingers. None of your gammon,' says your father; 'I've got your forged writing, and I'll Old Bailey you as sure as there is a God to see.' Says your pa again, 'You have been a-hanging about my little place, and giving a world of trouble, keeping Akin and Spicer from their beds, and frightening me and me sleeps habitual with Armstrong revolvers in consequence of your goings on. Why, I've got you in my power, and I'll transport you,' says your pa, 'about convicted swells being kep' in the okumyard, at the Oose of Erection; but Portland is handy for them sort of prisoners, and in twelve months, and the books theirselves has been touched up in some of their speculations, and they mass Portland and nothing short.' That is what your father ought to say to this young swell. Your father, as a gentleman, would naturally dress it up, and put it smaller than an ignorant man like me. Still, I wish the plant was mine. I'd have the old girl to Ramsgate every year if I was."

"It might be yours," said Rebecca, suddenly, with that strange heedlessness which was the great fault in her.

"Don't say such dreadful things as those, Miss," said Akin, turning pale; "that ain't worthy of you."

"What have I said?" said Rebecca, aghast. "What was your dreadful idea? Is it, which you give us, about Charles Steward?"

"The Pretender, yes. What have said?"

"It is wrote down in that book, that Charles Steward, who had been up to some game or other, I never made out what, had thirty thousand pounds set on his head. And he was loose among the Highlanders (a bad lot), and not one of them gave the places the office on him, not one out of all them—not for thirty thousand pound. And you would rank me lower than a common Highland drover."

"Dear Akin, I did not mean it. I spoke only in compliment. I know you would never turn on us. Please let me be angry."

There was a child in heaven who had left her footprints behind her, which prevented Jim ever being angry with Rebecca. Still she had heedlessly touched his honor. There is a mass of potential chivalry in this queer nation of ours, to which, under certain military régime, we do not get. I wish I had the Queen's commission to raise a regiment. Kingsley's foot should be the terrible sole to the grand-uncle Kingsley's boots. And equally queer in their antecedents, I doubt, would be Akin's shuffleboard for about two dozen from Field Lane to begin with.

To Rebecca the next fortnight was actually worse than the night when she broke the wing of the Gresham bank. Her father had told her that the house would be broken into for the forged papers, which was one evidence, and Akin, a most experienced man, had confirmed his opinion emphatically. So she believed in it day after day, and night after night. Mr. Spicer and Mr. Akin had taken to sleep at home she was quite comfortable. They were all wrong together. She had never been believed in at all.

The weather might have been better, for even in this part of the metropolis it howled and raved. Rebecca, who had weak nerves, and the habit of fancies, was delighted with the storm. Still, Mr. Morley was possibly safe, and wind was better than burglary.

"Well, Akin," she said one night, "I pay are not going to rob and murder us at all."

"I am afraid to hear it, my dear; for am getting very ill."

"Shall I sleep in your room, pa?"

"No, my love. You must go to bed. That is a very dear little dog, Rebecca."

"You can have the dog, pa. She is very nice. Let me give you a good night, dear."

"No, no," said Mr. Turner. "I am well enough, only I am very ill indeed."

"You may as well go over to the office for ten days, pa: you are not well."

"I am going to sell out of the business, my love. It was a fortune to me."

"And the papers?" said Rebecca.

"You will hear about them," said he. And they went to their respective beds.

Rebecca, with her bed across the mysterious door, went to sleep and dreamed of absolutely nothing. She told Alfred Morley in afternoon that she never dreamed less in her life than she did that night. After, as it seemed to her, a short night, she was awakened by what she thought was morning. But it was not morning at all. It was the light of a lantern on her face, held by a man in a black mask on, and others behind him.

"Miss Turner," said this man, "we must trouble you to get up. If you speak we shall use violence."

"How on earth did they get in?" thought Rebecca. "This is your burglary, is it? I'll manage your business," she added to herself. "Mr. Philpott, you have no possible business in a lady's bedroom. If you only came after your own forgeries we should not care; but there are others. You will retire I will go to my father, and your rascalities shall be put into your own hand."

Young Philpott took the key from the door without one solitary word and locked the door on the outside. The instant he did so Rebecca was out of bed. She wrapped herself in her dressing-gown, and pulling her bed aside, unlocked and unbolted the door, ran barefooted to the top of the stairs, and with a loud scream—

Philpott heard the door unlocked, and ran in. But he was too late: the dog had got there all but silent, and defenceless girl had beaten his well-laid plot. The girl who was to have been intimidated, and held as hostage until the necessary papers were got from her father, had passed through those net. Instead of cowering among them in terror, she was pulling resolutely at a rope, and sending forth upon the night air clang, clang, clang, in a terrible staccato, which it did not cease to wake brought thirty thousand men out of St. Antoine, and even now would people it with ghosts, if there were a St. Antoine—a court which, connected with Field Lane, green, if not St. Antoine.

Her enemies were utterly beaten. Philpott (on the dock) was sent to her with placks and obsequiousness; for such rapidly acting dexterity he was not prepared. The girl's brains were keener than his. He was unused to crime, and not accustomed to music. When he heard his burglary proclaimed at midnight in an amorphous concrete (I beg to use bad language), he fled. When he thought of the courage and dexterity through which Rebecca had outwitted him, he fled faster for mere shame. The bell, disused and dumb for twenty years, went on clang, clang, clang, clanging him to the world as a surrel gamester, who had staked all to keep his wife's respect, and had lost. The poor fellow fled away.

Lost through the courage and dexterity of an idle girl, who was going to be married to a Methodist parson! So he came back; but who first had messages from the sea which gave her sailor's courage, and sailor's recklessness. And she still went on ringing that horrible bell. And if he had gone back and cut her throat it would have been much the same. He had met with a power more powerful than his own. He was beaten. His wife must know all now, and he was desperate. for he, potential felon as he was, did not trust her.

One hardly knows sometimes whether Providence is kind or unkind. In the end, it seems to me (and to others) that Providence always acts for the best. When you come to mere details you may say that Providence should have done otherwise. One would say to those who question the government of this world that you must see it. One would say to them, par exemple, was not the 2d December the seal of Democracy, not of wax, but of iron?

Rebecca is a very poor little illustration to offer for my pretentious theory. It gets infinitesimally small as one looks at it. Still, granting that the little Rebecca Mabs are of benefit into the world for nothing, you must grant this.

When Rebecca began clanging the bell Mab began to bark, and aroused Mr. Turner, who put on his trowsers, and got hold of his pistol. Coming out he met young Philpott in a mask, but knew him, and challenged him by name, holding his pistol toward him. Philpott, in his desperation, fired at him and wounded him, and Mr. Turner fell at the head of the stairs.

The whole district was gathered round now. Akin and Spicer were in and Philpott and his accomplices in hand very quickly. Turner only said, "Let them go before the police come, and stop that bell. Where is Rebecca?"

Akin, the dextrous, assisted by Spicer, carried the captured men through Rebecca's bedroom, and down the back-stairs, and left their way they came on Rebecca ringing away as hard as ever.

"For Heaven's sake, Miss, stop that noise," said Akin; "the parish engine's in the lane. Let us get these folks out this way. Is there any road this way?"

There was, it seemed, and Philpott and his friends were got out. There was nothing saved from the bankruptcy save his evil reputation, and she knows nothing of his midnight meeting with Rebecca. To pleasanter matters.

A TWILIGHT PICTURE.

"In a sweet Sabbath eve in summer time
And lovers' hearts, with hand exchanged in hand,
Upon a flower-hemmed meadow pathway stand,
Beside a silver brook not yet to climb
Before them spread fair uplands crowned with pine,
That, sharply set against the amber sky,
Stand up black-green against it; while behind,
A wood of oak with strongly arched limbs
Curves round a hill. Fair is the sylvan scene,
And all is sweet the tender twilight hour.
So sweet, and yet so sad. A silvery sheen
Falls like an echo's breath on all around;
And such deep calm abounds, the very air
Breathes low and faint, like one engaged in prayer.

EMBLEMATIC POETRY.

Although specimens of emblematic poetry of the seventeenth century may be familiar to the reader, yet we venture to reprint a modern imitation in the present vernacular, which will please at least patrons of the curious. The following is from the Boston Herald, and is entitled:

THE POOR FIDDLER'S ODE TO HIS FIDDLE.

Torn Worn
Oppressed I mourn
Bad
Three quarters mad
Money gone
Credit ended,
Dunsat door
Bill unpaid
Wife in fain
Twins ailing
Others ailing
Nurse waiting
Billy hooping
Betsy measles
Besides poor Joe
Ill of fever, too.
Come, then, my Fiddle,
Come, my sister and friend,
With gay and brilliant sounds
Seem once the world to cheer.
Oblivious all I feel my woes no more,
But skip o'er the strings
As my old fiddle sings,
"Cheerily oh! merrily oh!
Presto! good master,
You are very sorry now
I will find Music
If you will find Words,
For I'm up in alto, to G, down below."
Thus I find a sense to charm the time,
For some Adagio, solemn and sublime.
With grateful attention to the concert hear
My heart, responsive to the soothing charm,
Keeps steady time, while every health-creating care
Lies prostrate, vanquished by the soft mellifluous air.
Merry and sweet plaintive succeeds with hearty cheer,
And resignation mild soon soothes my wrinkled brow.
Keenly I feel every spread, wailing, plaintive appeal,
The Supremest joy spread, and the Trombone may howl.
But, by Pol! my old fiddle is the prince of them all.
Could I ex-Dryden return, by praise to rehearse,
My Ode to Cecilia would seem ragged verse.
Now to thy case, as funeral warm to lie,
Till called on to perform by master's eye.

The following is a second example of torturing verse into the form of

THE WINE-GLASS.

Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow?
Who hath contentions? Who hath wounds without cause?
Who hath redness of eyes?
They that tarry long at the wine! They that go seek mixed drink. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red,
when it giveth its colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright,
at the last
it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.

THE FIRST OF MAY IN NEW YORK CITY.—[Drawn by Thomas Worth.]

Y. M. C. A. BUILDING, WASHINGTON.

We give on this page an illustration of the New Building erected by the Young Men's Christian Association at Washington. The plan of its erection, by a joint stock company, which was afterward put into the act of incorporation (approved March 2, 1867), was presented by a special committee on the building, consisting of General S. L. BROWN, Messrs. H. D. COOKE, and B. H. STERNETZ. The Board of Directors held their first meeting under the act April 2, and reorganized by the election of Chief Justice S. P. CHASE as President; General O. O. HOWARD and JOHN R. ELVANS, Vice-Presidents; General J. A. EKIN, Secretary; and H. D. COOKE, Treasurer; who are all at this time the officers of the Board.

In May the large lot at the corner of Ninth and D streets, on which the building now stands, was purchased, and the work of the demolition of the old buildings commenced somewhat later. The corner-stone was laid, November 27, by Chief Justice CHASE, in the presence of a large gathering of citizens. General HOWARD presided on the occasion; and Senators WILSON and FRELINGHUYSEN, and Rev. Messrs. BROWN, GURLEY, BOYNTON, TUSIN, BUTLER, EMORY, GILLETTE, and HAMILTON took part in the exercises.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY L. E. WALKER, WASHINGTON.]

The building is erected by a joint stock company, who are authorized to issue a capital stock not exceeding $200,000, and which is governed by a Board of Directors. All net receipts over six per cent. on the capital stock become the property of the Young Men's Christian Association, to be used by them in buying up the capital stock at rates not exceeding par.

The lot on which the building is erected contains about 11,000 square feet. The building will contain on the first-floor five large stores, having extensive cellars connected with them. On the second-floor will be the rooms designed for the parlors, reading-room, library, and gymnasium for the Association. It will also contain the largest public hall in the city, being capable of seating 1500 persons, and give each one a chair. The form of the hall will be like the ancient theatre, with the stage as the centre of a semicircle of seats, arranged in segments, rising one above the other. An unobstructed view of the stage will thus be given from all parts of the house.

The upper story will be divided into rooms for offices, artists' studios, and the like.

The exterior is constructed of cut Seneca stone, and it is believed that no building in the city, erected by private enterprise, will exceed it in beauty. It has been constructed by THOMAS M. PLOWMAN of Washington. The total cost of the building and lot will be about $140,000.

THE MOLE AT HOME.

THE most diligent and instructive historian of the mole is Henri Le Court, who, flying from the terrors that came in the train of the French Revolution, betook himself to the country, and from being the attendant on a Court became the biographer of this humble animal.

We shall first briefly describe the adaptation of its structure to its habits. The bony framework is set in motion by very powerful muscles, those of the chest and neck being most vigorous. The wide hand, which is the great instrument of action, and performs the offices of a pick-axe and shovel, is sharp-edged on its lower margin, and when clothed with the integuments the fingers are hardly distinguishable. The muzzle of the mole is evidently a delicate organ of touch, as are also the large and broad hands and feet; and the tail has much sensitiveness, to give notice to the animal of the approach of any attack from behind. Its taste and smell, especially the latter, are very sensitive.

Its sight is almost rudimentary. The little eye is so hidden in the fur that its very existence was for a long time doubted. It appears to be designed for operating only as a warning to the animal on its emerging into the light; indeed, more acute vision would only have been an encumbrance. If the sight be imperfect the sense of hearing is very acute, and the tympanum very large, though there is no external ear, perhaps because the earth assists considerably in vibration. The fore-feet are inclined sideways, so as to answer the use of hands, to scoop out the earth to form its habitation or pursue its prey, and to fling all the loose soil behind the animal. The breast-bone in shape resembles a plow-share. The skin is so tough as only to be cut by a very sharp knife. The hair is very short and close-set, and softer than the finest silk; color black; some spotted and cream-colored. This hair is yielding; but it is been strong, as in the rat or mouse, it would doubly have retarded the progress of the creature; first by its resistance, and then acting as a brush, so as to choke up the galleries, by removing the loose earth from the sides and ceilings of the galleries.

THE WILD-CAT AND HER LITTER.

During summer the mole runs in search of annals and worms in the night-time among the grass, which pursuit makes it the prey of owls. The mole shows great art in skinning a worm, which it always does before it eats it, by drawing the skin from end to end, and squeezing out the contents of the body. It is doubtful whether any other animal exists which is obliged to eat at such short intervals as the mole, ten or twelve hours appearing to be the maximum of its fasting; at the end of that time it dies. A Cuvier tells us that if two moles are shut up together without food there will shortly be nothing left of the weakest but its skin, all along the belly! Buffon accuses moles of eating all the acorns of a newly-set soil. Its voracity makes the mole a great drinker: a run is always formed to a pool or ditch as a reservoir; when it is too distant the animal sinks holes in wells, which have sometimes been seen brimful.

To afford proof of the rapidity with which the mole will travel along its paths, Le Court watched his opportunity, and when the animal was on its feed at one of the most distant points from its customary or fortress, to which point the mole's high-road leads, Le Court placed along the course of that road, between the animal and the fortress, several little corn pieces, so to speak, the staff of each being a straw, and the flag a bit of paper, at certain distances, the straws penetrating down into the passage. Near the end of this subterraneous road he inserted a horn, the mouth-piece of which stood out of the ground. When all was ready Le Court blew a blast loud enough to frighten all the moles within hearing. Down went the little flags in succession with astonishing velocity, as the terrified mole, rushing along toward his sanctuary, came in contact with the flag-straws; and the spectators affirmed that the rate of progression was equal to the speed of a horse at a good round trot.

In the domain of the mole the principal point is the habitation, or fortress, constructed under a considerable hillock raised in some secure place, often at the end of a tree or under a rock. Of some of the fortress is of earth, beaten by the mole-architect into a compact and solid state. Inside is found a circular gallery with a flat floor, which communicates with a smaller upper gallery by means of five passages. Within the lower gallery is the chamber or dormitory, which has access to the upper gallery by three passages, From this habitation exceeds the high-road by which the engineer reaches the spot selected for the encampment; the galleries open into this road, which the mole is continually carrying out and extending in his search for food; this has been termed the hunting-ground. Another road extends, first downward, and then up into the open road of the territory. Some eight or nine other passages open out from the external circular gallery. From the habitation a road is carried out, nearly straight, and connects with the encampment and the alleys leading to the hunting-ground which open into it on each side. Its diameter the road exceeds the height of a mole, but its size will not admit of two moles passing each other. The road, from the repeated pressure of the animal's sides, becomes smooth and compact. Sometimes a mole will key out a second or even a third road; or several moles will use one road in common, though they never trespass on each other's hunting-grounds.

If two moles should happen to meet in the same road one must retreat into the nearest alley, unless they fight, when the weakest is often slain. In forming this tunnel the mole-engineer drives it at a greater or less depth, according to the quality of the soil or other circumstances. When it has carried under a road or stream, a few and a half of earth, or sometimes more, is left above it. Then does the little engineering mole carry on the subterraneous works necessary for his support, traveling, and comfort; and his tunnels never fail.

The quality or humidity of the soils which regulates the abundance of the worms determines the greater or less depth of the alleys or runs from these are filled with stores of food the mole works out branch alleys.

M. St. Hilaire describes the pairings, or, as he calls it, the loves of the moles. At a season as the mole has finished the galleries he brings his mate along with him, and shuts her up in the bridal gallery, taking care to prevent the escape of his rivals: in case of a fight they enlarge the part of the gallery where they are met, and the victory is decided in favor of him who has received his adversary before the ear. The female, during the fight, is shut up in the bridal gallery, so as to be unable to escape: for which purpose, because she uses all her resources in digging, and attempts to get away by the side passages. Should she succeed the conqueror hastens to join his faithless mate, and to bring her back into his galleries. This manœuvre is repeated as often as other males enter the lists. At length the conqueror is recognized, and his mate becomes more docile. The pair work together and finish the galleries; after which the female digs alone for food. As soon as the galleries are formed the male conducts his mate to a certain point; and from this time the female no longer digs in the solid earth, but toward the surface, advancing by merely separating the roots of the grass.

The mole is a great friend to the farmer; but there are places in which he is a public enemy. He is not a vegetable feeder, and he never roots up the growing corn in spring-time, except when he is after grubs, snails, and wire-worms. It has been calculated that two moles destroy 40,000 white worms in a year. He is very destructive to underdrains; and where the land is low we are in danger of a deluge from his piercing holes in the drain-banks. Thus it would be madness not to extirpate moles in those places where the waters, in drains or rivers, are above the level of the lands around, especially when the banks are made of sand or earth of loose texture.

HOW TO PURCHASE A CLOTHES WRINGER.—In purchasing a Clothes Wringer we prefer one with cog-wheels, as they greatly relieve the rubber rolls from any unnecessary and otherwise occurring and add much to the durability of the machine. The next point is to see that the cog-wheels are so arranged as to run in a bath, and have a large article is passing between the rollers. It matters not whether the cog-wheels are on one end or both ends of the shaft, if the gearing articles disconnect them they are entirely useless. This is very important, for, as the larger the article, the greater the strain; therefore, if the cog-wheels separate so as to disconnect, they are of no service when most needed. We have taken some pains to examine the various Wringers, and much prefer the "UNIVERSAL," as lately improved, because it has long and strong gears (ROWELL'S Patent Double Gear), and is the only Wringer with "Patent Stop," for preventing the cog-wheels from separating so far as to lose their power.—New England Farmer.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine for the last twelve years, and it had already been in use two years when I bought it. I have had it doing all kinds of shop-work from seven in the morning until six and sometimes ten o'clock at night, constantly at work. I have never sent it for repairs, and I think it is now in as good order as when it came out of your store, and I would not exchange it for any you have. HENRY WRIGHT.
Statea Island.

BEWARE OF ACRID TEETH-BLEACHING PREPARATIONS

that destroy the enamel. SOZODONT is a delicious vegetable compound. Molluscous as a syrup when, that simply removes their impurities, protects them from decay, lends fragrance to the breath, and keeps the gums elastic, fresh, and rosy.—(Com.)

INTERESTING TO LADIES.—I have had one of GROVER & BAKER'S Machines in use fourteen years, during which time I have worked constantly on it, and it has never cost me cent for repairs. E. A. PRATT, Keene, N. H.

A HOUSEHOLD WORD.

CONDIE & CO., in the manufacture of Toilet Soaps, have attained a national celebrity. Their name is a household word.—Methodist Home Journal.

TO REMOVE MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN from the face, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Sold by Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond St., N. Y. Sold by all Druggists.—(Com.)

WALTHAM WATCHES are the best and the cheapest.—N. MATSON & CO., Chicago.

DOBBYN'S PLASTIC AND INDURATING COMPOSITION, Hextrburn, and Sour Stomach, prepared by Dobbyn & Co., Chemists, 80 Cedar St. Sold by druggists. S. G. WELLING, 571 Broadway.

PAPER HANGINGS.—New Patterns, wholesale or retail, at No. 4 & 5 BEEKMAN ST'S CURTAIN STORE, 447 Broadway, between Grand and Howard Streets.

BOOSEY'S MUSICAL CABINET.—A Complete Library of Modern Music for Voice and Piano-forte: CHOPIN'S VALSES, complete ..... 50c.
SCHUBERT'S HARTFORE AND BASS SONGS ..... 50c.
BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS, complete ..... 50c.
COMPLETE OPERAS FOR PIANO, each ..... 50c.
Mailed on receipt of price. CATALOGUES FREE.
BOOSEY & CO., 644 Broadway, N. Y.

All Eruptions Vanish

From the face, bosom, arms, or any other part of the body, under the effects of DR. HAYFORD'S IRON AND SULPHUR BITTERS. They also quickens the circulation, and the sallow skin, the boil, and blood from any thing of an irritating nature, and leaves it in a fair surface in the form of a subtle fluid which finds its way through the millions of little orifices which ventilate the system through the skin. The cure the Powders accomplish is perfect, because they obliterate the causes of the disorder. No outward application is necessary.

SOLD BY DRUGGISTS.
1 Package, 12 Powders, $1; 3 Packages, 36 Powders, $2 50. Mailed Free.
BALL & RUCKEL, 218 Greenwich St., N.Y.

NARRAGANSETT STEAMSHIP COMPANY.
FOR BOSTON, VIA NEWPORT AND FALL RIVER.
CONSOLIDATION OF THE BRISTOL AND FALL RIVER LINES.
THE LARGEST AND MOST MAGNIFICENT STEAMERS IN THE WORLD.
BRISTOL, Capt. BRAYTON. PROVIDENCE, Capt. SIMMONS.
MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and SATURDAYS. TUESDAYS, THURSDAYS, and SATURDAYS.
Will leave Pier No. 28, North River, foot of Murray Street, DAILY, at 5 P. M.
A NEW AND CONVENIENT FEATURE OF THIS LINE IS, RUNNING A BOAT ON SUNDAY AT SAME HOUR.
By this route passengers can take train from Newport at 4 A.M., and arrive in Boston at 6 A.M. in time to connect with all northern and eastern trains or rest undisturbed, if preferred, on board, and take 7.45 A.M. train and arrive in Boston at early business hours. JAMES FISK, Jr., Managing Director.
M. R. SIMONS,
CHAS. H. VAILE, General Superintendent.
General Passenger Agent, 298 North River.

REMOVAL.

V. J. MAGNIN, GUEDIN, & CO., beg to announce that they have removed their place of business from No. 3 Maiden Lane

TO
No. 652 BROADWAY
(between Bleecker and Bond Sts.), and offer, from their Spring importations, a complete and elegant assortment of their specialties in WATCHES,
HOUSE-TIMERS,
JEWELRY,
CLOCKS,
BRONZES,
MUSICAL BOXES,
AND FANCY GOODS.
SOLE AGENTS FOR THE NARDIN WATCH.

THE NEW WRINGER WHICH has the Patent Stop, to prevent the cogs from coming separating.
"It really merits all the good that can be said of it."—Weed's Rural New Yorker.
"The Universal, 'the Best.'"—Amer. Agriculturist.
Sold by dealers generally. R. C. BROWNELL & CO.,
General Agent, 52 Cortlandt St., New York.

"STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" Shell Shawls. You want one. Splendid $2 engraving and paper a whole year only 75 cts. 8 pp., 40 long columns (Ledger size). It's worth $5. Subscribe NOW. Specimens, &c., postpaid for 6 cts. Address "STAR-SPANGLED BANNER," Hinsdale, N. H.

PIANOS and ORGANS.
Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of finish-less tone, for $275. New Cabinet Organs and Melodeons for $65, and upwards. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $50 to $200, at 481 Broadway. HORACE WATERS.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.
Prices from $16 to $22.

From the Scientific American of April 11, 1868.
"The color of this metal closely resembles that of pure carat gold, is more grateful to the eye, and its lustre brilliant," &c., &c.
When desired, these Watches will be sent to any express office, and permission of examination granted upon payment of freight charges.
JULES D. HUGUENIN VUILLEMIN,
Geneva, Switzerland, New York.
For sale by all respectable dealers.

A GENTEEL BUSINESS for either sex. No risk, previous knowledge, or the use of capital required. This is no advertising scheme, but comes from a reliable business firm. Thoroughly outlined can be made by addressing T. W. EVANS & CO.,
No. 162 Nassau Street, New York City, P. O. Box 5,126.

PATENTS.—Munn & Co., Editors Scientific American, 37 Park Row, New York. Twenty-three years' practice in obtaining AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PATENTS.
Opinions free of charge. A pamphlet, 100 pages of law and information, free. Address as above.

BLACK-WALNUT PORTABLE RACKS for Parlors, Sitting-rooms, &c. Hide Beds and Fancy Articles. Sent by Express on receipt of price, $2 50. C. WOOD, 149 Fulton Place, N. Y.

FIRE EXTINGUISHER, PLANT SYRINGE, WINDOW WASHER, and GARDEN ENGINE for $5. Send stamp for circulars to N. E. P. PUMP CO., DERBYS, MASS.

$10 Indispensable to every Household! Perfectly new, wonderful! Every body buys at first sight! Agents making fortunes! Illustrated circulars free! Address AFEX CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE.
First-class, and fully licensed. AGENTS WANTED. For terms, address CHICOPEE M'F'G CO., Boston, Mass.

INSTEAD of BITTER, take SWEET QUININE!

FINE WATCHES
AT IMPORTERS' PRICES.
SOLID GOLD
HUNTING-CASE LADIES' WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jewelled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, $56. Lepine Movement, Same Balance, $52.
FINE SILVER
GENTS' HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, Lever Movement, First Quality, $34; Extra Quality, $36.
IMPERIAL SILVER
Engraved Movement, Ruby Jewels, Sweep Seconds, Silver Hunting Cases, $38.
AMERICAN MOVEMENT
3-oz. Silver Cases, $18; Full Jewelled, $16.
SOLID GOLD
GENTS' HUNTING-CASE WATCHES, First Quality, Lever Movement, Full Jewelled, Adjusted Balance, Regulated and Warranted, $85; Extra Quality, $88; and Watches of every grade, at prices equally low, sent by Express, to be paid for after they have been received and examined. Every Watch warranted for one year, or exchanged if not giving perfect satisfaction. Full Descriptive Price-Lists sent free.
S. H. MOORE & CO., Importers,
52 & 54 JOHN ST., NEW YORK.

HITCHCOCK'S
HALF-DIME MUSIC.
Sixty sheets of music mailed for $6, or any of the series at FIVE CENTS each.
LATEST NUMBERS:
Nos. 60. Call Me Thine Own.
61. Why Wandering here?
62. Pretty, Pretty Eyes.
63. Those Tassels on the Boots.
64. Five O'Clock in the Morning.
65. Lady Mine.
66. Bold Buck's Song.
67. Sweetheart.
68. The Smile of Memory.
69. Mabel Waltz.
60. Meet Me in the Lane, Love.
61. The Lancashire Lass.
62. The Harvest Queen.
63. Where there's a Will there's a Way.
64. Be Not Angry and Depart.
65. Boston Belles.
66. Chestnut Street Belles.
67. Barney O'Hea.
68. The Sleigh Song.
For first 50 subjects send for a catalogue. Address HENRY M. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
No. 34 Beekman Street, N. Y.

20TH THOUSAND.—Hunter's Guide and Trapper.—By Dr. J. SUTTON. How to hunt, trap, and trap all animals. How to tan and cure hides, &c. New Ed. with 43 Cuts. Sent by mail or by express. Neatly printed and bound.—only 25 cts. post paid; 6 for $1. Send to HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

No Pianist will fail to Admit
That of the hundreds of Books of Instruction in Piano-forte Playing published, JEFFREYS' NEW METHOD takes the lead and seems destined to keep it. THIRTY-SECOND EDITION OF JEFFREYS' MUSICSON'S METHOD ARE SOLD EVERY YEAR—a sale which no similar book has ever reached. It is adapted alike to the youngest and to the oldest—to the beginner, the amateur, the artist, the professor, and practical practice. Price $2 75. Sold by all Music Dealers. Sent postpaid by the PUBLISHER JEFFREYS, Printer, 288, 291 Washington St., Boston. CHARLES H. KEMBLE & CO., 151 Nassau Street, New York.

5000 FEES WANTED.—A sample sent for 25c., with terms to clear from $15 to $25 per day. New and wonderful. Address H. WAITE & CO., Address N. H. WAITE, 59 Orange St., Newark, N. J.

LYONS' PATENT HAIR-CRIMPERS.—Every lady should have them. For sale at Fancy Stores. Made only by E. LYONS, 1301 Marshall St., Philadelphia.

AGENTS WANTED, local and traveling, to sell a staple article. Liberal inducements. Send for Circular.
A. D. WAGNER, 68 Murray St., New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just published:
BARNES'S NOTES ON THE PSALMS.
NOTES, CRITICAL, EXPLANATORY, AND PRACTICAL, ON THE BOOK OF PSALMS. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c., &c. Now in Three Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, Vol. III. just ready. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

BREAKING A BUTTERFLY;
OR, HIGHLY RESPECTABLE ENDING. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," "Barrington," "Sans Merci," "Maurice Dering," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

SCOTT'S FISHING-BOOK.
FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By GEORGE C. SCOTT. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

CHARLES READE'S NOVELS:
IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHARLES READE. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT; or, Jealousy. By CHAS. READE. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HARD CASH. A Matter-of-Fact Romance. By CHAS. READE. Illustrations. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

GUICCIOLI'S LORD BYRON.
MY RECOLLECTIONS OF LORD BYRON; and those of EVERYBODY ELSE. By the COUNTESS GUICCIOLI. Translated by Hubert E. H. Jerningham. With Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

LEVER'S THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S.
THAT BOY OF NORCOTT'S. By CHAS. LEVER, Author of "The Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly," "Barrington," "Martins of Cro' Martin," "Charles O'Malley," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HARPER'S SCHOOL AND FAMILY SLATE.
SCHOOL AND FAMILY SLATE, with Cards, for Instruction in Writing, Printing, Drawing, and Arithmetic. $12 per dozen.

BALDWIN'S PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS.
PRE-HISTORIC NATIONS; or, Inquiries concerning some of the Great Peoples and Civilizations of Antiquity, and their Probable Relation to a still Older Civilization of the Valley of the Nile. By JOHN D. BALDWIN, Member of the American Oriental Society. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, at the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS.

OOLONG (black), 72c., 83c., 90c.: best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.: best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents: best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can find economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

FORTESCUE, MASS., August 26, 1868.

To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York.

GENTS: The people here will not let me alone. They say I have got a good thing, and that I have got to send another order for them. So here you have it, in the shape of my seventh order during the year. As May last, making five hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-five cents. I have sent you since that date.

Hoping this will be as good as former packages, I remain Yours, &c., JOHN WILLIAMS.

10 lbs. Uncol'd Japan, Mrs. Kempton...	at $1 00		$10 00
6 " Imperial..."	" 1 00		6 00
5 " Young Hyson..."	A. L. Cummings...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Imperial..."	Estes Howe...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Imperial..."	I. I. Chapman...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Gunpowder..."	A. Watrous...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Imperial..."	F. Taylor...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Young Hyson..."	J. Hopkins...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Coffee..."	"	at 30	1 50
5 " Gunpowder..."	Wm. Stephens...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Imperial..."	Wm. H. Dority...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " do. do.	H. Malone...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " do. do.	J. N. Newcomb...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Gunpowder...	Mrs. Campbell...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " do. do.	Judge Miller...	at 1 25	4 50
5 " Gunpowder...	Gold...	at 1 25	6 25
5 " Imperial...	Mrs. Bird...	at 1 25	6 25
			$74 81

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-Office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, and at one-third to one-half less than dealers and stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large family number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-half besides the Express charges by sending directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—Some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising, and during August it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put the name of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of keen imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

THE DOLLAR SUN.

CHARLES A. DANA'S PAPER.

The cheapest, largest, and most readable Daily in New York Journals. Every body likes it. Three editions. DAILY, SEMI-WEEKLY, and WEEKLY, at $6, $3, and $1 a year. Full reports of markets, agriculture, European affairs, Grower Gossip, and a capital story in every Weekly and Semi-Weekly number. A valuable premium to every subscriber. Send for specimen, with premium list.

I. W. ENGLAND, Publisher of Sun, New York.

WHOEVER

WILL act as Agent, either lady or gentleman, can earn in an evening a Watch or Shawpin, Silk Dress Pattern, Vase, Castor, Set or Waiters, &c., &c., or selection from a great variety of New-ties, &c., without commission by any other article, without commission by any other article, at

GREAT SPRING TRADE SALE,

Comprising over 350 different articles. Send for Catalogues.

PARKER & CO.,
98 and 100 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

THE "BEST" SEWING MACHINE.—Will do all that any machine can do. Price only $18.—Beware of all $25, $30, and $40 machines. Have been tested and best. Agents wanted. Samples very low to Agents. Wanted, one agent to control each County. Speak quick. Address

ASHUELOT S. M. CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

WHAT IS A TONIC?

Bear this in mind—that, although a tonic is to a certain extent a stimulant, a stimulant, unmodified by any medicinal substances, is not a tonic, but a debilitant.

In

HOSTETTER'S

STOMACH BITTERS

there is a stimulating element of the purest grade manufactured in this or any other country. Every fiery and corrosive oil or acid which contaminates the ordinary liquors of commerce is expelled from the re-spirit which forms the alcoholic base of the BITTERS, by the careful and repeated rectification. The juices of the valuable roots, barks, and herbs, infused into this wholesome product of the finest grain, still further modify its action, so that it becomes, in fact, a strictly diffusive agent, minus all the heady and brain-exciting properties which belong, more or less, to all spirits. In a word, it is simply the safe and harmless vehicle which renders the medicinal virtues of the preparation effective—increasing the digestive power and diffusing them through the system. Hence the pleasant and gentle glow which is experienced after taking a dose of the BITTERS. Instead of creating a fever-action, as unmedicated stimulants are apt to do, this salubrious tonic is the best-known remedy for that complaint. It calms and soothes excited circumstant, strengthens the nerves, promotes the secretion of the gastric juice, invigorates the bowels, determines the fluids to the surface, improves the appetite, increases the animal vigor, induces sound action, and, from its mild yet effective alternative qualities, is the very best preparation that can be administered in the weaker sex in the many difficulties to which their organization subjects them.

15,000 AGENTS WANTED to sell 100 beautiful new articles. Every family buy. 500 per cent. profit realized on every thing. Send for our Illustrated Circular and Reduced Price-List. DALEY & CO., 149 Fulton Street, New York.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15. HUNTING WATCHES $20.

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior COLLINS METAL Watches having recently been introduced, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability; and to protect our goods from imposition hereafter, we have adopted the name of

"COLLINS METAL,"

and we give notice that no one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color perfectly in all climates, and is warranted by us to Gentlemen's Hunting Watches in our

Are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by us for FIVE YEARS. Watches are equal in accuracy, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, with Chased Cases, Hunting, Gold Watch costing $200, from the $15 grade.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, and Chains, &c., all of the most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our published prices. Our regular customers will receive the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York. Parties are requested to send for our Collins Metal Circular, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. In ordering, or making inquiries, write plainly the name, town, county, and State. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO.,
80 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

$20 A Day to Male and Female

Agents to introduce the NEW AND IMPROVED LOCK-STITCH FAMILY MACHINE. Stitch alike on both sides, SEWING BACKWARD AND FORWARD. MACHINE is not liable to get out of order, and is the only low-priced machine in the market that will not do the same work. Price less than $40. All others are infringements, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and damages. Full particulars free. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

A WATCH FREE—GIVEN GRATIS to every Live man who will act as agent in a new, light, and honorable business paying $30 a day. No gift enterprise. No humbug. No money required in advance. Address H. MOORE & COMPANY & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Persons who have been drugged without benefit by bilious disorders, dyspepsia, or confirmed constipation, will find immediate and permanent relief from this remedy.

Alaska Diamonds.

The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the real diamond, mounted at our own factory, in artistic diamond settings, guaranteed four years, and sold by us at one sixtieth of the cost of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

Look at our Price-List.

Ladies' Solitaire Finger-Rings, $8 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Drops, $8, $6, and $10. Cluster Finger-Rings, $10, $12, $15. Cluster Ear-Drops, $6, $12, $14.
Cluster Sets, $10, $15, $20, and $25 each; Cross Sets, $30 and $38.
Gentlemen's Solitaire Pins, $3, $5, $8, $10, $15, $20; Gents' Solitaire Rings, $5, $10, $18, $30; Cluster Rings, $6, $10, $15 each.
Cluster Pins, $10 and $12; with tail, $16; Cross Pins, $6, $10, and $15. Cross, per set, $6, $8, $12.

We do our business direct from our factory, located in a city which has a world-wide reputation for its fine jewelry.

Orders less than $5 should be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods sent free. Exceeding that amount will be express, C. O. D., customers paying all express charges. A Large Discount to the Trade. Address

STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO., Providence, R. I.

"ALUMINUM BRILLIANTE"—$10 WATCHES, of new metal, equal to silver. Elegantly engraved cases, equal to Gold. Finish, style, and appearance of a Waltham." Sent C. O. D., and can be returned if not satisfactory. Send for trade-list of cheap and costly watches. Agents & &c. Address

N. E. WATCH CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

VELOCIPEDES of superior quality at least 25 per cent less than regular prices. Send for Circular to THE GREAT AMERICAN VELOCIPEDE FACTORY, 464 Broadway, N. Y. We can confidently say that in price and quality we defy competition.

AGENTS WANTED in every town in the U. S.

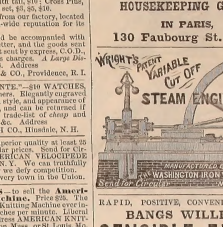
WANTED—AGENTS—to sell the American Knitting Machine. Price $25. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit 20,000 stitches per minute. Liberal terms to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

HERMAN TROST & CO.,

Nos. 48 and 50 Murray St., N.Y.

FRENCH CHINA DINNER SETS,
TEA SETS,
VASES, &c., &c.,
PARIS BRONZES,
PARIAN MARBLE STATUETTES,
CRYSTAL TABLE GLASSWARE,
BOHEMIAN GLASSWARE,
LAVA ARTICLES,
HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

IN PARIS,
130 Faubourg St. Denis.



RAPID, POSITIVE, CONVENIENT, NEAT!

BANGS WILLIAMS'

SENSIBLE ERASER

AND PAPER CLEANER!

For the use of Book-Keepers, Artists, Draughtsmen, Architects, Students, and every body.

THE MOST CONVENIENT INVENTION ever made for erasing all surface writing.

For sale by all Stationers, and sent by mail on receipt of 25 cts.

N. BANGS WILLIAMS,

Manufacturer of Specialties for Stationery and Fancy Goods Trade and Dealer in ART PUBLICATIONS,

No. 95 William Street, New York.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—I am now prepared to furnish all those who are willing to work, right in their homes, the whole of the time, or for the spare moments. Business new, light, and profitable. Fifty cents to $5 per evening is easily earned by persons of either sex, and the boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. Great inducements are offered those who will devote their whole time to the business; and that every person who sees this notice may send me their address and test the business for themselves, I make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, etc., sent free. Sample sent by mail for 10 cents. Address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Me.

BIG MONEY Something New! also, best selling Articles in the World. Circulars sent FREE. Address BLOOD, STEBBINS WORKS, Mich.

SALESMEN wanted by a Manufacturing Co., to travel and sell by sample a new line of goods. Situations permanent; wages good. H. H. RICHARDS & CO., 418 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year..... $4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, One one address, for one year, $10 00; or two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, or Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE, 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 20 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 10 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR can begin at any time. The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Specimen Numbers will be sent gratis, in answer to a written request, but no time is specified, unless with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be supplied at the current rates.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by Draft or Post-Office Order or Draft at sight, avoid all risks, since, should the Draft prove liable to Bank Discount, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be very plainly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

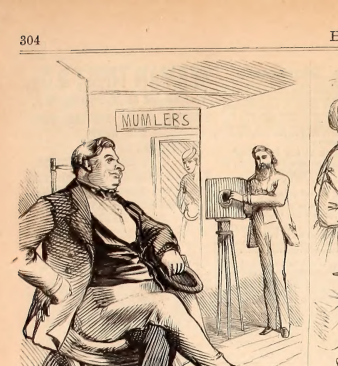
TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200: Half Page, $105: Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 00 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 00 per Line; Outside Pages, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.



SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHY.

1. Mr. Dobbs, at the request of his Affianced, sits for his Photograph. Unconsciously happens in at Mumler's.

2. Result—Portrait of Dobbs, with his Five Deceased Wives in Spirituo!!!

Trade-Mark for Silver. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate. GORHAM MFG CO

GORHAM MFG. CO.,

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Sterling Silver Ware,

AND

Nickel Silver-Plated Ware,

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

WATCHES, $15, $20, and $25. Sent by Express, C. O. D. Send for Circular, or see last issue of this paper.—JOHN FOGGAN, Prest'Groids Gold Watch Co., 79 Nassau St., N. Y. (Removed from No. 18.)

A POOR GIRL'S

LETTER. New Song from Perfection.....25c.
Standard and Captive Indian Maid. Perfection. 30c.
Perfection Waltzes, 30c. "Telegram Waltz," 40c.
Not for Joe Galop, 30c. "On the Beach Galop, 25c.
Ka-boodle-ta (comic song), "Danny Pat, each 35c.
Violin or Flute Arrangements, 10c. each. Music mailed.
FREDERICK BLUME, 1125 Broadway, N. Y.

WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, Plans, and Details of Working Scale of Country, Suburban, and Village Houses, with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE Twelve Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. 150 Designs, $1 50, postpaid. Geo. E. Woodward, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York. Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

HOWE'S
MUSICAL MONTHLY.

In each No. 48 worth of first-class Piano Music for 25 cts. No. 5 contains 3 full sets of Waltzes; 3 Galops, Polkas, &c., by Strauss, Gungl, Faust, &c.; 10 songs, such as "Gypsy's Warning," "Tassels on her Boots," "Love's Request," &c. 25 large pages, on extra sheet-music paper. Terms, $1 per year, in advance; 10 cents, 3 copies for $1. Single Nos. sent by mail, postpaid, for 25c., or 3 for $1. For sale by all Music and Periodical Dealers. ELIAS HOWE, 109 Court St., Boston.

CARPET PAPER.

A prepared paper to put under Carpets, 1½ yards wide; soft and thick, and only

FIVE CENTS PER YARD.

MANAHAN & MILLAR,

No. 10 SPRUCE STREET, N. Y.

£150,000,000

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1600. Fee to search for any name, $2. Gew & Co., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

THE CELEBRATED

BRAND
BLACK ALPACA

is one of the most desirable fabrics now worn by ladies, either for promenade or house dress. There are no Alpacas imported equal to the "CELEBRATED BUFFALO BRAND" for fineness of texture, brilliance of color, and durability of wear; they excel all others ever offered in this market. They have all the finish and lustre of a grass-cloth silk, are made of the very best material, and are positively superior to any Black Alpaca ever introduced. These beautiful goods are sold by most of the leading retail dry-goods merchants in New York, Brooklyn, and the principal cities and towns throughout the country, and are rapidly becoming the most popular and fashionable goods worn.

WM. I. PEAKE & CO., 46, 48, & 50 White St., N. Y., Sole Importers of the Brand for the United States.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,

Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.

Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.

ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

TWENTY-ONE years' experience.
THE most extensive agency for obtaining Patents in the world.
AMERICAN and European Patents obtained in United States and Europe.
CHARGES less than any other reliable agents.
NO FEE UNTIL PATENT is allowed. Examination of models free. A pamphlet sent free. A broad volume of information concerning Patents, sent free to any part of the United States or Europe, with State and receipts for mechanics, gates & rents. Communications confidential. Address

MUNN & CO.,
No. 37 Park Row, N. Y.

COMPETITION EXTRAORDINARY.

BUY the Celebrated Wilson Shuttle Sewing Machine. You can have three years to pay for it. Send for Illustrated Pamphlet of this kind. Also, for Pamphlet containing full directions for placing our Sewing Machines into every household in the land. Address C. D. HARPER, Cleveland, Ohio. Special Agent of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co. Incorporated under the Laws of Ohio.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, everywhere, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth cannot be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical sewing machine manufactured.

NEBRASKA.—Soil, Climate, and People.—A pamphlet for 20 cts. Chopsey & Bass, Lincoln, Neb.

TO WATCH BUYERS.—An illustrated description of the Watches made by the American Watch Company of Waltham will be sent to any address on application.

In addition to a description of the Watches, the pamphlet contains much other useful information to watch buyers. Address ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents, No. 182 Broadway, N. Y.

Manufactured by
THE
National Watch Co.,
OF ELGIN, ILL.

Pronounced by Watchmakers, Railroad and Express men, East and West, to be the most correct Time-keepers made.

Avoid Imitations, and all parties who advertise to send our goods C. O. D.

Call on your Jeweler and ask to see them.

Business Office and Salesroom, 159 & 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

The Highest Cash Prices
PAID FOR
OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;
OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;
OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are written full;
and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Public and Private Libraries, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Offices, &c.
JOHN C. STOCKWELL,
23 Ann street, N. Y.

$25 to $50 per Day made by Agents selling the American Pocket Policeman, a beautiful silver-plated combination Lock and Chain, of universal application, combining utility, novelty, and beauty. Capable of 10,000 changes of combination. Send One Dollar for Sample and Terms to Agents. Address AMERICAN POCKET POLICEMAN MFG. CO., P. O. Box 918, Chicago, Ill.

DE DE JONGH'S
LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL

Universally recognized by the Faculty as

INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR

to every other kind,

and the unequaled remedy for

Consumption, General Debility,

and the Wasting Diseases of Children.

DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in America in Imperial Half-Pints only, sealed with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with his Trade-Mark.

Sole Consignees,

ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.

Sole Accredited Agents in America,

EDW'D GREEY & Co., 385, Canal St., New York.

Sold by all Druggists, at $1.50 per Bottle.

☞ Beware of felonious imitations.

"LET US HAVE PEACE!"

GRAND

National Peace Jubilee

AND

MUSICAL FESTIVAL,

To be held in the

CITY OF BOSTON,

June 15, 16, 17, 18, & 19, 1869,

To commemorate the restoration of PEACE throughout the land.

THE COLISEUM

in which the Jubilee is to be held will afford ample accommodation for nearly FIFTY THOUSAND PERSONS, and the series of Musical Entertainments will include oratorio performances by the

GREATEST CHORUS

ever organized in any part of the world, made up of Musical Societies from all sections of the country, and TWENTY THOUSAND CHILDREN from the public schools, with an Orchestra of

ONE THOUSAND INSTRUMENTS, comprising many of the principal Bands and best Musicians in the United States.

DISTINGUISHED GUESTS

from all sections of the Union, including NATIONAL and STATE OFFICIALS, will participate in the Jubilee; and the citizens of Boston will be prepared to extend those hospitalities and attentions to visitors from abroad which they hope may serve to inaugurate the return of kind and fraternal feeling among all American citizens, and aid in perpetuating throughout the world, "PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN."

The immense outlay attendant upon this vast undertaking has been guaranteed with an unexampled promptness by the citizens of Boston, insuring for the Festival and Jubilee every success which pecuniary aid can command.

The following scale of prices has been established:

Single Admission, with secured seats, $5 and $3, according to location.

Single Admission, without secured seats.. $2.

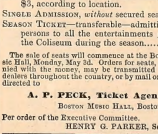
Season Ticket—transferable—admitting three persons to all the entertainments given in the Coliseum during the season..... $100

The sale of seats will commence at the Boston Music Hall, Monday, May 3d. Orders for seats, accompanied with the money, may be transmitted by music dealers throughout the country, or by mail or express, directed to

A. P. PECK, Ticket Agent,
Boston Music Hall, Boston, Mass.

Per order of the Executive Committee.
HENRY G. PARKER, Secretary.



The Human Telegraph. The nerves are telegraphic fibers connecting the brain; but if the stomach, the great vitalizer of the system, is disordered, the whole nervous organization is partially shattered for the time being. Tarrant's Seltzer Aperient works wonders in cases of nervous debility arising from dyspepsia, by restoring the stomach to its normal condition, and keeping the bowels free.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

PRINCE & COS.
ORGANS
AND MELODEONS.
43,000, now in use.
BUFFALO, N.Y. CHICAGO, ILL.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For Pamphlet, address Simpson & Co., Box 5070, N.Y.

SAFE CEDAR & CAMPHOR

For Moths. Cheap. Reliable. Durable. Fragrant. Every druggist sells it. THEOD. S. HARRIS, Boston.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Have Just Published:

SCOTT'S FISHING-BOOK.

FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS. By Genio C. Scott. With 170 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

MARVIN & CO.'s

CHROME IRON SAFES

ARE THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

265 Broadway N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XIII.—No. 646.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

SEE ESSAY IN THIS

MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONVENTION HELD AT NEWARK, NEW JERSEY, APRIL 28, 29, AND 30, 1869.—[SEE PAGE 308.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1869.

THE BRITISH QUESTION.

THE battling fact in the settlement of the Alabama question is the sentiment difficulty. But is it impossible to show intelligent Englishmen that by every usual and acknowledged means of such knowledge we had every reason to suppose a profound latent hostility toward us upon the part of the British Government; and that still believing that the hostility existed we can demonstrate that the principle involved in the British action is destructive of all international amity? The question is one of principle and of fact. Ought a friendly power to serve as a naval base of hostile expeditions against another, and was not England such a base during the rebellion? If a nation may be such a base, there is an end of what are called friendly international relations. If she may not be, there still remains the question of fact.

We had every right to suppose that England was unfriendly, and consequently to interpret her acts as hostile. The official conduct of the British Government, the tone of the British press, the applause of LAIRD in the British Parliament, the cruel cheers of the British ship running the Alabama, the enormous scorn and incredulity of British society, the base and malignant misrepresentation of the truth, and the truth evident carelessness to know it, the truth was, all these meant one thing only. When, after urgent remonstrances from the American Minister, the Alabama gayly and openly sailed from Liverpool, and took in her armament from the British shore, and to the protest of our Minister the British Government returned a cool statement that the steamer was without armament except the unhappily complicated matters, and the Alabama skimmed the seas ravaging and burning every American craft she met, the people of this country never saw in the depredations the visible consequences of the British hostile feeling. The Alabama, a British ship, burning American ships at sea was nothing by the powers of the British Parliament, the sneers of the British press, the scorn of British society taking form. It was the more offensive because it the Russian and the Prussian and then recently ended, the United States had observed the most honorable, and if the word might be used, the most friendly neutrality toward England.

These facts, which no honest Englishman will deny, however he may even at the time have regretted them, indicated a very deep malignement hostile feeling to the United States. That this country had done nothing to occasion it one may see from saying. That we loved England more than England loved us can not be truly alleged. But the frank expression, "the bubble has burst," revealed a feeling that was very profound and very universal. Now if it is for every reasonable Englishman to consider whether it is not highly probable that under the spur of such a feeling, and a very general conviction of what the Times called "the impossibility" of restoring the Union, the action of the British Government may not have been such as to be afterward regretted. The whole question under this aspect may be narrowed to this: Was the conduct of the Government friendly? Assuredly we presume no Englishman can assert that the tone of the press, which generally represents the popular sentiment upon such subjects, was friendly. But if not friendly, may not the action of the Government have been really, and upon calm reflection, untenable?

We observe that MR. H. LEE WARNER, who appears to have been a friend of this country during the rebellion, writes to the Nation that the proclamation of neutrality was issued to enable the British Government to prevent acts which the rebel agents were about expediting from England; and that the recognition of equal belligerent was, therefore, in a friendly sort, "done in kindness" to the Union. But MR. WARNER does not say that the proclamation prevented the departure of the two ships, and he knows that Lord Cairns, then Lord Chancellor, states that if the rebels had not been recognized as belligerents the Englishmen engaged in fitting out such ships for the rebel agents were expediting would be guilty of piracy. That is to say, the proclamation was not necessary to enable the British Government to prevent the departure of the ships. MR. WARNER says further that "we English blushed at the tone of our newspapers, at the tone of our Berechet Hopes, and at the meanness of our Government officials." But does MR. WARNER really believe that if the Government had been acting in a friendly spirit, and anxious that all should be "done in kindness," its officials would have been remiss? Certainly not; those were the precise circumstances under which officials are not remiss.

If, then, the feeling of the people, with the noble exceptions which American can never forget, as shown in every newspaper, was unfriendly; and if the action of the Government was also unfriendly, is it not very probable that acts were done, such as the building, equipping, and sailing of the Alabama, which were not only unlawful, but which in principle must necessarily destroy the comity of nations? Is it impossible to show this to England, and if not impossible is there any reason why England should not honorably concede that the principle is untenable? It is to this point, it seems to us, that the negotiations should tend. We can not call England to account for not liking us except by a declaration of war. We can only heal a wound of friendship by a bank-note. But we certainly can show that, not being friendly, England did not carefully consider the character of her act, and then there can be no honorable reason why she should not disavow an untenable position. If diplomacy has not advanced to that point it is time. Let the statesmen of each country take counsel of the best, not of the worst, public opinion around them.

A MODEL ARGUMENT.

IN a country so heavily taxed as this the question of the best method of raising revenue is one that can not be avoided, and which must be discussed in the calmest and most reasonable spirit. No subject so grave and vital can be wisely disposed of by flippancy, personal abuse, and appeals to prejudice. Of this great but rather elementary truth the Tribune, which is the advocate of the Protective system, is evidently unconscious. It does not discuss the question candidly, and therefore stated, a few days since, that the Abolitionists, having tried "to abolish every thing, from humanity down," were now trying to abolish the tariff. Nothing could be fairer in spirit and weightier in argument than such a remark; and this admirable and forcible presentation of the essentials of the Protective policy has been followed up by a writer in the Times signing himself "A Veteran Observer."

This writer addresses himself to the remarks of the Rev. MR. BEECHER, who lately presided at a Free Trade meeting in Brooklyn, and made a speech in which he stated his views upon the great principles of Free Trade and cognate subjects. The Veteran Observer differs with MR. BEECHER upon the principle of Protection as a policy, but he does not meet the Reverend, and nothing can be more delightful than the manner of his reply except the force of his argument. It mingles scholarly courtesy with a very remarkable degree, as our readers will observe.

MR. BEECHER is a clergyman. "It may be," says the Veteran, "that the gospel can be preached in a newspaper, or possibly in a novel, as well as in the pulpit..... What a pity it is that the gospel is not wide enough and full enough to afford employment to all ministers ..... But let us hear the Reverend HENRY'S philosophy." Some writers, in replying to MR. BEECHER'S remarks upon a subject upon which every citizen, and even a clergyman is a citizen, is profoundly interested, might have begun by endeavoring to excite prejudice against him on account of his profession. But the Veteran Observer deals solely upon truth, obviously relies upon the strength of his argument, and perceives that, whatever he occupies, he is thoroughly well enough informed to be a master in it. He is not a man to be moved by mere sarcasm, but he is not intolerant, the free trader or the pigs..... The pigs have rather the best of it, for they go upon fixed instincts, and feel under no necessity of becoming idiots when they were not born so." Could any thing be more excellently put, or more conclusive against the philosophy of free trade? Free traders are idiots. "It is easy to say you desire that free trade, or any theory of raising revenue except that of the Veteran, is sheer idiocy?

MR. BEECHER said that the great question is the relation of organized capital to the unprotected laborer. The Veteran is a thin organ. "In this he is much nearer the mark than he thinks himself; but he is not always dressed in right, or defined it right, or seems to know where he is going..... Does the Reverend HENRY get his views of political economy from fees pews?..... No manufacturing Company makes such profits as the gamblers in Wall Street, ... and I guess it would not be very hard to find the opposition sitting in the cushioned pews of fashionable churches paying their share for the support of fashionable ministers." There he certainly has him. But he has a better pew yet for pews in MR. BEECHER'S church. What can be plainer than that, therefore, MR. BEECHER'S views of raising a revenue are unsound?

MR. BEECHER suggested that he had been called to preside because he represented a very large and yet undeveloped class of persons in the community. Hapless man! See how nobly the Veteran demolishes the idea that there will ever be any more free traders: "Agassiz tells us that there are three stages of a frog, each of which is found in some part of the country as a separate animal. But these never grow into one another; so that a tadpole in one part of the country never becomes a frog. These 'undeveloped' free traders will never grow into any thing more. It is the whole of them." Thus to hold other views of raising a revenue than those of a Veteran is to prove yourself not only an idiot but a tadpole. Now the plain practical question is, shall an enlightened people listen to idiotic tadpoles?

MR. BEECHER, reasoning still further to state his views upon the true principles of raising a revenue, the Veteran subtly refutes him again by a series of the most skillful and admirable arguments. The present tariff, says the Veteran, averages forty-seven per cent. on all importations. "Without this revenue we could not pay the interest on the national debt....." The value of Government bonds depends upon maintaining the tariff at the highest practical point..... I am sorry to see gentlemen of ethical talents and popular talents ministering to the mere quackeries of the day, bringing educated gentlemen down to the low level of vulgar demagogues.....Some but the wildest theorists or the veriest demagogues would oppose a doctrine so obviously adapted to the circumstances of our country." This really seems to settle the whole question of Free Trade, because it appears that to differ with the theories of a Veteran is not only to demonstrate that one is not a practical man, but that you are a mere quack and vulgar demagogue. Now why should any body heed idiots, tadpoles, quacks, and demagogues? The Protective theory is palpably established.

It is only natural that at the end of so persuasive an argument, conducted in so philosophical a manner, in spirit, and with such entire freedom from personality of every kind, an argument so distinguished by amenity, and so illuminated with intelligence, the Veteran should remark: "I yearned with no one for differences of opinion, or even for the wildest theories of government or society. But I do desire that in this discussion, with its hundreds of colleges, the discussion of great national questions should be conducted with the amenities of gentlemen and the intelligence of educated men.

Si sonnumentum queris, circumspice!

TIME AND WAGES.

IT is a great misfortune that Congress is not a little more careful to say what it means. The new Tenure-of-Office Act, as we remarked at the time, was passed under an explanation in one House which was directly contradicted in the other, so that nobody knows what it means. If no doubt were intended it was very easy to state exactly the provisions of the law; and it was left obscure because light was not desired. Was it so also with the Eight Hours law? That was the obscure statement was plain. They wished to be paid for a day of eight hours the wages that are now paid for ten. Was that a difficult thing to understand in the bill? When the bill came up SENATOR SHERMAN moved that rate of wages paid by the Government to its laborers should be the current rate for the same labor for the same time paid by other employers in the neighborhood. This was voted down. That is to say, Congress decided that the Government employer should be paid for eight hours' work what neighboring workmen were paid for ten hours' work. Why didn't the bill say so? Why was it left in conflict with other laws? Was it the wonderful duty of Attorney-General at that time, and his successor, must be appealed to for an explanation? SENATOR WILSON has published a statement in debate, in the form of a letter to the Secretary of War, and there is no doubt that the question was understood and debated; that it was resolved to pay the Government workmen more than other workmen; and that yet the law is so loosely drawn that it is interpreted exactly the other way.

Is not that the fact under the circumstances, suspiciously suggestive? Suppose that the bill had been entitled an act to pay the laborers under Government one-fifth more than the current rate of wages, and that it have been passed by the country, and especially by all laborers, except the "few hundreds" who, it appears, were employed by the Government? Suppose that it had been expressed in another form as an act to furnish the laborers under Government with a sinkin and a pudding every Sunday, would they have supported with equal zeal, yet would it have been essentially different?

Senator WILSON remarks that he was not himself convinced that as much work could be done in eight hours as in ten, nor that it ought to be paid for at the same rate. It was sure that it might be for the benefit of toiling men and women to reduce the hours of labor, and that at least the Government could afford to try the experiment. The difficulty is with the Senator's reasoning, not with his feeling. The Government is, in this sense, an irresponsible proprietor. The tendency of its action is to compel all other employers to pay ten hours' wages for eight hours' work. It may be a mistake. It may lead to disaster. But that is not the question. Therefore every one injured the Government does not suffer, and merely puts its hands into the pockets of those proprietors to pay for the losses which its own action has occasioned. Is it the function of a Government to try experiments in political economy? It is certainly most desirable to lighten and simplify toil and to secure comfort to every man and woman, but is it reasonable to suppose that this can be done by a law that sixpenny loaves of bread shall be sold for fourpence?

PUBLIC POCKET-PICKING.

IT was a favorite amusement of the older satirical English writers to depict John Bull as a dull, patient fool who danced at every whim of his rulers and bowed to pay the piper, and MACAULAY quotes VOLTAIRE as saying somewhere, that the art of government is to make two-thirds of a people pay all it possibly can pay for the benefit of the other third. But at least John Bull could not help himself except by revolution, and therefore even when JAMES II. deliberately proceeded to undo the results of the long civil war, the patient sufferer shrugged his shoulders and said that he thought the King would not last long. So the King dealt another blow—and fortunately knocked himself over.

Now Jonathan has not the excuse of John Bull. A man who must bear every thing and can not because he can not help himself, except at the extremest peril, may move pity and sympathy; but a stalwart fellow who allows a sneak openly to pick his pockets is simply contemptible. This excellent city is one stalwart fellow of that kind, this State is another, and very often it seems as if the country were another. The people of this city and State elect the persons who make and execute the laws. If they elected honest agents the work would be honestly done. But is it honestly done? Twenty-five cents out of every dollar of internal tax which is collected disappears. It does not reach the Treasury. Meanwhile the insolent Jonathan roars about taxation and economy. "That rascal is picking my pocket," whines the stout giant. Why don't you stop him then, and your blubbering at the same time?

The Legislature of this State will probably have adjourned when this paper is issued. It was a Republican Legislature, although the majority of that party was small. It had tried, and able, and upright members. But no Legislature ever had a worse record. Is the Republican party therefore responsible? Not at all; for the steady opposition to most of the unworthy propositions came from the great body of the Republicans, while the vote of the bolters lay in the few Republicans who could be "influenced." But we invite the attention of the honest Republicans of the State to the tide account which appeared in the Supply bill, and we remind them that a party which must bear such responsibilities is in serious danger unless that stalwart public is a greater fool than ever.

There was a Committee upon Privileges and Elections whose duty it was to inquire into the facts concerning contested seats, of which we believe there were three. This Committee was composed of four Republicans and one Democrat. The Committee reported at the close of the session, giving two Republicans seats held by Democrats, and substituting one Democrat for another. Both contestants are paid: and in the case of Richmond County, MR. DECKER received the full salary of an office to which he was never elected. Of course there is no good reason that the investigation of the fraud at the Republican committee—struck out every item except for actual board and other legitimate expenses, and still the bill amounted to $8000. The SARATOGA bill was paid by himself, and no wine or cigars were charged to MR. CONANT, as appears by the published letters from Albany. This wagon was waste, however, but peculiar to a Republican committee. It was equally flagrant last year in the case of a Democratic committee; and this is one of the ways in which Jonathan's pocket is picked.

MR. CONANT, of Suffolk, introduced a bill which proposes to simplify the settlement of questions of contested seats by taking all testimony before the meeting of the Legislature, and giving the Committee on Elections ten days from its appointment to report and the Legislature five days for a decision—a bill which makes no provision whatever for "Olympic, cigars, brandy, and wine." Nor for "whisky, wine, and Nibbs." Should the bill pass into law it would stop a shameful leak in the Treasury, and commend itself to public favor. Yet, whether it is passed or not, Republicans ought to remember that the party will suffer for the conduct of some of its members; and the work of all of us is harder. When the assertion that one party is as honest as another seems to be forcibly illustrated, there are men enough in the dominant party who will stay at home and let the party be defeated.

CONDITION OF TRADE.

THE anomalous feature still continues of a tolerably firm cotton market and a weak market for cloths, both brown and bleached. At the close of April middlings were as follows: Upland and Florida, 28½ @ 29; Mobile, 28½ @ 29; New Orleans, 29 @ 29½; Texas, 29½ @ 29¾. This is about two cents per lb. higher than at Liverpool. At Manchester the complaint is still made that manufacturers find the supply of their products to exceed the demand, which is the present feature of the trade on this side. Profit is still made here in wide steppings, as there are but about half a dozen mills with looms of sufficient width to produce them, and the market is never glutted. Those with narrow looms find it exceedingly difficult to make profit, as the supply is in excess of apparent wants. The fear is entertained that weak mills will be obliged to stop, and that only those of large means will be able to go on in the face of present competition. The Southern mills, which are increasing in numbers, distribute chiefly through New York and Philadelphia, although their productions constitute but a very small percentage of the whole. Western mills distribute more in their particular localities, and scarcely at all through New York and Philadelphia.

Some of the workmen thrown out of employment by the strikes in Preston cotton mills for a reduction of wages have reached this country, but the opinion prevails that they are unable to manage as many looms as the best of our men, and they will probably pass into other occupations. At Liverpool a larger number than usual of skilled workmen had congregated, determined to emigrate; but when they reach the small and quiet manufacturing towns on this side, and find neither gin nor dance houses, nor the protection of trade-unions, they will in a moment disinstalled. The reduction of wages at Preston, which amounted to about ten per cent., had been at last advices assented to, and arrangements were being made by many of the mills that had stopped to resume work. It is clear that the reduction claimed was not capricious, but came from actual necessity, due in part to the ability of the Continent, where food is more abundant, to produce at lower cost.

The trade in woollen fabrics in this country is not satisfactory. Fancy cassimeres are sold at rates under those which prevailed before the war, notwithstanding that the expenses of the mills have been largely augmented. The importation of these fabrics has fallen off as our skill in production improves. Instead of importing a case of a particular style only pieces arrive, showing that a supply of equal quality in this line are now made here, and it would appear from the present state of the market, in excess of the demand. If faced cloths were produced in any considerable degree at the mills, we should soon attain the excellence which is shown abroad in this manufacture, and become independent of foreign competition, so far as fabrics for men's wear are concerned.

In foreign dress goods the trade this spring has been good; but from the circumstances we have mentioned, resulting in a little activity for domestic productions, business is not satisfactory, although it is expected to improve. The bottom is supposed to have been reached. Southern people have too much to do in the way of recuperation to enter into extravagance, and the West is waiting for a better demand for grain, and for the opening of navigation. It is quite clear that what grain had reached the East has hitherto created a burden to be carried, and it is fortunate that more has not been thrown upon the sea-board. The market had slightly improved. The recent arrivals of wheat at Liverpool, the finest of California, have proved unprofitable, and made further shipments impossible from that quarter.

The industries pursued in this country are all of them of great advantage as compared with those of foreign people, from the great expense which attends them, the effect of our financial condition. The markets of the world are closed against many of the produce, because cheaper can be supplied by others.

Cotton has this year found a highly remunerative market in the face of peculiar circumstances, and for many of our other agricultural productions we have been well paid. The situation as to cotton was carefully weighed by Southern planters, and they have acted with that common firmness and skill in dealing out their crop. The effect could scarcely have been accomplished without extensive combinations, by means of which they have fortunately secured to themselves an amount of capital sufficient to go far toward placing the South on a sound footing.

Our industries, however, are many of them so unremunerative that the duty is impressed upon us of lopping off every useless expense, so that we may be able to compete in the markets of the world with the foreign producer in every form of industry suitable to our country.

Gold at the close of April advanced for a short time to 135, notwithstanding sales by the Government. The impression prevails that these sales are made with a view to the purchase by Mr. BOUTWELL of the Five-Twenties of 1862; but we can not suppose that such purchase will be made by him as framing obligations remain outstanding. The National banks hold about thirty-seven millions of the outstanding fifty-seven millions of 5 per cent. certificates issued during the war, all of which are past due, and demandable, principal and interest, in currency at any time. These certificates are held as part of the reserves of banks, and if paid off by the United States would require to be replaced by legal tenders, and consequently their withdrawal would amount to a contraction of our paper issues to that extent.

A prudent merchant would pay off a floating in preference to an unmatured debt, and we suppose that Mr. BOUTWELL, in fixing upon the policy to be pursued, will maturely consider whether or not contraction will be supported, and adopt or abandon it as he shall decide this question, upon which vast interests are inevitably hinged.

THE CUBAN NEWS.

THE Cuban cause has been immensely strengthened by the reported orders issued by COUNT ALCOVIA, the Spanish Commander in the eastern part of the island. No civilized nation will suffer so savage a policy to be pursued without forcible protest, and its execution in Cuba, if it be really intended, will do for the Cubans all that a signal act of heroism upon their own part would do, it will arouse the sympathy of the world. The shooting down of men living who recall the massacre of Scio, and the intense feeling which it kindled for the cause of Greece. The crimes of the Ottomite are among the blackest stains upon the name of CHARLES II., and the bloody sayings of JEFFREYS sealed the hatred of the English for JAMES. A policy of this kind, however, which is in this age and in such a cause utterly intolerable, and the Spanish minister in this country may safely assure his Government that VALMASEDA is a more fatal foe to the Spanish rule in Cuba than CESPEDES.

The Mexican Congress, by a vote of 100 to 19, has recognized Cuban belligerency. This is what England did at the outbreak of the rebellion. The Cuban flag is admitted and recognized in Mexican ports. This was to be expected; for the memory of the long struggle of Mexico with Spain is yet fresh and warm in the traditions of the country. This recognition, however, is due to the fact of information that there is a war, and that Mexico will remain neutral. The next step, of course, is recognition of the independence of the Cuban Government. That there is such a government is asserted in the Cuban address to the American people. The revolutionists issued their Declaration of Independence on the 10th of October, 1868, at Magsanillo; and their army is now stated to comprise some 42,000 men, under CESPEDES, Commander-in-Chief, and "the head of the Republican Executive, duly established within the lines of the Liberators." That government, however, is probably merely the headquarters of the army. The first government like that of the Colonies in 1775, nor of the rebel States in 1861. It is such a government as FRANCO when he raised the standard of revolution in Spain would have created.

But such a policy as that proclaimed by VALMASEDA will soon give form and importance to the Cuban Government. OLIVER CROMWELL, indeed, smote Drogheda and Wexford with fire and sword, and subdued Ireland. But VALMASEDA is not CROMWELL, and CROMWELL'S policy is indefensible. The horrible massacres of Andersonville and Belle Isle are free from its atrocity.

IMPENDING BLESSINGS.

IT is reported that the Mexican Government has offered to sell a part of its territory, perhaps the States of Sonora and Sinaloa, to the United States. Senator CRAGGIN, of Michigan, proposes that England be requested to cede Canada in satisfaction of our claims for moral damages. And on the morning after the inauguration the Tribune proposed the immediate dropping of luscious Cuba into the lap of the Union, with other bewildering splendors of acquisition and extension. Meanwhile Mr. SEWARD has bought Alaska for us, and our honor is perhaps pledged for St. Thomas.

If all these fine anticipations of expansion could be fulfilled by the 1st of June, this Government would be weaker than ever before. There would be immense opportunities for place-hunters and for all kinds of jobs, and the corruption that now ravages the national character and wealth would certainly not be diminished. But with such a sudden extension of the area of the country, and so great an increase of a population alien in sympathy and tradition, it would be necessary to reconsider some ideas which have come to be regarded as fundamental; such, for instance, as the essential and indefeasible nationality of the Union, with its corollary of regarding secession as a crime. With a Union which would inevitably extend from the islands of the Gulf to its shores, and gradually so bring the Western Continent—a Union composed of utterly different races, languages, faiths, and traditions—it would be folly to suppose that the theory established by the war could be maintained. A nation was made by mere contiguity. The French and the Germans are neighbors, but that is all. The French and Spaniards are neighbors, but no more. The association of people and states which would be the result of the universal annexation which is so fascinating to many minds would necessarily be of the nature of a League or a Confederacy. It would involve an entire change of policy, and the Union, as we of this generation have conceived and maintained it, would disappear.

We do not say that this is a result which is not inevitable, nor that it is undesirable. It is foolish to deprecate a disastrous consequence, for the course of events can never be foreseen, and it is apparently determined by the most insignificant causes. The departure of a Genoese sailor from a Spanish port on an August morning four centuries ago; a Connecticut Yankee's invention of a better method of cleaning cotton "how unimportant" would have full of consequence! A huge continental confederation of self-governing States may very well be the result to which we are silently drifting. Such a result may be fraught with incalculable advantage to the people of the continent. If we did not remember the North American Indians, and if popular instincts could affect climate, we might indeed prophesy with confidence.

At present, however, the one thing of which we can be tolerably sure is this fact, if the condition of the Southern States is not an element of strength in the Union, the addition of half a million of Mexicans and of a million and a half of Cubans will not diminish the matter. In case there seems to be no reason for adding to our taxes in order to acquire these elements more speedily, and to reap the fruit which Time is evidently aiming at our laps, let us at least await the heavenly hour and not pluck the gift untimely.

TESTIMONIAL TO THOMAS NAST.

IT is universally conceded that Mr. THOMAS NAST's cartoons, published in Harper's Weekly during the war and since, were the most remarkable and powerful that have been produced in the history of American illustrated journalism. They caught up and reflected, and at the same time strengthened the popular sentiment in favor of the Union and of Equal Rights for All. It was eminently proper, therefore, that the Union League Club, a city society of which he is a member, should take the appreciation which these works have won from all loyal men, by the presentation of the beautiful testimonial which we illustrate on page 314. The gift consisted of a Vase of solid silver, 15 inches high, made by TIFFANY & Co. Y. The Vase is on either side, representing loyal Art armed with porte-crayons, and bearing the open-mouthed monster of Secession. On the Vase is the following inscription:

THIRTY-SIX MEMBERS of the Union League Club unite in presenting this Vase to THOMAS NAST, as a token of their admiration of his genius, and of his ardent devotion at that Genius to the Preservation of his Country from the Curse of Rebellion.

APRIL, 1869.

The Vase was presented to Mr. NAST at the rooms of the Union League Club on the evening of April 29, and appropriate speeches were made by Colonel R. C. HALSTED and other gentlemen, to which Mr. NAST felicitously responded.

NOTES.

THE Narragansett Steamship Company propose to do a new and delightful thing. Their steamers, the Bristol and Providence, leave Pier No. 1, R. R. every day at 5 P.M., return by way of Newport and Fall River, and how spacious and convenient the boats are is known to all travelers. But now for a short hour leaving the wharf, and during the charming sail through the East River to the Sound, there is to be a concert of vocal and popular music with the band attached to each boat, and in the evening a promenade concert by the regular intrigued band, which is to follow, as the advertisement assures us, then DODWORTH'S orchestra. The managers truly say that "nothing in the mode of transportation of first-class passengers shall surpass this line on a scale of grandeur and magnificence."

THE Veteran Temperance Corps of this city has recently taken up the subject of free bathing-places for our citizens, and has several weeks of meetings to awaken popular interest in this important matter. A petition is being circulated asking that there shall be set apart a slip or basin at the easterly end of the Battery for the purposes of public salt-water baths, with appropriate buildings and accommodations. There is a proposition before the Common Council to assign this spot to private parties, but public baths, indeed, of public baths, but with especial reference to the interest of these parties. Plainly this proposition should be rejected, and the one in the citizens' petition adopted. Instead of one, also, there ought to be a number of these public baths in the city.

MR. DE CHAILLU's remarkable success in his recent lectures in this city confirms the conviction which we expressed some time ago, that with such a topic and such audiences he could not help being popular. We hope that his success here will induce him to extend his engagements so as to embrace all our large cities.

THE subscription to the Library fund of the New York Chapter of the American Institute of Architects progresses, and many of the most conspicuous citizens interested in all good causes are already among the subscribers. The names should be sent to A. J. BLOOR, Secretary, 42 East Fourteenth Street.

CONVENT LIFE.

IN Thackeray's "Irish Sketch Book" is an article on convents. Referring to the Ursuline Convent at Blackrock, near Cork, he says: "In the grille is a little wicket and a little door within it. It is to this wicket that women are brought to speak; and a bishop is in a chapel on the other side, and takes their hands in his, and receives their vows. I had never seen the like before, and felt a sort of shudder in looking at the place. There rest the girl's knees on the often kneeled up, and forswears the sacred affections which God gave her; there she kneels and denies forever the beautiful duties of her being—no offender maternal yearnings—no gentle attachments are to be felt by her. There she kneels, and she kneels and commits suicide upon her heart. Oh, honest Martin Luther! thank God you came to put that infernal, wicked, unnatural altar down—that cursed Paganism! I came out of the place quite sick; and looking before me, there, thank God! I saw the spire of the Protestant Church, soaring up into the free sky—a river in front, rolling away to the sea—liberty, sunshine, all sorts of pleasant things around, round about; and I couldn't but thank Heaven for it, and the Being whose service is freedom, and who has given us affections, which we may use like—not smother and kill them; and a noble world to live in, that we may admire it and Him who made it—not shudder at it, and hate it as we dared not live there, but must turn our backs upon it, and its beauties, and its God. I declare I think, for my part, that we have as much right to permit Suttceism in India as to allow women in the United Kingdom to take these wicked vows, or Catholic bishops to receive them."

LIVES AND LIVES.

How easy they take it, their handful of Life!
No question, no struggle, no labor, no strife:
As in cynic flat glass, world-seeing, they look knife.
Life's smoke was so thick that I only could see
A heart down in the battle—a soul on her knee:
These such terrible, terrible things we dared not live there,
How lightly they mount, and go riding apace
Where the graves are the thickest—a smile on the face;
With a jaunty, lax, airy, unconcerned grace!

For the power to pass all the great sea through a sieve,
To turn mountains to molehills, oh, what would I give,
In this strong, earnest, terrible struggle to live!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

THE Massachusetts Senate has, by a vote of 17 to 6, decided to exempt lager-beer from the provisions of the liquor law.

Robert Johnson, son of the ex-President, died at Louisville, Tennessee, April 19.

A sub-Committee of the Ways and Means Committee of Congress will visit Europe shortly. It is the purpose of arranging with the Canadian officials a basis for a treaty. The Committee is supposed to have the new treaty ready to lay before Congress immediately after its reassembling.

The trial of Mumler for fraud in the exercise of his art of spiritual photography, and to which the testimony ended in a ludicrous comedy. For P. T. Barnum made his appearance as a witness. His replies to the questions asked him concerning the Mermaid, the Woolly Horse, and the Feejee Mermaid, were his own best and most humorous merriment. But his testimony was chiefly given on several years ago he contracted with Mumler, and succeeded in making a surplus with him as to the expenses of spiritual photography to one of the humbugs of the age.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE serious of the Irish Church bill provides for the maintenance of certain clergymen, and as additional monuments have been repealed.

Servian riots occurred at Londemberg, Ireland, on April 28, between Papists and Orangemen.

At the subscription of the Paris Bourse, members on the 27th of April the Government members absented "Vive l'Empereur!" in the Chamber, which the Republican members raised the significant cry: "Vive la Liberté."

It is reported that the Catholic missionaries in the province of Te-Chuen, China, with several hundred converts, have been massacred by the Chinese.

The Spanish Conscription law has been executed with comparatively little disturbance. The Cortes have rejected the proposition to declare the Roman Catholic faith the religion of the country.

The prerogative of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical is to be the subject of debate in the Cortes.

It is reported that the Spaniards have captured and executed the revolutionary Governor of Manzanillo, in Cuba.

The Russian Government is persevering in the line of moderate and judicious progress. The Council of State is devising means for enlarging the powers of the local municipalities, and the Press Laws are to be modified in a liberal sense.

From advices lately received it would appear that Lopez is being enthusiastically supported by his rebels, and that his cause is not so desperate as has been supposed.

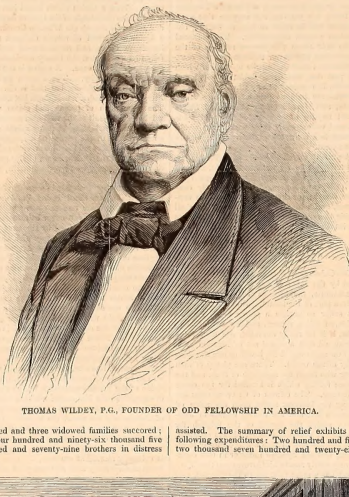
In the year 1850 Europe was estimated to consume 1,000,000,000 gallons of coal; in 1869 it consumes 2,111,111,111 pounds. In 1867 the consumption was reckoned at 1,500,000,000 tons, or more than double the former quantity.

THE "ODD FELLOWS" SEMI-CENTENNIAL.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the introduction of the Order of Odd Fellows into America was celebrated on April 26th throughout the country. But the grand celebration of this occasion took place in Philadelphia. A procession of members of the Order, estimated as numbering 25,000, in full regalia, passed through the principal streets to the Music Hall. Our illustration on this page shows this procession as it passed "Odd Fellows' Hall. This hall occupies the site of the old Abolition Hall, burned down a number of years since. Arriving at Music Hall, which was beautifully and expensively decorated for the occasion, a hymn was sung, and an oration delivered by HON. HENRY F. GAREY, of Baltimore, Grand Representative to the Grand Lodge of the United States. In referring to the pageant of the day he said: Our numbers and position fully justify this demonstration; we act directly upon a population of two millions; our territory equals the dimensions of the United States; our treasury and sub-treasuries have an annual income and expenditure exceeding revenues of duchies and principalities; we have archives in which our proceedings are recorded and preserved, and public printers who stereotype them for posterity. He then referred to the Order in 1819, after briefly passing in review other temporary events. On the 13th of April Messrs. JOHN WELCH, JOHN DUNCAN, JOHN CHEATHAM, and RICHARD RESHWORTH assembled at the dwelling of THOMAS WILDEY, in Baltimore, and arranged the preliminaries which resulted in the institution of Washington Lodge No. 1 on the 26th day of April, 1819. The name Odd Fellow was brought by them from England. English laborers and mechanics, meeting after the toils of the day, formed convivial parties, then personal friendships, and last by their payment of a penny a week provided for their poorer associates, especially to defray funeral expenses and provide for their widows and orphans. In February of the same year, when the body named Past Grands having assembled, the charter of Washington Lodge No. 1 of Maryland and the United States was surrendered to them, and the scattered fragments united for the common good. A table of statistics lately prepared exhibits the progress of the Order from 1830 to 1868, both included. Prior to 1830 no reliable record was kept of its proceedings, but subsequently a system was adopted to preserve its annals in official form. It appears from that record that in thirty-nine years, ending with September, 1868, six hundred and twenty thousand one hundred and six persons were initiated; fifty-seven thousand five hundred and three widowed families succored; and four hundred and ninety-six thousand five hundred and seventy-nine brothers in distress assisted. The summary of relief exhibits the following expenditures: Two hundred and fifty-two thousand seven hundred and twenty-eight dollars to educate orphans; one million six hundred and eighty-five thousand nine hundred and eighty-two dollars for the burial of the dead; and nine millions seven hundred and ten thousand nine hundred and ninety-eight dollars as benefits to brothers in misfortune, making the total paid for relief eleven millions six hundred and forty-nine thousand seven hundred and nine dollars, the whole revenue in that period being thirty-one millions two hundred and forty-three thousand eight hundred and thirty dollars.

A poem was read from the pen of BENJAMIN P. SHILLABER. After the closing of these exercises a levee was held in the hall.

We give, also, in this connection a portrait of THOMAS WILDEY, P.G., the founder of the Order of Odd Fellows in America. He was born in London, January 15, 1783, during the reign of GEORGE III. He received a limited education, and at fourteen was apprenticed to a trade. He arrived at Baltimore September 2, 1817. Here he instituted the Washington Lodge in 1819, the first lodge established in this country. He was for two terms Grand Sire of the Order. He died in 1861, and shortly afterward a magnificent monument was erected in Baltimore to his memory by the Order.



THOMAS WILDEY, P.G., FOUNDER OF ODD FELLOWSHIP IN AMERICA.

THE NATIONAL SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONVENTION.

ON the 28th of April the National Sunday-School Convention assembled in the First Baptist Church at Newark, New Jersey. The delegates, from all parts of the Union, numbered about six hundred at the opening session. The first Convention of this nature was held in New York in 1832. A second was held in Philadelphia in 1859. The third is the one alluded to in this article. In this Convention GEORGE H. STUART, of Philadelphia, was chosen President. A portion of the exercises were devotional; and a large number of addresses were made by the most prominent of the delegates present from this country, and also by reverend gentlemen from abroad.

It has been the custom for some time for women to press their claims upon every national convention, and it is not surprising, therefore, that upon the second day of the Convention the inevitable lady gained the stage. This was MRS. JEANETTE P. HEATH, of KANSAS. She mounted the platform and was presented to the audience amidst much cheering. She was dressed in deep black, and presented a face beaming with Christian charity and kindness. She spoke in a clear though tremulous voice, and said that she waited throughout the first day of the Convention ex-

SEMI-CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE "ODD FELLOWS," PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA—THE PROCESSION PASSING "ODD FELLOWS" HALL.
[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

THE CENTRAL REPUBLICAN JUNTA OF CUBA AND PORTO RICO IN SESSION AT NEW YORK CITY.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

peeting every moment to see some one pop up to represent Kansas, but looked in vain. Now she felt that somebody should say a word for that magnificent spot, and she felt diffident as well as joyful in being that somebody. She expressed her regret that women had not been selected as a part of that organization. HENRY WARD BEECHER also addressed the Convention in his usually happy style. He was followed by Rev. STEPHEN H. TYNG, Jun. In the evening session an address was delivered by ex-Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey. The Convention sat during three days.

CUBA.

THE situation in Cuba at the present moment is one which it is almost impossible to exactly comprehend. On the one side, taking the Cuban accounts, it would appear that the enthusiasm of the rebels was never greater than it is now; while the Spanish statements which we read make the cause of the insurgents seem absolutely hopeless.

It seems probable, however, that the Spaniards have really been gaining ground, and that the new reinforcements which they have received have told with great effect against the insurrection. We have hitherto alluded to the cruelty of the Spanish soldiery in their treatment of prisoners—whether political or those reduced to the last extremity on the battle-field. This general policy is still continued. Count VALMASEDA, commanding the Spanish forces in the Eastern Department, recently issued a proclamation ordering every native male over fifteen years of age found away from his residence without sufficient cause to be executed; every uninhabited dwelling and every inhabited dwelling not protected by the white flag to be reduced to ashes; and all women away from their houses to be brought by force to Bayamo or Jiguani.

These orders indicate two things: first, that such severity seems necessary on account of the persistence of the patriots; and, second, that the Spaniards are confident of their ability to enforce them, and have no fear of retaliation. But this severity elicits the sympathy of foreign nations, and thus helps prolong the rebellion. Mexico, through her Congress, has recently authorized President JUAREZ to recognize the Cubans as belligerents; and ere long, if the insurrection lasts, this course will be followed by the CUBAN PARTISAN RANGERS.

South American republics, and, perhaps, by our own government.

One of the illustrations which we give this week on page 309 shows the Central Republican Junta of Cuba and Porto Rico in council, in their rooms at the corner of Rector Street and Broadway, in this city. This Junta consists of a President, Secretary, etc., and is composed of twelve members. From this body emanates all authoritative power so far as New York city is concerned; it regulates the expenditure of funds, raises troops, prepares arms for the field, and issues all commissions. Branch societies are being organized in all our large cities.

Our other illustration represents a body of Cuban Partisan Rangers. Every where about them signs of the life out of the ground, like MARIUS's men in our Revolution. Many of those who have gone from this country to join the insurgent soldiers on the field of war, and have already gained distinction on Cuban battle-fields.

EMMA CZERNOWITZ.

By JUSTIN MCARTHY.

THE marriage of Edith Stanton to Henry Wigram was one of the grand events of a New York season. It took place at Grace Church; and so many people were anxious to be present that it was found necessary to limit the admissions strictly and rigidly to those who came provided with cards of invitation. If I had only a gift of brilliant description in the matter of ladies' dresses and fashionable ceremonials I might make quite a magnificent scene out of this gorgeous wedding. But I have no such gift, and if I were to attempt painting the picture I should be sure to illustrate it with my ignorance and stupidity. I should be describing ceremonies which never could have taken place, and clothing fair ladies in the most incongruous and impossible garments manufactured out of inconceivable materials. The bridesmaids of Cinderella's wedding would be intruding upon Grace Church, New York; and Edith Avenue belles would be likely as not to appear again in dresses which were going out of fashion in the younger days of Mary Wortley Montagu. To me the whole scene seemed just now a moving mass of flowers and lace and glittering gems and long hair. I think I was the finest thing I ever saw, except the transformation scene in a first-class London pantomime.

Edith Stanton was the daughter of a wealthy merchant who had made a great mansion on Murray Hill. Henry Wigram, the bridegroom, was the chief representative of a long-established Wall Street firm, whose numerous clerks had been building for his bride quite a new palace in Fifth Avenue. Yet he really was a good fellow, although he was a swell—as long as my friends admitted that; and his bride Edith was a very good girl. I believe these fashionable marriages do sometimes turn out well, although, of course, it is hard for us, poorer Christians, to admit such a possibility. Edith Wigram, at least, has thus far turned out well; but even if it did not, our chief concern just now is not with the bride and bridegroom, but with one of the bridemaids and the bride's brother.

Of course the eyes of all the ladies in the church were fixed for the greater part of the time on the bride. But I think the male spectators on such occasions are apt very soon to turn their attention to the bridesmaids. One of these—the one already alluded to—was well worthy of special attention. She was a tall, stately young woman, with a noble, Grecian outline of face, a white forehead, and a complexion of colorless, marble purity. Dark brown hair, short, thick, and curling, added to the striking appearance of her face and figure, and made her look like the beauties Diana, while the other bridemaids were a group, pretty little things—a pleasant girl, who reminded one somehow of a pouter pigeon. This latter was one of the ladies for whom I cared whenever she chose to be married, would bring her successful wooer a marriage portion fit for a Russian prince. But the other bridemaid was the living presentation of a marble Diana—was probably the poorest girl then standing under the roof of Grace Church.

Emilia Czernowitz was a Polish girl. Her father had been one of the exiles of the great insurrection of the year of generation, and had lived for many years in Paris, where Emilia and her mother had lately been trying to make a living by teaching the piano. When the Stantons met her this time Emilia's father was dead, and it so happened that while the Stantons were in Paris the poor girl was dead too. Then the Stantons, filled with kindness and pity, took bodily possession of the girl, and made her one of their family whether she would or not, and brought her off to the United States with them; and now she stood a sad and beautiful bridesmaid at the wedding of her dearest friend. Sad, in spite of her best efforts and her better self; sad, although she sincerely joined in the happiness of her friend; sad, because she could not but feel that life would no longer be the same to her when Edith had left the Stanton household. Emilia, an inmate of the household any longer Emilia had resolved that she would not and could not. Edith and her husband were going to Europe, and they would take Emilia with them, and, according to her own urgent wish, help her to settle in Paris or London and teach music in schools and play the piano at concerts. The Stantons had very much wished that, if she would insist on not earning her own living, she should do so in New York, where their friendship and influence could help her. But she was firmly resolved not to remain in New York, and it was therefore arranged that she was to go to Europe with the newly-married pair.

Paul Stanton was the bride's brother, who has already been mentioned. When the ceremony was over, and while the congratulations were pouring in and the crowd was gradually pouring out, he found his way to Emilia's side and whispered in her ear:

"Once more, Emilia—will you not change your purpose?"

"Impossible!" And he contrived to touch her hand appealingly.

She did not venture to look count at him, but kept her eyes fixed on the ground; and she spoke in words that sounded sometimes like French literally translated:

"No, M. Paul. Impossible that I should change."

"Then you will leave me?"

"I must leave you, M. Paul."

"But why—why Emilia? Do you not care for me?"

"Ah, Paul, you are cruel! Do not demand of me such a question!"

And the girl's eyes filled with tears.

"Then why leave me? Why persist in going away?"

"Because I will not be guilty of treason to your good and noble parents. Because you know they would be unhappy if you do not marry the rich Mademoiselle Vining" (the other bridesmaid), "and it would perhaps lead to a quarrel. When your parents and your sister took me by the hand—me, a poor orphan, homeless—and brought me to this country to take care of their family, did they believe I would repay them by robbing them of their son? No; and they had reason! Oh, Paul, I do not urge me any more—I must go, and I will!"

"Then that is your last answer, Emilia?"

"Paul, I pray you—"

"And we must part forever?"

"We must part—forever—or until we can meet as friends!"

She put out her hand gently to meet his. But he caught it and held it, almost crushing it, and turned away and lost himself in the crowd.

Paul Stanton was a young man of ardent, passionate nature, inclined to extravagance in every thing. When he threw his soul into business operations he did so with the energy worthy of Fisk of Erie. When he chose to spend money he spent it in a fashion that might have satisfied the late Marquis of Hertford. When he was for the first time in his life, he fell in love he loved with a genuine passion worthy of the grand old romantic times when a man would die for the unwithering of a whole life. Perhaps if Emilia had known how fervent and how enduring was the love he felt for her she would have found gratitude and duty to his family would have been strong enough to induce her to reject that love. But she had studied him but little, and knew him not in the deeper and stronger of the two, and that out her would fall the heaviest blow of remonstrance. So she held to her purpose, and she sailed for Europe.

It was quite true that there was an unspoken, common family understanding that Paul Stanton was to marry Miss Vining. The families were bound together by long and firm friendship, and the young man and woman had known each other from childhood. The very night after the departure of the ship that bore Paul suddenly sought out Sophia Vining, and asked her to marry him. She consented; the idea of refusing or even considering refusal had never occurred to her; and yet there was something strange, defiant, reckless in his manner, which made her ask herself that question which she never asked before, whether she really loved him; whether she was not rather afraid of him; whether she has done right in accepting him. "I will love you again," says the perplexed voter in Coriolanus; "but 'tis no matter!"

But this occurred some half dozen years ago. Paul had served with distinction in some of the earlier campaigns of the civil war, and had resigned his position on the staff of a rising regiment. He had returned from the field wounded, not long before his sister's marriage; and his family were then in great anxiety for his health and return to active service. But they soon began to wish that he had not been in such a hurry to resign, or engaged in any earnest honorable pursuit to which he could give his heart. For a complete change now took place in him. He became moody, fierce, capricious; he plunged occasionally into wild fits of an entirely unwonted dissipation; he took to living on his Southern plantation, and go for weeks and weeks campaigning in the Adirondacks, or hunting in the far Western prairie, or anywhere. His betrothed bride became alarmed at his ways, and heartily sick of the engagement; and at last she finally told her lover that she would not be his wife, she now believed she never had loved him—that she certainly did not love him now. And accordingly the two were formally released from all and there was a scandal; and people said Paul Stanton was a scoundrel, which he most assuredly was not—only a young man consumed by a love so genuine, deep, and passionate that in his wild way of life one day it was an utter unmanly and unchristian apparently and people no more sought for such an explanation of Paul's conduct than they would have looked for a human Stylites on Murray Hill, or a Savonarola in Grace Church, wherein I think people are much apt to blunder; for the one reality in life, outlasting all change, and unaffected by any chimes or condition, is human passion.

One day there came a letter from Edith Wigram, still in Paris:

"I am deeply sorry to tell you, mamma," said one passage in it, "that a new and great rebellion has broken out in Poland. You will wonder why I am specially sorry for this. Well, because Emilia Czernowitz has been seized with a madness which possessed others of her countrywomen here. They got up a great concert, under the patronage of Prince Napoleon and Count Walewski, in aid of the Poles: they raised money for the relief of the wounded; and now a dozen or more of them have actually gone off to Cracow, from which they intend to make their way to one of the insurgent camps and act as nurses, and all that sort of thing. Did you ever hear of such a proceeding? It is not like acting as nurses in our war, for they have no hospitals and no appliances—and no army, I am afraid, just now. And other unfortunate girls are sure to be captured; and they say the Russians are as cruel to women as they are to men! It is most shocking. Nobody could stop her. I said to her she would never return alive; and you should have seen the sad, and look on her face when she said to me, 'And if I do not want to return alive?' Indeed, I have long thought that for some reason or other she really wishes to die. I only wish you had been here. You might have prevented her; we could not."

When the letter was read to Paul he struck his hand heavily on the table, and exclaimed:

"There is one woman in the world who deserves to live, and she only wants to die! Mother, I loved that girl, and by Heaven I'll go to her!"

Next day Paul started on his New York-to-Cracow journey, leaving a farewell to any one save his father and mother. Not many days elapsed before he burst in upon his astonished sister in the room in which she was dressing for dinner. Then for the first time his sister learned the depth and power of his love. But she could not give him direct guidance toward the finding of Emilia. The Polish girl had gone to Cracow—that was all. "Good-by, sister now. Emilia has promised to write, but had not yet written."

Paul sped on to Cracow. He found the town literally overflowing with a new and intensely increasing population of enthusiastic Poles, phlo-Poles of all nationalities, strangers in search of adventure, newspaper correspondents, and all that miscellaneous indescribable mass of adventurers always to be found hovering on the "outskirts of battle." Perhaps it would be well to remind my readers that Cracow is in Austrian Poland; that Austria, in the early part of the present century, showed a strong inclination to wink at the mustering of rebels against Russia within her frontier, and that consequently there was a considerable time the rendezvous, camping-ground, and city of refuge of the insurgents. Gallant, reckless band of exiles, they marched out of Cracow and across the Russian frontier morning after morning, night after night. Decimated, defeated, blasted, broken, fugitives too often returned to seek a refuge there.

Paul could not discover any thing of Emilia in Cracow beyond the fact that a number of devoted young women were believed to have succeeded in joining one of the insurgent camps as nurses. Paul attached himself as volunteer to a little motley band made up of many nations, and set out to penetrate the frontier, and go in search of the insurrection. I purposely use the phrase "in search of the insurrection." There were no regular armies, and no pitched battles. There were little spouting fires of rebellion and battle here and there; when a flame was quenched in one place it broke out immediately in another and another spot. Perhaps in your first day's march you fell in with a rebel band, and took part in a skirmish fight with the Cossacks, which the newspapers of Paris described weeks after as a great battle, but which really was nothing more than a little act of bushwhacking. Perhaps, on the other hand, you wandered—I know men who did—for weeks and weeks in the dark, dismal recesses of the forests of the Kingdom of Poland, and never saw a camp-fire or heard a shot, and at last had to give up the futile chase overcome by hunger, and sadly struggle back to Cracow weary of limb and sick at heart.

Not so, however, with Paul. His star no doubt it was which led him at once to the warpath. He found fighting from the first, and his previous experience in the Civil War in the American forests was of much service to him. He did some skilful and daring reconnoitre things, and became quite a hero with the band to which he was chiefly attached. He had not found Emilia; he began to grow sick at heart over finding her; but he had a fierce, wild delight in the thought that his life was daily and nightly risked in the cause of her country.

One day the little band to which he clung was surprised, attacked, and scattered by a considerable body of Russians. Paul and several of his comrades were wounded and made prisoners. Many of the Poles were killed; the rest contrived to escape into the woods and mountains. Paul and his companions, very severely bleeding as they were, had to tramp along through miles of snow and ice in a frightful the Russians were preparing for a bivouac among the trees, when, to their utter amazement, a whole mass of insurgents, principally armed with the terrible scythe, swept down upon them. The Russians were cut up and driven every way, but of course the insurgents ventured on no pursuit, and Paul and his comrades were eagerly welcomed by the rebel band.

"You are wounded and tired," said one of those who spoke French fit for the Faubourg Saint Germain; "and I am glad we have fallen in with you. We have quite a tolerable encampment not far off—and you will have a welcome there, for we have all heard of the gallant American who has done so much for us. How long we shall be able to remain there Heaven only knows—and it is not for our cause only but our, helas, Heaven too can only tell. But you shall have at least a few hours' rest with us; and we are happy to have with us just now some brave Polish ladies who will see to your hurts, and nurse you while we are allowed to keep together."

The sudden wild excitement of hope which these last words produced was too much for Paul Stanton just then. He fell on the earth in a faint.

When he opened his eyes he was lying on a bed made of leaves and grass and a cloak or two, and Emilia Czernowitz was kneeling beside him and gazing down upon him.

We need not follow the flickering and fading fortunes of the rebellion. Even at this time it was utterly hopeless; and it was not long before the secret chiefs of the movement gave the word d'ordre for a general dispersing and sauve qui peut. Paul and Emilia were fortunate enough to meet again safely in Cracow—and they were married there, and he brought home his wife to a family in New York who had long mourned him as lost, and now welcomed him as if he were a son risen from the dead.

A MISSISSIPPI NIGHT.

ONE home was on the Louisiana or western shore of the great river, and the mansion was a mile or more from the negro quarters of the large plantation.

My husband was absent on business in New Orleans, and I had not returned from a prolonged rains of that autumn began. As the rain-storm was a general one, extending through States far to the north, the planter of Wilmer's began to rise with more than ordinary rapidity. From the upper porches and windows of the house I could actually see the rising waters of yellow water as it widened over the opposite Mississippi flats, where there was no levee. The quantities of drift-wood coming down, and the peculiar way in which the river seemed convex and clear of drift in the middle, while the apparently lower margins were thick with the spoils of the forest, showed me that it was still swelling to a higher rise, and was a veritable flood. That the stream is falling the sock of the lower current draws the drift to the middle, and keeps the portions next the shore quite clear. But the first time the main channel was only marked by the smooth, waveless rush of the muddy tide, and the ear caught only the sound of the relentless giant asking for its ocean bride. I at once summoned every available person on the estate, and made the details to work on fences at intervals on levee, so as to keep watch all night. Also directed the gangs with spades and axes to be ready for any breach on our side, or any call from the neighboring plantations. Every precaution seemed to have been taken which was necessary for safety. Low places had been carefully filled, places needed, and points where the current set with great power had been strengthened by felled timber. At sunset, just when the rain-fall ceased the wide upper veranda, I thought I saw what had happened in a moment. It was evident that the swollen stream had received some new accession of volume from some of its great upper feeders—perhaps from the Missouri, with its springs under the arches of the sunset. Then, coming down like a vast tidal wave, it had overleaped all artificial barriers. It was the crushing and splintering of the massive timber that made me think I had heard at first. Every where around me the moonbeams glittered on the ripples of the yellow water, while trees, buildings, and fences stood out of the shiny surface, and cast delicate shadows upon it. Every cloud had passed from heaven, and the serene blue, with its calm stars, was quiet and holy. The illumined water was beautiful, and indeed so grand and picturesque that I only felt mortified because my husband would know that the Mississippi had defeated his wife. The negroes who were at first inclined to crowding on the unbroken part of the levee, some mile above, and I could see their dark forms relieved against the glare of the fire from the building. As I saw the women and children and cattle, slowly moving up the broad embankment to safer ground, I felt that the negroes were less likely to occur, and so said to Aunt Sarah, who had silently joined me with a shawl. She looked at me a moment, and said, "You won't be scared?"

"No," said I, "for I should rather like it were it not for the loss to my husband, and the wetting to you. How did you get wet?"

She answered, "I went out wid a hoe when I see the ridge gittin up, but it come too strong, an' lake to washed me away. I couldn't find de horn to blow for de quarter peoples."

"You lonely old woman," said I. "Never try to mend a break by yourself. But as you are safe I don't mind the crevasse."

She was silent for a little while, and then said, "My lamb, dis is no crevasse; dis is a cut-off."

"Are you dreaming?" said I, with a laugh that was mixed with a vague terror.

She pointed to the timbered land back of the garden, where I could see that the ripples were of only two or three feet depth, that lay around the house changed to a deeper and more rapid current. "Look at dem trees beyon' sister," said she. "Dare, two of 'em goes down."

I felt my heart stand still, and my limbs tremble as I looked, and comprehended the truth. On each side of the swift path of the water the giant oaks, with their hoary beards of gray moss, were leaning together over the mid-current, as the spoke two went down with a splash. Perhaps a thousand years before that had been the old channel of the river. Some trifling raft of a million interlocked trees had checked the rush of some past flood, and the retarded waters had whirled away to cut a new channel around the elbow of some twenty miles. Centuries had passed—mould had covered the sand and mud on the right, and fresh, and redeemed from virgin mould from nature, had built his home, and gathered vast riches of golden fleeces, as Jason dreamed of. Now the autocrat river claimed its ancient bed, and swept down with its hoarse voice to the forest and the field. Our home stood directly in the old path, and the leaning and falling trees showed how terribly sure was the grim plow making its furrow. Nature had harnessed the Mississippi.

Aunt Sarah was perfectly calm as she said: "Now you is lucked enough. Get all de warm dresses an' jewelry an' some blankets, while I puts on dry close an' gets an axe."

"An axe," said I; "what for?"

"To prize up the porch floor an' make a raft, my precious. Dis house will wash away by daybreak."

I saw that too, and hesitation and delay were over. My husband's valuable papers were first secured, and then clothing, money, plate, and jewelry. By the time I had begun to roll up blankets Aunt Sarah was in warm, dry clothes, and I heard the crash, as her strong arm smote down doors and window-blinds, and soon began to cut and pry at the long, narrow planks of the veranda floor. I brought an iron bar from the tool-room on the first-floor, and by our united strength we overcame the tenacious nails, and stripped up board after board. A few blows on the lower ceiling made a hole, and we dropped them through, where they lay almost on a level with the water. I never knew before that I was so strong when excited, and the soreness and blistered hands were not thought of till the next day. Still it was my old nurse who thought of every thing, and talked to me in her queer way, as if I was still her child. There were some large and massive French bedsteads in the sleeping-rooms on the first-floor, and by our united strength we turned them edgeways and pushed them through the windows that opened to the veranda floor. While the stout old woman arranged the long boards across them, I was sent to the store of farm implements in the building, and told to bring every rope and plow-line and ball of twine I could find. These were abundant, and the boards were woven together like the bottom of a huge basket, and laced to the sides and ends of the bedsteads. Then we tied strong cords for cables, and rolled them off into the water. They dipped down and were wet, but that did not matter, so they floated again. We got the two side and side and securely fastened together; then doors and window-shutters were laid on or tied up for sides; and finally cotton mattresses were put on to keep us above the water. Then came trunks and blankets, and when we had all that it was safe to take, or that was at once small and valuable, we paused to see if our peril grew. The yard fence, not one hundred yards away, was leaning on the verge of some unseen gulf, and the oaks for half a mile wide were all gone. It was their splash we had heard as we worked. We had no oars, nor skill to use them if we had, and the best poles we could find for pushing were the long, slender canes used for fishing. Then came a supply of food and candles; and as the lull followed the heat and excitement of labor, the terror of the inexorable river and of our frail raft would come and make the heart sick.

We had no time to delay. By means of poles and ropes we managed to push and warp the clumsy raft around the corner of the house, and then tried to make it float up into the eddy, where the cut-off was not likely to follow us. We got a little ways, but the suck of the current was too strong for us. So we tied up to a crapemyrtle, and waited for the crumbling bank to reach us. The moon went down, and there were only the silent stars above the low monotone of the waters.

Silently we waited and prayed. We were warm and dry, as only the bottom mattresses became soaked. About daybreak of day the house began to lean. The negroes on the levee had retreated from the widening river, and their fires beat submerged. In an hour more the house slid slowly into the stream. We could hear the crash as the chimneys tore out of the timbers and sank, and then it floated away, shaking in the water, and little to be seen but the rent roof. Once or twice it grounded, or caught on snags in the bottom, and then hurried down out of sight. The power of the water was making fierce tugs at our hempen rope, and it was soon broken. Two or three times we slowly rotated in the side eddy, and then, as if caught by some unseen hand, we shot out into midstream. That was well for us, as we avoided the falling timber of the still widening banks, and also the worst of the hurrying drift. Steam would not have taken us faster, and in less than an hour, we, two women on a raft, were out on the broad bosom of the Mississippi.

The night was over, but not the peril. As our raft was buoyant we were only shaken, but not sucked down by the whirlpools. We had lights to prevent the danger of being run over by steamboats at night, and on that great highway we were sure of being soon picked up. There were barns, fragments of fences, and sometimes mills and small houses floating down; but it was noon before we saw any human being. Then a fine boat came breasting the current, and while we were half a mile away, in the dead water near a swamp, they saw our table-cloth on a cane, which was our signal. They took us for negroes, and, hailing us as such, bade us take care of ourselves, but made no pause. Sick enough at heart were we as the white jets of her steam escapes faded out of sight up the stream. There was a far prospect of floating all night near enough the swamp for snakes and wild-cats to swim to us, or of hurrying down the current to unseen perils. One such night as that would have seemed not to see our signal against the background of gray moss. I cried like a baby, and Aunt Sarah tried to console me. It was nearly night when a great steamer passed up on the other side, but the people turned to see us. Suddenly the roar of her whistle came across the mile of flood, and she slowly rounded toward us like a large white swan. She had to follow us a little down stream, but when salvation was sure I must have fainted. I think I was a little conscious of the jar as we touched her sides, and of being lifted by strong arms. The first I heard was a well-known and loved voice, saying, "Mary, my wife, don't you know me?" Faithful Sarah was dancing for joy, and telling every body of the providence which made the two ladies aboard, but she had the one which held my anxious husband. That was years ago.

Aunt Sarah received her freedom and that of her family, but has never left me. She is never more pleased than when she can gather children or grown people to listen to the marvels of a Mississippi night.

SUNSHINE.

LITTLE buds, little buds, toss your heads—
Toss your heads, little truculent buds!
Rise up, pretty lilies, look out of your beds,
And welcome the sunshine in floods!
How softly uncloses
Each innocent daisy!
Now roses, now roses!
You must not be lazy;
The beautiful sunshine
Is shining for you—
Unfurl your bright petals,
And laugh at the dew.

Hawthorn hedges, break out in a breath,
With your delicate bouquets of snow;
Start up, little thorns, with your promise of death,
Keep guard on the treasure below!
Their blossoms of beauty
The fruit-trees must scatter;
They've done their bright duty,
So what does it matter?
They laugh with delight,
As they flutter away,
To see little berries
Peep out at the day!

Royal sunshine, be trusty and true;
Pour your golden enchantment on all!
We spring into life for the worship of you—
Be ready to answer our call!
No whimsical hiding,
No clouds fling before you:
'Tis you we take pride in,
'Tis we must adore you!
What creatures would scatter
Their beauty and grace,
For a king who refuses
A glimpse of his face?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE MARKETS.—Ladies' Hair has an upward tendency!

FOR PAWNBROKERS.—When you "pop" the question is it necessary to pledge your truth?

On the feet of an Irish pig he called hog-trotters?

A New Hampshire man told a story about a flock of crows three miles long, and no thick you could not see the sun through it.

"Don't believe it," was the reply.

"Wa'al," said the narrator, "you've a stranger, and I don't want to quarrel with you; so to please you I'll take off a quarter of a mile in the thinnest part."

A Trinity College (Dublin) man was talking the other day upon the small value attached to life by uncivilized nations. Somebody remarked that in China, if a man were condemned to death, he could easily hire a substitute to die for him. "Ah, yes," said T. C. D., "I believe many poor fellows get their living by being substitutes that way."

"Wake up here and pay for your lodging," said a deacon, as he nudged a sleepy stranger with a contribution box.

A DEBATE ON THE CONSTITUTION.—A consultation with a physician!

A lady living in Louisville has a husband who snores. She keeps a clothes-pin under her pillow, and when his snoring awakes her she puts it on his nose, then sleeps in peace.

There is no harm in a glass of whisky—if you allow it to remain in the glass.

THE PERILS OF OFFICE.

FAYMALE SUFFRAGE.

BY DENNIS O'SAFFEETY.

Och, be it a baste who opposes the right
Of a female to vote whichiver she plazes;
For mesilf I look forth to the day wid delight,
When the polls will appear like a meadow of daisies.

I said to me Kathleen, when from the convintion
She came wid a beautiful smile on her face,
"It's soon be a lady, and ivery attendin,
Bo shown yees by those who have power and place.

Mrs. Gumphaw thin on yerself will be dotin,
And axin yees up to her house, never fear;
And thin in her carriage, when bymales are votin,
Yell sit by her side, coz I'll be there, me dear.

It is said that this life, afther all, as a bubble,
But wot so to me, a thrue son of the sod,
For the years have been joyous, and free from all throubles,
While mixin the mortar and carryin me hod.

And I am not jealous, oh no, not at all,
But welcome from Erin each young-minded daughter,
To climb up the ladders and walk on the wall,
And share all the joys of the brick and the mortar.

"It pay face dirty?" remarked a young lady to her aunt while seated at the dinner-table on a steamboat running from Cairo to Memphis. "Dirty? No. Why did you ask?" "Because the insulting waiter insists upon putting a towel beside my plate. I've thrown three under the table, and yet every time he comes round he puts another one before me."

When a promotee is binding, is it Russia Leather or Morocco?

Adam and Eve escaped two serious annoyances of modern times: in the first place, they had no mamma to make judicious inquiries as to Adam's social position and prospects of patrimony; and Adam had no "governor" to see that he did not throw himself away on a portionless girl.

A KIND HUSBAND.—A lady who was suffering under a slight toothache one day, intimated to that it was with the greatest difficulty she could breathe, and the effect shortened her exceedingly. "I wouldn't try, my dear," soothingly responded the husband.

"Bolles" call a great many people to church.

PROGRESS OF CHILDHOOD.—From pap to paps.

A couple ran off to get married, and came back to the bride's house, where she humbly sued for the forgiveness of her parents, kneeling at the foot of the stairs. "Forgive, forgive me, dearest father?" sobbed the lovely supplicant.

"Forgive you?" exclaimed the old gentleman, "why, I am only too glad to get rid of you. Your industry and idleness have been the plague of my life, and make your marriage no loss to me, my dear child. So take her," added the old gentleman, generously addressing his happy man; "and may you be happy!"

When in Aberdeen, Dr. Johnson dined with a clergyman, the soup being "broth-pooh." The lady of the house, after having served him once, asked if he would take some more. The gruff and stern moralist and outspoken social bear replied, "I'll eat a fish for hope, Madam." "Take a little more, then," was the immediate and appropriate reply.

A SHORT STORY,

IN VERSE, WITH ONE WORD TO FIVE HYMNS.

By the side of a murmuring stream,
An elder gentleman sat;
On the top of his head was his wig,
And a-top of his wig was his hat.

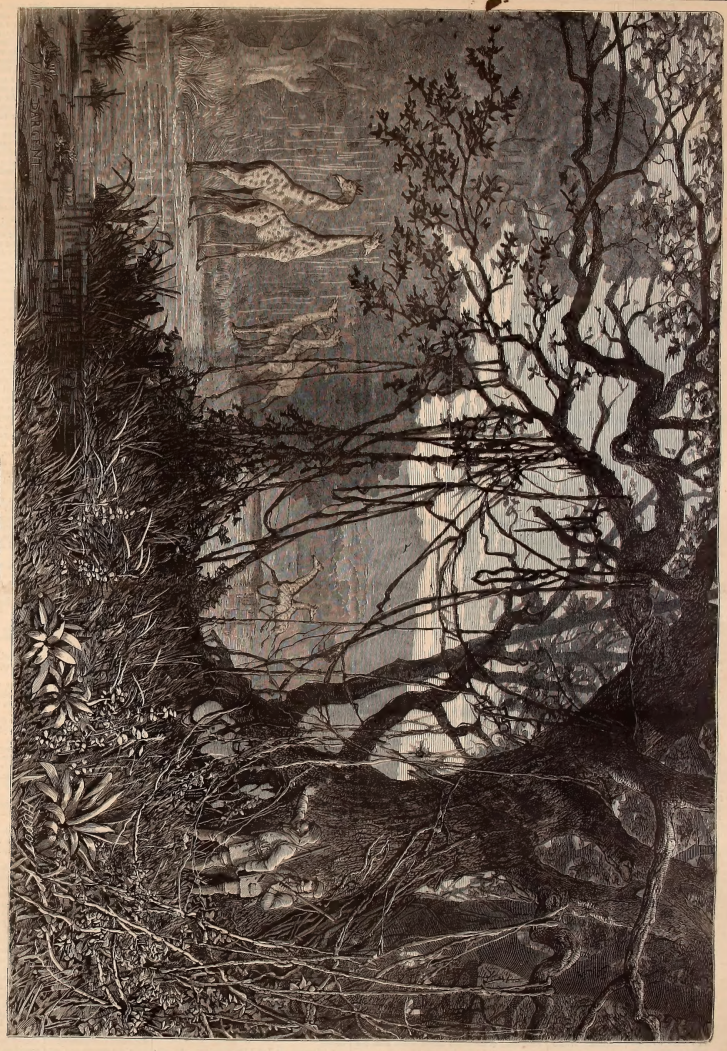
The wind it blew high and blew strong,
As the elderly gentleman sat;
And it tore from his head in a trice,
And plunged in the river his hat.

The gentleman then took his cane,
Which by by his side as he sat,
And he dropped in the river his wig
In attempting to get out his hat.

His breast it grew cold with despair,
And full in his eye sadness sat;
So he flung in the river his cane,
To swim with his wig and his hat.

"Do you say your prayers regularly, my child?" said a clergyman to a little girl who was blacking the shoe-black to whom she had just given a penny. "I allus says 'em at night, mum, but any how they can take care of himself in the day-time," was the little rogue's reply.

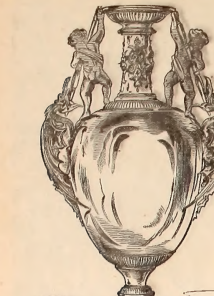
SOROSIS, 1869.—[Drawn by Charles G. Bush.]



HUNTING THE GIRAFFE.

HUNTING THE GIRAFFE.

THE Giraffe, or Camelopard, was until quite recently a mythical animal which travelers described in the most extraordinary language, giving it the robe of the tiger, the head of the stag, the neck of the swan, and a marvelous height. The giraffe is of African origin. It roams in the Abyssinian wilds in herds numbering from twelve to forty head. The characteristics of this singular animal, which in some particulars appears to participate in the qualities of the camel, the ox, and the antelope, are these: the lip, not grooved, is covered with hair; the tongue is so long that it has sometimes been likened to the elephant's trunk; the neck also is of great length; the tail is elongate, with a tuft of thick hair at the end. The horns are not hollow like those of the ox, nor are they like those of the stag, which are solid and annually renewed; but they are bones, covered with a hairy skin and terminating in a ring of bristly hair at the summit, surrounding a bare apex. The eyes are beautiful, extremely large, soft, and brilliant, and are so situated that the animal can see not only in front but upon all sides, and even behind itself. Its great length, added to the height of its fore-quarters, enables the giraffe to feed upon the succulent leaves and twigs of trees, as well as upon the vegetable products of the soil. It is a timid animal, but wary and not easily overtaken. It easily outdistances its natural enemies, but is unable to withstand such a hunter as Captain GORDON CUMMING. By its kicking it will tire out and discourage even the lion, though it is not proof against a Spencer rifle. It seems almost cruel to kill the giraffe, which is so unprofitable as game, and which is so beautiful and so harmless. Even after he has been stricken, let the hunter descend from his horse and stroke his head, and the dying animal will look upon him not only without resentment, but with even an expression of gratitude for the kind attention. Representations of this animal are found on ancient Egyptian monuments. It was exhibited by JULIUS CÆSAR in the Circus Maximus, and was a frequent spectacle at the cruel shows of Rome. There are no such deficiencies or malformations in the giraffe as BUFFON asserts that there are. On the contrary there is the most extraordinary adaptation of all its parts to the peculiar sphere which it holds in creation.



TESTIMONIAL VASE PRESENTED TO MR. THOMAS NAST BY THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB OF NEW YORK CITY, APRIL 19, 1869.

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

TURNER SNUFFS THE SEA WIND.

The neighborhood was aroused, and there were six engines in the lane. The parish engine, anxious to exert itself against the office engines, played upon the house for a little time, and then stopped and driveled into imbecility. The other engines went home smoking pipes, and wondering why they had been sent for when there was no fire. The policeman had come to see what was the matter, and had been promptly turned out by Rebecca. The lane had gone to bed, on the theory that Mr. Turner had been took by his conscience in the night, and had rung the bell for prayers. There were more unconscious lies told that night than there are twice a year, and in the midst of it all Mr. Turner lay, severely wounded through the deltoid, and Rebecca minding him.

She had got singularly emphatic all of a sudden.

"I, you don't want a doctor from here?"

"No. All this must be kept quiet."

"You will die if you don't have one. Will you let me bring you to Limehouse?"

"That is the best," he said, "good girl. We must take the safe."

"Lor bless you, yes, dear pa. We will take that fast enough. Bother the safe, I wish it was chucked in the water. You will have to move in an hour, pa."

"I wish I was well out of it," said he, "with the safe."

"You will be well out of it directly," she said. "Keep quiet."

She ran down to livery stables near by, and ordered a fly, to take her father away in half an hour's time. It was there punctually, and she hurried him in.

She had tied every thing she could find tight round his deltoid, and it is not a very difficult wound to stanch. He was very quiet, in that lethargic state which comes from loss of blood, and he cared nothing about any thing.

She looked back on the old house until they turned the lane. And she said, "There is an end of that, thank Heaven." He did not care at all. "Where are you taking me?" he said once.

"Limehouse," she answered. "9 Pilot Wharf. Keep quiet, or the hemorrhage will come on again."

"Where is Morley?" he asked, as they were going along Bird Cage Walk.

"At sea," she said. "Keep quiet. Every thing depends on your keeping absolutely quiet and trusting implicitly to me. Your wound is a severe one, and will be shortly followed by fever. You must be perfectly quiet."

When they were passing Tower Hill he said, "You are a brave, good girl, Rebecca. Where did you get courage?"

"From Hetty," said Rebecca.

"Where did you see her, then?" said Mr. Turner.

"I have never seen her," said Rebecca, "and I don't suppose I ever shall. But she is Alfred's daughter. And I have made a daughter for Alfred who I suppose does not exist at all."

"Talk to me, darling," said Turner. "My own Rebecca, talk to me, for my wound is aching, and I am going to die. Let me hear you talk. What do you conceive about this Hetty?"

"Give me your wounded arm, father, and put it over my breast; lay your head on my breast: and if you keep quite quiet I will tell you what I have imagined Hetty to be. If I am wrong, do not undeceive me.

"Hetty had no mother. Some girls have none. I had none.

"Hetty was a radical and a dissenter in her heart. For no person is a radical or a dissenter except from sentiment."

The wounded man said, "Radicals and dissenters form their opinion on pure reason."

"Hold your tongue, pa, or I will knock you. Hetty found herself, as a radical and a dissenter, with her hand and foot, by radical and dissenting bye-laws. And she broke them."

"And we all wished she had burnt at the bottom of Jordan when she did so," said the wounded man.

"But she was right in what she did, pa."

"No she wasn't," said he. "She is one of the most thundering fools on the face of the earth. I never heard of her having any good that a coster-monger's wife could not have done. She has smashed her father's connection in our sect, and driven him abroad, for which you have to thank her; because I am going to die, and you will be all alone until he comes back."

"But she is good," said Rebecca.

"Many fools are," was the only reply she got.

Hetty had been tried as a subject of conversation, and had utterly failed. Their silence toward one another was barely become oppressive, when they were at Morley's house.

Very few words were necessary from Rebecca to tell her story. Turner knew her at once. Mr. Morley's landlady was easily aroused, and it was bright summer morning, with the river gayly dancing on among the ships toward the sea, when Mr. Turner stepped out of his carriage and looked about him.

"Hush!" he said. "It is good for us to be here. What a lovely place to die in!"

"To get well in, I think you mean, father," said Rebecca.

"No I don't," said he. "There is but little business left me to do. That done I will go to sleep. I am sick of it all."

CHAPTER XXIX.

PILOT TERRACE.

A TIME now came which Rebecca has separated from all times in her life. Such a time may come again, she says, but it will not be this.

Ceaseless activity and care, ceaseless employment, ceaseless anxiety, ceaseless thought for others. A strange mixture of melancholy waiting for death and for life.

And all about and around, golden summer weather, bright water, passing ships, distant Kentish hill-sides basking in the sun. The tomb at Waltham Green had given up its soul so long imprisoned there, and it had escaped not to useless silence, but to anxious usefulness.

As I saw him fading away, day after day before my eyes, I loved him more and more, but, believing that he was going to his God, I do not think I was unhappy. I do not think I could be unhappy under any circumstances at Pilot Terrace.

The girl was not talking nonsense when she said this. Indeed in her nature was a love for brightness and motion, without which she was petulant and unbearable. Unbearableness either are one of the few things which are absolutely certain; in the greatest number of instances the sire sets his seal upon the race, and in the case of a very strong will in the mother she may compete with her mate in the formation of characteristics. Rebecca's mother, coming of a race by which had been used to light gayety and music for centuries, had left this waste with Rebecca as her legacy—in the fortune on which she was to be the sole heir-able prison at Waltham Green. In addition to this precious legacy of her mother's, she had got her Sicily nature not only from the transmutation, but the vice, obstinacy (as Carry well knew). And, furthermore, in addition to it all she had got—God knows where, I do not—some bright, clear spark of the divine nature, which made her very errors and indiscretions lovely.

Poor child. What if she ran away to Ramsgate, thereby violating a law never mentioned so far south as, and of course unrecognized of in, Philistia: she was very sorry afterward, and she took her most discreet and excellently beloved old nurse. Poor old Rebecca, when she found her duty ready to her hand she did it. Have we all done so?

She wanted light and beauty. She had seen dimly in old time the Popish worship with her mother; and up to the time when she had run away to Ramsgate and the Kursaal, that was the only beautiful thing she had seen. There was movement, light, brightness of color: the tinsel is as good as the gold to a child. She had dimly recollected it, in the long hours of Puritan seclusion at Waltham Green. How could the Puritan brothers, will you make religion hideous to one-half at least of your children? Think, in these days, when the nation is becoming educated to a rough love of light and beauty, what mischief you are doing, not to us, but to yourselves.

Rebecca says that the first pretty thing she knew when she was grown up was young Hartop the sailor. She always declares to Hetty that she was desperately in love with Hartop for a week, and that he used her disgracefully. However, Rebecca was worthy of seeing something more than a pretty sailor. She was capable of understanding real beauty, of the very highest form.

Mr. Morley. I would have made Mr. Morley a duke if I could, only for the simple fact that he was a dissenting minister, and considered unsound and unsafe even in that capacity. How many times that brown sailor-like face, that grizzled hair, and those steady brown eyes had passed before Rebecca's retina, before they were fixed on it forever, I do not know. But they were fixed there firmly enough now.

He was the first man, practically, who had ever introduced her to real light and beauty. She might have loved Hartop, but Hartop was for Hetty, and with her keen intellect she quickly found out this. That Hartop, brave, glorious, beautiful, was not so brave or so glorious as brown-faced Mr. Morley, with the slightly grizzled hair. "I would not change with Hetty," she said.

However, he was at sea, and she was all alone, and her father was dying, and she declares that she was not unhappy at this gaunt time, which lasted long. She makes my explanatory soirées quite good enough for a well-told story.

She did well in every detail now. Quick, keen wits, once roused to love, seem to do without experience almost magically. The higher nature seems to descend to the level of the lower, intellect is subservient to instinct, Cupido by Eros. (A thinking friend of the writer says that I am utterly wrong, and that the love of the child for the parent is reflected. I give him this opportunity of adding to the amount of human knowledge.) Love and sympathy supplied experience. And Sisters and trained nurses had had a conference with Gamp and Prig, they could have done no more for Mr. Turner than Rebecca did, with all her hints about details to the landlady.

I resume my story. She put his bed in the bow-window so that he could see the river and the ships. The landlady saw after him while Rebecca went out in the early morning until she could find a doctor. There were a dozen doctors close by, and the landlady recommended her to one, and Rebecca fetched him up.

He put a head out of window, and said:

"What do you want?"

And Rebecca said, "He won't do. Pa would never stand him."

Then she was going to pull at the bell of the next door but one, when it was suddenly opened, and a fat gentleman of fifty said to her, "Th[illegible] advertisement said four o'clock, and it is half past. Come in." And she marched off; and thought, "You won't do, my gentleman."

"Bother the doctors," she said. "I wish—I beg your pardon, sir," for she had run up against a queer little man with one leg shorter than the other, coming round a corner.

"Go on with the wish," he said, waving her off, "you most ridiculous and incautious young woman. I am one saturation of scarlet-fever from head to foot, and, before attending a scarlet-fever case, and I have pulled my pretty ones through. There are between eighty and ninety thousand people on your fine velvet cloth at this moment; chuck it over your little sister's bed to keep her warm, and then say it was me."

"You will do," said Rebecca, emphatically.

"Well, I suppose I am," said the little gentleman; "what do you want?"

"Pistol wound."

"My friend, murder!" he said, turning his queer shrewd little face up to hers.

"Sir," she answered.

"Ho!" he said. "Has! aristocratic, or long shore?"

"Neither. But mysterious."

"Young man?"

"No, but faint," said Rebecca.

"Ha! I'll get these fever clothes off and come directly. What is the house?"

"9 Pilot Terrace."

"Morley's? Yes, quite so. You are Miss Turner. I warned Morley that he was flying his kite too high. I told him that there would be bloodshed if he sought a wife among the Aristocrats. All my words have come true, you see. Well, you are a wise young lady in choosing him. I am a Romanist myself: Doctor Sloop, you know [illegible]. Don't know your secret; of course not. I knew they would shoot some one over you."

"This has nothing to do with me," said Rebecca.

"Of course not," said Dr. Barnham. "Lord bless you, we know. Of course not. Bless you! call us Jesuits at one moment, and deny us common knowledge of each other at another. I'll change my fever clothes and come in."

The whole story of Mr. Turner's pistol wound was carefully explained to Dr. Barnham by at least three people; but he never believed it. He only said, "Yes! yes! quite so. We are men of the world, we Catholics."

But Barnham was a great acquisition to them. He treated Mr. Turner with great skill and bonhomie, and the little man, who had waited for his coming. Both men were intensely in earnest; Barnham a violent ultramontane, Turner a violent Protestant. They used to argue furiously, the Bishop of Rome was alternately the old man of Rome or Mr. Turner's side, and something which one does not care to write about another human being on Dr. Barnham's. These two gentlemen used mutually to assure one another of the utter impossibility of the other's ultimate salvation; in a way which I dare not produce, not believing that God's mercy depends on a few details, as these men did. But they liked one another better in the midst of their quarreling: and this quaint little Romanist was one of the brightest things in their new short life.

Turner would be in the bay-window, looking at the ships going to and fro, and would invent arguments against the doctor. And he would say to Rebecca, "Come, old girl, give a hand next time, and we will smash him, and put an end to him."

And Rebecca would laugh, and cower down by her father, and say, "I won't say one word against him. And you know that you love him in your heart."

He was indeed the only educated friend they had. Mr. Turner was quietly falling away day after day, and finding his time getting short, he wrote notes to several people calling on them to come.

Lord Ducetoy was the first. "How de do, my lord?" said Turner. "I have summoned up the phantom."

CHAPTER XXX.

LORD DUCETOY'S PROPOSALS.

HERE first she began to learn the artistic value and beauty of tones, crossed indefinitely by other tones; perfect harmonies, and sometimes without incident. At times of the night when the tide was even brimming full, and she was watching she would open the window, and hear the sounds of the river, all mitigated into one, and assisted by the dull under-tone of the city. At first, in her ignorance and her sleeplessness, she had thought that the city was the sea; and that the eternal crawling hum, waxing and waning as the night was the raising of the breakers upon the shore; but Lord Ducetoy, standing in the balcony with her one evening, hinted at it, thinking on, and pointed out her mistake.

"But water runs down hill, my lord; and the river runs the other way."

"My fair cockney cousin, do you not notice that it runs the other way sometimes?"

"I never do so. Her beloved sea was farther off than she thought, and it was silent to her. He was right. She had mistaken the music of the land breeze for the dim, far-heard melody of the free sea.

"Do you ever sail upon the sea, my lord?" she said.

"Not at present, my lady," he answered. "Your good father has given me the means of keeping a yacht, and when the king has his own again perhaps you will sail with me. Have you heard from Mr. Morley?"

"No my lord. Nor from Harton of Navy, either. I am all alone, with my father."

"Except for me," he said.

"Except for you," she answered, looking straight at him; "exactly. It is very kind of you to come here and see us."

"Now, Rebecca, I want to have a serious talk with you. I shall offend you deeply, I know; but a man must speak what is in him, or—"

"Hold his tongue."

"Exactly. I am not going to hold mine. Rebecca, do you know that I love you heartily?"

"I thought you did, and I am very glad. I suppose there is not the wildest chance of my return of love, Lord Ducetoy?"

"Not if you go to the South Sea Islands. But, Rebecca, do you love me?"

"Very much indeed."

Dead stop. Rebecca stood and looked at him. "You see, I don't know how to begin."

"Well, then, don't begin," said Rebecca. "No one wants you to."

"Yes, but you don't know. I have a great personal admiration for you, and I am your cousin, and I think you in a monstrously unusually odd fellow, one of the most splendid creatures, and one of the most admirably formed ladies I have ever seen. You see, cousin Rebecca, I am under terribly great obligations to you for your gallantry. I don't know what your father has done with the money, but he offers me, for one thing; what money shall you have when you marry Mr. Morley?"

Rebecca gave a gasp of relief; she was afraid that he was going to talk some sentimental nonsense. "I don't suppose we shall have any," she said. "Hagbut has drained away pa's cash for Carry's settlements. I should have liked to take him some, but I shouldn't."

"I don't understand. Did Lord Ducetoy.

"Can't you see that, cousin? I should like to take him some money, because I want him to have money for his works and his charities, for which he lives. Yes I should also like to go to him, cousin, saying, 'You chose me, and here I am, without one penny. Will you take me still?' And he would. And he would love me better without the money than with it. For if I had all Carry's money it would only be a cloud between us. He, the noblest man in all England, has scattered just about little me all his my indiscretions and errors, above all women in the world. And I would sooner go to him in forced pauperis. You are talking to an attorney's daughter, you know."

"But Rebecca, do you mean to say that you would sooner marry a mere dissenting clergyman without money than with? It is totally incredible to me why you should marry him at all; but without the power over him which money could give. Are you mad?"

"Not in the least. When you find in your order as fine a gentleman as George Morley I shall be glad to hear from you."

"He must be a conceited puppy."

"Of course he is," said she. "There is another exception coming to plague us. Stop and see the other coming, and then finish what you were going to say."

"Well, Rebecca, I only wanted to know this. If money should run short with you, will you accept some from me?"

"Certainly," said Rebecca. "I am very much obliged to you. Some of your money may come in very useful, if ja has been drawn dry by him, and if we have not got any of it. We should be very glad of some of yours under those circumstances."

"A few thousands," began Lord Ducetoy.

"Thousands!" said Rebecca, laughing. "If you can find us £100 some day, it is quite as much as we are fit to be trusted with. Don't give George Morley more. He would only give it away. Tell me. Is this offer of money all you were going to say to me when you began?"

"It was all, indeed."

"Bless me, I thought you were going to talk nonsense to me. Now we are, my boy."

"I assure you, Rebecca, that I had not the least intention of doing so."

"Quite sure?"

"I am not quite sure that you are sane in dreaming of marrying Mr. Morley. Comu, you are the very last person on the face of the earth that I would dare to talk nonsense to. How Mr. Morley got into his present position with you I don't know. I would not have dared to say as much as he has dared. Cousin, I only wanted to try and help you, and you are so very quaint and emporte that I had to beat about the bush. It was a little in love with you once, but I have quite got over any little sentimental feeling of that sort."

They had come into the upper room out of the balcony by this time, and she said, as she flung down your head, my lord." And he bent it down to her and she kissed him, saying, "You are a good man, cousin, and we understand one another."

And if any one thinks she was wrong, I happen to disagree with them.

Since Eve kissed her first-born (unfortunately for the illustration, Cain, I believe, unless some new state papers have been grubbed out at Fetter Lane or Simancas to the contrary) no purer kiss was given or received than Rebecca gave to Lord Ducetoy. And how Lord Ducetoy, knew it.

"Now let us come down stairs," she said. "You have spoken well for Mr. Morley as a discerning matron. As if they were in all ways, as if you Nobles were all alike." And she gave illustrations. "Come and see what I have escaped, will you?"

CHAPTER XXXI.

BREAKING WINDOW.

What do young men break windows? Some do it to get locked up; but I do not mean them. Why do people who do not want to be locked up at all habitually break windows? We break windows? Every one. You, and I, and Rebecca. You and I are wise people, and hold our hands from breaking, unless we can get something by breaking it. Now Rebecca was a fool, and never could keep her hands off a window. Morley said she was nearly as bad as Lucy.

There is something very exasperating to a certain kind of mind in a smooth square of plateglass. One's fingers demand much, the only demands what nature will give, at any point, at any time of the year, Half and quarter time, melting into one another, yet making a great harmony, and an "arrangement," as great as Turner's Heidelberg. That was all Rebecca wanted, though she had never seen it, and could not tell you exactly what she did want. She knew, however, that plate-glass with gas behind it exasperated her. So she was given to window breaking.

One sure she had never learned the subtle, interminable delight and beauty of half tints. It is not true. She had learned it from Mr. Morley's grizzled head and brown face. And now she came down stairs with Lord Ducetoy, of the prairies, thinking about Morley of the sea: of men with a considerable number of half and quarter loves about them: and she found Hagbut and Carry, plate-glass and gas. A window, a bald, ill-favored head, a blow instantaneously broke it, with the first stone she could find—and you can generally find a stone if you stoop down.

It was very much of her. I offer no defense. I am not bound to carry a heroine through every thing. Still Hagbut and Carry, sitting in a row, drinking tea and smiling, were not calculated to make any one the less petulant.

"Where have you been, Rebecca?" said her father.

"Up stairs, with Lord Ducetoy."

"Did you hear Mr. Hagbut come?"

"Yes, I heard him."

"Where were you?"

"In the upper passage, kissing Lord Ducetoy."

"Becky, old girl," said Mr. Turner. "Don't say such things."

"Why not? You ought to tell the truth, ought you not? And I was kissing Lord Ducetoy on the stairs."

Hagbut said, very quietly, "For my part, not being a gentleman myself, I am uneasy in the company of even an ordinary gentleman, still more so in the company of a nobleman. However, by your confession of having kissed his lordship on the stairs, my elephantine awkwardness is somewhat easier to bear. About the outrageous impropriety of this thing happening at all, and of Rebecca telling about it afterward, I say nothing. But from all I can hear, two very good people have kissed one another, and are not ashamed of it either."

Lord Ducetoy laughed aloud. "It was her, you know, Podre, mind that. She kissed me in the passage. You believe me, I am sure."

"My lord, I am bound to believe the word of any hereditary legislator, the more particularly in this case because I am perfectly certain that you would never have obtained the favor on your own account."

Carry sat utterly aghast. Lord Ducetoy had kissed Miss Rebecca, and Hagbut was and making fun of it. Her husband was laughing, and Becky and Lord Ducetoy were smiling. She began to cry.

Hagbut did not attend to her at first, for his eyes were fixed on Mr. Turner. He turned suddenly on Carry and ordered her to run for the doctor.

"Rebecca, look at your father," he said, "Good heavens and earth! I can't be all while we have been chattering nonsense here. Go away, Rebecca, go and fetch the landlady, or the surgeon, or the doctor, or somebody. My lord, things have gone wrong here. Are you afraid of death?"

"Is he dead?" said Lord Ducetoy.

GENERAL PATRICK HENRY JONES

POSTMASTER NEW YORK CITY.

General Jones, the new Postmaster of New York city, is an Irishman by birth. Twenty-five years ago he came to this country with his father. He was then a lad of ten years of age. He served with gallantry in the late civil war, entering the service as a private in the Thirty-seventh New York Volunteers in May, 1861. He was soon elected second-lieutenant by his company, and from this rank he was successively made first-lieutenant, then to the post of major of the regiment, and in October, 1862, to the rank of colonel, assuming command of the Third Brigade and Fifty-fourth New York. He went through all the campaigns under Pope and Burnside, up to the battle of Chancellorsville, where he was badly wounded and taken prisoner. On his recovery he managed to get out of the hands of the rebels, and was sent with his regiment to the Western army, then operating under Sherman. He participated in the campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and by his soldierly coolness and bravery that he was recommended by Generals Hooker and Howard for promotion to the position of Brigadier-General. President Lincoln, on receiving these recommendations, immediately telegraphed General Sherman to know by what authority Colonel Jones assumed the command, and General Sherman replied that it was one eminently proper to be made, on account of his gallant conduct on the field. Accordingly he was made a full Brigadier-General, which position he held throughout the war, participating from that time in all the campaigns of General Sherman. He resigned his military rank June 15, 1865. The same year he was elected Clerk of the Court of Appeals on the Republican ticket, and served his official term. In 1868 he was appointed by the Governor to the Registership of New York, to fill the unexpired term of General Charles G. Halpine. He was succeeded in this position by the present incumbent, Colonel Connolly. The proceeds of this office, after defraying expenses, he paid over to the widow of General Halpine. He was also made an Interpreter before the war, is a lawyer by profession, and was Governor Fenton's law partner before the breaking out of the Rebellion.

HON. THOMAS H. NELSON,

MINISTER TO MEXICO.

Hon. Thomas H. Nelson, of Indiana, recently appointed Minister to Mexico, is a native of Mason County, Kentucky, and is about forty-five years of age. He is a grandson of Judge John D. Nelson, and of the late General William Nelson of the United States Army. He removed early in life to Rockville, Indiana, and subsequently to Terre Haute, where he still resides; and in this latter place has for more than twenty years been prominent in politics, in law, and, since 1861, in the diplomatic service of the country. Prior to the war he was known as a strong Unionist as an advocate and debater of great address and power in his own and other Western States, as well as one of the friends of Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln, of the national Republican party. Upon the accession of the latter to the Presidency, Secretary Seward of Mr. Nelson, always his friend and often his legal opponent, to represent this Government as its Minister to Chili. The historical years—from 1861 to 1866, during which Mr. Nelson occupied this position—were freighted both in the United States and Chili with occurrences which at once gave scope to and demonstration of his activity, fidelity, and abilities. Though convulsed by internal rebellion, the Federal Government held claims of large amount against Chili. These Mr. Nelson pressed with such clearness and force as to secure their immediate and full payment; and at the same time so ably represented the issues in controversy in this Republic that Mr. Lincoln was constrained to declare that the Government and people of Chili were the staunchest friends when the Union was threatened.

During Mr. Nelson's incumbency of this Mission, and while he was President of the Diplomatic Corps at Santiago, occurred the war between Spain and Chili, and to the American Embassador more than to any other was due the latter country attribute the correct understanding of, and consequent sympathy with, its own side of the struggle which contemporary governments displayed. His dispatches to the State Department are thoroughly American in tone, and are graphic in their delineation of grave events and interests which came under his attention. Upon his return home in 1866 Mr. Nelson at once threw himself into the memorable canvass in behalf of the Fourteenth Amendment, and spoke, from Kentucky to Kansas, to immense crowds of people. Unanimously elected to head the Republican electoral ticket last year in Indiana, Mr. Nelson, "as is the custom of the country," canvassed and spoke in nearly every county in the State, until it was triumphantly carried for Grant and Colfax, himself bearing its electoral vote to the Capital. A few days ago the President nominated Mr. Nelson to succeed General Rousseau in Mexico, and, although contemporary appointments are critically scanned, his own was at once reported upon and confirmed by the unanimous vote of both parties in the Senate.

OBSERVATORIES AT WASHINGTON AND PRINCETON.

The National Observatory at Washington is situated southwest of the Executive Mansion, upon an elevation overlooking the Potomac River. It was originally designed and used for a hydrographical office. The preparation of wind and current charts, the regulation of chronometers, and the other branches of hydrographical research, still occupy the principal care of those in charge, and much investigation is being made secondary. The Transit instrument, shown in the cut on page 317, is in the west wing of the building. It is a 7-foot achromatic, with an aperture of 5.3 inches, and was made by Ertel & Son of Munich. The glass and brass work of the instrument cost $10,000.

The chronometer room is also shown in one of our cuts. The chronometers of the Navy are here regulated by means of an electric clock. The Observatory is open to visitors between the hours of 9 a.m. and 3 p.m., and a courteous attendant is always in attendance to render all needed assistance and to furnish information.

The Halsted Observatory, erected for the College of New Jersey at Princeton, is built of sandstone, and consists of a central tower of an octagonal form and two smaller towers more octagonal in shape which are connected with the central tower in the manner indicated in our engraving.

The length of the whole building is 101 feet and the height of the middle tower up to the top of the dome is 40 feet. The pier in the dome is about 4 feet wide, and the dome surmounting this is hemispherical in form and 40 feet in diameter. The extreme height from the ground to the top of the dome is 65 feet. Each of the small octagonal towers is surmounted by a metal dome, and these two observatories are about one-half of those of the great tower. These smaller towers, or wings, will contain an astronomical library and offices for the use of the observer. The walls of the whole edifice are about 2 feet thick, and built in the most substantial manner.

The telescope will be supported by the solid pier of sandstone resting on ground, which is present, already constructed within the main tower, and which itself rests upon the solid rock, from 12 to 16 feet below the surface of the ground. Its dimensions are about 31 feet by 26 feet at the base, on which the structure is carried upward by an octagonal pier of brick, whose thickness gradually to the top, where it is 11 feet square, upon a level with the main floor of the Observatory, and 40 feet above the ground. Upon this pier is placed a granite base 10 feet square and 1 foot thick, from which rises a solid column of Quincy granite 8 feet square, 27 feet, and over 3 feet high, so that when the telescope is mounted on it the centre of motion of the telescope will be 64 feet above the base, and 40 feet above the floor. The dome itself, which is of wrought iron, covered with a bright composite metal, like the smaller observatory domes, is to be raised and lowered by means of pulleys arranged in a ring upon a circular railway, and so fixed as to obtain great strength and rigidity for resisting wind and security against derangement of any part of this apparatus. The dome has the usual facilities of shutters for the purpose of enlarged dimensions, the opening being no less than 6 feet wide.

It is contemplated that the telescope shall have an object-glass of 25 inches in diameter and a focal length of at least 30 feet, being as large as any achromatic refracting telescope yet attempted, and larger than any of the same kind in this country.

The plan fixed upon for this Observatory at the outset, and thus far steadily pursued, has been to furnish it with one large instrument such as has been described, for special research, and with such other appliances as may be indispensable. It is proposed that the telescope shall be constructed by Alvan Clark & Sons, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, who have deservedly obtained a high reputation for their art equal to that of any opticians in the world.

The cost of the Observatory, thus far, has been about $50,000, which has all been defrayed by one generous donor, General N. Norris Halsted, of Newark, New Jersey, after whom the Observatory has been named. This gift is but one of the ways in which his liberality and public spirit have been exhibited. The late Rev. Gerard Hall, D.D., and Mrs. Hall left a legacy to be applied to the purposes of the Observatory; in fact, the Observatory itself is the result of an agreement between General Halsted and Dr. Van Rensselaer.

It is under the charge of Professor Stephen Alexander, LL.D., the distinguished Professor of Astronomy at Princeton, whose attainments, and especially his extension of the Nebular Hypothesis of La Place, have given him so high a position among scientific men. The friends of science as well as of the College should see to it that the Observatory be armed with an instrument such as has been described—and which must be a very costly one—with the least possible delay.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"Spirit Photography" continued to excite the public mind last week—but the serious side of the question was presented. Mr. Elbridge T. Gerry and Mr. Dittenhoefer, with the prosecution, brought various witnesses on the stand to show "how ghosts were made." One deponent—Mr. Rogers—said there were more ways of producing these so-called spirit photographs than he could count up; he could produce the picture of an angel flying over a man's head, or put bones on his head without his knowing that any thing unusual had been done; an photographer might find out the trick; but he had deceived some good ones. He would take an impression on a sensitive plate, put the plate aside, either in the bath or elsewhere, and then bring it out and develop and print on it. When the plate is developed both pictures will be developed together. This method, however, sometimes does not call up the desired picture. For example, an artist once took the likeness of a gentleman owned by the majestic apparition of Webster, City, Calhoun, Benton, and Napoleon. But the gentleman owned the disembodied presence of Webster, and this was not to be evoked, the artist not having made the necessary preparation.

Mason, Secretary of the Photographic Branch of the American Institute, testified that the "spirit photographs" were done by double printing, and making a positive from it, which was subsequently used to print the spirit picture. It was easy to deceive any one. He produced a small camera in court, and explained the matter practically. He described also one of his own processes in which the negative used was a piece of transparent mica having a figure drawn on it, and worn by mediums according to the dexterity the impression of the figure on it could be made to fall on the sensitive plate and thus produce a ghost. His exposition of the matter created much merriment. Testimony was also given by Mr. Munler, brother to some of Mr. Munler's pictures, which were exhibited, could not have been in front of the camera at the time they were taken, because the faces and even shadows of the one were opposite to those of the other.

In regard to the alleged likeness of the "ghostly" mentioned Mason, it was in evidence that the picture had been honestly received by their imaginations, the same "spirit having appeared in different forms and attitudes and dressed in a suit of different pieces." The dimness of the portraits aided the deception, and occasionally an extraordinary likeness to some deceased person happened to exist, or to be imagined.

The Prince of Wales is to be married on the 10th. Upon Victoria will have only one married daughter —the Princess Beatrice.

The Boston Herald gives a timely warning not to put on thinner under-clothing too early in the season. "Let your winter clothing be dismissed, but should be done in the morning when first dressing. At the time of year homebeepers usually do this, as the warm days of June are very treacherous in summer. The comfort and health of a whole family are often destroyed by the folly of a single day's exposure through overhaste in this respect. In order to keep well one should avoid exposure during the change of seasons.

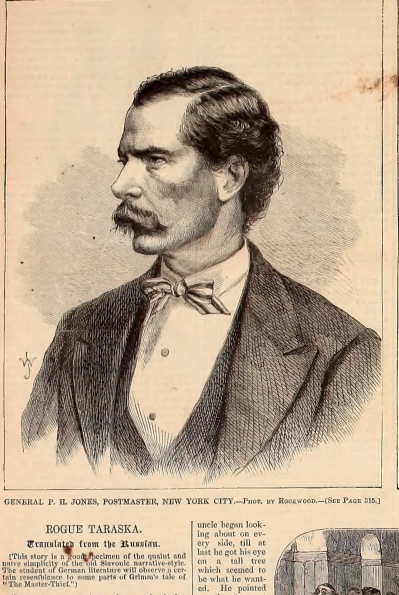
The Evening Post gives what it calls a "nice little bill" of $4000 it, incurred by a legislative committee who visited Albany to "investigate" whiskey—the items being largely such as "brandy and wine," "cigars," "champagne," "oysters," "whiskey," "ales." The bill contains at least thirty separate charges for meals to Senators. The Post remarks that it will be seen that this committee was obliged to drink a good deal of brandy, whiskey, and wine, to keep them in a condition to find it visited many theatres; that it gave a number of dinners; that it rode in a great many carriages; that it had a large number of medical attendance—all which shows that the Senators were not for members of the committee a singularly vigorous men.

Miss Van Lew, the new Postmistress of Richmond, is reported to have made many postal reforms in that city. She has placed two bullies in charge of the police delivery. She has increased the force of registration and money orders, and she intends also to establish a branch post office in the western part of the city, and to have the mails delivered in the main throughout the city promptly on arrival.

Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, was last week the scene of a terrible tragedy. Excessive jealousy becomes enough, and all kinds of criminals—the careless and the hardened, the young and the old. About twelve years ago he attempted to poison his fifth wife; but failing in that he tried to destroy her by setting fire to the house, in which she was confined in an upper room. For this crime he was tried and hung. Before his attempt he was sent to the Penitentiary six years. Three of his previous wives died under circumstances of suspicion. During his trial he was cool and calm, and often apparently unconcerned, and manifested little interest in the proceedings.

A recent writer on the fashions says: "A trip to Saratoga, with the view of the lakes afterwards, is considered the trouble and more of expense in the preparation than a trip to Europe. For the latter the outfit required is a couple of suits, a water-proof cloak, a black round hat, a blue veil, and plenty of cuffs and collars and pocket handkerchiefs." The writer then goes on to remark that it is very difficult to tell what is really required for a well-appointed trip, as those of people vary so much, but enumerates the least of people vary so much, but enumerates the sundry silk, satin, and gossamer articles which form the outfit of ladies who expect to frequent the watering places this summer. It is a pity one can not travel in our own country more sensibly. Ladies who will set a good fashion in this respect will be a blessing to the community.

The young ladies of a Virginia female seminary have decided that "the mind of woman is not capable of as high a degree of cultivation as that of the opposite sex." Very modest of them to come to such a conclusion! They have doubtless formed it after reflecting. We question whether a New England Seminary would unanimously arrive at such a decision!



GENERAL P. H. JONES, POSTMASTER, NEW YORK CITY.—PHOT. BY ROCKWOOD.—(SEE PAGE 315.)

HON THOMAS H. NELSON, MINISTER TO MEXICO.—(SEE PAGE 315.)

ROGUE TARASKA.

Translated from the Russian.

[This story is a fair specimen of the quaint and naive simplicity of the old Slavonic narrative-style. The student of German literature will observe a certain resemblance to some parts of Grimm's tale of "The Master-Thief."]

There was a certain gentleman who had a cook called Taraska, one to whom stealing was like the bread of life. Every thing that came in his way, which: it was gone, and never came back again. There was no telling what ways his master tried to break him of this foul habit—but try as he might, he took nothing by his trouble. At last he thought to himself, "Well, it must be one thing or the other—either break him of this way of stealing, or else put an end to him altogether." So he sent for Taraska to speak with him.

"Well, Taraska, have you learned well how to steal yet?"

"Pretty well, but not just as it should be. See now, if you had sent me to study with my uncle I'd have been quite a professor by now, for my uncle's a first-rate hand at thieving, and knows all the ins and outs of it."

This was a piece of good news for the master, who thought he had discovered a nice way of getting Taraska off his hands without any more trouble. So the very next morning he called him up, furnished him with all that he could want for a journey, and bade him God-speed on his way. When he came to his uncle the old man received him very affectionately, and agreed readily enough to teach him the practical parts of the science of thieving. Accordingly, after giving him two or three days' holiday to freshen him up after his journey, Taraska's uncle proposed to his nephew to go a little walk through the forest. Very good—away they went. By-and-by the uncle began looking about on every side, till at last he got his eye on a tall tree which seemed to be what he wanted. He pointed to the topmost branch and said:

"Taraska, my lad, do you see that raven's nest up yonder, on the top of that big tree?"

"Ay, ay, uncle, I see it clearly enough; and what's more, the mother's at home, sitting upon her eggs."

"You've hit it, my boy; and what's more, she's asleep, and the thing is to carry off the eggs without waking her."

"Well, uncle, I suppose it can be done; stealing is just stealing, after all."

"Ah, but there's a way of doing every thing, too. Now just watch and see how I do it; I'll climb up and take all the eggs from under the mother without her feeling it a bit."

Up went the uncle. Five minutes passed, neither more nor less: look now—there are all the eggs in the uncle's hands!

"Heavo, uncle!" and Taraska; "you're the one for doing things. It's no joke taking eggs from under a sleeping raven. But see now, you've not been sleeping or dreaming either, and yet—where are the soles of your boots?"

The uncle put up one foot, then the other, and sure enough his feet were looking through his boots, and not a bit of sole to be seen. And the reason of this was that Taraska, while his uncle was getting up the tree so cleverly, had whipped out his knife and shaved off the soles of his boots (which were brand-new) without the old man knowing any thing about it.

Not many days after this Taraska's uncle invited his nephew to assist him in robbing a monastery which stood but a little way from their haunt. So off they set; and, not to make a long story of it, they cleaned out the holy place from top to bottom.

By this time Taraska began to think that he had pretty nearly completed his education; so back he went to his old master. But such a guest was not at all to the master's taste, and he began to cast about for some way of getting rid of him.

"HELP! HELP!"

At last he hit upon a plan; and calling up Taraska, he put on a pleasant face, and said to him very kindly:

"Well, Taraska, have you become a first-rate thief by this time?"

"So-so; I can not praise myself, but I'm not just so bad at it as I might be."

"And whatever I set you to steal, could you steal it, do you think?"

"With your good leave, you will hardly find fault with my fingers."

"Very good—now we'll see what you can do. If you succeed in what I set you, your fortune's made; but if not, I'll hand you over to the soldiers (i. e., deliver you to justice). Do you see, yonder comes a priest leading a cow. Can you steal me that cow, do you think, without the priest seeing you?"

"To be sure I can," says Taraska; "only give me a pair of small boots."

The master brought him the boots, and away went Taraska. He made a circuit through the forest, and coming out on the high-road about a hundred yards in front of the priest, threw one boot in the middle of the road, and slipped behind the trees again. Presently the priest came along, and seeing the boot lying there, picked it up.

"What a famous boot for my son now, if there had only been a pair of them! But as it is an odd one I'll e'en let it lie."

But Taraska, coming up the minute he was gone, took the boot again, and making another round among the trees, came out a good way ahead, and threw the boot into the road as before. The priest came along and espied it.

"Ah, now! what a fool I was not to keep the other, and then I'd have had the pair of them! I'll just go back and get it."

And tying the cow to a tree, he set off. But meanwhile Taraska stepped nimbly in, cut the rope, and marched off with the cow right into his master's yard.

But the master was no happier than a wolf in a trap when he saw how Taraska had managed; and he determined in some way or other to be even with him yet. So he called him up, and said: "This is all very well; but do you think you could steal the plate off my dinner-table?"

"Nothing easier," says Taraska, very coolly.

"Very good—if you can do it, well done you! but if not, to the soldiers you go forthwith."

Next day there was a great dinner at the master's house, and Taraska made himself very busy in the kitchen; he helped to cook the dinner, carried pans and dishes, and was like a man with three hands. But all this time he did not forget his own business; for, as soon as all was ready, he took a peasant whom he had bribed for the purpose, smeared him with honey, and stuck him full of black feathers, and then bade him creep into the great stove in the dining-hall, and do as he had been told. Presently in came all the guests, and sat round the table; and among them came the prior of a monastery close by. Now he (as it happened) took his seat exactly opposite the stove in which Taraska's man was hidden. Well, just as dinner was beginning, the door of the stove opened quietly, and out popped a black, horrid-looking head, all covered with feathers. But no one noticed it except the prior, who got a terrible start. After a time the bogie peered out again, and grinned, and put out his tongue at the prior, who fell all of a tremble, and began crossing himself at a great rate. "Heaven preserve me!" says he to himself, "what evil can I have done that the devil should be sent to torment me like this, miserable sinner that I am?" The thought had scarcely passed through his mind when suddenly the bogie jumped out of the stove with a great whoop, and began dancing round the table. Then nothing was heard but "Oh dear!" and "Help! help!" Away ran all the guests, one faster than another; two or three fainted and rolled under the table, the master seized his pistols and rushed after the bogie, followed by one or two of the gentlemen. As soon as they were gone our hero made a clean sweep of the plate.

"NOT A BIT OF SOLE TO BE SEEN!"

SHOOTING A DUMMY.

When the master came to think over the matter, and remembered how things had gone, he was so wild that you could not have held him with a cart-rope; and he swore vehemently that, come what might, he would find means to pay Taraska for all that he had done. At last a thought came into his head, and he called up Taraska, and said to him, with as pleasant a face as he could put on:

"Well, Taraska, my lad, you've done famously; there's no denying it. Now I'm going to set you one task more, and then you're a free man. Do you think you could steal my money-chest? If so, the money's yours; but if not, why, then to the soldiers!"

"I shall be most happy," said Taraska, very politely; "and the sooner the better."

So the master went his way; and, bethinking himself that woman's wit is sometimes sharper than man's, he told the whole story to his wife, and asked her counsel.

"I'll tell you what to do," said she; "when night comes on put the chest in this corner, and I'll sit down upon it; and you sit beside me and keep watch, with your pistols on the table in front of you, ready to hand; and we'll keep watch till he comes, and if he gets the money then, let him say that he outwitted me!" And as she said, so it was done; and when all was ready the master began to rub his hands and chuckle, saying to himself, "Come, I've got him this time, I think. Let us see how hell get out of it now!"

But in the mean time Taraska had run off to his uncle (who happened to be in the village), and engaged him to assist by the offer of a share of the booty. So, in the first place, they made a kind of dummy with a sheep-skin and a block of wood; then Taraska dressed up his uncle in an old uniform belonging to the District Inspector of Police, which they had stolen some time before; and in this way they set off to the master's house. It was summer time, and consequently all the windows on the ground-floor were open; so Taraska took the dummy in his arms, and lifted it till its head came above the window-sill. The moment the head appeared the master, who was on the watch, fired a pistol full at it. Immediately there came a fearful groan, and the sound of a heavy fall; and then all was still.

"Hallo! hallo there!" cried Taraska's uncle, coming round the corner in the inspector's uniform; "what does all this mean? Here's a man murdered under your very windows, and you don't even stir a foot to help him, or to seize the murderer! Just be so kind as to step this way, will you?"

THE HALSTED OBSERVATORY AT PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY WM. R. HOWELL, 667 BROADWAY.—[SEE PAGE 315.]

Out came the master with a very bad grace, carrying his lantern in his hand, and there, sure enough, was a dead body (or something very like one) lying on the ground, and the inspector of police, to all appearance, standing beside it.

"This is a pretty business for you to be mixed up in, my friend," said the pretended inspector, very sternly. "Be off with you this minute to the constable's hut, and get every thing ready for taking the deposition; and I, in the mean time, will go round the village and make farther inquiries respecting the affair."

Away went the master accordingly, trailing one foot after the other, and cursing Taraska, the money-chest, himself, the inspector of police, and every thing in the world, a thousand times over. But no sooner had he turned his back than Taraska slipped quietly into the house, and went straight to the room where the master's wife was still keeping guard over the chest, and wondering why her husband did not come back.

"All's well now, my love!" said Taraska, in a whisper, imitating the master's voice; "I've finished that rascal at last, and a good job too. He won't come to rob us again in a hurry, I'll be bound. Now, then, give me the chest, and I'll put it back in my cabinet; it's no good sitting up over it all night, now that there is nothing more to fear."

Now at night, as we all know, it is generally very dark; and it was none the lighter now that the master had carried off the lantern. Consequently, the good lady, who could not see a bit of Taraska, never dreamed but that it was her husband who was speaking; so she handed over the chest without more ado. Taraska immediately marched out of the house with it, hid it among the bushes, and then, going into the kitchen and curling himself up beside the stove, he went comfortably off to sleep.

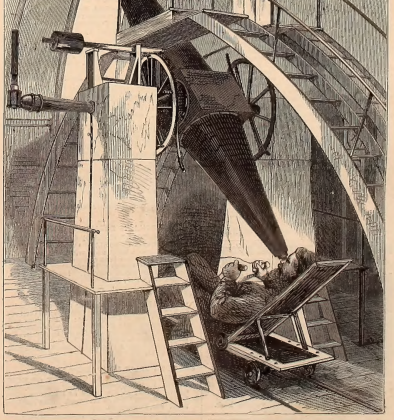
In the mean time his master, who had waited at the constable's hut till he was tired without hearing any thing more of the murder, thought he might just as well go home and see that his money-chest was all right; so back he went accordingly, lantern and all.

"Why, wife, where's the chest?"

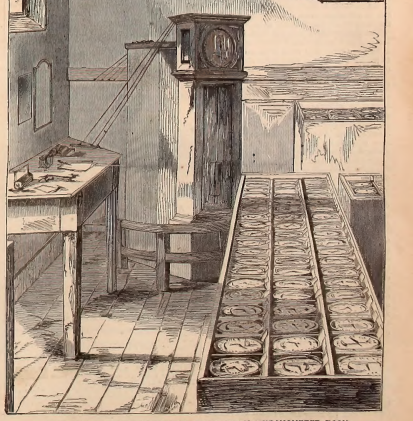
"Why, my love, you took it away yourself, you know, about half an hour ago. What have you been doing all the time since then?"

The master gave a kind of roar, like a bear hit by a bullet, and bumped his head against the wall as if he had suddenly gone mad.

"Oh, but I am an old fool!" howled he; "see now if I haven't let that villain take me in again! Well, it's no use trying to get over him, I can see that, so I'll just send him about his business, and never have any thing more to do with him."



ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORY AT WASHINGTON—OBTAINING THE SIDEREAL TIME.
SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 315.]



ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATORY AT WASHINGTON—CHRONOMETER ROOM.
SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 315.]

TALKING BIRDS.

CERTAIN birds are known to utter strange sounds, the origin of which has much puzzled the ornithologists. The Brown Owl which hoots is hence called the Screech Owl. A musical friend of Gilbert White tried all the owls that were his near neighbors with a pitch-pipe set at a correct pitch, and found they all hooted in B flat; and he subsequently found that neither owls nor cuckoos kept to one note. The Whidah Bird, one of the most costly of cage-birds, rattles its tail-feathers with a noise somewhat resembling that made by the rattle-snake. The Chinese Mocking Bird, or Chia called Lanyong, in captivity is very teachable, imitating words, and even whistling tunes: we all remember those airs starling, "Poll" is reported to be seen in troops in the Blue Mountains, is named from its ready mimicry of other birds: its imitation of the chucking and scolding of hen and the crowing of a cock, as well as its whistling of tunes, are described as very perfect: its native note is said to be a loud whistle. The Blue Jay turns his imitative faculty to treacherous account: he so closely imitates the St. Domingo Falcon as to deceive even those acquainted with both birds: and the falcon no sooner appears in their neighborhood than the jays swarm around him and insult him with their imitative cries, for which they frequently fall victime to his appetite. The Bullfinch, according to Blumenbach, learns to whistle tunes, to sing in parts, and even to pronounce words. The note of the Crowned Crane has been compared by Buffon to the dolorous es of a trumpet; it also clucks like a hen. Mr. Wallace, in his "Travels on the Amazon," saw a bird about the size and color of the red curlew, that uttered a loud, hoarse cry, like some deep musical instrument, whence its Indian name, Coroniaba—Trumpet-bird. It inhabits the flooded islands of the Rio Negro and the Solimoes, never appearing on the main land. The only sound produced by storks is by snapping their bills. The Night Heron is called the Qua Bird, from its note Qua.

The Bittern, the English provincial names of which are the Mire-drum, Boll or the Bog, etc., is so called for the bellowing or drumming note or booming for which the bird is so famous. This deep note of the "hollow-sounding Bittern" is exerted at the season of the breeding season, about February or March. As the day declines he leaves his haunt, and, rising aprubly, soars to a great height in the twilight. Wilfughby says that it performs this last-mentioned feat in the autumn, "making a singular kind of noise, nothing like to lowing." Bewick says that it soars so above described when it changes its haunts. Ordinarily it flies heavily, like the heron, uttering from time to time a resounding cry, and lowing; and then Willughby, who well describes the bellowing nobe of the breeding season, supposes it to be the Night Raven, at whose "dismal voice" the superstitious wayfarer of the night turned, pale and trembled. "This, without doubt," says Willughby, "is that bird concerning whom people call the Night Raven, and have such a dread of, imagining its cry portends no less than their death or the death of some of their near relations; for it flies in the night, answers their description of being like a flagging cuffon, and hath such a kind of hooping cry as they talk of." Others, with some reason, consider the Qua Bird already mentioned (which utters a deep and most disagreeable noise when on the wing, conveying the idea of the agonies of a person attempting to vomit) to be the true Night Raven. The Bittern was well known to the ancients, and Aristotle mentions the fable of its origin from staves metamorphosed into birds. The piping cry of the bird-toe is much prized as a tooth-pick, and in the olden times it was thought to have the property of preserving the teeth.

The Greater-billed Butcher Bird, from New Holland, has extraordinary powers of voice: it is trained for catching small birds, and it is said to imitate the notes of some other birds by way of decoying them to their destruction.

The most imitative sounds of parrots are of little interest compared with the instances of indirect, apparently allied to reason, which are related of individuals. Of this tribe the distinguishing characteristics are a hooked bill, the upper mandible of which is movable on a joint of the lower, and not in one piece with the skull, as in most other birds, but joined to the head by a strong membrane, with which the bird lays hold and lets it fall at pleasure. The bill is also round on the outside and hollow within, and has, in some degree, the properties of a mouth, particularly the tongue, which is thick and fleshy, to play freely; while the sound, striking against the circular border of the bill as a mandible, reflects it like a palate: hence the animal does not utter a whistling sound, but a full articulation.

The Wild Swan has a very loud call, and utters a melancholy cry when one of the flock is killed; however, it was said by the poets to sing its own dying dirge. Such was the popular belief in olden times; and, looking to the anatomical characteristics of the species, it was, in some degree, supported by the more inflated windpipe of the wild when compared with that of the tame species. The Song of the Swan is, however, irreconcilable with sober belief, the only noise of the Wild Swan of our times being unmelodious, and an unpleasing monotony.

The Laughing Goose is named from its note having some resemblance to the laugh of man, and not, as Wilson supposes, from the grinning appearance of its mandibles. The Indians imitate its cry by moving the hand quickly against the lips while they repeat the syllable quok.

The Cuckoo may be said to have done much for musical science, because from that bird has been derived the minor scale, the origin of which has puzzled so many; the Cuckoo's couplet being the minor third going downward.

The Germans are the finest appreciators of the Nightingale; and it is a fact that when the Prussian armies invade another country, they are about to cut down certain trees near Cologne, which were frequented by Nightingales, the alarmed citizens purchased the trees in order to save the birds and keep their music. Yet one would think the music hardly worth having if it really sounded as it looks upon paper, transcribed thus by Bechstein, from whom it is quoted by Broderip:

*Zozozoz

ESTABLISHED 1861.

THE

GREAT AMERICAN

TEA COMPANY

RECEIVE THEIR TEAS BY THE CARGO FROM

THE BEST TEA DISTRICTS OF

CHINA AND JAPAN,

and sell them in quantities to suit customers

AT CARGO PRICES.

The Company have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of clubs. They are sold at cargo prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show.

PRICE LIST OF TEAS,

OOLONG (black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
MIXED (green and black), 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST (black), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 50c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER (green), $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, refreshing-house keepers, and families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by buying which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE,

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.
GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

CLUB ORDER.

PORTSMOUTH, MICH., August 26, 1868.

To the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York.

GENTS: The package here will not let me alone. They say I have learned the road, and that I have got to send another order from here. So here it is; in the shape of my seventh order since the 6th of May last, making five hundred and forty-five pounds and sixty-four cents I have sent you since that date.

Hoping this will be as good as former packages, I remain Yours, &c., JOHN W. HAWKINS.

20 lbs Tucol'd Japan, Mr. Kempton, at $1 00 . $20 00
5 " Imperial....." at 1 35 . 6 75
5 " Young Hyson, A. L. Cummings, at 1 35 . 6 75
3 " Imperial.....Bliss Stephens, at 1 35 . 2 50
5 " Imperial.....I. Chapman, at 1 35 . 6 75
2 " Gunpowder....O. A. Watrous, at 1 50 . 3 00
2 " Imperial.....Mrs. Taylor, at 1 35 . 2 70
4 " Young Hyson..J. Hopkins, at 1 35 . 5 00
1 " Colong.....at 1 00 . 1 00
6 " Gunpowder....John Stephens, at 1 50 . 9 00
4 " Young Hyson..Wm. H. Dorsey, at 1 35 . 5 00
1 " do. do. ..H. Malone, at 1 35 . 1 25
1 " do. do. ..Mrs. Newcomb, at 1 35 . 1 25
4 " do. do. ..Noah Campbell, at 1 35 . 5 00
2 " Gunpowder....Geo. Miller, at 1 50 . 3 00
4 " do. do. ..A. Gale, at 1 50 . 6 00
2 " Imperial.....Mrs. Bird, at 1 35 . 2 70
$74 95

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-Office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our prices are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned to us at our store within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Committees of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees to less than one third (besides the Express charges) by handling directly to

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in the city and other places, have put the same name and style of business and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in the advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street,
Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—I am now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at their homes, the whole of the time, or for the spare moments. Business new, light, and profitable. Fifty cents to $5 per evening is easily earned by persons of either sex, and the boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. Great inducements are offered those who will devote their whole time to the business; and, that every person may make the test of my offer, I send their address and test the business for themselves, I will make the following unparalleled offer: To all who are not well satisfied with the business, I will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing me. Full particulars, directions, etc., sent free. Sample sent by mail for 10 cents. Address E. C. ALLEN, Augusta, Me.

PIANOS and ORGANS.

Prices greatly reduced for Cash. New Seven-Octave Pianos, of first-class makers, for $275. New Cabinet Organs and Melodeons for $50, $65, and upward. Second-hand Pianos, Melodeons, and Organs from $40 to $100, at 481 Broadway, N.Y. HORACE WATERS.

DEAFNESS, CATARRH, SCROFULA.—A lady who has suffered for years from Deafness, Catarrh, and Scrofula, was cured by a simple remedy. Her sympathy and gratitude prompts her to send the receipt free of charge to any one similarly afflicted. Address MRS. M. C. LEGGETT, Hoboken, N. J.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold

$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS OXIDE WATCH FACTORY

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oxoide Watches having recently been instituted, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oxoide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in interior, style of finish, and time-keeping qualities to Watches costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $2 to $6.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Odd Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents; our own personal (or authorized) signature on each genuine low price bill, and sold by us at our salesrooms at the cost of real diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE).

NOS. 37 AND 39 NASSAU STREET, OPPOSITE THE POST-OFFICE (UP STAIRS), NEW YORK.

C. E. COLLINS & CO.

ALASKA DIAMONDS.

The new ALASKA DIAMOND, or carbonized quartz, equal in brilliancy to the real diamond (by actual test), is attracting universal attention, purchased for gold, and sold by us at our salesrooms at the cost of rock diamonds, to which they are equal in every respect except intrinsic value.

LOOK AT OUR PRICE-LIST.

Ladies' Solitaire Finger-Rings, $8 and $10; Solitaire Ear-Drops, $6, $6, $10.
Cluster Finger-Rings, $5, $10, $12; Cluster Ear-Drops, $8, $12, $14.
Cluster Scarf-Pins, $5, $10, $20, and $25 each; Cross Pins, $10 and $25.
Gents' Solitaire Pins, $5, $8, $8, $10, $15, $20.
Gents' Cluster Rings, $8, $10, $20, $30. Cluster Rings, $8, $10, $12, $20, $25, $30 each.
Cluster Pins, $10, $12, $25, $30 each; with tail, $16, $25; Cross Pins, $6, $10, $18; Studs, per set, $3, $5, $10.

We do our business strictly on the principle of "one price to all, and no deviation from it." Orders less than $5 should be accompanied with P. O. Order or Registered Letter, and the goods sent. Orders less than amount sent by express, C.O.D., customers paying all express charges. A Letter Discount to the Trade. TRY US. Address STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO., Providence, R. I.

The following letters are a proof that our goods are what we represent them to be, and we are receiving many:

NASHVILLE, Feb. 1, 1869.

MESSRS. STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO.—Gents: I received the Pin all O.K. I like it very much. Will a single Solitaire Stud answer as much as the pin. I have been offered $400 for the Pin. Of course I would not sell, but I mention it to show. Yours truly, S. H. TATE.

PHILADELPHIA, April 1, 1868.

MESSRS. STANLEY, WHIPPLE, & CO.—Gentlemen: Your goods came to hand all right, and money paid ($26) to Express Co. on receipt of invoice of articles. Please send me a $50 Solitaire Gentleman's Ring, C. O. D. and oblige, yours truly, W. W. STEINWELT.

Jewelry not and made to order to imitate the genuine diamond. Send size of finger by slip of paper when ordering.

ARCHITECTURAL DEPARTMENT OF THE

Novelty Iron Works,

Nos. 77 and 83 Liberty Street,
Cor. Broadway, New York.

Plain and Ornamental Iron Work of all kinds for Buildings.

$20 A DAY to Male and Female

Agents to introduce the BUCKEYE $30 SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Sells on both sides, and is the only LICENSED SHUTTLE MACHINE in the market sold for less than $50. Orders are liberal, and the seller and user are liable to prosecution and imprisonment for infringement. Address W. A. HENDERSON & CO., Cleveland, Ohio.

DO IT NOW.—Don't delay, but send 25 cents at once and receive MAPLE LEAVES for twelve months. It is the cheapest, the best, and the most popular Monthly published. Specimen copies sent on receipt of address.
GOODBACH, No. 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

A GENTEEL BUSINESS for either sex. No previous knowledge or large sum of capital required. This is no advertising scheme, but comes from a reliable business house of this city, and can be made by addressing T. W. EVANS & CO., 41 Grand St., Philadelphia.

CHICOPEE SEWING MACHINE,

First-class, and fully licensed. AGENTS WANTED. For terms, address CHICOPEE M'F'G CO., Boston, Mass.

100 PHOTOGRAPHS or BEAUTIFUL WOMEN sent, postpaid, for 20 cts. Send for Circulars. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, New York.

The Celebrated Genuine Oroide Gold Hunting-Case Watches, fac-simile Walthams.

Genuine Oroide Gold Watch Co., Geneva, Switzerland, manufacture, on strictly scientific principles, style, and elegance, the only perfect and reliable imitation of the most rare and costly description of Gold Watches, Full-Jeweled Patent Levers, Hunting Cases, Expansion and Gentlemen's fine Swiss Movements. $15 ; Ladies' and Gentlemen's Hunting-Cases, $20 ; Chronometer Fine Swiss Movements, Hunting-Cases, Chronometers, Lecturers, Engineers, Expressmen—the most exacting of our customers—have thoroughly demonstrated the strength, durability, accuracy, and utility of our celebrated watches, and pronounce them invaluable as reliable time-keepers. Each Watch warranted by special certificate from the Oroide Gold Watch Co. to be perfect time-keepers, and to retain their color equal to gold. Magnificent Oroide Gold Chains, $3, $5, $7, and $10. Express Co's will exhibit the Watch, &c., when requested, on receipt of express charges both ways. Expressed every where, to be paid for on delivery. Customers must pay all charges. Don't send orders to parties who make you pay for Watches before you see them. CLUBS FOR SIX WATCHES WILL RECEIVE AN EXTRA WATCH FREE. The universal demand for our specialties have induced unprincipled persons to counterfeit our inimitable Watch with worthless metal watches that furnish us a case, claiming for them the name of Oroide Gold Watches.

TRADE-MARK, COPYRIGHTED.

JOHN FOGGAN, President Oroide Gold Watch Co.

Only Office in the United States No. 79 Nassau Street, New York.

HITCHCOCK'S

HALF-DIME MUSIC.

Seventy sheets of Music mailed for $3 50, or any of the series at FIVE CENTS each.

LATEST NUMBERS:

Nos. 50. Call Me Home Once.
51. Why Wandering here?
52. Pretty, Pretty Bird.
53. Those Tassels on the Boots.
54. Five O'Clock in the Morning.
55. Lady Mine.
56. Root-Bird's Song.
57. Sweetheart.
58. The Isle of Memory.
59. Mabel Waltz.
60. Meet Me in the Lane, Love.
61. The Lancashire Lass.
62. The Foreign Lover.
63. Where there's a Will there's a Way.
64. Be Watchful and Be Wise.
65. Boston Belles.
66. Chicopee Street Belles.
67. Barney O'Rei.
68. My Mother Dear.
69. Day and Night I Thought of Thee.
70. The Pilgrim Wife.
71. My Angel.
72. Oh, I'm Pretty, Blue-Eyed Witch.

For first 50 subjects send for a catalogue. Address BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
No. 34 Bookman St., New York.

LET US

Protect Ourselves.

The physical structure of the strongest human being is vulnerable every where. Our bodies are endowed by nature with a certain sensitive power, which protects them, to some extent, from unwholesome influences; but this power is easily impaired, and can not be safely relied on in unhealthy regions, or under circumstances of more than ordinary danger. Therefore it is wisdom, it is prudence, it is duty, to endeavor to provide against such contingencies by taking an ANTIDOTE IN ADVANCE; in other words, by fortifying the system with the most complete protective against all the epidemic and endemic maladies that has ever been administered in any country. As a remedy for dyspepsia there is no medicine that will compare with it. Whoever suffers the pangs of indigestion, say where on the face of the earth where can be procured, does so voluntarily: for so surely as truth and reason are invariable sequence and axiomatic would restore his disordered stomach to a healthy condition. It never to be too universally recommended, and in cases of continued constipation it also affords speedy and permanent relief.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

In all cases of fever and ague HOSTETTER'S BITTERS is more potent than any amount of quinine, while the most dangerous cases of bilious fever yield to its wonderful properties. Those who have tried the medicine will never use another for any of the ailments which the Bitters are known to relieve. To such we say, To those who have not made the experiment we confidently recommend an early application to the Bitters, and wherever they are stricken by disease of the digestive organs.

WANTED—AGENTS.—to sell the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE. Price $25. The simplest, cheapest, and best Knitting Machine ever invented. Will knit 10,000 stitches per minute. Knits the inducements to Agents. Address AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO., Boston, Mass., or St. Louis, Mo.

$10 Indispensable to every Household! Perfectly wonderful! Every body buys at first sight! Agents make $5 per day. Sample sent free. Address APEX S. M. CO., 428 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS FOR 1869.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, " 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, " 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE, Three cents a year, free of prepayment; or 20 cents a year, payable quarterly at the office of delivery. Subscriptions from the British Provinces must be accompanied with the Postage, or with the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 20 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 40 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will date with each number the Number with which their subscription expires. Thus, 'Subscription Expires June, 1869,' will indicate that the subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

The volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for January and July of each year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by Post-Office Money Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to bank bills, as in case the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. Whenever the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $200; Half Page, $105; Quarter Page, $70—each insertion; or, for a less space, $1 50 per Line, each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Wright's Patent Variable Cut Off STEAM ENGINE.

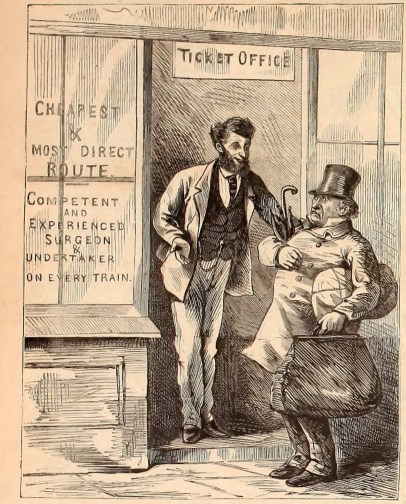
PATENTS.—Munn & Co., Editors Scientific American, 37 Park Row, New York. Twenty-three years' experience in obtaining AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN PATENTS.

Opinions no charge. A pamphlet, 168 pages of law and information, free. Address as above.

A WATCH FREE—GIVEN GRATIS to every A live man who will act as agent in a new, light, and honorable business. $20 a day. Don't be a loafer. No humbug. No money wanted in advance. Address H. DALLETT & CO., Pittsburgh, Pa.

FIRE EXTINGUISHER, PLANT SYRINGE, WINDOW WASHER, AND GARDEN ENGINE for $3. Send stamp for Circular.
N. E. P. PUMP CO., Danvers, Mass.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills are working most wonderful cures. Glandular swellings that have defied all other treatment are easily softened and removed by the Ointment, while the Pills relieve Asthma,



VERY CONSOLING.

TICKET AGENT (to Hesitating Friend). "Why, you are going by our Line surely, Mr. JONES, are you not? We now have an experienced Surgeon and Undertaker on every Train.

Trade-Mark for STERLING. Trade-Mark for Silver. Trade-Mark for Electro-Plate. GORHAM MFG CO

GORHAM MFG. CO.,

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Sterling Silver Ware,

AND

Nickel Silver-Plated Ware,

Orders received from the Trade only, but these goods may be obtained from responsible dealers every where.

THE LATE JAMES HARPER.

For his portrait, phrenological development, and character, see June No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, 20 cts. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N.Y.

HUMAN NOSES,

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Nose as a Sign of Development; Noses Classified: The Roman Nose, Executiveness; The Greek Nose, Refinement; The Jewish Nose, Commerciliness; The Snub Nose, Undevelopment; The Celestial Nose, Inquisitiveness; The Grecian Nose, Love of Nature; What is a Cognitive Nose? The Appreciative Nose, The Inquisitive Nose, Voltaire's Nose, Combative Noses, The Defensive Nose, The Irritable Nose, The Aggressive Nose, Contrasted Noses, The Tasteful Nose, Intellectual Noses, Destructive Nose, The Combing Nose, Acquisitive Nose, The Economical Nose, Feminine Noses; Nuniversal Noses; The American Nose, The German Nose, The English Nose, The Irish Nose, The French Nose; Miscellaneous National Noses: Indian Noses, Negro Noses, Mongolian Noses; Noses of the Pacific Islanders; Noses Photographed Noses, The Noses of Scripture, Lord Bacon's Nose; Some Poetical Noses, A Double Nose, The End of the Nose: with 100 Illustrations, in NEW PHRENOLOGY, by S. R. WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y. Sent, first post, for 35. Agents wanted.

DR DE JONGH'S

THE ORIGINAL AND GENUINE

LIGHT BROWN COD LIVER OIL

Universally recognized by the Faculty as

INCOMPARABLY SUPERIOR

to every other kind,

and the most wonderful remedy for

Consumption, General Debility,

and the Wasting Diseases of Children.

DR. DE JONGH'S GENUINE OIL is sold in AMERICA in IMPERIAL Half-Pints only, sealed with a blue capsule, white top, stamped with his Trade-Mark.

SOLE CONSIGNEES,

ANSAR, HARFORD & Co., 77, Strand, London.

SOLE ACCREDITED AGENTS IN AMERICA,

EDWD GREEY & Co., 38, Vesey St., New York.

Sold by all Druggists at $3.50 per Bottle.

Beware of fabricated imitations.

£150,000,000

Sterling. Unclaimed Money and Estates Registry, commencing 1800. Fee to search, for any name, 2s. Gee & Co., 6 Prince of Wales Road, London, England.

SERIES OF

GRAND CONCERTS

for 1869, by

DODWORTH'S

BRASS, STRING, AND REED BANDS,

Will be given EVERY EVENING on board the world-renowned steamers

BRISTOL and PROVIDENCE, leaving Pier No. 28, North River, foot of Murray Street, DAILY, at 5 P.M.

FOR BOSTON,

VIA NEWPORT AND FALL RIVER.

The Brass Band will play a selection of the most popular music for one hour before leaving the dock, and on their passage from the stream to the Sound.

IN THE EVENING,

A PROMENADE CONCERT

BY THE

REED AND STRING BANDS.

The management being determined that nothing in the mode of transit of first-class passengers shall surpass THIS LINE on a scale of grandeur and magnificence, adds this most expensive attraction and novelty, the engagement of the FIRST ORCHESTRA of the country —the Dodworth's—which will be attached to each steamer on its passage.

JAMES FISK, JR.,
Managing Director.

CHAS. H. VAILE, General Passenger Agent.
M. R. SIMONS, General Superintendent.

A POOR GIRL'S

LETTER. New Song from Perichole ..... 25c.
STANDARD and CAPTIVE INDIAN MARCH. Perichole. 40c.
PERICHOLE WALTZES, 50c. "Telegram Waltz," 40c.
"Fly not yet Gidney, Etc." "On the Beach Galop," 30c.
KA-POODLE-UM (comic song), "DANDY FAY, each 25c.
Violin or Flute Accompaniments, 15c. each. Music mailed
FREDERICK BLUME, 1120 Broadway, N.Y.

COMPETITION EXTRAORDINARY.

BUY the Celebrated Wilson Shuttle Sewing Machine. You can have three years to pay for it. Send for Illustrated Pamphlet of this truly lovely, with full particulars of our new plan of placing our Sewing Machines into every family throughout the land. Address C. D. HARPER, Cleveland, Ohio, Special Agent of the Wilson Sewing Machine Co. Incorporated under the laws of Ohio.

S.C. CEDAR CAMPHOR

THE BEST DEFENCE AGAINST MOTHS. Sold by druggists. THEOD. S. HARRIS, Boston.

VELOCIPEDES of superior quality at least 20 per cent. less than other prices. Send for Circular to THE GREAT AMERICAN VELOCIPEDE FACTORY, 699 Broadway, N. Y. We can truly say that in price and quality we defy competition.

AGENTS WANTED in every town in the Union.

FREEMAN & BURR, CLOTHIERS,

Always have in Stock, Ready for Immediate Wear,

SUITS	OVERCOATS	BOYS' SUITS
For all Occasions,	For all Seasons.	For all Ages.
ONE PRICE TO ALL.	FURNISHING GOODS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.	ONE PRICE TO ALL.

Our Stock of Goods in the piece,—Cloths, Cassimeres, Coatings, Vestings, &c.—is of unparalleled extent and variety. Orders for Garments to measure executed within a few hours. Gentlemen in all parts of the Country are ordering their Clothing direct from us, with entire satisfaction. Perfect Fitting guaranteed in all cases by

Our New Rules for Self-Measurement.

Rules for Measurement, Price List and Samples of Goods mailed free on application.

FREEMAN & BURR'S WAREHOUSES,
138 & 140 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK.

TO WATCH BUYERS.—An illustrated description of the Watches made by the American Watch Company of Waltham will be sent to any address on application.

In addition to a description of the Watches, the pamphlet contains much other useful information to watch buyers. Address ROBBINS & APPLETON, General Agents, No. 182 Broadway, N. Y.

FURNITURE.

WARREN WARD & CO.,
Nos. 75 & 77 Spring St., corner of Crosby.

Established 1850. Wholesale and Retail Manufacturers of the latest styles of BEDROOM, PARLOR, DINING, and LIBRARY FURNITURE, MATTRESSES, SPRING BEDS, &c., &c. Suitable for City and Country residences.
ALL GOODS WARRANTED AS REPRESENTED.

Manufactured by
THE
National Watch Co.,
OF ELGIN, ILL.

Pronounced by Watchmakers, Railroad and Express men, East and West, to be the most correct Time-keepers made.

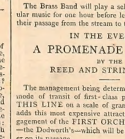
Avoid Imitations, and all parties who advertise to send our goods C. O. D. Call on your Jeweler and ask to see them.

Business Office and Salesroom, 159 & 161 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

KEMLO'S WATCH REPAIRER'S GUIDE.—Being a complete hand-book to the young beginner in taking apart, putting together, and thoroughly cleaning the English Lever Watch, and all the American Watches. By F. KEMLO, Practical Watchmaker. With Illustrations. 1 vol., 12mo. Cloth. Price $1 25. For sale by all Booksellers in the United States. Single copies will be mailed, free of postage, on receipt of price. Address A. WILLIAMS & CO., Booksellers, 100 Washington St., Boston.

TWENTY-ONE years' experience.
More than TWENTY THOUSAND applications for patents have been prepared by this agency for inventors in the United States and Europe.
THIRTY-FIVE Patents obtained in United States and Europe.
CHARGES less than any other reliable agency.
NO FEE in advance. No charge unless the patent is allowed. No fee for making preliminary examination, nor opinion as to patentability.
A pamphlet of 100 pages, containing the Patent Laws of the United States, with full directions how to obtain patents, sent free. Address
MUNN & CO.,
No. 37 Park Row, N. Y.

$1000.—AGENTS WANTED.—For 50 cents we will send Agriculturist Sample Picture, worth $2. Am. Picture Co., Tompkinsville, S. I., N. Y.



WOODWARD'S NATIONAL ARCHITECT.

A practical work, just published, containing 1000 Designs, and Details of Working Scale of Country, Suburban, and Village Houses, with specifications and estimate of cost. Quarto. PRICE Twelve Dollars, postpaid.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. 150 Designs, $1 50, postpaid. GEO. WOODWARD, Architect, 191 Broadway, New York. Send stamp for catalogue of all new books on Architecture.

Musical Boxes

The largest and oldest depot in America. Fresh Novelties by the Steamer. Fine Supply of Fancy Goods, Swiss Carved Goods, Fine Gold and Silver Watches. M. J. PALLIARD & CO., 630 BROADWAY, N.Y.

MARVIN & CO.'s

CHROME IRON SAFES

ARE THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
265 Broadway N.Y.

FARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

In Harmony with Nature.—It is because the water of the Seltzer Spa contains no convulsing elements, but gently reinforces nature instead of protecting the bodily energies, that it performs such astonishing cures in dyspepsia, bowel complaints, disorders of the kidneys, and general debility. FARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT, which is identical in all respects with that spontaneous product of the earth, is producing the same beneficial results on a more extensive scale in this country.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

$25 to $50 per Day made by Agents selling the AMERICAN POCKET POLICEMAN, a beautiful silver-plated combination Lock and Chain, of universal application, combining utility, novelty, and beauty. Capable of 10,000 changes of combination. Send One Dollar for Sample and Terms to Agents. Address AMERICAN POCKET POLICEMAN MFG. CO., P. O. Box 518, Chicago, Ill.

WANTED—AGENTS—$75 to $200 per month, every where, for the best, and fastest, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON-SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. The Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $100 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., BOSTON, MASS., OR ST. LOUIS, MO.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties pointing out worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

NEBRASKA—SOIL, CLIMATE, AND PEOPLE.—A pamphlet for 25 cts. CROFFEY & BAIN, Lincoln, Neb.

STAMMERING cured by Bates' Appliances. For Pamphlet, address Simpson & Co., Box 5076, N.Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just published:

WALLACE'S MALAY ARCHIPELAGO.
THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO: The Land of the Orang-Utan and the Bird of Paradise. A Narrative of Travel, with Studies of Man and Nature. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro," "Palm Trees of the Amazon," &c. With Two Maps and Fifty original Illustrations. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

KATHLEEN.
A Novel. By the Author of "Raymond's Heroine." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE PSALMS.
NOTES, CRITICAL, EXPLANATORY, AND PRACTICAL, ON THE BOOK OF PSALMS. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the New Testament," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c., &c. Complete in Three Volumes. Ready, IX. and XI. just ready. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per volume.

BREAKING A BUTTERFLY;
OR, THE CLERISLIE'S ENDING. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," "Brakespeare," "Sans Merci," "Maurice Dering," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above books by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Price.

OC

The Highest Cash Prices

PAID FOR

OLD NEWSPAPERS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION;
OLD PAMPHLETS of every kind;
OLD BLANK-BOOKS AND LEDGERS that are written full;
and all kinds of WASTE PAPER from Bankers, Insurance Companies, Brokers, Patent-Medicine Depots, Printing-Offices, Bookbinders, Public and Private Libraries, Hotels, Steamboats, Railroad Companies, and Express Offices.
JOHN C. STOCKWELL,
29 Ann street, N.Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XIII.—No. 647.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1869. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE SOURCE OF THE JORDAN.

THE well-known master of the Rob Roy canoe (Mr. JOHN MACGREGOR, patron of many benevolent institutions in London, and the solitary explorer of many inland waters in Europe, Africa, and Asia,) has lately been navigating the rivers and lakes of Palestine in that ubiquitous little boat, of which he is both captain and the whole crew. We publish on this page a sketch of one of the most interesting places visited by him. An attack made upon him by some Arabs, who first upon him and captured his canoe, prevented him from tracing the Jordan for one mile in the marsh of Huleh; but, with that exception, he has followed the river's course from its three separate sources. As this course, he says, has never been traced before, and several miles of it are marked by conjecture only, and are quite incorrect, even in the best maps, he describes how that wonderful and sacred river runs: "I brought my canoe from Damascus, round the spur of Hermon, by very rugged roads, with the ice cracking under our feet, and the snow beside our path. The Rob Roy was then launched on the perennial source of Jordan, near Hasbeya, and paddled down until she was transferred to the pool at Dan, where from out of the moist earth there gushes the largest single spring in the world. The third source is at Banias, the ancient Cæsarea-Philippi, where a torrent rushes out of the rock; and then these three rivers, each born full-grown—the Hasbany, the Leddan, and the Banias—converge in the plain of Huleh, and unite in a small lake, called in the Bible "the waters of Merom." To trace the course of the stream through this marsh, eight miles long and four wide, was Mr. MACGREGOR'S object. The Rob Roy was carried to the furthest point where a horse could take her, and then he launched her alone. Having traversed the lake in all directions, and taken soundings and compass-bearings every where, he states the following as his conclusions: "The Hasbany River is the true Jordan. The river Leddan spreads almost at its birth into a hundred streams and gets lost. The Banias and Hasbany rivers each lose one-half of their bulk in this way, but they unite at Tell Sheikh Yusuf. The united stream runs south about three miles, and then spreads into a morass. On this is a vast floating forest of papyrus and cane, perfectly dark inside. I could never penetrate more than 3 feet. I measured one cane, and following 1 foot for the root) it was just 20 feet high. The papyrus is called ardor by the Arabs. Many of the stalks of it are as thick as my arm. The water percolates below and through the spongy morass, and there loses at least half its volume by absorption and evaporation. This impassable barrier is about a mile wide. I reached northward to within a mile of the place I stopped at in going south. The Jordan flows in a stream 100 feet wide and 15 feet deep on the western side of the centre of the morass (not the eastern, as it is given in VANDEVELDE'S splendid map). The lake of Huleh is very irregular in outline. Its upper edge is the only one bounded by reeds and marsh. The bottom is nearly level. It is about 12 feet deep, and in no part more than 20 feet. No part of it is more than three miles across. The whole of the spacious area might be drained dry by a single cut at the southern end. Until it comes to Jacob's Bridge the river flows deep and smooth; but the canoe had to be carried past the long line of torrent."

The highest source of the Jordan, represented in our engraving, is at Hasbeya, under the snowy Hermon. It consists of small springs in the little island above the stone dam represented in our illustration. Under the rock on the right is a deep pool, unapproachable for sounding until the Rob Roy canoe was launched upon it. The water behind the island dries up in summer. Heavy rains make its color a deep brown, and it falls over the dyke in a muddy cascade; but in the middle the unsullied crystal stream from the island spring falls separate in a clear blue stream of its own. The new-born river escapes by the channel on the left, and hurries on, in a winding, foaming torrent, through wild mountains, until it is joined by the Leddan and the Banias from the other two sources. The whole then spreads into the vast floating morass of Huleh, passing through which by a channel three miles long, and first traversed by the Rob Roy, it rests a while in the lake of Merom. With new force then the Jordan rushes on to the Sea of Galilee; and again, by tortuous bends, it runs down to the Dead Sea, which is the lowest depression on the surface of the globe. Here the Jordan is lost; but it ascends to heaven again by the evaporation under a fierce sun; and perhaps the south wind wafts the vapor back to Hermon, to be there congealed in snow, and so to pass once more through a wondrous history; for as mystery cradles the river's birth, so does mystery again shroud its termination.

THE SOURCE OF THE JORDAN.

EXPLORATIONS AT JERUSALEM.

THE topography of ancient Jerusalem, a subject of profound historical interest, has long been disputed by the learned partisans of different speculative theories without adding much to our positive knowledge. The labors of Lieutenant CHARLES WARREN, R.E., with the assistance of Sergeant BIRTLES and one or two other non-commissioned officers, employed during the last two years by the Palestine Exploration Fund, have opened a new series of practical researches. This fund is raised by a society whose objects are the accurate and systematic investigation of the archæology and topography, the geology and physical geography, and the manners and customs of the Holy Land; with a view to Biblical illustration, but with a view no less to the general interests of historical and scientific inquiry. We publish on page 324 illustrations of some of the underground explorations at Jerusalem, conducted by Lieutenant WARREN.

The most important part of these explorations is that relating to the Jewish Temple, the one built by Herod, which stood upon Mount Moriah; and the site of which, now called the "Haram," a word signifying "Rest" or "Peace," and equivalent to the Hebrew "Salem," is still guarded by the Moslem as a very sacred place. Here is the Mosque of Omar, known also as the "Dome of the Rock," and the ground inclosed by the walls that surround the level summit of this rocky eminence has not yet been opened. Lieut. WARREN has been obliged hitherto to confine himself to sinking many shafts outside the Haram Wall, on all four sides of the hill, and burrowing along, in every promising direction, to find the precise external boundaries of the Temple, and its subterranean passages catacumulating with the city and suburbs. We now invite attention to the points specially illustrated by our engravings; and we may first notice the one entitled "Robinson's Arch, Haram Wall."

The ground here shown is the present level of the surface in the filled-up Tyropœon Valley. The view looks northward, the Haram Wall being to the right hand of the spectator. This piece is a very fair sample of the masonry of the wall. Its stones are of various sizes, and one of them, partly visible in the illustration, but partly hidden, is 38 feet long, which is about half the size of one at Baalbec. There is a corner-stone at the southeast angle of the Haram, weighing a hundred tons. The concave front presented by two of the stones here, beneath which the wall is seen going on in the middle of our engraving, had been observed by Dr. Robinson, the author of "Biblical Researches," and it had been suggested by him that they once formed part of an arch. But it has been reserved for Lieutenant Warren to discover the other stones or vestiges of the arch, buried at a depth of 40 feet, and one 63 feet, beneath the present surface of the Tyropœon Valley; proving that they had fallen down into it when the arch was destroyed; from which circumstance it may be inferred that the arch formed part of a grand bridge or viaduct, built across the valley joining Mount Moriah to Mount Zion. He has also found the pier upon which the opposite or western side of the arch was built.

The discoveries at Wilson's arch are no less important. In Robinson's arch, we have only the three first courses of the spring of the arch visible to the eye; but here we have the spring of the sixth course; it is only one of a series forming an approach from the western city to the inclosure of the Temple. To the ordinary visitor walking along this street above, no arch or bridge is visible. The only entrance to this arch is through a door high up, with a rope-ladder for the means of ascent. The wall here is the western wall of the Haram inclosure, the level of which is 35 feet above, and the depth of it is 51 feet 6 inches below. An aqueduct with the water from the Pools of Solomon behind Bethlehem passes into the Temple inclosure over this arch and below the street on the surface. This street leads to what was supposed to have been the Essenian Gate of the Temple, and must have had a fine effect when it stood with its tall piers crossing the valley of the Tyropœon connecting Zion with the Temple. A second wall, meeting the southeast angle of the Haram Wall, incloses the space outside of it upon the hill of Ophel, above the Kedron Valley. It is within this precinct, and in the neighborhood of a watering-place called the Fountain of the Virgin, that the most ancient remains have been made. The most remarkable feature of this place is the system of rock-cut passages connected with the Fountain of the Virgin. One of these is 1700 feet in length, connecting the fountain with the Pool of Siloam. A copy of this guide is given in one of our cuts; also a view of the large tunnel cut through the rock.

Another of our illustrations gives a view of the Royal Sepulchres, at the head of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, or Kedron Valley. It is not many years since these caverns were discovered. There had been very wild speculations regarding their extent. It was believed that they went in for miles under the city, and that they had a passage under the Temple by which the stones were taken for its building. The tradition that the Temple was built without the sound of hammer or tool, but grew up in silence and peace, was quoted on behalf of the theory that these vast caverns were the quarry where the stones were cut and prepared, and that a passage exists by which they were taken to their place.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 22 1869.

THE CUBAN SITUATION.

NOBODY seems really to know any thing about Cuba, but the situation is now said to be this: the patriots are shut up in the mountains with few weapons and no ammunition and with no food but cattle, and they are cut off from vegetables, salt, and other necessaries. Their number can not yet accurately be ascertained. The Spaniards are disciplined soldiers, well equipped, numbering about twenty thousand effective men. The hope of the Spaniards is to starve out the insurgents; the hope of the Cubans is the hot weather, the yellow-fever, and sympathy and assistance from the United States.

The Spanish party in the island, it may not be generally understood, is really composed of native Spaniards. They come to the colony from Spain and engage in various industries with the intention of returning. They are what would be called in Europe the shopkeeping class. The Cubans are the planters, the owners of great plantations, the aristocratic class. There is naturally no love lost between the two. The Spaniards are the volunteers, of whose ferocious feeling so much has been said, and who fiercely enjoy maintaining the rule of their nation over the disdainful Cubans. The slaves are undoubtedly in sympathy with the revolution, as its success promises them freedom.

The Cubans are also reported to have held a Congress recently at Sibanico and to have organized a civil government, with CESPEDES at the head and QUESADA as General-in-Chief. Whether the people were really represented or whether the Congress was a mere form by which those leaders invested their position with an air of popular authority, does not clearly appear, and is of no practical importance, as they are undoubtedly recognized as chiefs by the revolutionary party. This Congress is also reported to have declared that Cuba was fighting for annexation to the United States. The Tribune has discredited the report of the Congress, and said that while the ultimate fate of Cuba was plain, the immediate question is independence. The next day it said that the proposition is to annex Cuba as one of the United States or a continued dependence upon Spain; and already we hear of three new States of the Union in the Gulf. The Herald publishes a telegram that the Spanish chain thrown over Cuba can be called a government, and would have America acknowledge brotherhood with the patriot army; but he adds that he has no wish for Cuban annexation. She must lead the West Indian Confederacy, and "if, after trying that, years hence, she seeks us, then will be time enough to entertain the question."

For that, however, we are not very likely to wait. A very large part of the Cuban property is already in hot of creditors. It uses noble names and fine words. It declaims with energy against oppression, and extols the American principle. Now, there is a true and a false interpretation of principle. The spurious may be discovered at any moment by listening to declamation upon who flatter because they despise, and who pay lip-service to popular principles which they sneer. For ourselves, we are not yet convinced that the blatant body-guard of the late slave system in the United States Senate is entirely to be trusted about freedom, or that leaders of political "rings" are profoundly concerned to secure "popular government" in Cuba. We shall not take leave to suspect whether gentlemen who six years ago were fighting zealously to establish a slave empire in the Southern part of this country are now prepared honestly to found a republic of equal rights in the everblessed isle. The late Mr. WILLIAM WALKER was the father of a numerous family, but he went, and they know, very little about the American principle.

For an oppressed people honestly struggling to be free, as the Cretans are, as the Greeks were in the American war, as the deepest sympathy. It feeds them and clothes them and cheers them in every honorable way. But do the Cubans who are struggling in this city and country, and who are taking money out of the island, expect sympathy for a cause which they desert, or serve only in New York hotels and at the swinging West Street food for Spanish powder? Do they hope to bribe this country to free Cuba by the promise of Cuba when free? Do they imagine that those who will neither fight for their independence nor maintain it when gained are a desirable addition to any nation? If the Cubans in New York would inspire the people of this country as WILLIAM WALKER family, with a hearty enthusiasm for Cuba, let them prove their faith by their works and join Quesada in the field.

Let us, at least, have something to lay hold of. Of the tyranny of the old Spanish rule in Cuba there is no question. Whether the Cuban can govern themselves is another question. That the Cubans ought to be independent of foreign rule if they wish to be is granted. If the Cubans are earnestly fighting for their independence we wish them God-speed. If they have won any victories we are glad of it. But we are all groping in a cloud of ignorance. The trouble began last October. Is it ended? We know about it since? Has there been a Congress? Did it form a government? Has the government any authority beyond the camp? Has it pronounced for annexation? There have been enthusiastic public meetings of sympathy. What light have they shed upon the essential question? Is there an army? Are they only guerrillas? If there are brave men somewhere struggling for liberty all Americans sympathize, but they would like to know something about it.

STATESMEN.

AN article in the Chicago Tribune lamenting the lost prestige of President GRANT'S Administration, has given great comfort to the Democratic papers. It seems to us that the Tribune fails to perceive that the immense and vague and reckless expectation that attended the inauguration could not have been satisfied by any administration whatever; and the reaction of feeling which it expresses was inevitable. But that reaction is not to be unreasonable. The President has undoubtedly made mistakes. The appointment of Mr. WASHBURNE as Secretary of State was one of them, as the Tribune justly intimates. But every President makes mistakes. So do newspapers; and there is none greater than the suggestion that the Administration has lost the confidence of those who brought it into power.

The Chicago Tribune insists that statesmen must do the work of statesmen. Undoubtedly. But it is only by doing that that a statesman reveals himself. Are there a number of ready-made and acknowledged "statesmen" from whom the President is to select a Cabinet? What is a statesman? During the campaign the Democratic papers were constantly contrasting Mr. SEYMOUR, as what they called "a statesman," with General GRANT. But what was Mr. SEYMOUR'S statesmanship? Nothing but the most servile devotion to the political policy of slavery. He had been in political life for a quarter of a century. He was familiar with our political history. He was a fluent public speaker. He was a skilful party manager, as his own nomination last July sufficiently proved. All these gifts, such as they were, this American politician devoted to the perpetuity of human slavery in this country. He was solemnly called a statesman, and at the beginning of the war professed his willingness to sacrifice the Union to slavery. He was still called a statesman, and at the end of the war he was the Presidential candidate of rebels and repudiators. There are a great many people who still seriously suppose that a man who so totally misunderstood the character of his countrymen and the political tendency of the times, whose long political career is associated with no generous purpose or noble sentiment, is a statesman. That is to show how curiously misunderstood the word is. So when Mr. LINCOLN was elected President, there was a shout of contempt at the Albany and Illinois lawyer. Why, it was demanded, "why can't we have a statesman, at least?" After the illustrious administrations of statesmen like BUCHANAN, PIERCE, FILLMORE, POLK, SCOTT, and CLAY, or statesmen like JOHN B. FLOYD, TOUCEY, HOWELL COBB, JEFFERSON DAVIS, JACOB THOMPSON, et cetera, it was intolerable that the country should be ruled under the administration of a boor and a joker. We have lived to see the boor, and the joker, and the third-rate Illinois lawyer honored and beloved as a ruler with WASHINGTON.

Statesmen must indeed do the work of statesmen—but who are statesmen? It is a fine and engaging new name. But where does it apply in the country? How many are there upon whom we should all agree as statesmen? Meanwhile, is it not quite as true that the most important part of government that its administration should be in the hands of sagacious, honest, capable men, in full sympathy with the best American principles? With such the President has surrounded himself; and thus far, whether their names were as familiar, for instance, as those of some members of Congress or not, they have neither discredited themselves, the President, nor the country.

AN ADMIRABLE EXAMPLE.

WE had occasion some weeks since to remark that a worthy person by the name of JAMES FISK, JR., had received himself as a gentleman by the ingenious manner in which he caused Mr. SAMUEL BOWLES to be arrested and lodged in jail for a night. It was his coarse ingenuity and gentlemanly because Mr. BOWLES was a stranger stopping at a hotel, and because his invalid wife was with him. He has now again distinguished himself. A man does not satisfy himself with the cold and niggardly letter of the law, and Mr. BOWLES passed the night in jail. Now nothing is more desirable than to have gentlemen in possession of the decencies and comities of life as Mr. JAMES FISK, JUN., should be constantly held up for the emulation of all generous and gentlemanly persons; and we take great pleasure, therefore, in stating that he has just done another of those acts which are naturally to be expected from such a gentleman.

Mr. NORVELL, of the New York Times, had written something for which Mr. FISK was pleased to call him out, which, it appears by the account in that paper, he intrusted to Mr. CLARENCE SEWARD. Mr. NORVELL lives upon Staten Island, and at six o'clock one evening a deputy from Mr. FISK met an interview between Mr. FISK and Mr. SEWARD, was directed in the most gentlemanly manner to proceed to Staten Island, arrest Mr. NORVELL, bring him to the city, and lodge him also in Ludlow Street Jail. A more gentlemanly proceeding, under the circumstances, can hardly be imagined, and Mr. SEWARD is to be congratulated upon his association of his name with that of his respected client. Nothing could exceed the impressive seriousness of the deputy in the consummation of Mr. NORVELL. It was—it must be presumed —known to Mr. FISK and to his friend Mr. SEWARD, that Mr. NORVELL was intending to elude justice and abscond, and that summary measures alone could defeat his base intentions. That he expected to pass the night quietly at home and to attend to business in the morning, ready to answer any complaint, was not to be supposed of so hardened an offender. Mr. FISK and Mr. SEWARD are not only polite gentlemen, they are sagacious gentlemen, and quite equal to the duplicity of notorious reprobates.

But by an inscrutable dispensation of Providence, Staten Island is in the Eastern, not in the Southern District; and for this, or some other equally mysterious reason, the Deputy-Marshal did not embark for Staten Island, and the two gentlemen, one of whom we are treating were deprived of the legitimate pleasure of baffling the elusive designs of Mr. NORVELL. Despite the gentlemanly plans of Mr. FISK and Mr. SEWARD, the culprit NORVELL passed the night in his own home instead of Ludlow Street Jail, which only proves, we suppose, that he is a more adroit evil-doer than Mr. BOWLES.

The Times informs us that General BARLOW, the new Marshal, with an apparent total disregard of what is due to gentlemen like Mr. FISK, is resolved to prevent his deputies from make of "the instruments of private spite and paltry spleen." But things have come to a pretty pass, indeed, when gentlemen like Mr. FISK are not to be allowed to send those who offend them to jail! What inducement, let us ask, has any body to cultivate the gentlemanly graces of which Mr. JAMES FISK, JUN., is so shining an illustration, if they can not imprison at their pleasure those rascally fellows who write what displeases them in the public prints? Ludlow Street Jail if Mr. FISK can not put offenders into it? We insist that, in this view, Mr. FISK and the jail are made for each other; and he is no better than he should be who tries to keep them asunder.

THE LONG ISLAND RAILROAD.

WE have formerly spoken of the discomfort of the Long Island Railroad, but it has become necessary to speak now of its danger. The late frightful accident by which seventeen were killed has been investigated thoroughly, and the jury returned that "the Long Island Railroad Company are responsible for said accident by neglecting their duty in keeping their tracks in proper order."

It would now, of course, be agreeable to the public to know that some change had been made in the management of the Company, as the one immediately responsible; and it is certainly satisfactory to ascertain that there can be a verdict against it for a Railroad Company. It would, however, have been still more serviceable if the names of the guilty persons had been published in the verdict. A Company is a very vague term, although in the case of the Long Island Road the President, Mr. OLIVER CHARLOCK, is supposed to be a very large and important part of the Company. Where such a verdict, of course, should suits for damages be brought against the Company, the most exemplary amounts would unquestionably be allowed by an intelligent jury. But where the insanity and common prudence are hopeless, it appears, in dealing with the management of railroads. Nothing but a vigorous assault upon the treasury, a reduction of dividends, a consumption of profits, makes an impression.

Various suggestions have been offered as to the cause of the frightful disaster and the accident, all showing that many obvious and essential improvements in construction and management had not been adopted by the Long Island Road. Mr. S. WARD COX states that MANHATTAN atomatic coupling, used by the Erie and other great companies, was not used upon this road. He adds that the Long Island Road is "a mud Road "was and is aggravated by bad spiking, inferior iron, deficient ties, and a scamping of the work generally." Another correspondent says that the timbers were not sound, and, of course, when they were wrenched from their places they turned at right angles with the road and rolled down the cars.

Indeed it was fair to presume that the management of a road which—at least two or three years ago—was so negligent of the ordinary comfort of passengers would not be very solicitous for their safety. A miserly economy upon a railroad does not promise security, and passengers who are thrown off in a snow-bank must not be surprised if they are regarded as cattle. After so solemn and terrible a catastrophe, however, and so emphatic a verdict, we may justly expect a radical reformation of the road, if suits be brought for heavy damages.

THE CITY.

THE Sun, in some forcible remarks upon the necessity of abolishing the present system of Legislative Commissions in the city of New York, says:

"One method, of all events, we are now suffering from, and that is the creation of s feeling on the part of our city officials of entire irresponsibility to our citizens for their conduct. They are not dependent for their power upon the esteem and approbation of those whom they nominally represent: but if they can only win by fair means or foul the favor of a handful of back politicians miles away from here, their places, their patronage, and their perquisites are secure from all danger. They may indulge in the most shameless corruption; may cheat us, rob us, and waste our money at their pleasure, and only half perform their duties, and the Governor bears all the responsibility, and lets them go free."

But does the Sun suppose that if the Health and Police Commissioners were elected by and for the city of New York would be any less at the mercy of "a handful of back politicians?" Does it believe that Tammany is any less liable to "shameful corruption," and that its agents would "cheat us, rob us, and waste our money at their pleasure" any less than the Legislature? The responsibility to our citizens in the city of New York is a mere phrase. It is the irresponsible managers who do the work, and they nominate, and their party obediently elects, precisely such candidates as will be serviceable to them.

The Sun asks whether the police is less costly and efficient than when the Mayor was at the head of it. It is not less costly, certainly, for the city has so grown as very naturally and properly to increase the expense. But as for efficiency, what does the Sun think would have happened if FERNANDO WOOD had been at the head of the police during the July riots of 1863 instead of THOMAS C. ACTON? Recently Mr. OPDYKE was the Democratic mayor, and most zealously co-operated with the Police Board. But Mr. OPDYKE would never have been Mayor if the managers of the Democratic party had not quarrelled. The party to which the rioters belonged elect the Mayor of the city. And the present Mayor of the city last November, the present Governor, Mr. JOHN T. HOFFMAN, issued his official proclamation the sole tendency of which was to protect the bullot-stuffers to whom he owes his present position.

It is the people of the State of New York who are the proper judges of the system which will best regulate that part of their domain known as the city of New York. And the people will not change that system until, as the Sun intimates, they call the Democratic party to power. When they do that, Tammany will take charge of the State as well as of the city, and the gentlemen who rule its councils, and whose hands are now in the queensland jobs of every kind which are pressed upon the Legislature, will rule the State. There are great faults in all party policies as there are bad men in all parties. But what there is in the antecedents, or the present conduct, of the Democratic party to show that it is desirable that it should return to power, we are unable to perceive. Nor that it would do if it absolutely controlled the Legislature the proceedings of this winter plainly show. Let any man carefully study the record of the last session of the New York Legislature, and honestly declare which party most strenuously supported, in proportion to its numbers, the measures which were intrinsically good and wise. The State certainly does not elect the representatives in the Assembly from the city of New York. They are elected by the direct suffrage only in the city. Is it not be judicious to intrust the unrestricted administration of its affairs to those gentlemen?

TRADE AND FINANCE.

THE check at London in the sale of our bonds, though attributed by the public to the distrust of Napoleon, is sufficiently accounted for in the condition of affairs in the great metropolis. Moneyed men have a peculiar sensitiveness on the subject of foreign complications, and they doubtless see in the new phase of the Alabama question, and the supposed American attitude toward Cuba, the possibility of disturbance, which they may think increased by the action of Mexico in opening a port to the Cuban insurgents, a measure which affords facility for aid to Cuba.

The necessity for this check in the sale of our securities is due also to the condition of the Bank of England. The private deposits last month were £20,278,278, against £20,433,000 in April, 1868. The reserve had fallen from £11,587,080 to £7,236,175. The coin had fallen from £20,327,000 to £17,000,151. The circulation was diminished to only £23,637,950 last month, as against £24,412,917 at the same time in 1868. The rate of interest was therefore raised from four per cent. to six and a half, in the expectation that capitalists in London would stop their transactions in foreign securities, and that money would flow in from abroad.

When the rate was raised to 4 per cent. it was noticed that French and other bankers who, until 1866, were attracted by such a rate began to buy in London commercial bills, had given as a reason for abstaining, although the rate was lower in Paris, that they had their purchase, but on the contrary, tempted by the large fortunes attributed to those on the Continent and in England who held our bonds purchased at low rates, investments were made in them at constantly advancing rates, threatening to turn the flow of specie toward this country notwithstanding our excessive imports.

The Bank of England, which is managed to promote the commercial advantage of the kingdom, has undoubtedly sought to arrest the tendency to invest in foreign loans, although there has been no recovery in the general attitude of trade from the depression which has existed since the panic of 1866. The policy has to encounter this difficulty, and the question arises whether our bonds will still prove the more tempting, or investors in London will be satisfied with what their own meagre market affords at low rates of interest. One thing is certain, that an augmented considerable demand abroad for our bonds can not be met without an advance in price on this side, as there are now but few of them in the hands of speculators in the United States.

The check was instantly felt on this side in all the departments of business, showing how intimate are the relations between the two countries, and how immense is the power of the board which manages the Bank of England.

In sympathy with the advance here in gold, which was coincident with the measure and due in part to skillful speculation, business was more active on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of May than it had been immediately before; but the weather was finer, and stocks in the interior are undoubtedly low. The fact is, that until the July account of stock seems to be the policy of many country merchants. The season is late and has been as a rule cold and unexpected. Depression in the price of gold has uniformly depressed business, and if an advance appears to have the character of permanence the opposite result follows, if other circumstances are favorable. But extravagance has exhausted many of their surplus means, and produced a greater amount of prudence than was lately known.

It is not creditable to the sagacity of this country, rich as it is in all that is required for the easy accumulation of wealth, that we are so much exposed as we appear to be to the power of foreign capitalists. We ought at this period of our existence to be as independent of British gold as is political matters, but we are very far from being so; and we shall remain in "leading strings" until we place our finances on the sound footing of the leading commercial nations.

This will continue to be the point of deepest interest to us until we escape from a depreciated currency, as we shall without controversy to others the benefit of our wonderful natural advantages. It may be that in the economy of all-wise Providence we have been subjected to these "leading strings" in order that those who occupy the overcrowded and worn-out portions of the world may share in the advantages which are peculiarly ours in this country, and that some escape from an unwise system will be coincident only with the premium of severe necessity.

The Chancellor of the EXCHEQUER has proposed, as a concession for some advantages to the Government arising from collecting the Income and other taxes earlier than usual, to abandon the duty on sugar refined, and on the shilling per quarter of eight bushels, and reaching a total of £900,000. MR. LOWE in taking this step claims that the tax is a charge on the consumer, and falls heavily on the poor, who consume a greater proportion of bread than is used by the higher classes; but it was contended in opposition that the tax is a tax for freight on corn earned by British carriers, was a charge on the foreign producer, either wholly or in part, and should be allowed for as an offset to the income tax. But the consumer pays the tax was explained on the ground that England, being the largest consumer in the world of foreign food, the tax is to be a reprieve and command the markets of the world on her own terms.

The time when this abolition of the duty shall take effect had not been fixed, but the first of June was mentioned with favor, and it seems not improbable that this tax, which stands as a charge heavy on the poorer class of consumer, may soon be removed to the advantage of this country. The abolition of this tax is partly due to the growing wants of the English for cheap food; but the purchase of it here is greatly obstructed by the advance in freights which attends every renewal of demand for our products. It is to be hoped that this may soon grow into a policy which will restore to us that fair share of the business of carriers upon the ocean to which this country is entitled.

CASTELAR.

A NEW orator has just made himself famous. SEÑOR CASTELAR has proposed the republic as the Spanish form of rule. He has asserted religious liberty against the argument of SEÑOR MANTEOLA, the representative of the Romish ecclesiastical authority, that a free government must bring Spain to his feet, and has sent his name wherever newspapers are read. What the effect must have been we may imagine upon reading such sentences as these in his first speech:

"There is not a single progressive principle which has not been coined in the blood of martyrs. There is not a great philosophical system which extends from the Pyrenees to the sea of Cadiz, for we have been excommunicated since the days of Luther. We have no agriculture, we have no industry, we have no learning, through ascendency of the principle of religion. We tie up the fires of the Inquisition and cast our freethinkers into them. . . . The Church has bewitched the queens and enchanted the kings, and given that terrible history which the slaves of St Patrocinio can not forget. To crown all, the Pope sent the distinction called the Golden Rose to a queen rejected by the conscience of the nation. . . . Let us say that our people are not instructed, and it is true. Yet for fifteen centuries the Catholic Church has had the education of them. Our middle classes now put on religion not as a fashionable dress, but as a necessity, but just as they snatch—to secure them in their property. Our statesmen, or the greater part of them, do not believe in the Catholic Church, but they pay it as an element of order.

At the close of a speech, which, even read and in our imperfect reports, is powerful and eloquent, and which in delivery must have been, under the circumstances, resistless, CASTELAR said: "Why should we not be governed by our great public men, such as SERRANO or PRIM, RIOS ROSAS or RIVERO. Why do we need a foreign king? In short, why can we not have a republic with these men at the head?" This is a question so simple, so natural, so conclusive, that it will continue to ask itself until a republic is established.

But the more remarkable speech of CASTELAR was in reply to MANTEOLA. This ecclesiastic had insisted upon Romanism as the State religion, with all its consequences. It is necessary, said CASTELAR, in reply, that a State be truly free should have great moral bonds, a great sense of rights, of duties—but duties imposed not by civil authority, nor by armies, but by its own reason and its own conscience. This can never be seen among enslaved nations. What does SEÑOR MANTEOLA require? That to be a Spaniard liable to all rights a man must bear a religion forcibly imposed and not freely accepted by his conscience. But the doctrine of the Inquisition, of the Church by the State should end forever. "The State has no religion—it can not have any—it ought not to have any. The State can not confess, the State can not communicate, the State can not die."

SEÑOR CASTELAR proceeded to a historical survey of the doctrine and its consequences, and came again to the Inquisition, considered as a Church. Then this Spaniard, glowing with a feeling that we may imagine, speaking to Spaniards who had the decree of liberty in their power, exclaimed:

"We did not kill the persecuted ones," said SEÑOR MANTEOLA. Mistaful defense! As if the assassin could not be said to have killed his victim, if he gave the dagger! The Inquisition, gentlemen, the Inquisition was the work of the Church. . . . We have not degraded not because we are inferior in intelligence and in talent to the nations of the English race. We have been degraded before as the great moral treasure of liberty of thought—because they have not explained, as we did at once, without light in the conscience, buried in the depths of the Inquisition."

The peroration of this speech was electrical. The conscience, the thought, the hope of Spain had at last found a voice. All that men had not dared to say was now said, and with passionate power. The speech of CASTELAR was not a greater event than the revolution. It aimed to change not merely the form of the Government but its soul. Further debate on Wednesday, May 5, was adjourned. The Cortes crowded around the orator. His speech changed the plans of the leaders. Not improbably it has made Spain a republic.

ECONOMICAL DEMOCRACY.

WE beg our readers to consider the moment who are about to think that the extravagance of the Republican party is so prodigious, to remark the economies of the Democratic party in the management of the State of New York.

The annual tax levies for the city and county of New York, which were not only generous but enormous, were submitted to the Legislature, and they were carefully revised before their passage. The Assembly, or Lower House, is nominally Republican; but the majority has been constantly overcome by the skill of the Tammany leaders. At the last moment MR. A. B. HODGES, of Brooklyn, a member elected as a Republican, introduced a substitute increasing the total of the city levies by some three millions of dollars, and the county levies by a similar sum.

After a vigorous protest from eminent Republicans in the House this infamous bill was passed, and every Democrat in the House, every member of the party that is constantly thundering the horrible words reform, taxation, voted to increase the taxes nearly six millions of dollars! Twenty Republicans voted with them, and secured the passage of the bill; but the opposition was all Republican.

We again remind our readers that when they hear the Republican Legislature of 1869 denounced as the most venal that ever disgraced the State, they are to remember that of the seventy-two Republicans voting fifty-two voted against this cunning iniquity and twenty for it, while every Democrat voting—forty-eight in number—voted for it. The names of the Republicans which should be carefully remembered are MESSRS. BELL, BENUS, BENDER, CALKINS, CARPENTER, GEORGE CLARK, CONGER, CRANE, J. FERRIS, HARRIS, HEGEMAN, HODGES, H. RAY, RICH, SCHOONMAKER, D. STEWART, W. H. STEWART, SUMMERS, THORNTON, and WHITMARSH.

NOTES.

THE next annual meeting of the National Teachers' Association will be held in the city of Trenton, New Jersey, on the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th of August, 1869. Professor J. S. HART, Principal of the State Normal School, has made arrangements for the entertainment of the members upon the most liberal principles. The State, county, or city associations which send delegates are requested to communicate with him. A very large attendance of the teachers and a vigorous discussion of the most vital educational questions are anticipated; and it is supposed that with reasonable effort this may be made the most interesting meeting of the kind yet held in the country. MR. L. VAN BOKKELEN, of Maryland, is the President of the Association; and a hearty welcome awaits all who attend.

A VERY interesting and important historical work is announced as in preparation by the Rev. RAPHAEL DE C. LEWIN. It is the "Histories of the Jewish Congregations of America": a complete account of the rise and progress of Judaism in this country. The immense research necessary to such a work in such a work and the great expense of the publication have hitherto prevented its execution. But upon careful investigation the author has decided that the time has now arrived for the publication. It will be neatly printed and furnished to subscribers at three dollars a copy, payable on the agents upon delivery of the book. Orders and other communications should be sent to REV. RAPHAEL D.C. LEWIN, 17 Brevoort Place, New York.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

FRANK B. CONVEY, aged fifteen years, and one of highly respected parents in North Andover, Massachusetts, shot himself dead on the morning of April 26. He had received a blow to spelling in the school teacher for truancy, which is supposed to have induced the rash act.

Another strange suicide is reported from Iowa. A young boy, a student at Griswold College, Iowa, while riding out with a young lady, May 2, drew a pistol from his pocket and blew out his brains. He was son of Mr. D. B. Clayton, connected with the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Railroad, very influentially. The youth had a revolver, and was playing with it, when it accidentally went off and discharged. He is sport, politics and religion, and lived well, with effect. Prior to his own head, and received the ball from the fatal discharge of the weapon. A fortunate escape for the child.

CHARLES J. GUITEAU, who was convicted on the 31st of May, was acquitted, on the ground that the prosecution had failed to make out their complaint. He was accordingly discharged.

The corner-stone of the lantern at the top of the Public Railroad was laid. It was of polished California granite, weighing about two tons, and silver, is composed by a spike of solid gold costing $200. The completion of the great enterprise will be celebrated by congratulatory connection between San Francisco and the Atlantic coast.

A curious present has been sent to Whittier from Egypt. It is a "Bible text" most beautifully done in the form of a Lord Seal," founded on a tradition of North-Africa, to the effect that the Lord's Prayer, written on a fly bled called by the people on the Amazon the "Mosquito of the Lord," and the Soul of the Lord, or the Lost Soul, is not the cry of a bird, but of a

"The pitiful cost of some fellow
Who has made his own bullets."

This poem so interested the Emperor of Brazil that he translated it very faithfully and poetically into Portuguese, and sent it to the author in a letter.

The working-women of Boston have at length organized a Sewing-Women's Union, the object of which is to educate women until their labor shall be as valuable as that of men, and to secure a just price for it. Between the two sexes. The Women's Club has been in existence for two years, and in connection with regard to the work and wages of women in that city, and many of the leading members of the Union were of the Club.

Recent Conventions and Associations.—The Convention of Commissioners and those interested in educational matters will be held in Albany, commencing on the 25th inst. This will also be generally given some two years ago by Mr. George Peabody, to extend the beneficent influence of the South, has not been diverted from its purpose of the South, and has its institutions in the South-ern cities is producing the best results. The Washington Chronicle says: "There is hardly a Southern city where these schools have not been reorganized and encouraged, and the colored children have been afforded equal opportunities with the children of the whites. How far this interesting work may be aided by the Peabody fund when it shall have matured is some of the towns of the South the smallest permanent basis: while in others, as Richmond, it is found added to the contributions of such as Atlanta, Memphis, Nashville, and Louisville, the fund will be considered, revives and extends what had previously been imperfectly conducted."

FOREIGN NEWS.

CUBA.

The Congress of the Revolutionary party at Sibanicu, on the 10th of April, unanimously adopted resolutions declaring that the party is "desirous for independence from Spain and annexation to the United States." Here is a change in the plans of the Cubans. If they are to be Government is successful. What will follow? General Cespedes proclaimed the Congress. Bayamo, the capital city or village, in the southeastern corner of the island, was captured. Other towns, formerly from Puerto Principe, and almost equally distant from Puerto Principe, and almost equally distant from Bayamo, on the north, have also been captured. Reports already proved a strong desire for annexation to the United States. Spain has elected Generalissimo of the Revolutionary Army.

ITEMS.

Prince Alexander Serjeuitsch Menschi'koff, Admiral of the Russian Navy, died at St. Petersburg, May 2, aged 69.

The Rev. Theodore Cuyler, Society of Paris has decreed a gold medal to Dr. Hayes, of the Arctic Expedition, in connection with the new book of Arctic exploration and discovery.

A revolution, it is reported, has broken out in the State of Guerrero, Mexico. Troops have been sent to the State, and the disturbance is said to be suppressed.

The Cabinet has been formed under General Menabrea as President.

The Florence Nazione says: "Thanks to PIUS IX., who has made Florence save 'Thanks to PIUS IX.,' who has made Florence save 'Thanks to PIUS IX.,' who has made Florence save 'Thanks to PIUS IX.,'

EXPLORATIONS AT JERUSALEM.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

ROBINSON'S ARCH, HARAM WALL.

WILSON'S ARCH, HARAM WALL.

THE ROYAL CAVERNS AT JERUSALEM.

GALLERY AT THE SOUTHEAST CORNER OF HARAM WALL.

ROCK-CUT TUNNEL NEAR THE FOUNTAIN OF THE VIRGIN.

THE CHALLONER-WHITTAKER TRAGEDY, QUEBEC.

THE third day of March last will be long remembered in Quebec, Canada. The skating-rink in St. Lewis suburbs presented the customary lively appearance. The military, civilians, and ladies of the city were well represented. Non-subscribers to the rink were denied admission except when introduced by members. This arrangement allowed but few spectators, among whom, however, on the above day was one whose brow throbbed, and whose heart was smarting under feelings of abused honor and purposes of revenge. This was a youth of sixteen years, small for his age, the son of a respectable citizen of Quebec. He took his stand in the entrance to the boys' dressing-room, and immediately by that of the gentlemen's, when the object of his search, Ensign WHITTAKER, of the Fifty-Third Regiment, who was then in the dressing-room removing his skates, soon passed out to the platform. As the officer passed young CHALLONER raised a Remington revolver and fired, but missed his aim. The sudden explosion caused WHITTAKER to face quickly around, with his arms extended, as if to grapple with his dangerous foe; but before he had time to do more, a second shot was fired, the ball entering his left temple. He fell instantly upon his face an insensible man, and continued so for seven days, when death terminated his melancholy career.

PLACE D'ARMES, QUEBEC, CANADA.

"You know what that is for," said CHALLONER, as his victim fell at his feet. He made no attempt to escape; but surrendered himself to the first peace-officer that appeared, and was immediately taken to jail, to await the result of his desperate act.

Ensign WHITTAKER was twenty-two years of age, stood upward of six feet in height, entered the army in 1865, enjoyed the reputation of a handsome, fast young man, and on the day he received his mortal wound was gazetted a lieutenant. On the third day after his death his remains were conveyed to Mount Hermon Cemetery, followed by the Fifty-third Regiment, the Royal Artillery, and the Rifle Brigade. But few citizens joined the procession, which slowly wended its way through the serpentine approaches to the old citadel. The solemn notes of the bands playing the Dead March, the measured tread of the long procession, and the sad reflections of blasted hopes and happiness that the scene furnished to every mind and pictured upon every countenance, gave the cortège a sickening impressiveness.

The cause of this tragic affair was not long in coming to light, and furnishes another of numerous instances of British officers being admitted into families as gentlemen, while many of them neither care nor are sufficiently honorable to support such a reputation. For months WHITTAKER had been received into the CHALLONER family as a gentleman paying court to Miss CHALLONER, sister of the prisoner, whom he seduced by means of drugs. For a time he silenced her by promises of marriage. To injury he added insult, by accompanying his victim to the church-door, ostensibly for marriage, when he said to her, "Tell the clergyman that I will call another day," and then left her. Legal redress was now sought, when it was ascertained that the law of Quebec does not punish the seducer. On the 3d of March the law-officers were called in to counsel the family. While they were in the house young CHALLONER returned from his office. "We are ruined; there is no hope for us," said his father to him. He rushed away from his sad home, his father's grief, his mother's tears, and sister's dishonor nerving his arm. An hour after he met WHITTAKER and shot him.

The trial, which lasted nearly three days, was impressive and harrowing. To see arraigned at the bar a spirited youth, who bore an excellent character, and who was a general favorite—to see him weeping passionately as his counsel dwelt upon the wrongs inflicted upon his family—to see jurors and an associate judge upon the bench in tears while the prisoner's father and mother reluctantly told their story, was a scene seldom witnessed in a court of justice.

On the morning of May 5 the jury rendered their verdict acquitting the prisoner, who was congratulated by the citizens present, and carried away in triumph.

JOHN H. CHALONER.

LIEUTENANT FREDERICK C. WHITTAKER.

MISS CHALLONER.

INAUGURATION OF THE NEW MASONIC LODGE-ROOM IN BOOTH'S BUILDING, NEW YORK CITY, BY THE PRINCE OF ORANGE LODGE, MAY 1, 1869.

SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 327.]

RECONCILIATIONS.

Or let not thoughts of sullen hue
The hearts that were in union part;
But question straight, and answer true,
And clear them with a sunny heart.

The rain-blue vreaths that arch the dell,
And sweep the mountain's grassy sides,
Would slay its glory did they dwell
Forever on the darkened sides;

But sunbeams come, and breezes blow
The sluggish folds to snowy shapes,
Till leaves and den-set flowerets glow
On all the green and glistening copse.

And so, when friendship scatters pride,
How gayly heart to heart awakes!
Like two far sails that fogs divide,
When suddenly the sunshine breaks.

SPECULATING FOR THE RISE.

A STORY OF WALL STREET IN 1864.

"Most decidedly, my dear, we must alter our style of living. It is impossible with our means to continue in this street, for instance, and we must at once set up a carriage with a span of the finest horses that can be had for money."

"Well, and what else, Mary?"

"The girls must immediately establish fashionable and handsome wardrobes."

"You are one of 'the girls' on this occasion, I presume?"

"Don't be absurd. Next we must take a good house. Several servants will be necessary in fact, there are many requirements entailed by our new position that I really must beg you to think them all over."

"Let me know when you are quite through, and we'll see how much it all comes to. Mean while I'm off for 'the street.'"

Thus Mr. Augustus Bottley, a Wall Street speculator for the rest. The Fates had been propitious. By a series of fortunate ventures he had become rich, as many like him did during the violent fluctuations in gold at various recent periods. Accustomed to the barrack life of a great boarding-house, varied by the annual haul back life of a great hotel in some fashionable watering-place, he now found that a mansion among the Upper Ten when in town and a suburban mansion when out of it were among the necessary properties of his new position. Hence a family consisting of whom the fashionable should arise a new era of luxury and fashion. The family of Mr. Augustus was not large, consisting only of self and partner, with two junior partners, Clifford and Annie. A few words describe the first. Mr. Bottley was one of those men who seem to carry about great waistcoats before them rather than appear clothed thereon, and whose broad, clean-shaven face, expressive tie, and carefully-regulated hair, all spoke volumes of the prosperous man. Mrs. B. was a little lady with a great soul. Not much dressing as yet, her style of dress was the juvenile; having beautiful teeth, she smiled much: handsome locks, she took care of them; a tolerable complexion, she took care of it; and with the knowledge that her feet were symmetrical, was not averse to people in general being impressed with the fact. But it was not with her that made the impression. That was grand. People were conquered by it, and among those who were so conquered by it most completely was Mr. Bottley himself. Clifford was nobody at all—that is, only about seventeen if we consider age only, with a veteran in his own and his accounts of himself among companions were to be believed. He did not trouble him in our story. But the chief of the household was Annie. She was the pet of both parents, and as pretty as she was good. Even her brother conceded that she "wasn't a bad sort—for a girl; and that, though he couldn't see it himself, fellows seemed to experience great delight in her society." And so they did. As to her looks, if blue eyes, golden hair, a slender but perfectly well shaped figure, a merry smile, and a musical voice will do for the reader to realize her appearance, those items of description are freely offered; but as all male readers think a model of beauty, no complete list of attributes, were it a column long, would convey half so charming a picture as was Annie Bottley.

We have spoken of the "fellows" who admired her collectively, but they must stand aside in favor of one in particular. Herbert Foster was a friend of Annie's, his parents and hers having been intimate on terms of acquaintance before their time. In fact, at one time the Fosters and the Bottleys had been striving doubletes side by side in the journey of life, the good roommates, had often helped and cheered each other. Then, one after the other, Stephen Foster and his wife fell by the way; one child only child, Herbert, then ten years old, was left to pursue his travels there or at least with such companionship as his father and mother's gift bounds could give him, and a little fortune of ten thousand dollars. But their sympathies were practical, and the little fellow found in them almost a father; for during several years, till he left school, and all his spare time when he went into a counting-house, was spent in the society of his kind friends and dear Annie. And as centers continued down to the time of our sketch, excepting in one particular. The young couple who had been so much together were by no with the entire approval of the girl's father and mother—for a time. The boy became a man; the girl a woman. The little affectionate ways of childhood were replaced by the timid restraint of those who could no longer meet without emotion, nor whose hands clasp without a thrill. Her mother saw all this, of course, and the father too. But still the entire approval was not withheld—for a time. But the time was drawing to a close; for on the morning when Mrs. Bottley developed her ideas of the new social duties now joined by their new riches, she sat a long time after her husband had gone down town, and thought deeply of what social duties were enjoined by them in respect to her daughter's future.

Mrs. Bottley was not a cruel woman; never meant to be an unkind one even. She had a sincere affection for her daughter, and scarcely less for Herbert. She had watched their growth with pleasure and pride. She had seen with what ease springing up between them had stirred her heart with kind emotion. And if, a short time ago, she had been asked whether the young people were to marry, she would—while, perhaps, replying indefinitely—have whispered to herself that of course they would. But now Annie would be rich—a great match; while Herbert was just a clerk, and nothing more, "with only a begga-ly ten thousand." And so she mused, pondered, rather sadly it must be owned, upon her duty as the world would see it.

As with Mrs. Bottley, so with her lord. Riding down town he rapidly glanced over the daily views of the Wall Street writers, as spread over the money-columns of his favorite dailies, and somehow a new subject obtruded itself among the figures. Herbert's money value and prospects seemed to become an item of the "matter" news, and a poor exhibit they made. Annie stock was away up high above par, and Herbert stock was decidedly nowhere. And when he got out in Park Row a cloud was over his face, which grew darker at every step he took toward the office of the respectable of the Bulls and Bears. To acquire wealth was good; but what was wealth without position? What was to be the position of Annie? To be sure he could establish the young couple handsomely, which would in one sense be pleasant, but business before pleasure was the highest wisdom. The whole subject must be thought over; and if steps were to be taken inimical to Annie's peace of mind, why, the sooner the better was an end of it! Still there was no hurry—for a few days, at all events; and so with cheerful brow the speculator joined the Bulls.

But this particular day was more important than he thought. For some little time the young people had projected a visit to the ever-growing beauties of the Central Park, and, singular as it may seem, had communicated their intention to any one else. By mere chance, too, Mrs. Bottley thought the day suitable for a round of gossiping visits to people, with the delightful subject of her enlarged views of life with a be-duly trotted out, so that when Herbert rang the bell Annie was quite alone, and was more than surprised. The weather was beautiful, and the Park seemed an elysium to the young lovers. We need not enter minutely into their feelings, however, nor set down all their conversation: suffice it to say that, when Herbert left her at the door of her home, he was the happiest man on earth for all aglow, and soon melted into tears of happiness; while he marched away with as proud an air as if he were the happiest man on commercial rich uncle, and had just come into his property. For during that golden afternoon the words had been spoken which united the destinies of the young lives. Not that words were needed, for their looks told the others's heart long before. But now the vow had been pronounced which never should be broken. They had agreed, however, not to confide their hopes to Annie's parents just yet, for which line of conduct she was the first to the least reason so far as they were aware.

The evening dress was ready, and Mr. Bottley was ready too. He had been quite fortunate in the street. Another heap of money had sprung up between certain stocks. A new nothing of value. To them the after-dinner music and reading were more delightful than ever. They had a delicious secret to keep—a secret which cast a hidden meaning to their merry talk and looks. And the father and mother almost sighed as they read to each other's eyes that they were disappearing, for what before had been a source of pleasure to both.

The question was soon discussed by the worthy couple. That very afternoon Mr. Bottley, as many folks having separated, sat with his wife alone in their parlor—he silently smoking, and she silently knitting under the gas-light. "Mary," said he, at length, "are you and I thinking of the same thing, I wonder?" "I have no doubt of it," said she. "Then what is it?" "Why, dear, I've got go on like this, of course," he added. "Of course not," she replied, absently. "Then, again I say, what is it that you and I want to see soon united," said he. "No, nor I," she answered. "Well," said he, "now this thing's got to be looked at from a business point of view. Herbert has, or will have, ten thousand dollars. Annie an almost nothing." "A mere nothing." "A mere nothing!" she echoed. "Now, then, agen, Mrs. B., what do you suggest? The fact is, are we to go to Newport, Saratoga, and give our girl away —throw her away, Mrs. B.—to the highest bidder without money or prospects, just because we happen to have a little money?" "Why, no; we have a liking for him," replied Mrs. Bottley, with some sadness. "But," added her husband, with some irritation, "a kindness to Herbert? Why, the will be able to marry a millionaire!" "Where is your millionaire?" rejoined Mrs. Bottley, with some little irritation on her part also. "Now, Mary," replied he, with a softened manner, for he was just a little afraid of her bent brows, "let's discuss this matter like a Christian. I don't think that they care for each other very much—at least there will be no broken hearts, or rubbish of that sort. Then she has not seen much society yet—of the right sort, I mean. Both of you are made to shine, and should not only shed but reflect lustre upon the new circle that you will adorn. When we are newly fixed up we will gather round us a new set. Good gracious! I know of a dozen rich young fellows that will be at Annie's feet in no time. Yes, I see it all. A suitable establishment, Mary. Obstacles placed in the way of young Foster—social obstacles. New admirers for her, and, girls are but girls, his market will be swamped. Now say no more about it. I see the way clear. All you have to do is to make her appreciate our new position, and teach her how to adorn it. You want no teaching."

Mrs. Bottley smiled at the compliment, and sighed for Herbert and Annie. Annie's visions of the future shut him out from her thoughts. She even shed a few tears silently upon her pillow for the sacrifice, but resolved to think it was her duty, and when she dreamed her dreams were not of him, but of the coming splendors for herself.

Soon after this, less than a month, "young fellows" began to ask each other "had they been invited to Bottley's?" "and they seen the Bottley girl?" who was that young fellow who hung round her?" "and seemed to be engaged very often?" and so forth. For the Bottleys' house was now a mansion, the Bottleys were of the upper ten, or very nearly so, and their remotes were, although not yet quite fashionable, getting on rapidly in that direction. Gold, the magician, had touched Mary B. with his wand, and she seemed to expand in "width and wisdom" every day. Mrs. B. no longer asked the prices of things, but ordered them at once; and Annie, decked out in all the colors of the rainbow, illustrated the aliens of millinors who copy their fashions from the Empress Eugenie's maid, and who never have to sell their experience how a lady should be dressed. Annie was not more happy amidst these changes. Her simple heart was broken in upon, and the life passed before in something like domestic privacy was altered by obtrusive attentions, and the perpetual gayeties that seemed to be her mother reflection nor rest.

But what had her with secret uneasiness was the change which gradually came over the position in the house of her lover. This change could scarcely be called by her imperceptible were its degrees; but it was none the less certain. Herbert felt this and understood it. When, one day, Mr. Bottley called him to dinner, he knew that invitations were for the future unnecessary. He was now a visitor where always before he had been at home. He was ushered to take Annie for a drive, Mrs. Bottley "was so sorry, but Annie was engaged to a matinée, accompanied by Mrs. Devilshoe, and didn't think them charming!" And so throughout. A hedge of forms and ceremonies and occupations was built up between the young couple, which they might penetrate occasionally peep, but which they could not penetrate.

All this excited Annie's dismay at first, and then her indignation. To say the least, there was in it manifest injustice, and she could not but think, cruelly. She resolved it should not last, certainly not without explanation. The opportunity soon came.

Among Mrs. Bottley's new acquisitions was a foreign lady, recommended according to the newest ideas of that sacred retreat. Here she would "receive" a few of her very dearest friends, and exchange the usual gossip in which such retreats are often dedicated. Among those very dearest was Mrs. Deville, whose spouse—an ex-sloper—was one of the millionaire of the class profanely called shoddy. To her came Mrs. Devilshoe one day, and, after being present, the conversation turned upon a ball to be held that evening. "Any body we know to be there?" inquired Mrs. Devilshoe, with affected indifference.

"Any body, my dear! You amaze me! Why, every body is to be there."

"Isn't it delightful. But one must counterance these things, I suppose. Does your charming daughter attend?"

"Certainly. And yours?"

"Well, I suppose so. Poor things! they are pestered to death by invitations; but then one doesn't like to disoblige a friend. I am almost worn out chaperoning them. You see, my girls are much sought after, as is yours also, my dear Mrs. Bottley, and a good partner at a waltz is quite such as we should prefer for." But you understand me, I am sure."

"Very well indeed," Mrs. Bottley. "The subject forms one of my chief anxieties." This with the chief anxieties of Annie, who sat with her eyes fastened upon the pages of a book, which never seemed to turn.

"By-the-by! who has become of that young man—I forget his name—who really seemed quite domesticated with you?" said Mrs. Deville, with affected indifference. "One never sees him now. I thought you were such great friends."

"Yes, he is under considerable obligations to us. He still comes here sometimes, but of course we are very much engaged always."

Annie's eyes flashed, and she bit her lip; but she did not speak a word until after a little more of Mrs. Deville's conversational display had been exhibited, and she had taken her leave. Then did the pent-up agony of wounded pride shake her soul found vent in a passion of bitter tears, as she flung herself upon her knees and hid her face upon her mother's lap.

For a moment a spasm of pain passed over that mother's face, but it was for a moment only. "Annie, get up, child, and tell me the meaning of this."

"Mother, you know already. Oh, how could you—how could you be cruel?"

"I cruel! Again I say, rise and explain yourself."

"Mother, you have just now been speaking of one," replied she, rising to her feet, and looking her mother steadily in the face, "who I thought you loved as dearly almost as—as—" And her voice faltered.

"As you do. Is that what you would say?" said Mrs. Botley.

"As I do," repeated her daughter.

"I thought as much. Now listen, Annie, and don't interrupt. Your papa and I have higher views for you than a marriage with that penniless young man. I grieve for the necessity for telling you this: I thought you would have seen it for yourself. Stay—not a word! I repeat I am grieved that you so little appreciate our position as to deem it possible that we could for one moment think of such a mere spbody as Herbert Foster ever aspiring to your hand. That you must see for yourself."

"I do not see it. What is this position that I should give up my oldest friend, my—"

"Your lover. Do you mean that?" replied the mother, angrily. Then, on a new light broke over her, she added: "Have you engaged yourself to him, may I take the liberty of asking?"

"Mother," replied the daughter, steadily, "I have promised to be his wife."

"Then," almost screamed the mother, "you have been most undutiful—most—most—deluded! Take my word for it, Miss, you shall never keep your promise—no, never!"

"I shall keep my promise," replied Annie, with now increasing calmness.

"You will—you defy me? Now, Annie, this is too much. I was disposed to be patient before, said Mrs. Botley, rather untruthfully; but now that you openly rebel—actually fling your wretched lover in my face—I will not see how it ends. I am never in a passion, but I can be firm, young lady."

"And so can I, mamma." And, with a haughty courtesy to her mother, Annie left the room.

Long and anxious was the certain conversation between the parents of the rebellious young lady that night. Like many people who are secretly conscious of being in the wrong, they encouraged each other in indignant expressions, condemning their child "very severely" for conduct of their daughter. The difficulty was how to meet it. Coercive measures were dangerous. The days of shutting up prisoners in the most lonely towers had passed; nor was that sort of treatment always effectual. Appeals to reason were not altogether possible, for on that point both sides, as they very well knew. Finally, from blaming the girl they fell to scolding each other; and their discussion ended in Mrs. Bottley pulling his night-cap over his ears with a profane grunt, and Mrs. Botley subsiding into angry silent tears.

But Mr. Botley was a man of action; and when bright Phœbus once more climbed into his chariot, and Broadway behind the young Island Sound a plan was already maturing in his brain. Leaving his wife still slumbering he hurried through his breakfast, and was away down town—for he had one now, furnished thoroughly with luxurious literary cabinet-work, and a "genteel assortment" of "hands." Here he was busy, and, as rapidly as if he were telegraphing the price of stocks, wrote a letter—the reader guesses its purport and its destination. Then he "received his compliments," "was amazed, my own surprised," "begged to be excused," "remaining his friend," etc.; and, finally, "hoped that nothing would at present be painful to all parties, he would not trouble him further," "remaining himself," etc. "There," said he, in the height of the document, "that fixes his business, if all can say ha! ha!" And he had a soul when he had done. The note in due time reached its destination, but not alone. The same post brought a second to Herbert Foster. What it was about we shall presently discover.

Next day, and for several days, the three belligerents appeared at a sort of armed neutrality, ther Annie nor her parents approached the subject of their disagreement by word or look. Each, indeed, had been a little afraid that the other was willing to wait developments. One of the three, however, exulted secretly. Herbert studiously avoided the house, and remaining at Mr. Bottley in the street, contented himself with a look of cool. "Clearly he has taken my hint, and himself off," chuckled Mr. Botley, daily; however, with extensive magnanimity, "the lad has his virtue all, and knows his place. I'll make it up to him some day." Strangely enough, Annie makes no complaint of her lover's absence; but then, it was, to satisfactory, eminently so," further soliloquized the father, and then disposed the subject from his mind.

At the end of the story evening society for many New York men was out of town. Entertainments at home and entertainments at the Evening Parties divided their time and attention. Mr. Botley, while encouraging the former, distinctly stipulated that he should not be interfered with in his attendance at the latter. This stipulation was in full force on the night of which we write. Even Annie smiled, though tragically, as for the "dozenth time" "awful Beauty puts on all her charms." We shall not describe the entertainment. "It was splendid" —that description of the guests will do. Mrs. Botley was delighted. Mr. Botley had not appeared, but that was of little consequence: and then Annie had been so good, though Herbert was absent. When "the guests had departed," the lights were all dead," she parted with her daughter with a warm embrace. "Good-night, Annie, or rather good-morning. You have fulfilled almost expectations, and I am much pleased with you. Good-night, mother," said Annie, rather sadly, as she retired into her chamber.

Mr. Botley was asleep, or seemed so, when his wife joined him, and, utterly fagged out, she soon followed him into the land of dreams. When, late next day, she awoke he was gone. The whole house was a late riser that morning; they likely he had gone to his office at breakfast.

By degrees the domestic establishment of the Botleys came to itself. From basement to roof the daily sounds of life renewed themselves. "Mistress's bell!" said one servant, and the activity around increased. Mrs. Botley would rise. Her maid was in requisition. "Go to Miss Annie's room," said the lady to that functionary, "and see if she will be up soon. Give her my love, and ask her how she is."

"Yes, m'm," answered the maid, and departed on her mission.

Soon she came flying back aghast. "Oh, please, m'm, Miss Annie isn't there, and nobody don't know where she is; and she haven't slep' in her bed!"

Run all over the house and look for her," faintly replied her mistress, turning pale. "I'll dress myself. Can it be?" she faltered, as she hurriedly rushed through her toilet. "Surely Annie would have to be so wicked as to—"

"Oh, m'm," cried the servant, bursting into the room again, "we can't find her nowhere, and cook says the policeman says as he found the front-door open early this morning and pulled it to with the latch."

With an agony of fear the mother rushed to her daughter's chamber. It was true—she had flown! The costly ball-dress lay upon the floor, and a plain suit with appropriate outdoor gear was missing. Hardly waiting to note these facts she hurried down stairs and called a male servant. "Take the quickest conveyance you can find; go to Mr. Botley's office; find him wherever he is; tell him to come home instantly, instantly—do you hear? Tell him that—no, tell him only that he must return without a moment's delay." The man vanished, and the woman sank upon a chair, feeling as if stunned. She had no one to advise her. Oh, that her husband were here!

Those hours of waiting—how dreary they are even when no calamity is impending; how dreary Mrs. Botley found them now! Every minute seemed an age. But the messenger did his work well, and returned quickly. "Well," she exclaimed, with some excitement, "is he coming?"

"I am very sorry, Madam, but I fear not."

"Not coming? Man, what do you mean?"

"I found him from his office to the Gold Room, Madam, and sent a message for him to come out. He said he was too busy. I then sent again and said, I told him he must come, and that you insisted upon it, and then he sent a message out that—But I don't like to repeat it."

"Never mind. Do not spare me. I could not be more wretched than I am."

"Well, Madam, I'm sorry, I'm sure. He couldn't have meant it, but he did say that you and me might go to the devil together, for he himself was half-way there already."

As these cruel words passed the man's lips the distressed wife and mother uttered a loud shriek and fell senseless upon the floor.

That day was a day of double agony in the broker's mansion. When she recovered from her swoon, her self-possession was gone, and she called her in this. But the crowning shock came when, as Botley rushed in suddenly, frightening her by his extreme excitement, and the sight of their loss, he swore a great oath that both she and himself were fools, and if the daughter had run away with young Foster all the better.

"What do you mean to do?" inquired the terrified mother.

"Nothing at all," said he, savagely.

"What has changed you in this extraordinary manner, Mr. Botley?" asked she, gaining courage.

"Now, wife, I want you to let me alone. You may do as you like, but I am going out directly." And slamming the door to it shut almost as suddenly as he had come in. There was no help for it.

The evening sped on. Night came. No Annie. Worse than all, Mr. Botley came home very late, drunk and furious. He upbraided his wife, nay, swore at her with bitter oaths. She had caused him, he yelled, to rush into extravagant follies; he was eaten up by such long-purses her parties and her finery had crippled his resources. And when she begged him to go to bed and recover himself, he blundered in her horrified ears the awful word, ruin, ruin! Let us draw the curtain over that miserable night.

They were weary eyes which met the next morning's light. The day seemed but another beginning of wretchedness. The breakfast-table, with its costly appointments, mocked at those who sat at it. Husband and wife exchanged no words. She feared to ask the meaning of his incoherent exclamations of the night before, and he was moody and abstracted. At length, with a painful effort, he spoke:

"Mary, forgive me, but I was very miserable. I tried to drown my cares last night and only became a madman."

"Not another word, Theophilus. This is no time for recriminations. Only tell me what those cares were. Confide in me. You used to do so once."

"Mary, things have gone wrong. Gold has gone down twenty per cent. in three days, and I have gone down with it. I am on the verge of total ruin. If I can't get hold of ten thousand dollars this very day, and I don't know where to look for it—"

A telegram for you, ma'am," interrupted a servant, who entered and placed a packet before her mistress.

Mrs. Botley tore it open, and read the message, trembling like a leaf the while. Then she handed it to her husband. "We are married," it said, "and are at the Staten Island Hotel. Do you and papa love us enough to take us back?"

"Hurrah! hurrah!" shouted he. "I see good in this. I'm off right away."

"But," anxiously inquired she, "about the forgiveness—"

"All right," he replied, "I forgive; don't say a word till I am back."

"How long?" asked his wife.

"Five or six hours will do." And he was gone.

An hour afterward a young couple sat with mingled anxiety and happiness on their faces at a hotel in Staten Island. They need no introduction except as in their new relationship of Mr. and Mrs. Foster.

"It seems a long time," said Annie. "There has been plenty of time for an answer."

"Plenty, indeed," replied Herbert. "Perhaps one or both will come—perhaps never see us again."

As the words left his lips Mr. Botley rushed in. "My children!" he exclaimed, and embraced his daughter. Of course this was according to a little dramatic programme which he had arranged; but no matter.

"Can you forgive us, Sir?" said Herbert, not without trepidation.

"Forgive you, my boy! I do from my heart. Can you forgive me?" said Mr. Botley, cheerily.

"Forgive you, Sir! You have been always kind. What is there to forgive? True, we eloped—Annie and I—but we might not be separated, and so took the bold step which—"

"No more—no more. Come home at once. And as for Foster, some day I will explain why it was written."

"What letter?" said the young couple both at once.

"Ahem! Well, I should say, if you received a letter, Herbert—"

"I have received none, Sir, believe me."

"Capital!" said Mr. Botley to himself. "Out of no consequence," said he, aloud. "Come away at once. Your mother will be impatient to see you. I shall send Annie on first, Herbert, and you can come into Wall Street with me for a little while. I have business."

And so it was arranged.

We shall not enter into business details as to Mr. Botley's operations in the stock-and-bullion line. Herbert's ten thousand dollars, however, was the chief subject of it. That sum Mr. Botley borrowed on security which was perfectly safe, though realizable from no other source than the new son-in-law. And Mr. Botley was relieved.

That night the family circle assembled in full conclave, and mamma, with some tears, told all the story. "I have a reason for being candid," said she. "We have had a taste of splendor, and have narrowly escaped losing all. We are going back to a quiet life, and will never be less happy for being safe. Let all my unkindness be forgotten. Riches changed my heart, but only for a time."

"Oh, how happy you make me—make us both!" cried Annie. Then she added, after a pause: "Papa, where's my curiosity, papa; but you spoke of a letter—"

"A word!" interposed Herbert. "I have found a letter, Sir, which I put into my pocket and forgotten until this evening. Here it is. Am I right, my now father, in putting it unread into the fire?"

"I shall be extremely obliged to you if you will," said Mr. Botley.

And it was done.

THE NEW MASONIC LODGE-ROOM.

THE opening of the new Masonic Lodge-Room in Booth's Building, corner of Twenty-third Street and Sixth Avenue, in this city, took place on the evening of May 1. The reception was given by the Prince of Orange Lodge, No. 16, A. F. and A. M. A large number of select guests were present, a good proportion of whom were ladies. This was not a formal dedication of the room, and the proceedings were of a purely social character, STEPHEN H. TYNG, Jun., delivered a short address of welcome.

The new Lodge-room is the finest and most elegantly furnished of any in the city. The walls and ceiling are beautifully colored, and frescoed in a very chaste and artistic manner, the latter being ornamented with Masonic designs. The hangings are of rich scarlet cloth, trimmed with velvet of the same color, and the floor is covered with a magnificent carpet. The furniture is remarkably solid in appearance, and at each end of the room is a raised dais for the use of the officers of the lodge. The cornices are massive yet elegant, and the gas fixtures are in good taste and excellent keeping with the rest of the fittings. The room has been fitted up by Mr. EDWIN BOOTH, under the immediate supervision of the architect of the building, JOHN A. ROBERTSON. The room contains a very powerful organ.

The following gentlemen were the officers of the Lodge: W. M., E. E. THORNE; S. W., T. B. CLARKSON; J. W., G. E. SCOTT; Chaplain, S. H. TYNG, Jun.; Secretary, J. H. CHAPMAN; J. D., T. R. DAVIES; Treasurer, GEORGE SANDERSON; Secretary, A. S. GARDINER; Marshal, G. C. AMES; Tiler, R. ENGLAND.

INSECTS IN AUSTRALIA.

THE approach of summer (at the end of September) is heralded to us by the increase in the insect tribe. Fortunately, the different species do not all appear at the same time, otherwise madness or death would be the result to the poor victims. In the winter a large species of fly comes into existence, a most unsightly animal, but not personally hurtful; then, as summer approaches, these make way for sand-flies, armed with a weapon considerably larger than a needle, capable of producing most intense pain, and wine-flies, who find their way every where and into every thing, eyes, nose, mouth. All sorts of estables form an attraction too great for them to resist. These in turn die out, and are succeeded by the dreaded mosquito, concerning whose ferocious instincts we need not here dilate. These are accompanied by a perfect plague of the common house-fly, whose unremitting attentions nearly succeed in adding the last straw to the burden and killing you outright. The summer also brings enormous hornets and wasps of a most peculiar form and fearful sting; and last, but not least, ants, who are distressingly active and persevering when there is any thing in the shape of food. Ordinary wood exists that will defy their teeth, that is mahogany. Of all other woods they take a pleasure in eating out the interior, so that some morning your favorite falls to the ground, and the ants, quite satisfied with their work, retire to some other part of the premises. The following is one of the varieties with which we are most acquainted:

The sergeant ants, over one inch long, armed with a small sword, filled with some virulent poison. Eight of these have been known to kill a horse. These do not come into your houses in large numbers, but sometimes you inadvertently sit on their nests, when they soon make you aware of their vicinity. Second in order are the white ants (fortunately an outdoor ant), armed with a bo no means insignificant sting, who persist in making their nests just exactly in your bed, to be in readiness for any thing thrown out; you toss a bone to the dog, it is instantly covered by these insects, and even to the rash dog who attempts to dispute possession of it with them; he might as well cut off the hydra's heads, for, kill as many as he likes, thousands are ready to take the place of their dead brethren. The next are the black ants, quieter than their brethren; and then appears a most obnoxious little insect, who will persist in getting into every kind of food; nothing is safe from its ravages, and nothing but water will secure in order in pursuit of food. Another variety is the white ant: this gentleman despises human food, and pays his attention to articles of dress, or stuffs of any sort, boots and shoes, his taste ranging from articles of the hardest texture to the softest materials. Then we have the spider race, with large hairy heads, and several other kinds, who, keeping principally out of doors, have not yet attracted much attention. We might say much concerning centipedes, tarantulas, scorpions, lizards, and snakes, but must reserve ourselves for the present.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SAID I to little brother Howard: "There! your toes roll out of your boots again; scoot up to my bay-wear out in a hurry." Giving a comical leer he said to me, with a knowing wag of his head at the boots?" "No." "Because toes wiggle, and heels don't."

THE FIRST ONE FELLOW—ADAM.

Every bird pleases us with its lay—especially the hen.

The boy who was caught looking into the future has been arrested for trying to see the show without pay.

A subscription paper, circulated for some charitable purpose, was presented to a wealthy Dorcas, manufacturer, who subscribed twenty francs. "Twenty francs!" said the lady who presented the list to him: "why, you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Your son has subscribed fifty francs." "That is all very well," replied the manufacturer; "my son has a rich father, and can afford to give more than I, who shall not inherit any thing."

Upon what object in nature has every author written?—Upon the subject.

DECEIT OF SONG-WRITERS.

The man who wrote "Old Arm Chair" never had an arm-chair in all his life. The best he had was an old cob-bottom chair without any back to it.

